The Princeton Encyclopedia of Islamic Political Thought

Editor

Gerhard Bowering
Yale University

Associate Editors

Patricia Crone
Institute for Advanced Study

Wadad Kadi
University of Chicago

Devin J. Stewart
Emory University

Muhammad Qasim Zaman
Princeton University

Assistant Editor

Mahan Mirza
Zaytuna College

Contents

Introduction vii

Alphabetical List of Entries xxi

Topical List of Entries xxv

Contributors xxix

Maps xxxv

Entries A–Z 1

Index 607

Introduction

The Islamic World Today in Historical Perspective

In 2012, the year 1433 of the Muslim calendar, the Islamic population throughout the world was estimated at approximately a billion and a half, representing about one-fifth of humanity. In geographical terms, Islam occupies the center of the world, stretching like a big belt across the globe from east to west. From Morocco to Mindanao, it encompasses countries of both the consumer North and the disadvantaged South. It sits at the crossroads of America, Europe, and Russia on one side and Africa, India, and China on the other. Historically, Islam is also at a crossroads, destined to play a world role in politics and to become the most prominent world religion during the 21st century. Islam is thus not contained in any national culture; it is a universal force.

The cultural reach of Islam may be divided into five geographical blocks: West and East Africa, the Arab world (including North Africa), the Turco-Iranian lands (including Central Asia, northwestern China, the Caucasus, the Balkans, and parts of Russia and the Ukraine), South Asia (including Pakistan, Bangladesh, and many regions in India), and Southeast Asia (the Indonesian archipelago; the Malaysian peninsula; Singapore; and minorities in Thailand, the Philippines, and by extension, Australia). Particularly in the past century, Islam has created the core of a sixth block: small but vigorous communities living on both sides of the Atlantic, in Europe (especially in France, Germany, Great Britain, the Netherlands, and Spain), and the Americas (especially in Canada, the United States, the Caribbean, and Argentina).

Islam has grown consistently throughout history, expanding into new neighboring territories without ever retreating (except on the margins, as in Sicily and Spain, where it was expelled by force, and the Balkans, where it is now regaining its foothold). It began in the seventh century as a small community in Mecca and Medina in the Arabian Peninsula led by its messenger, the Prophet Muhammad (d. 632), who was eventually to unite all the Arab tribes under the banner of Islam. Within the first two centuries of its existence, it came into global prominence through its conquests of the Middle East, North Africa, the Iberian Peninsula, the Iranian lands, Central Asia, and the Indus valley. In the process and aftermath of these conquests, Islam inherited the legacy of the ancient Egyptian and Mesopotamian civilizations, embraced and transformed the heritage of Hellenistic philosophy and science, assimilated the subtleties of Persian statecraft, incorporated the reasoning of Jewish law and the methods of Christian theology, absorbed cultural patterns of Zoroastrian dualism and Manichean speculation, and acquired wisdom from Mahayana Buddhism and Indian philosophy and science. Its great cosmopolitan centers—Baghdad, Cairo, Córdoba, Damascus, and Samarqand—became the furnace in which the energy of these cultural traditions was converted into a new religion and polity. These major cities, as well as provincial capitals of the newly founded Islamic empire, such as Basra, Kufa, Aleppo, Qayrawan, Fez, Rayy (Tehran), Nishapur, and San'a', merged the legacy of the Arab tribal tradition with newly incorporated cultural trends. By religious conversion, whether fervent, formal, or forced, Islam integrated Christians of Greek, Syriac, Coptic, and Latin rites and included large numbers of Jews, Zoroastrians, Gnostics, and Manicheans. By ethnic assimilation, it absorbed a great variety of nations, whether through compacts, clientage and marriage, persuasion, and threat or through religious indifference, social climbing, and the self-interest of newly conquered peoples. It embraced Aramaic-, Persian-, and Berber-speaking peoples; accommodated the disruptive incursions of Turks and the devastating invasion of Mongols into its territories; and sent its emissaries, traders, immigrants, and colonists to the lands beyond the Indus valley, the semiarid plains south of the Sahara, and the distant shores of the Southeast Asian islands.

By transforming the world during the ascendancy of the Abbasid Empire (750–1258), Islam created a splendid cosmopolitan civilization built on the Arabic language; the message of its scripture, tradition, and law (Qur'an, hadith, and shari'a); and the wisdom and science of the cultures newly incorporated during its expansion over three continents. The practice of philosophy, medicine, and the sciences within the Islamic empire was at a level of sophistication unmatched by any other civilization; it secured pride of place in such diverse fields as architecture, philosophy, maritime navigation, and trade and commerce by land and sea and saw the founding of the world's first universities. Recuperating from two centuries of relative political decentralization, it coalesced around the year 1500 into three great empires: the Ottomans in the west with Istanbul as their center, the Safavids in Iran with Isfahan as their hub, and the Mughals in the Indian subcontinent with Agra and Delhi as their axis.

As the Islamic world witnessed the emergence of these three empires, European powers began to expand their influence over the world during the age of global discoveries—westward across the Atlantic into the Americas and eastward by charting a navigational route around Africa into the Indian Ocean—there entering into fierce competition with regional powers along the long-established network of trade routes between China on the one hand and the Mediterranean and East Africa on the other. The European exploration of the East and growing ability to exploit an existing vast trade network, together with the inadvertent but eventually lucrative "discovery" of the New World, were to result in Europe's economic and political hegemony over the Islamic world, with which it had rubbed military and mercantile shoulders since the early Muslim conquests. The early modern Islamic world (and much of the rest of the world) fell behind the West economically and politically with the advent of the Enlightenment in the 18th century and the Industrial Revolution in the 19th century.

By about 1800, small European nations (e.g., England, France, and Holland) had established rule over large regions of the Islamic world. Their trading companies and imperial outposts in distant Muslim lands were transformed into colonies of European supremacy that were eager to benefit from Western industrialization. It took until the end of World War II for the global geopolitical map to become reorganized into an array of discrete nation-states on the European model. Muslim nations perceived Islam not only as the way of life led by the majority of the population but also as the source of normative principles for social order.

In the 19th century, two diametrically opposed trends would preoccupy the Muslim intelligentsia in their effort to bring about social and religious renewal. Modernism proposed adapting Islam to Western ideals, while revivalism advocated restoring the vigor of the original dynamics of Islam; neither approach would lead to the utopia of a Pan-Islamic caliphate. Islam was now challenged to express itself within the framework of independent nations, with their focus on ethnicity, territoriality, and culture.

At the beginning of the 20th century, the Islamic world witnessed the explosion of Turkish secularism; in its middle period, it sought sovereignty and honor in Arab, Iranian, Pakistani, and Indonesian nationalism; at the end of the 20th century, it became increasingly dominated by militant trends. "Islamism," a fundamentalist reaction to Western ascendancy, called for an Islamic state rigorously based on Islamic law; its public image was dominated by marginal yet high-profile extremists who advocated the use of terrorist attacks and suicide martyr missions to achieve this end. Both Sunni and Shi'i expressions of Islamism—in Algeria, Sudan, Iran, or Afghanistan—were inspired by their belief that if only Muslims were to return to their religious roots, God would grant them success in this world and bliss in the next. The past glory of the Islamic world would be restored, and the West would again study at its feet.

At the beginning of the 21st century, the world has drawn closer together through the power of advanced technology and the speed of global communication, including ubiquitous access to mobile phones and the Internet. Those advances enabled the annihilation of the Twin Towers in New York City on September 11, 2001, and other acts of terror that have occurred since that date. Yet they also may be nurturing a different response of Islam to the modern world, as rumblings of freedom, cries for liberation from corrupt regimes, and calls for democratic forms of government echo from Muslim lands through cyberspace. The nonviolent but persistent 2011 demonstrations in Freedom Square in Egypt may be a sign of a transition from organized martyr-murderer movements to coordinated peaceful agitation for political liberty, respect for human rights, and free exercise of religion for the many polities of Islam.

The Evolution of Islamic Political Thought

The development of Islamic political thought tracks the differing positions Islam has occupied during its political expansion over the course of 14 centuries. Just as Islamic history both preserved its tradition and reshaped its internal culture consistently over this period of expansion, so did Islamic political thought maintain certain principal foundations while undergoing successive stages of evolution. The foundations of Islam neither allow for distinctions between spiritual and temporal, ecclesiastical and civil, or religious and secular categories, nor envisage the same duality of authority accepted in Western political thought as standard, such as God and Caesar, church and state, clergy and laity. Over the centuries, Islamic forms of state and government, power and authority, and rule and loyalty have exhibited great diversity. Although they were all based on the premise of a unity of religion and state, it has nonetheless been impossible for Islam to formulate a norm of political thought that would stand above and apart from its various cultural permutations.

In contrast to the West, the respective realms of religion and state are intimately intertwined in Islam and subject to a process of fluid negotiation; the concepts of authority and duty overshadow those of freedom and the rights of the individual. Islamic political thought not only deals with matters of government, politics, and the state but also addresses questions of acceptable behavior and ethics of both the ruler and the ruled before God. Islamic political thought cannot be measured by Western criteria and standards of political theory. It must be understood from within its own tradition, characterized by a vibrant integration of the secular and sacred in obedience to God and His Prophet. In its very nature, Islam is dynamic, not static, both as a way of life and as a way of monotheistic worship. It is a living reality rather than a frozen system.

Rudimentary but enduring foundations for Islamic political thought were laid beginning with the Prophet's career in Medina. Significant divisions, however, came to the fore under the Umayyad caliphs (658–750), the first Arab dynasty ruling from Damascus. Arabic, the language of Muhammad and his early successors (632–61), was propagated by the conquests of Islam and became established as the language of high Islamic culture and political thought during the caliphate of 'Abd al-Malik (r. 685–705). On the criterion of its scripture (kitāb), Islamic political thought enforced the basic principle of obedience to God and His Prophet. That principle was articulated in the nucleus of its creed, the shahāda, and extrapolated in oral tradition by the early practice of the community, modeled after the Prophet, which is known as the sunna.

The Umayyad rulers belonging to the Quraysh, Muhammad's tribe, claimed to be the rightful caliphs as heirs to the Prophet but saw their leadership challenged by both the Shi'is, who reserved legitimate leadership for Muhammad's family, and the Kharijis, who advocated that the most meritorious Muslim be the ideal caliph. By the end of the Umayyad caliphate in 750, the stage had been set for Islamic political thought to evolve through five successive periods, the trajectory of which may be summarized as follows.

750–1055. The early medieval formulations of Islamic political thought during the ascendancy of the Abbasid caliphate at Baghdad developed in three directions: those of the clerical class of administrators (kuttāb), the schools of legal scholars ('ulama', fuqahā') and theologians (mutakallimān), and the circles of philosophers (falāsifa). Over a period of five centuries, in particular during the caliphates of Harun al-Rashid (r. 781–809) and Ma'mun (r. 813–33), Islamic thinkers integrated the thought patterns of a great variety of peoples, absorbing the intellectual systems brought into its fold by the converted populations of the Iranian empire and the Byzantine provinces. It appropriated the legacy of their learning and the acumen of their political experience with the help of comprehensive translation movements from Greek and Pahlavi into Arabic.

1055–1258. During this stage, Islamic political thought had to address the upheaval caused by Sunni Turkic nomads from Central Asia. Turkic sultans gained effective military control and cut into the economic and administrative strata of an Iran-based society, nominally ruled by the Abbasid caliphs. The Turkic Seljuqs neither intended nor attempted to impose their language, culture, and seminomadic social order on the fabric of the Islamic polity; instead they wholeheartedly adopted Islam as their religion and promoted Persian next to Arabic as a language of higher learning.

1258–1500. After the demise of the attenuated Abbasid caliphate of Baghdad in 1258 during the Mongol invasions, Muslim political thinkers were forced to come to terms with three new political powers in the east: (1) Ilkhanid and then Timurid rule in Iran and Iraq, (2) khanate rule of the Golden Horde from Siberia to the Caucasus and from the Urals to the Danube River, and (3) Delhi-based sultanates in India. Farther to the west, it saw military control pass into the hands of Mamluk Turks and Circassians who, uprooted from their homelands as military slaves, were sold into the households of their patrons and emancipated as converts to Islam to serve as soldiers in the Mamluk armies in Egypt and Syria. Control of the polity was thus usurped by a medley of foreign khanates and slave sultanates, each attempting to claim legitimacy through the manipulation of Islamic symbols of just rule and institutional affiliation with Sufi shaykhs. Faced with this fragmentation, Islamic political thinkers sought to find new paradigms that reflected the effort to overcome the tumultuous breakdown of order. Nonetheless, despite having to endure the devastations of Chingiz Khan (1167–1227) and Tamerlane (1336–1405), the conquered Islamic community managed to integrate the foreign conquerors into its religion and polity.

1500–1800. From about 1500 onward, the division of the Islamic world into sultanates was succeeded by the rise of three separate and flourishing monarchic empires, none of which used Arabic as their official language of discourse and administration. The Turkish-speaking Ottomans, who had conquered Constantinople in 1453 (now named Istanbul as their seat of government), added Syria and Egypt to their empire in 1517 and eventually adopted the title and the legacy of Sunni caliphs. Adopting the Persian idiom, the Safavids established themselves in Iran in 1501 and transformed it into a theocratic Imami Shi'i monarchy. The Mughals, developing a Persian-speaking culture, established their predominantly Sunni rule over India with their victory at Panipat in 1526. In this new threefold constellation, political theory was made to serve the particular vision of rule of each empire rather than that of a universal caliphal culture, and thus Islamic political thought was shaped according to three different modes. Decline set in for all three empires in the 18th century: in the Ottoman lands after Russia gained access to the Black Sea and the Dardanelles in the Treaty of Küçük-Kaynarca (1774) and Napoleon landed in Egypt (1798–1801); in Iran after the murder of Nadir Shah in 1747 and the Qajar accession to power; and in India with a long, agonizing decline after the death of Aurangzeb in 1707 that terminated when the last Mughal emperor was deposed by the British in 1858.

From 1800 onward. The multifarious search for rationales of Islamic political thought from 1800 onward struggled with a situation the world of Islam had never encountered before in its history. It was challenged by a Western culture that had entered its ascendancy. For the first time, Islam neither had the power to conquer nor the capacity to absorb the opposing culture. In response to this anxious and often desperate situation, there gradually emerged revival movements and nationalisms in the Islamic world, whose ideologies covered the spectrum from puritanism, reformism, modernism, secularism, nationalism, and socialism to the extremes of fundamentalism, often termed "Islamism." Its apogees are represented on the one hand by the Iranian Revolution of 1979 and on the other hand by the terrorist attack of September 11, 2001, on the United States.

Rudimentary Foundations of Islamic Political Thought (from Muhammad to 750)

Both Islamic history and Islamic political thought began in the twilight of Late Antiquity with the hijra, the emigration of the Prophet from Mecca to Medina in 622. During his prophetic career in Mecca, Muhammad preached with the expectation of apocalyptic end times, focusing his listeners on their future in the hereafter and reminding them of their individual accountability before God. In Medina, he changed course, dominated by the urge to establish the collective religious unity of a community that would enter history here and now and shape a polity in this world. Once the proclamation of the Qur'an came to an end with the death of the Prophet, eschatological concerns faded; Muslims focused on the victories of the Arab conquest and the resulting exigencies of empire building and the shaping of polity. The caliphs took charge in their succession to the Prophet as leaders of the community. The crisis (fitna) of fraternal wars of succession within the ranks of the believers pitted insiders against outsiders, early Arab Muslims against new client converts, orthodox against heterodox, tribes against tribes, regions against regions, and dynasties against dynasties. It gave rise to sects and parties but, ultimately, did not dismantle the body politic even though, from the ninth century onward, it allowed for the separation of political functions between caliphs, military amirs, and viziers administering the state. Neither the bifurcation of the caliphate in the middle of the tenth century into the Muslim East under the Buyid amirs in Baghdad and the Muslim West under the Fatimid caliphs in Cairo (and the Umayyad caliphs in Córdoba) nor the influx of Turks and Mongols in the middle of the 11th and 13th centuries destroyed the cohesive but highly flexible structure of the Islamic polity.

Early medieval Islamic political thought proved masterfully able to build on the rudimentary foundations of the earliest phase of Islam. Although the Qur'an was not designed to be a book of political thought, it included language that Muslim political thinkers adopted in their formulation of essential concepts. In addition, Muhammad's organization of Medinan society through the Constitution of Medina offered a model of applied political thought and a glimpse into the Prophet's pragmatic approach toward the creation of a new polity. The first four caliphs conquered and quickly established themselves as administrators of the core lands of the future empire and encapsulated their political vision in short directives and instructions. In Umayyad times, the caliphs defended Muslim interests, regarding the state as their family's benefice. The people, most of whom were non-Muslim, were regarded as clients under the caliph's patronage, providing the tax revenue needed by the state. As deputy (khalīfa) of the Prophet, the ruler oversaw the law and demanded unconditional obedience on the part of his subjects. Differing views about government and society were put down decisively as manifested by the neutralization of the Shi'is and the suppression of the Kharijis. In the dying days of the Umayyad caliphate, the scribe 'Abd al-Hamid (d. 750), founder of the Arabic epistolary style, began a tradition of giving advice to the ruler on personal conduct, administrative and ceremonial matters, and the conduct of war.

Islamic Political Thought in the Early Middle Ages (750–1055)

Upon the accession of the Abbasids as rulers of the empire in 750, the caliph acted as the protector of religion and state (dīn wa-dawla) and his government as God's shadow on Earth under whose sheltering protection everyone could find refuge. The clerical class (kuttāb) undertook impressive Arabic translations of Persian treatises on Iranian political institutions—a movement spearheaded by its principal proponent, Ibn al-Muqaffa' (ca. 720–56), the champion of the courtly ideal of government (adab). Kitab al-Kharaj (The book of the land tax), written by the chief judge Abu Yusuf (d. 798) at the behest of caliph Harun al-Rashid, set a precedent for treatises on government and fiscal matters written by 'ulama'. It covered not only the rules of taxation but also legal and ethical principles as applied to social groups. It also defined the caliph as the shepherd of his flock and stressed his obligation to establish divine order. Ma'mun's attempt to establish a high imperial ideal with the primacy of the caliph over the clerical class and the learned elite produced a flourishing high culture infused with the Hellenistic heritage. Neoplatonism, in particular, entered into Islamic political thought through a translation movement of Greek (via Syriac) into Arabic. After the failure of the miḥna (trial), the inquisition enforced by an edict of the caliph to impose the theological doctrines of the Mu'tazilis as state creed, the clerical and learned classes found a way to resist caliphal authority in matters of religious doctrine and law.

The seat of the caliphs in the center of the circular capital city of Baghdad, conceived as an ideal city, did not become a throne for a pope-like authority; rather, the caliphate had to acknowledge that the 'ulama', inspired by Shafi'i (d. 820) and Ahmad b. Hanbal (d. 855), held the allegiance of the masses and would exclusively and collectively represent the teaching authority in Sunni Islam on a consensual basis. The situation was very different with the Shi'is, who emphasized the teaching authority of their ideal leader and placed overriding authority in the infallible imam. This view was expounded in the theological works of the Imami Shi'is; it was forcefully articulated by Mufid (948–1022) and Murtada (967–1044), who formulated a response to the Mu'tazili vision incisively presented in the works of the Qadi 'Abd al-Jabbar (935–1025). The Shi'is, a minority weakened by internal dissensions and schisms, were unable to establish their own political theology as normative and endured Sunni ruling institutions by embracing the principle of cautious dissimulation (taqiyya). They were sustained by their belief in the hidden presence of the imam and their projection into the future of the Mahdi's apocalyptic return. In the middle of the tenth century, the Qarmati branch of the Isma'ili Shi'is produced its esoteric propaganda of fellowship in the encyclopedic Epistles (Rasa'il) of the Brethren of Purity (Ikhwan al-Safa'), an anonymous work too arcane to have a practical impact.

The articulate political thought developed by the Muslim philosophers (falāsifa) argued for a political society (madīna) that evoked the Greek ideal city (polis), from where the name of madīnat al-salām (city of peace) that the Abbasids adopted for Baghdad, their capital, originated. Farabi (870–950) and Ibn Sina (980–1037), both hailing from Transoxiana, focused on the center of the empire and supported the ideal of the philosopher-king, an ethically perfect individual as head of a virtuous polity. Farabi's ideal of "the virtuous city" (al-madīna al-fāḍila) offered a systematic thesis on the state as the perfect society, in which rational integrity and right conduct are the means for achieving supreme felicity (sa'āda). Just as the human body has different parts doing different work in a harmonious manner, so too does the body politic require an efficient division of labor. Just as the body has a head to rule it, so too does society have a chief to rule it, guiding society toward becoming an ideal community of the virtuous. Ibn Sina's chapter on governance (siyāsa) in his encyclopedic work, al-Shifa' (The healing of the soul) stressed the principle of human interdependence and promoted the ideal of the lawgiver who is both philosopher and prophet. Responding to the need for human government in a religious polity and reminding believers of God and the afterlife, the ruler guarantees the observance of the civil (nāmūs) and religious law (shari'a).

Anchored in reason ('aql) as its ultimate principle and worked out across boundaries of religious affiliations between Muslims and Christians, the political theory of the Islamic philosophers charted an intellectual trajectory that the majority of the Sunni population was unprepared or unwilling to follow. Unlike the philosophical elite, the Sunni masses needed a system of political thought established on the platform of tradition, not abstract reason. Islamic philosophy lacked the institutional basis that an academy would have provided and did not manage to attract the popularly important scholars of law and religion with their deep roots in the literature of the traditions of the Prophet and his Companions (hadith) and their codices of jurisprudence detailing the stipulations of shari'a and amassing myriad opinions on legal points (fatwa).

Islamic Political Thought in the High Middle Ages (1055–1258)

The political vision of Sunni Islam can be traced in two classical works on public law: the Arabic treatise on The Principles of Power (al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya) by Mawardi (974–1058), the honorary chief judge of the Abbasid caliphs, who defined the standard theory of the Sunni caliphate and its institutions from the perspective of the 'ulama', and the Siyasatnama, the famous Persian work on statecraft by Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92), chief vizier of the Seljuqs, giving expression to the views of the clerical class (kuttāb). Nizam al-Mulk also created the foundations of a network of educational institutions (madrasa) that offered scholars of law and religion lecterns and listeners for the dissemination of their works for many centuries. The Siyasatnama, together with the Qabusnama written in 1082 by Kay Ka'us, represent the apogee of the literary genre of nasīhat al-mulūk (advice for rulers)—that is, Mirrors for Princes literature that counseled political leaders on statecraft and diplomacy. Thriving for over a millennium, the genre found its beginnings in the writings of 'Abd al-Hamid and Ibn al-Muqaffa', followed by Jahiz (776–869), Ibn Qutayba (828–89), and Ibn 'Abd Rabbih (860–940); continued with treatises of Sufis and courtiers on ethical conduct in political life; and reached its final flourishing during the Mughal and Ottoman empires.

The impact of medieval Islamic political thought is best exemplified by the classical work of Ghazali (1058–1111), presented with great didactic clarity in his encyclopedic Revival of the Religious Sciences (Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din), which relied on the legal tradition of the Shafi'i school of law and the orthodox theological tradition of Baqillani (d. 1013) and Juwayni (1028–85). The major achievement of Ghazali's magisterial work, however, was the theological and ethical platform he laid for Islamic political institutions, a platform that enabled the moral and religious renewal of Islamic society. Offering a Sunni theological interpretation of political thought, Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (1149–1209) tried to combine dialectical theology with a modified version of Ibn Sina's philosophy in order to support the doctrine that the existence of the king-emperor—namely, the caliph—is necessary to maintain the order of the world. Following the line of the Treatise of Ethics (Tahdhib al-Akhlaq) of Miskawayh (936–1030), Nasir al-Din al-Tusi's (1201–74) ethical treatise, The Nasirean Ethics (Akhlaq-i Nasiri), revived Shi'i political thought during Ilkhanid times through his influence on the Shi'i school of Hilla in the works of Muhaqqiq (1205–77) and Ibn al-Mutahhir (1250–1325). Continued in the work of Dawani (1427–1502), Nasir al-Din al-Tusi's pattern of thought later had a significant impact on political ideas in the Mughal Empire of India.

On the far western periphery of the Islamic world in the Iberian Peninsula, Ghazali's books were burned in public by order of the ruling dynasty, bowing to the agitation of Maliki legal scholars. Significant contributions to Islamic political thought were made in Spain, however, through the works of Ibn Hazm (994–1064), and under Almoravid and Almohad rule, those of Ibn Bajja (d. 1139) and Ibn Tufayl (d. 1185). Political thought in Spain reached its peak with the insightful analysis of state and society by Ibn Rushd (1126–98), supporter of Almohad religious policy and one of the most original minds in all of Islam. According to Ibn Rushd, philosophers were best qualified to interpret scripture, tradition, and law because they possessed the highest form of knowledge. Following Aristotle, he held that right and wrong were determined by nature rather than by divine command and that effective legislation required both theoretical and empirical knowledge.

In the last century of Abbasid rule in Baghdad, Sufism emerged as an organized movement of fraternities or affiliations, building up the infrastructure of Muslim society and shaping the Islamic identity of the polity for centuries to come; in fact, Sufism made a powerful impact on the fabric of Islamic polity that contemporary scholarship has widely overlooked. Sufism had begun in the eighth and ninth centuries in Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and Iran with groups of men of piety leading an ascetic life and seeking mystic experience of union with God. Led by teaching masters called shaykhs (or pīrs in Persian), such as Dhu al-Nun (796–860), Bayazid al-Bistami (d. 874), Sahl al-Tustari (816–96), Junayd (d. 910), and Hallaj (857–922), it developed its ideal of poverty (faqr) and trust in God (tawakkul) and spread its practice of meditative recollection (dhikr). Its radical spiritual and social patterns provoked the scholars of law and theology, stirred up urban populations, and challenged public order. After being eclipsed by the Shi'i renaissance of the tenth century, Sufism reframed its path to God as a branch of the Muslim sciences during the Sunni revival under the Seljuq Turks in works such as the Risala (Epistle) of Qushayri (986–1074). Leading into the caliphate of the Abbasid Nasir (1180–1225), Sufism organized itself into a large number of fraternities (futuwwa) and affiliations (jartqa), based on a strict order of master and disciples and marked by initiation rites and common prayer ceremonies. Networks of Sufis centers, called "lodges" (ribāt), paralleled the educational institution of the madrasa and were favored by sultanate governments. The sultans sought sacred legitimization for the secular leadership they had acquired through usurpation by securing the endorsement of Sufi shaykhs, whom they often honored with the title of shaykh al-Islam.

Sufism was influenced by the illuminationist philosophy of Shihab al-Din Yahya al-Suhrawardi (1155–91) and was profoundly undergirded by the monist philosophy of Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240), whose pivotal concept of the "perfect man" (al-insān al-kāmil) supplied both an ontological and ethical ideal. Yet Sufism engaged the emotions as well as the intellect, tolerating unruly wandering dervishes (qalandar) and growing widely popular through its provocative use of Persian love poetry, especially that of Jalal al-Din al-Rumi (1207–73). Drawing upon an image familiar to steppe populations, the Sufis advocated a "tent" of spiritual rule (wilāya) over the entire society. The hierarchy of saints (awliyā') would be anchored in a spiritual pole (qutb), who would in turn be supported by his substitutes, the "stakes" (abdāl) and "pegs" (awtād).

Sufi institutions, often built at the outskirts of urban centers around the tombs of their founders, produced widely used manuals, such as Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi's (1145–1234) 'Awarif al-ma'arif (Gifts of knowledge) that disseminated the ethical and spiritual ideal of the Sufi way of life and contributed much to the Islamic identity of populations in India, Southeast Asia, and sub-Saharan Africa. Sufism made its principal impact on Islamic political thought and social practice during the turbulent transition from the fragmentation of the Abbasid Empire and the emergence of its three successors. During the sultanate period of Ilkhanids, Timurids, Mamluks, and Delhi sultans, Sufi influence was spread by many orders, among them the Kubrawis in Central Asia, the Shadhilis in Egypt and North Africa, and the Suhrawardis and Chishtis in the Indus and Ganges plains. The three great empires would draw religious and political strength from Sufi resources, the Ottomans from the Mevlevis and Bektashis, the Shi'i Safavids from their Sunni Sufi roots, and the Mughals from the Qadiris and Naqshbandis.

Islamic Political Thought in the Late Middle Ages (1258–1500)

Two writers on Islamic political thought stand out in the Late Middle Ages during the period of fragmentation and before the establishment of the three empires: Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) and Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406). Ibn Taymiyya, a Hanbali scholar of law and theology who was active in Damascus and Cairo, engaged in bitter controversies with rationalism, Sufism, Shi'ism, and Christianity. He championed the method of legal reasoning (ijtihād) to discern the consensus of the believers and chose the middle ground between reason and tradition as well as between violence and piety. In his main political work, al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (The book of governance according to the shari'a), Ibn Taymiyya countered the aggressive militarism of the Mamluk sultanate with the regulative idea of government embodied in the rule of Sunni religious law. He proclaimed that religion and state need one another because perfect spiritual and temporal prosperity is achieved only when religion is put into practice by religious law that is enforced by a leader who accepts the duty of commanding good and forbidding evil. Ibn Taymiyya maintained that the principles of the state's power should be applied rigorously through the use of the shari'a enforced by the ruler—an ideal that the Wahhabi movement adopted in the 18th century.

Ibn Khaldun was active in North Africa, Spain, and Egypt during periods of dynastic declines. Although he studied broadly in philosophy, law, and theology, he presented his famous Muqaddima (the prolegomena to his world history) as an empirical analysis gleaned from the history of the Berbers and Arabs in North Africa. His study of the history of civilization revealed a cyclical pattern: the rule of nomadic chieftains would gradually evolve into kingship in a civilized society that, in turn, would be overthrown by another nomadic group. To break the cycle, authority of leadership had to emerge from natural dominion, pass through the stage of government by men of intelligence and insight, and stabilize itself in a polity based on the principles of religion laid down by God, as exemplified ideally by the rule of the Prophet and his successors, the caliphs.

Little research has been done on the considerable role women played in the medieval Islamic polity. According to the Qur'an, women are equal to men before God and have similar religious obligations. Though subordinate to men in the public sphere and unequal in many sectors of Islamic law, many women played significant roles in the transmission of hadith, beginning with Muhammad's wives ' A'isha and Umm Salama, in the organization of court life, the education of scholars, and the welfare of Islamic families and children in medieval times. Muslim biographical works quote hundreds of women involved in teaching Islam and transmitting its tradition. Sufi women, such as Rabi'a of Basra (d. 801) and Fatima of Nishapur (d. 849), had an impact on Islamic ethics and Sufi practice; Umm Mu'ayyad al-As'ardi (d. 1218) was an important link in the transmission of collections on hadith; Ibn Taymiyya had a chief disciple in Umm Zaynab (d. 1312); Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240) was taught by Fatima of Marchena; and Umm Hani' (d. ca. 1466) taught hadith to groups of students in her house in Cairo. There has been a tendency in secular feminist scholarship to depict premodern women in the Islamic world as utterly backward. Against this backdrop, however, Muslim women now writing on Islam in the contemporary world have begun their own active line of feminist inquiry, which promises to open new vistas on Islamic political thought from a previously neglected sector of Islamic culture.

Since the end of Late Antiquity and through most of the millennium of the Early and Late Middle Ages, the Islamic world had been the leading culture on the globe. It has excelled in philosophy and the natural sciences; in logic and metaphysics; in mathematics, astronomy, and optics; in alchemy and geography; and in medicine and architecture. Its transition from vellum to paper in the eighth century propelled it onto a great curve of literary production in both religious and nonreligious literature. This enormous cultural achievement was accomplished in medieval Islam because the Muslim scholars of medicine and science, the philosophers, and the historians avidly inquired into the roots of world cultures antecedent to or surrounding them in India, ancient Iran, and the Hellenistic world. Islamic political thought drew on the classics of Greco-Roman and Irano-Indian antiquity. It also antedated and influenced the appearance of works of political thought in medieval Europe, building a bridge between antiquity and modernity. Islamic political thought developed in a cosmopolitan medieval environment of wide-ranging information about other cultures, with all their riches and restrictions. A significant disruption in this development, however, came about at the turn from the 15th to the 16th century, when the Western world of Europe embarked on a course of profound changes in its vision of the world, religion, society, and politics.

Islamic Political Thought in the Early Modern Period (1500–1800)

The Ottomans, a group of Turkic tribesmen, established a small principality in northwestern Anatolia, crossed into Europe in 1357, and took control of the Balkans, moving their capital from Bursa to Edirne in 1366. Although defeated by Timur at Ankara in 1402, they conquered Constantinople in 1453, making it their new capital of Sufi institutions, often built at the outskirts of urban centers around the tombs of their founders, produced widely used manuals, such as Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi's (1145–1234) 'Awarif al-ma'arif (Gifts of knowledge) that disseminated the ethical and spiritual ideal of the Sufi way of life and contributed much to the Islamic identity of populations in India, Southeast Asia, and sub-Saharan Africa. Sufism made its principal impact on Islamic political thought and social practice during the turbulent transition from the fragmentation of the Abbasid Empire and the emergence of its three successors. During the sultanate period of Ilkhanids, Timurids, Mamluks, and Delhi sultans, Sufi influence was spread by many orders, among them the Kubrawis in Central Asia, the Shadhilis in Egypt and North Africa, and the Suhrawardis and Chishtis in the Indus and Ganges plains. The three great empires would draw religious and political strength from Sufi resources, the Ottomans from the Mevlevis and Bektashis, the Shi'i Safavids from their Sunni Sufi roots, and the Mughals from the Qadiris and Naqshbandis.

Islamic Political Thought in the Late Middle Ages (1258–1500)

Two writers on Islamic political thought stand out in the Late Middle Ages during the period of fragmentation and before the establishment of the three empires: Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) and Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406). Ibn Taymiyya, a Hanbali scholar of law and theology who was active in Damascus and Cairo, engaged in bitter controversies with rationalism, Sufism, Shi'ism, and Christianity. He championed the method of legal reasoning (ijtihād) to discern the consensus of the believers and chose the middle ground between reason and tradition as well as between violence and piety. In his main political work, al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (The book of governance according to the shari'a), Ibn Taymiyya countered the aggressive militarism of the Mamluk sultanate with the regulative idea of government embodied in the rule of Sunni religious law. He proclaimed that religion and state need one another because perfect spiritual and temporal prosperity is achieved only when religion is put into practice by religious law that is enforced by a leader who accepts the duty of commanding good and forbidding evil. Ibn Taymiyya maintained that the principles of the state's power should be applied rigorously through the use of the shari'a enforced by the ruler—an ideal that the Wahhabi movement adopted in the 18th century.

Ibn Khaldun was active in North Africa, Spain, and Egypt during periods of dynastic declines. Although he studied broadly in philosophy, law, and theology, he presented his famous Muqaddima (the prolegomena to his world history) as an empirical analysis gleaned from the history of the Berbers and Arabs in North Africa. His study of the history of civilization revealed a cyclical pattern: the rule of nomadic chieftains would gradually evolve into kingship in a civilized society that, in turn, would be overthrown by another nomadic group. To break the cycle, authority of leadership had to emerge from natural dominion, pass through the stage of government by men of intelligence and insight, and stabilize itself in a polity based on the principles of religion laid down by God, as exemplified ideally by the rule of the Prophet and his successors, the caliphs.

Little research has been done on the considerable role women played in the medieval Islamic polity. According to the Qur'an, women are equal to men before God and have similar religious obligations. Though subordinate to men in the public sphere and unequal in many sectors of Islamic law, many women played significant roles in the transmission of hadith, beginning with Muhammad's wives ' A'isha and Umm Salama, in the organization of court life, the education of scholars, and the welfare of Islamic families and children in medieval times. Muslim biographical works quote hundreds of women involved in teaching Islam and transmitting its tradition. Sufi women, such as Rabi'a of Basra (d. 801) and Fatima of Nishapur (d. 849), had an impact on Islamic ethics and Sufi practice; Umm Mu'ayyad al-As'ardi (d. 1218) was an important link in the transmission of collections on hadith; Ibn Taymiyya had a chief disciple in Umm Zaynab (d. 1312); Ibn al-'Arabi (1165–1240) was taught by Fatima of Marchena; and Umm Hani' (d. ca. 1466) taught hadith to groups of students in her house in Cairo. There has been a tendency in secular feminist scholarship to depict premodern women in the Islamic world as utterly backward. Against this backdrop, however, Muslim women now writing on Islam in the contemporary world have begun their own active line of feminist inquiry, which promises to open new vistas on Islamic political thought from a previously neglected sector of Islamic culture.

Since the end of Late Antiquity and through most of the millennium of the Early and Late Middle Ages, the Islamic world had been the leading culture on the globe. It has excelled in philosophy and the natural sciences; in logic and metaphysics; in mathematics, astronomy, and optics; in alchemy and geography; and in medicine and architecture. Its transition from vellum to paper in the eighth century propelled it onto a great curve of literary production in both religious and nonreligious literature. This enormous cultural achievement was accomplished in medieval Islam because the Muslim scholars of medicine and science, the philosophers, and the historians avidly inquired into the roots of world cultures antecedent to or surrounding them in India, ancient Iran, and the Hellenistic world. Islamic political thought drew on the classics of Greco-Roman and Irano-Indian antiquity. It also antedated and influenced the appearance of works of political thought in medieval Europe, building a bridge between antiquity and modernity. Islamic political thought developed in a cosmopolitan medieval environment of wide-ranging information about other cultures, with all their riches and restrictions. A significant disruption in this development, however, came about at the turn from the 15th to the 16th century, when the Western world of Europe embarked on a course of profound changes in its vision of the world, religion, society, and politics.

Islamic Political Thought in the Early Modern Period (1500–1800)

The Ottomans, a group of Turkic tribesmen, established a small principality in northwestern Anatolia, crossed into Europe in 1357, and took control of the Balkans, moving their capital from Bursa to Edirne in 1366. Although defeated by Timur at Ankara in 1402, they conquered Constantinople in 1453, making it their new capital of Istanbul. With the conquest of Egypt and Syria in 1517, the Ottomans established a large Sunni empire over Anatolia, the Balkans, and the regions of the eastern and southern Mediterranean. Constantly engaged in warfare with European powers, they suffered a decisive defeat at Lepanto in 1571 and failed to take Vienna in 1683. Increasingly weakened during the 18th and 19th centuries, they acceded to the rule of Muhammad 'Ali (r. 1805–48) as governor of Egypt in 1805. The Ottoman Empire officially disappeared from the geopolitical map when Atatürk abolished the sultanate in 1922 and founded modern Turkey in 1923.

Ruled by pragmatic sultans, the Ottomans created a strong and loyal military force in the Janissaries, who were recruited as children from the Christian subject populations and raised as Muslims. Organizing themselves around the sultan, the Ottomans integrated the military, the learned, and the bureaucracy into their patrimonial state and gave room to the influences of Sufi orders and folk Islam. Seeing the implementation of justice as their right and duty, the sultans conferred upon judges (qadis) the authority to administer both shari'a and their innovative and parallel civil law (qānūn).

Ottoman rule excelled in practical politics; its range of political theories, however, was modest. The perspective of the 'ulama' can be found in Tursun Beg's (d. ca. 1492) essay and Dede Efendi's (d. 1565) epistle on governance. Abu al-Su'ud (1490–1574), a famous commentator on the Qur'an and appointed as a shaykh al-Islam, worked to strengthen the absolute rule of the sultan as the ultimate religious and civil authority. His fatwas brought the qānūn into agreement with the shari'a and established the principle that the qadis derived their competence from the appointment of the sultan and were obliged to go along with his directives in legal matters. In contrast, Kinalizade (1510–72) followed the philosophical tradition of ethics developed by Nasir al-Din al-Tusi and Dawani, advocating the ideal of the philosopher-king who ruled the virtuous city. His delineation of four status groups—men of the pen, men of the sword, traders, and craftsmen—became the foundation of an ideal social order, known as the "right world order" (nizām al-'ālam). In practice, however, Ottoman society was organized according to a rougher bipartite order. The ruling class of 'askarīs (warriors) encompassed the military, the learned, and the bureaucrats; its members were supported by taxes levied on the ri'āya (flock), the class of ruled subjects composed of tradesmen, laborers, and minorities.

Mustafa 'Ali (1541–1600) saw religion and the educational madrasa system as the moral and intellectual bases of the state; he emphasized the role of the sultan, qānūn, and nationality in forging a unified political community. Aqhisari (1544–1616), a Bosnian qadi, wrote a small book on political reform, titled Usul al-Hikam fi Nizam al-'Alam (Sources of wisdom on the world order), that advocated justice, counsel, military capability, and piety as the foundations of government. Katib Çelebi (1609–57), the most productive scholar of the Ottoman Empire, analyzed the financial state of the sultanate in his reform tract, Dustur al-'Amal (Code of action), which was influenced by Ibn Khaldun's work. He formulated his thought in anthropological and medical terms, analogizing the body politic to the human body and its stages of growth and decline. In addition to arguing for a balanced budget, an increase in agricultural production, and a reduction of the armed forces, he also exposed rampant corruption and exploitation of the peasants. Katib Çelebi advocated the rule of a strong and just sultan as a solution to the social problems that he identified.

The Turkic-speaking Safavids of Kurdish origin arose from a Sunni Sufi fraternity that was organized in Azerbaijan by Safi al-Din (d. 1334). There and in the neighboring regions of eastern Anatolia, the movement became militantly Shi'i under their leader Junayd (1446–60). Led by Shah Isma'il (1487–1524), they brought the whole of Iran under their control after overpowering the regional rule of the Timurid Qara Quyunlu and Aq Quyunlu in 1501. In these military endeavors, they relied on the support of Turkic tribesmen, called "Redheads" (Qizilbash) for their distinctive red headgear. Adopting Persian as the language of their monarchy, the Safavid shahs set themselves in opposition to the Sunni Ottomans based at the western flank of their territory. Claiming to be living emanations of the godhead and representatives on Earth of the Mahdi, the Twelfth Imam of Shi'ism, they combined supreme secular and spiritual authority into the office of a single omnipotent ruler. The Safavids imposed Shi'ism as the state religion upon all of Iran. The capital was moved from Tabriz first to Qazvin and then to Isfahan, where Shi'i Safavid power reached its apex in the reign of Shah 'Abbas (r. 1587–1629). The Safavid dynasty came to an end with the rise of Nadir Shah (r. 1736–47), a chieftain of Turkic tribesmen, who consolidated his rule over all of Iran, and the subsequent Qajar dynasty (1779–1925), a clan that had served in the Qizilbash army under the Safavids.

In the 16th century, the Safavids imposed Imami Shi'i beliefs on a largely Sunni population, although the distinction between the two groups was marked by significant ambiguity at the time. Shi'i political thought came vigorously alive in the work of Karaki (1466–1534), a Lebanese scholar who made the provocative claim to be speaking as the general representative (al-nā'ib al-'āmm) of the absent imam. Karaki's theory of authority has been accepted and extended from his own time until the present by those scholars known as uṣūlīs—that is, those who held that religious authority is derived from the study of jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh). In accordance with this view, the scholars of the Safavid realm recognized the leading jurist as mujtahid al-zamān (the independent jurist of the age) and treated his authority as absolute.

The uṣūlīs were challenged in the 17th century by Muhammad Amin al-Astarabadi (d. 1626–27), whose al-Fawa'id al-Madaniyya (Instructive notes from Medina), completed in 1622, inaugurated what came to be known as the akhbārī or traditionist school of thought. The uṣūlīs favored rational elaboration of the law (ijtihād) and the acquiescence of lay Shi'is to the opinions of qualified jurists (taqlīd). The akhbārīs saw in revelation the sole source of the law and furthermore claimed that it was most reliably preserved in the akhbār, the reports of the imams' words and deeds recorded in the Four Books of Traditions accepted by the Shi'is. Even the Qur'an, in their view, should properly be understood through the commentary of the imams preserved in these reports. In the later 17th century, the main spokesman for the akhbārīs was Muhsin Fayz Kashani (1598–1680). He popularized the political thought of his period by his Kingly Mirror, which integrated Sufi ideas into a treatise that nonetheless maintained the supremacy of revelation and religious law over reason and conscience. The uṣūlīs, on the other hand, found their most illustrious proponent in Majlisi (1627–1700), who developed orthodox Imami Shi'ism and brought the state under the direction of the legal scholars, launching attacks against Sufis and philosophers. In the view of Majlisi and similar theorists, the king (shah) was but the instrument of the clerical class and dependent on the leading mujtahid. The victory of the uṣūlīs over the akhbārīs was finally achieved by Muhammad Baqir al-Bihbihani's (1705–91) decisive work, Risalat al-Akhbar wa-l-Ijtihad (Epistle on prophetic traditions and legal reasoning).

During three centuries (1200–1500), Muslim rule in India was organized by Afghan and Turkic sultanates ruling mainly from Delhi. The control of the Mughal emperors over the entire subcontinent began with Babur (1483–1530), a descendant of both Chingiz Khan and Tamerlane, who invaded India from the northwest. After Babur's victory at Panipat in 1526, the Sunni Mughal monarchy was extended over almost all of India during the long rule of Akbar the Great (r. 1556–1605). Akbar, a superb though illiterate administrator, abolished the poll tax levied on Hindus; favored a syncretistic religion, called dīn-i ilāhī (divine religion); and created a ruling class of appointees (manṣabdārīs) consisting of Turks, Afghans, Persians, and Hindus. Dara Shikuh (1615–59), inclined toward the Qadiri Sufi order, inspired the translation of the Upanishads into Persian and championed religious assimilation with Hinduism. His program of religious openness was not to last long when he was executed on the orders of Aurangzeb (r. 1658–1707), his brother and rival. Aurangzeb stood up against the eclectic traditions of his predecessors, breaking the renewed vigor of Hinduism with a reform centered on Islamic values and supported by the Naqshbandi Sufi order. The Mughal Empire lost its glory after Delhi was sacked by Nadir Shah in 1739 and gradually lost all its power under the rule of British colonialism.

The open-minded innovations of the Mughal emperor Akbar broke with traditional patterns of Islamic political thought in an attempt to build a single political community that granted India's Hindu population religious toleration and equal status with their Sunni and Shi'i Muslim neighbors. He also tried to reconcile Muslim sectarian groups with one another. Akbar's views were expounded in the Regulations of Akbar (A'īn-i Akbarī), which were compiled by his adviser Abu al-Fadl (1551–1602). Claiming infallible monarchical authority and according himself supreme power as the insān al-kāmil, Akbar combined the role of king with that of spiritual teacher. Proclaiming himself the highest authority in matters of religious law as well as secular law, he set aside key stipulations of the shari'a and embraced religious tolerance and political equality.

Akbar's and Abu al-Fadl's vision did not survive in India. Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624), who stood in the spiritual line of the Naqshbandis, perceived Akbar's ideology as destructive to Islamic law and religion. He came to be called the "renewer" (mujaddid) as Islam entered into its second millennium because he wished to restore Islamic values in public and political life, albeit in a form inspired by Sufi piety rather than legalistic rigidity. 'Abd al-Haqq Dihlawi (1551–1642) went a step further and stressed the precedence of religious law over the Sufi path and limited the king's function to upholding the shari'a. Emperor Aurangzeb (1650–1707) repudiated Akbar's tolerance toward Hinduism; he reintroduced a unified legal system of Sunni orthodoxy based on Hanafi law and reimposed the poll tax on non-Muslims. Shah Waliullah (1703–62), a man of encyclopedic learning with roots in the Naqshbandi Sufi affiliation, strove to establish a polity based on the shari'a in India. In his The Conclusive Argument from God (Hujjat Allah al-Baligha), he applied the Islamic principle of ijtihād to the changing circumstances of his time and tried to reconcile the doctrinal differences between the legal scholars and Sufi mystics while rejecting tolerance toward Hindus.

Islamic Political Thought in the Later Modern Period (from 1800 to the Present)

During the 19th century, half of the Islamic world passed under the formal colonial rule of European states—geographically tiny but militarily and economically mighty countries in comparison to the vast Muslim territories they ruled and controlled. The reaction of the Islamic intelligentsia to this overpowering control from without was one of reform and revival from within, spearheaded by social and political reformers, some of whom were journalists rather than scholars steeped in Islamic law and religion. Perhaps the most outstanding figure among them was Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1839–97). Active in Istanbul, Cairo, Paris, London, India, Russia, and Iran, he devoted his life to the reviving of Muslim intellectual and social life in pamphlets and political articles and agitated for the resurrection of a reformed and purified Islamic identity in the face of European encroachment. He attacked Darwin in his refutation of materialism and asserted that only religion ensures stability of society while materialism causes decay and debasement. Longing to re-create the glory of Islam in a Pan-Islamic state, Afghani argued that Islam's ultimate orientation toward God enabled it to organize the finest possible political community.

Afghani's chief disciple was Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), often seen as the founder of Egyptian modernism. 'Abduh, who had received a traditional education and attended Azhar University, was attracted to mysticism and considered Afghani to be his spiritual guide. He became the editor of the Egyptian Gazette and for the last six years of his life served as the grand mufti of Egypt. He wrote several theological treatises, among them a defense of Islam against Christianity, and promulgated his program of reform in al-Manar (The lighthouse), a Qur'an commentary that he published in installments and that was later continued as a monthly by his highly educated collaborator Rashid Rida (1865–1935), a man of Syrian descent. 'Abduh's political thought had the overriding goal of returning Islam to its pristine condition, emphasizing the Qur'an and sunna and restoring the role of ijtihād. Although the exercise of reason and the adoption of modern natural science were of paramount importance, reason must defer to the dogmas of religion while prophecy focused on the moral education of the masses. Rida, a prolific writer, refined some of 'Abduh's points and distinguished between the religious duties ('ibādāt), unchangeable because based on the Qur'an and sunna, and duties toward other Muslims (mu'āmalāt), to be reinterpreted by the exercise of reason so as to serve the welfare (maṣlaḥa) of the community. Rida believed that the caliphate was indispensible in guaranteeing the coherence of the Muslim community. Faced with the breakup of the Ottoman caliphate in 1923, he proposed a resurrected caliphate preserve the solidarity of all Muslims worldwide.

With roots in the political thought of Ahmad b. Hanbal and Ibn Taymiyya, the modern reform movement of the Salafis began with Afghani, 'Abduh, and Rida and continued to identify the causes of disintegration of the Muslim community in the infiltration of foreign ideas and practices. The movement taught that Islamic honor and self-respect can be reestablished only if Islam as both a religion and a way of life is redeemed from cultural submission to Western powers. Salafi thinkers called for sweeping reforms in Muslim education, combining the values of traditional pedagogy with the creativity of modern education. They advocated resurrecting the ideal of Islamic law and updating the Arabic language to address the realities of modern life. The Salafis had an impact on Algeria with Ibn Badis (1889–1940), on Morocco with Muhammad 'Allal al-Fasi (1910–74), and on Tunisia with Muhammad al-Tahir b. 'Ashur (1879–1973).

The puritan movement of the Wahhabis began in the heart of the Arabian Peninsula with Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab (1703–92), who insisted on uncompromising monotheism (tawḥīd). Islam, he believed, had to be purified from all devotion to anything else (shirk): there was no room for saint worship, legal reasoning beyond the Qur'an and sunna, or any innovation (bid'a). He allied himself with 'Abd al-'Aziz b. Muhammad b. Su'ud (1765–1803), the leader of the tribal group of Al-Su'ud, becoming shaykh and qadi in the service of the amir and imam. The Saudi-Wahhabi alliance continued with their sons and extended rule over the Hijaz and the key cities of Mecca and Medina. Eradicating anything that might undermine the purity of their beliefs, they destroyed tombs of saints and books of intellectual adversaries, interdicted devotional prayers, and pillaged Shi'i shrines in Iraq. Muhammad 'Ali, the powerful governor of Egypt under the Ottomans, pushed them back, but the Saudi-Wahhabi state, with Riyad as its capital, was restored under the amirs Turki (d. 1834) and his son Faysal (d. 1865) and the religious authority of 'Abd al-Rahman (d. 1869), a grandson of Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab. After many setbacks and internal rivalries, the Saudi-Wahhabi state was restored in 1902. Over this long history, the Wahhabis expressed the staunchest spirit of politically strategic fundamentalism that inspired many similar movements in other parts of the Islamic world.

Traders brought Islam to West Africa on camelback from the north through the Sahara and to East Africa from the shores of South Arabia, Iran, and India by boat across the Indian Ocean. In West Africa, Sunni Islam of the Maliki legal school became dominant; since the 12th century, Timbuktu developed into a famous seat of commerce and Islamic learning on the Niger River. Dongola on the upper Nile River was taken under Muslim rule in the 14th century after the collapse of Christian Nubia. The vast independent state (often called the "Sokoto caliphate") established at Sokoto by Muhammad Bello at the death of his father 'Uthman b. Fudi (Usman dan Fodio, 1754–1817), who had led a successful four-year jihad against neighboring principalities, became the largest autonomous state in 19th century sub-Saharan Africa.

It was charismatic leadership that transformed sub-Saharan Islamic societies into fundamentalist-inspired states, as can be shown by two examples, one centered on the idea of "the seal of the saints" (khātam al-awliyā') and the other on the messianic idea of the Mahdi, the apocalyptic leader of the end times. In West Africa, the Tijani Sufi affiliation was founded in an oasis of Algeria by Ahmad al-Tijani (1737–1815), whose teachings were recorded by a close companion and thereafter elaborated by 'Umar b. Sa'id al-Futi (1796–1864). Ahmad al-Tijani claimed that the Prophet had appeared to him in a waking vision, appointing him to the spiritual rank of the seal of sainthood (khātam al-awliyā', quṭb al-aqṭāb), a rank that gave him spiritual domination over the age (ṣāḥib al-waqt), exclusive knowledge of the supreme name of God (ism Allāh al-a'ẓam), and the power of a vicegerent (khalīfa) who alone mediates between God and His creatures. In the middle of the 19th century, 'Umar b. Sa'id al-Futi, a Fulbe of Senegal, assumed the leadership of the Tijanis and the role of a mujāhid (border warrior for the faith), launching a militant anticolonial jihad movement across West Africa from Senegal to Ghana and into Nilotic Sudan. By the middle of the 20th century, the Tijanis were transformed into a revivalist movement among the black Africans as Ibrahim Niasse (1900–1975) extended it among the urban Muslims of Nigeria and Sudan.

In (Nilotic) Sudan, Muhammad Ahmad (1844–85), a Sunni with roots in the Sammani Sufi affiliation, proclaimed himself to be the expected Mahdi in 1881. He learned of his divine election in a colloquy with the Prophet himself. Ahmad advocated a reformist brand of Islam; he aimed to restore the primitive umma (community of believers), governed by the Qur'an and sunna, through his activity in supreme succession to the Prophet (al-khilāfa al-kubrā) and with the assistance of his chief disciples in the role of successors to the Rightly Guided Caliphs. Retreating (hijra) into the Nuba Mountains together with his followers, named Ansar after the helpers of Muhammad in Medina, he called people to arms in a jihad against Turkish, Egyptian, and British overlords. Ahmad died shortly after conquering Khartoum in 1885. He was succeeded by his son 'Abdallah b. Muhammad (1885–99) as his deputy (khalīfa), who established a Mahdist state that was overthrown by the British in 1898. The revivalist movement of the Ansar, however, continued under the leadership of 'Abd al-Rahman (1885–1959) and played a decisive role in the Sudan's declaration of independence in 1955. Under the influence of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hasan al-Turabi (b. 1932) worked toward the formation of an Islamic state and the promotion of a fundamentalist regime in Sudan.

Beginning in the ninth century, Islam reached East Africa through traders and seafarers who came from Southern Arabia and Iran and established trading posts on the East African coast. By the 13th century, the Indian Ocean had become a Muslim sea and Muslims controlled the trade from India and Iran to South Arabia and East Africa. Sunni Islam of the Shafi'i legal school laid the religious foundations for the emergence of the Swahili civilization of the Muslim "coastalists" (sawāhila) in East Africa. In 1332, the Muslim world traveler Ibn Battuta (1304–68) was impressed by the Muslim piety he encountered on the island of Kilwa and in the coastal settlements of Mombasa and Mogadishu. Swahili culture remained a coastal phenomenon with only sporadic Islamic inroads into the East African hinterland; in the area of Lake Nyasa, for example, Islam spread among the Yao. In the 16th century, the Portuguese took control of the spice trade away from the Muslims and secured a sea route linking Europe to India. By the end of the 17th century, however, the sultans of Oman reestablished effective rule in East Africa, when they exerted dominance over the island of Zanzibar in 1698 and expelled the Portuguese from the Tanzanian coasts in 1730. In 1832, the sultans of Oman moved their capital to Zanzibar, which had by that time become the center of the Arab slave trade. In the late 19th and early 20th centuries, imperialist European powers (Portugal, France, Germany, Great Britain, and Italy) scrambled among themselves for control of East Africa. Islam, however, began to play a significant political role in the region only in the 20th century as East African states that included large Muslim minorities gained their independence. These states included Tanzania, Mozambique, Kenya, Uganda, and Malawi. Although the Muslims of South Africa, who trace their ancestry to immigrants from South Asia and slaves imported from Southeast Asia, remained a small minority, they attracted worldwide attention in their struggle against the injustice of apartheid.

Islam in India saw its own developments of Islamic political thought in the 19th century. Ahmad Khan (1817–98), known as Sir Sayyid and knighted by the British in 1888, had only a traditional schooling but became the founder of Muslim modernism and the principal force of Islamic revival in India. An advocate of modern education for its Muslims, he published the periodical Tahdhib al-Akhlaq (Moral reform) and wrote commentaries on the Bible and the first half of the Qur'an. After the Sepoy Mutiny in 1857, Ahmad Khan worked toward the reconciliation of the British and Muslims in India and founded the Muhammedan Anglo-Oriental College at Aligarh in 1875. Reinterpreting Islam according to his maxim "the work of God—that is, nature and its fixed laws—is identical to the word of God," he emphasized a rational approach to Islam and to social reforms in Muslim culture.

The Sepoy Mutiny in 1857 that led to the formal colonization of India by the British also had an effect on the emergence of two Sunni reform movements among the Urdu-speaking Muslims, the Barelwis, led by Ahmad Riza (1856–1921), and the Deobandis, led by Qasim Nanawtawi (1832–80) and Rashid Ahmad Gangohi (1828–1905). Both movements maintain considerable influence among Muslims in India and Pakistan today. Muhammad Iqbal (1877–1938), an outstanding poet beloved for his commitment to the creation of Pakistan, accused both the West of cheating humanity of its values through the power of its technology and the Muslim society of his day of subsisting in a state of somnolence; in his Reconstruction of Religious Thought, he called the whole world to join the dynamism of the "true Islam" of Qur'an and Muhammad, a dynamism that he believed would harness the forces of history for the moral renewal of all humanity.

Islam came to Southeast Asia (Indonesia, Malaysia, Singapore, and Brunei as well as territories in Thailand and Mindanao) discreetly over the sea. From about the 13th century onward, Muslim traders in noticeable numbers sailed to the ports of this island world and its adjacent coasts, forming viable and enduring communities. Sultanates, based in the port cities of Malacca on the Malaysian peninsula (1400–1511) and Demak on Java (1475–1588), constituted little-known early Muslim powers. The 16th and 17th centuries saw the formation of four great Islamic empires with their centers in port cities, formed at (1) Aceh, in northern Sumatra and central Malaysia (1500–1650); (2) Bantam, on western Java and southern Sumatra (1527–1682); (3) Mataram, on central Java, southern Borneo (Kalimantan), and eastern Sumatra (1588–1682); and (4) Macassar, on Celebes and Sumbawa (1605–69). As Sunni Islam of the Shafi'i (Kalimantan) legal tradition spread in Southeast Asia, its law, practice, and essential doctrines took firm roots. In addition, Sufis coming from India to the Malay Peninsula and from the Arabian Peninsula to the archipelago had a significant impact on the formation of the Southeast Asian Muslim polity.

In the 18th and 19th centuries, the Muslims of Southeast Asia were challenged by increasing Dutch colonial supremacy throughout Sumatra, Java, and Borneo, as well as by British colonial administration in Malaysia. At the same time, the fervent practice of the pilgrimage to Mecca kept Southeast Asian Muslims in contact with the world of Islam and facilitated the influence of the Wahhabis and the reformism of 'Abduh and Rashid Rida on Southeast Asian Islam. Journals such as al-Imam (The guide) in Singapore and al-Munir (The enlightener) in Sumatra imitated al-Manar. The development of the pesantren, Muslim boarding schools led by groups of religious teachers known as kyai, created an infrastructure of traditional Muslim education that propelled the spread of Islam, especially in Java. The most influential puritan movement of the Muhammadiyya, founded in Yogyakarta in 1912, adopted Dutch institutional and Christian missionary approaches and opposed Sufi forms of education. It organized a comprehensive educational system that ranged from primary schools to teacher training colleges and expanded social services to the needy. Wiped out by the Dutch in 1930, it was followed to some degree by the traditionalist Nahdat al-'Ulama', founded in 1926. Indonesia achieved independence in 1945 and adopted the five principles or Pancasila (monotheism, nationalism, humanism, democracy, and social justice) as the philosophical basis for its order of society; Sukarno became the first president (1945–67), followed by Suharto (1967–98). Malaysia gained its independence from the British in 1957; its political system was a mixture of parliamentarianism and authoritarianism. The Malaysian constitution both guaranteed freedom of religion and made Islam the state religion. Ethnic Malays, who are mainly Muslim, dominated politics, and non-Muslim Malays of Chinese or Indian descent ran the economic and financial sectors. Since 1969, the dakwah (da'wa) movement has endeavored to invite non-Muslims to embrace Islam and has strived to establish the power of Islam as a total system of deen (dīn, religion) against Western secularism.

In the 20th century, Europe lost its global leadership during the period of the two world wars, when it experienced the eclipse of fascist nationalism, the downfall of colonial imperialism, and the emergence of the Soviet Union and the United States as the primary shapers of the world order. The Russian revolution and the emergence of the communist systems in the Soviet Union and China left only tangential imprints on Islamic political thought. The forceful entry of the United States into world politics in the aftermath of World War II, however, particularly its projection of military and cultural dominance into Muslim societies, provoked a range of vehement and enduring Islamic reactions. The extremist fringe is characterized by destructive militancy and terrorist movements, such as al-Qaeda, originally a group of American-backed jihadists fighting against the Soviet Union in Afghanistan.

For Islam, the 20th century began with forceful secularist movements and ended with a rising tide of fundamentalist movements seeking to expunge the Western presence from Muslim lands.

In 1924, Atatürk abolished polygamy, shari'a courts, and Qur'an schools in Turkey; he also created national banks, reformed the Turkish alphabet, prohibited the wearing of fez and veil, empowered women to vote and obtain equality in education and employment, and required citizens to use family names rather than simply first names. Turkey became the central example of a cultural and political revolution imposed from the top by an authoritarian regime. The country was divided into urban elites (which acceded to the secularization) and rural masses (which resisted it). Later leaders gradually restored balance to Turkey's society, allowing some expression of Islamic culture and practice to resume. Not all efforts to reappropriate the riches of the Islamic tradition have been violent. The Nur movement, founded by Bediüzzaman Said Nursi (1876–1960), with millions of followers that today form two major branches, was a peaceful revivalist phenomenon manifesting the re-Islamizing trend in Turkey.

On the other side of the spectrum, in the late 20th century, the Islamic world became dominated by fundamentalist movements: the Muslim Brotherhood founded by Hasan al-Banna (1906–49) in Egypt and spearheaded by Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); the Islamic Group, established by Mawdudi (1903–79) in India and Pakistan; and the movement of clerics and mujahidin led by Ayatollah Khomeini (1903–89) that culminated in the Iranian Revolution in 1979. These three movements transformed Islam into a political ideology and were not hesitant to use force to secure their political objectives.

Banna, a school teacher from Isma'iliyya on the Suez Canal, formed the Muslim Brotherhood in order to combat the influence of a corrupt society by bringing the Egyptian youth back to religion. He gave his movement a militant character with a strict chain of command, which consisted of a general guide presiding over the membership, members organized as families and battalions, and a trusted core of its elite defined as a "secret apparatus." His promulgation of the movement's "fundamental law" transformed it publicly into a social and political organization with antiforeign, anti-Zionist, anti-Communist, and antisectarian attitudes. After the Free Officers seized power in 1952 and exiled Farouk, Egypt's last king of Albanian descent, President Nasser cracked down on the Muslim Brotherhood, driving the movement underground. Sayyid Qutb, a journalist who had experienced cultural shock during a visit to America, returned to Egypt in 1951, proclaimed himself to have been reborn a true Muslim, and joined the Muslim Brotherhood. Imprisoned by Nasser for ten years, he wrote the Signposts on the Way (Ma'alim fi al-Tariq), a manifesto for political revolution through personal discipline and violent jihad, which decried Nasser's Egypt as jahiliyya, a land of ignorance and unbelief. He argued that to resurrect the Muslim polity as a collectivity (jama'a) based on Islamic ethics, a vanguard had to be mobilized by an all-inclusive jihad with the aim of establishing a truly Islamic society.

The Muslim Brotherhood achieved a strong popular appeal through its social programs, which assisted the large lower strata of Muslim society in their neighborhoods. They were unable, however, to offer an agenda that would pull Egypt out of lethargy and overcome corruption. They also contributed to social instability by organizing riots that targeted the minority Coptic populations. Later, small spin-offs of the Muslim Brotherhood had recourse to more extreme forms of violence. In 1977, al-Takfir wa-l-Hijra resorted to kidnapping, and in 1981, Al-Jihad assassinated President Sadat, using the pamphlet of the Neglected Duty (al-Farida al-Gha'iba) as their manual of action. Not unlike his predecessors, President Mubarak curbed the influence of the Muslim Brotherhood by arresting its leadership. When he was removed from power by peaceful mass demonstrations in 2011, however, the Muslim Brotherhood was taken by surprise and began immediately to reorganize its structure to resonate with the new spirit of freedom. The "Arab Spring," beginning with mass demonstrations in Tunisia and Egypt early in 2011, created enthusiasm but risks devolving into a leaderless revolution. The key challenge facing Muslim advocates for reform would be to identify and empower balanced leadership in the hitherto unfamiliar environment of human rights and democratic freedom.

In India and Pakistan, Mawdudi, an Urdu journalist by profession, became one of the leading interpreters of Islam in the 20th century. Educated as a Hanafi Sunni, he was insulated from Western ideas and the English language but acquired a fluent knowledge of Arabic. Stung by Hindu assertions that Islam had been spread by the sword, he emphasized the spiritual and ethical dimensions of the doctrine of jihad in his al-Jihad fi al-Islam (Jihad in Islam), a testimony to his profound conversion to the Muslim faith. For the rest of his life, Mawdudi published his ideas in the monthly Tarjuman al-Qur'an, making it the vehicle for his intense anti-Western feelings and his relentless desire to demonstrate the superiority of Islamic culture. For 30 years, Mawdudi worked on his Qur'an commentary, Tafhim al-Qur'an, in which he developed his political thought on the Islamic state. In 1941, he founded the Jama'at-i Islami, a carefully selected group that would disseminate his ideas and implement his plan for an ideal Islamic state that was not confined within national boundaries. Mawdudi was initially opposed to the creation of Pakistan as a separate state, out of fear that the Muslims in India would lose their religious identity. Nevertheless, when the subcontinent was divided in 1947, he opted to move to Pakistan, becoming the decisive force that directed the new nation away from the ideal of a secular state toward that of an Islamic state. Mawdudi met with considerable resistance, enduring a series of imprisonments and, in 1953, even a death sentence that was not carried out. He managed nevertheless to infuse his ideas into the constitution of Pakistan. Toward the end of his life, he supported the move to outlaw the revivalist and messianic movement of the Ahmadis, founded by Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1835–1908) in India—a move that was accomplished in 1974 by an act of the Pakistan parliament. In 1977, Mawdudi also called for the overthrow of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, the leader of the People's Party and prime minister of Pakistan, who was executed in 1979.

Khomeini came from a family of strict Shi'i religious leaders in Iran; his father was killed on the orders of Reza Shah (r. 1925–41). Having been educated in Islamic schools and having written extensively on Islamic law and philosophy, Khomeini was recognized as an ayatollah in the 1950s in Qum, where he had moved in 1922 with his teacher 'Abd al-Karim al-Ha'iri. He received the more exalted title of a marja' (grand ayatollah) after the death of Ayatollah Borujerdi in 1960. Because he spoke out against Muhammad Reza Shah (r. 1941–79) and against Westernization, he was exiled to Najaf in Iraq in 1964. Asked to leave Iraq in 1978, Khomeini settled in a suburb of Paris and agitated from there for the overthrow of the Shah and the establishment of an Islamic Republic in Iran. After the ouster of the Shah, he returned to his homeland on February 1, 1979, and was acclaimed as the religious leader of the revolution. Khomeini came to power with the help of a network of mosques, the support of the bazaar, and the support of the lower ranks of the military, together with a wide spectrum of leftist, secularist, and conservative traditionalist thinkers.

A new constitution created the Islamic Republic of Iran with Khomeini as its religious leader and legal guardian (wilāyat al-faqīh). More generally, a new theocratic political system gave the clerics ultimate control of the state. Although an elected president headed the executive branch, his authority was superseded by that of the legal guardian, who was supported by an advisory council of Shi'i jurists. Under Khomeini's direction, fundamentalist Muslim codes designed to suppress Western influence and restore shari'a were enacted. Women were required to wear the veil, alcohol and Western music were banned, and punishments prescribed by Islamic law were reinstated. Opposition figures were killed, imprisoned, or exiled. The fledging republic managed to survive war with Iraq (1980–88) but was unable to export its Shi'i brand of fundamentalism to other Muslim countries.

Perhaps the thorniest issue for Islamic political thought in the 20th century was the establishment of Israel on native Arab lands in 1948. To make room for Ashkenazi Jewish refugees from Central Europe and Sephardic Jewish immigrants from North Africa and the Middle East after World War II, Palestinian Arabs were driven from their homes without receiving any remuneration and forced to live in refugee camps. Wars in 1967 and 1973 between Israel and its neighbors as well as Israeli bombardments of Beirut in 1982 and cluster bombings of southern Lebanon in July 2006 only deepened Arab resentment. Ongoing construction of new Israeli settlements on the high ground of Palestinian soil west of the Jordan River and dividing walls cutting through Palestinian villages further antagonized the Palestinians, who were promised a two-part quasi-state—the Gaza Strip and West Bank—without territorial, economic, or military sovereignty. While advocates for peace and reconciliation can be found with both liberal Israeli and Palestinian factions, the policies of far-right Israeli leaders have resisted reconciliation and reparation as dangerous weaknesses. American support of Israel created a deep dislike for American policy in the greater Middle East that reverberated throughout the entire Muslim world.

In contemporary times, Pan-Islamism has remained a distant dream, secularism severed the bonds with a long and venerable Islamic heritage while fundamentalist movements forced Islam into a puritanical straitjacket, and militancy brought murder and destruction. Islam has not created a comprehensive system of political thought able to integrate the disparate elements informing its current stage of development. Emerging currents in political Islam are attempting to articulate ideologies and organize movements that aspire to inner purity, ethical strength, personal freedom, and collective dignity. Burdened with political and cultural fragmentation and labeled by the West as violent religion, Islam thirsts for a new paradigm of political thought that will enable it to construct its future as a peaceful order in a pluralistic world.

The Encyclopedia of Islamic Political Thought (EIPT)

In creating the EIPT, our goal was to provide a solid and innovative reference work that would trace the historical roots of Islamic political thought and demonstrate its contemporary importance. The editors first met for a workshop in fall of 2007 at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, where we agreed on a framework for the encyclopedia and drafted a list of entries. The EIPT was conceived as a combination of broad, comprehensive articles on core concepts and shorter entries on specific ideas, movements, leaders, and related topics. We intended to make the EIPT accessible, informative, and comprehensive with respect to the contemporary political and cultural situation of Islam, while also providing in-depth examination of the historical roots of that situation. The core articles on central themes were designated to provide the framework for the reader to integrate and contextualize the information provided by the plethora of articles on more specific subjects. It is our hope that this organizational structure will enable the EIPT to serve as a reference work of the first order for both beginners and specialists and to support undergraduate and graduate courses on Islamic political thought.

The entries appear in alphabetical order for ease of use but fall into five categories: (1) central themes, under the direction of state. In 1941, he founded the Jama'at-i Islami, a carefully selected group that would disseminate his ideas and implement his plan for an ideal Islamic state that was not confined within national boundaries. Mawdudi was initially opposed to the creation of Pakistan as a separate state, out of fear that the Muslims in India would lose their religious identity. Nevertheless, when the subcontinent was divided in 1947, he opted to move to Pakistan, becoming the decisive force that directed the new nation away from the ideal of a secular state toward that of an Islamic state. Mawdudi met with considerable resistance, enduring a series of imprisonments and, in 1953, even a death sentence that was not carried out. He managed nevertheless to infuse his ideas into the constitution of Pakistan. Toward the end of his life, he supported the move to outlaw the revivalist and messianic movement of the Ahmadis, founded by Mirza Ghulam Ahmad (1835–1908) in India—a move that was accomplished in 1974 by an act of the Pakistan parliament. In 1977, Mawdudi also called for the overthrow of Zulfikar Ali Bhutto, the leader of the People's Party and prime minister of Pakistan, who was executed in 1979.

Khomeini came from a family of strict Shi'i religious leaders in Iran; his father was killed on the orders of Reza Shah (r. 1925–41). Having been educated in Islamic schools and having written extensively on Islamic law and philosophy, Khomeini was recognized as an ayatollah in the 1950s in Qum, where he had moved in 1922 with his teacher 'Abd al-Karim al-Ha'iri. He received the more exalted title of a marja' (grand ayatollah) after the death of Ayatollah Borujerdi in 1960. Because he spoke out against Muhammad Reza Shah (r. 1941–79) and against Westernization, he was exiled to Najaf in Iraq in 1964. Asked to leave Iraq in 1978, Khomeini settled in a suburb of Paris and agitated from there for the overthrow of the Shah and the establishment of an Islamic Republic in Iran. After the ouster of the Shah, he returned to his homeland on February 1, 1979, and was acclaimed as the religious leader of the revolution. Khomeini came to power with the help of a network of mosques, the support of the bazaar, and the support of the lower ranks of the military, together with a wide spectrum of leftist, secularist, and conservative traditionalist thinkers.

A new constitution created the Islamic Republic of Iran with Khomeini as its religious leader and legal guardian (wilāyat al-faqīh). More generally, a new theocratic political system gave the clerics ultimate control of the state. Although an elected president headed the executive branch, his authority was superseded by that of the legal guardian, who was supported by an advisory council of Shi'i jurists. Under Khomeini's direction, fundamentalist Muslim codes designed to suppress Western influence and restore shari'a were enacted. Women were required to wear the veil, alcohol and Western music were banned, and punishments prescribed by Islamic law were reinstated. Opposition figures were killed, imprisoned, or exiled. The fledging republic managed to survive war with Iraq (1980–88) but was unable to export its Shi'i brand of fundamentalism to other Muslim countries.

Perhaps the thorniest issue for Islamic political thought in the 20th century was the establishment of Israel on native Arab lands in 1948. To make room for Ashkenazi Jewish refugees from Central Europe and Sephardic Jewish immigrants from North Africa and the Middle East after World War II, Palestinian Arabs were driven from their homes without receiving any remuneration and forced to live in refugee camps. Wars in 1967 and 1973 between Israel and its neighbors as well as Israeli bombardments of Beirut in 1982 and cluster bombings of southern Lebanon in July 2006 only deepened Arab resentment. Ongoing construction of new Israeli settlements on the high ground of Palestinian soil west of the Jordan River and dividing walls cutting through Palestinian villages further antagonized the Palestinians, who were promised a two-part quasi-state—the Gaza Strip and West Bank—without territorial, economic, or military sovereignty. While advocates for peace and reconciliation can be found with both liberal Israeli and Palestinian factions, the policies of far-right Israeli leaders have resisted reconciliation and reparation as dangerous weaknesses. American support of Israel created a deep dislike for American policy in the greater Middle East that reverberated throughout the entire Muslim world.

In contemporary times, Pan-Islamism has remained a distant dream, secularism severed the bonds with a long and venerable Islamic heritage while fundamentalist movements forced Islam into a puritanical straitjacket, and militancy brought murder and destruction. Islam has not created a comprehensive system of political thought able to integrate the disparate elements informing its current stage of development. Emerging currents in political Islam are attempting to articulate ideologies and organize movements that aspire to inner purity, ethical strength, personal freedom, and collective dignity. Burdened with political and cultural fragmentation and labeled by the West as violent religion, Islam thirsts for a new paradigm of political thought that will enable it to construct its future as a peaceful order in a pluralistic world.

The Encyclopedia of Islamic Political Thought (EIPT)

In creating the EIPT, our goal was to provide a solid and innovative reference work that would trace the historical roots of Islamic political thought and demonstrate its contemporary importance. The editors first met for a workshop in fall of 2007 at the Institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, where we agreed on a framework for the encyclopedia and drafted a list of entries. The EIPT was conceived as a combination of broad, comprehensive articles on core concepts and shorter entries on specific ideas, movements, leaders, and related topics. We intended to make the EIPT accessible, informative, and comprehensive with respect to the contemporary political and cultural situation of Islam, while also providing in-depth examination of the historical roots of that situation. The core articles on central themes were designated to provide the framework for the reader to integrate and contextualize the information provided by the plethora of articles on more specific subjects. It is our hope that this organizational structure will enable the EIPT to serve as a reference work of the first order for both beginners and specialists and to support undergraduate and graduate courses on Islamic political thought.

The entries appear in alphabetical order for ease of use but fall into five categories: (1) central themes, under the direction of Gerhard Bowering; (2) modern concepts, institutions, movements, and parties, under Muhammad Qasim Zaman; (3) Islamic law and traditional Islamic societies, under Devin J. Stewart; (4) historical developments, sects and schools, and regions and dynasties, under Patricia Crone; and (5) thinkers, personalities, and statesmen, under Wadad Kadi. In the spring of 2008, Princeton University Press assumed the significant administrative burden of implementing the editorial vision for the encyclopedia by helping the editors to secure contributors and track the encyclopedia's progress toward completion. This undertaking has much evolved during the last four years, and the final product, I believe, constitutes a pioneering venture in this field.

We asked contributors to write for the educated nonspecialist reader, to maintain an objective tone, and to provide recommendations for further reading. We followed the system of transliteration developed by the International Journal of Middle Eastern Studies (IJMES), with minor modifications, and have simplified spelling as much as possible.

As chief editor, I would like to thank Mahan Mirza for having become the heart and soul of the project, managing the flow of the contributions and consulting at each and every impasse with myself, the associate editors, and the Press, in countless phone calls and e-mails. Without him, the project would neither have begun nor come to term. My thanks are due equally to Patricia Crone, Wadad Kadi, Devin J. Stewart, and Qasim Zaman for their excellent contributions of core articles and their unstinting dedication to the great variety of articles that crossed their desk at untimely intervals. Without their endurance and patience, the project could not have been steered through many perilous straits. I wish to express particular gratitude to Anne Savarese and her collaborators at the Press (Claire Tilman-McTigue, Diana Goovaerts, Natalie Baan, and others who worked behind the scenes), all of whom went out of their way to overcome the technical hurdles of this project and to bear with all of us as the process lengthened beyond expectation. Finally, I would like to thank the many scholars who contributed to the EIPT, making it an instrument to explain and analyze Islamic political thought for specialists and generally informed readers alike.

GERHARD BOWERING

Alphabetical List of Entries

'Abbas I (1571–1629)
Abbasids (750–1258)
'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib b. Yahya al-'Amiri (d. 750)
'Abd al-Qadir al-Jaza'iri (1808–83)
'Abd al-Rahman, 'Umar (b. 1938)
'Abd al-Raziq, 'Ali (1887–1966)
abdication
'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905)
Abdülhamid II (1842–1918)
abodes of Islam, war, and truce
absolutism
Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634)
Abu Hanifa (699–767)
Abu Yusuf (ca. 731–98)
advice
al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97)
Afghanistan
'Aflaq, Michel (1910–89)
Aga Khan
Ahmad, Israr (1932–2010)
Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855)
Ahmadis
Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624)
'A'isha (ca. 614–78)
Akbar the Great (1542–1605)
'Alawis
Algeria
'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661)
Aligarh
alliances
Almohads (1130–1269)
Almoravids (1056–1147)
Amal anarchism apartheid apocalypse apostasy
Arab nationalism
Arafat, Yasir (1929–2004)
arbitration
Ash'aris
'Ashura'
astrology
asylum
Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938)
Aurangzeb (1618–1707)
authority
ayatollah
Ayyubids (1169–1250)
Azhar University

Babur, Zahir al-Din (1483–1530)
Baghdad
Bangladesh
al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49)
Barelwis
Ba'th Party
bazaar
Beirut
Berbers
Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011)
blasphemy
Brethren of Purity
brotherhoods
bureaucracy
Buyids (945–1062)

Cairo
caliph, caliphate capitalism
censorship
Central Asia
charity
China
chivalry
Christian-Muslim relations citizenship
city city (philosophical) civil society
civil war clients coinage collective obligations
colonialism commanding right and forbidding wrong communism
community
Companions of the Prophet consensus
constitutionalism
Constitution of Medina consultation contracts
conversion coup d'état
Crusades culture
custom

Dan Fodio, Usman (1754–1817)
Dawani, Jalal al-Din (1427–1502)

Delhi
Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526)
democracy
demographics
Deobandis difference of opinion
diplomacy
dissent, opposition, resistance
dissimulation division of labor
Druze

East Africa economic theory education
Egypt elections endowment environment equality
ethics
Ethiopia and Eritrea
ethnicity
Europe
excommunication
exegesis

Fadlallah, Muhammad Husayn (1935–2010)
faith
family
al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950)
Faraj, Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam (1954–82)
Fatimids (909–1171)
fatwa freedom
free will Friday prayer
friendship
fundamentalism

al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya
genealogy
Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111)
ghazi
Ghaznavids (977–1086)
Ghurids (1009–1215)
globalization
God governance government grievance

guardianship of the jurist guilds

hadith
Hakim bi-Amr Allah (985–1021)
Hamas
Hasan b. ʿAli (ca. 624–70)
heresiography heresy and innovation
hijra
Hizbullah
holy places honor household human nature
human rights
Husayn b. ʿAli (626–80)
hypocrisy

Ibadis
Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, Muhammad (1703–92)
Ibn al-Muqaffaʿ (ca. 720–56)
Ibn Bajja (d. 1139)
Ibn Hazm (994–1064)
Ibn Jamaʿa (1241–1333)
Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406)
Ibn Rushd (1126–98)
Ibn Sina, Abu ʿAli (980–1037)
Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328)
Ibn Tufayl (ca. 1105–85)
Ibn Tumart (ca. 1080–1130)
ideology
ijtihād and taqlid
Ilkhanids (1256–1336)
imamate
imperialism
India
individualism
Indonesia
inquisition
intercession
international Islamic organizations
international relations
Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938)
Iran
Iraq
Islamic Jihad
Islamization
Ismaʿil I (1487–1524)
Ismaʿilis
Istanbul

Jaʿfar al-Sadiq (702–65)
jāhiliyya
Jalal Al-i Ahmad (1923–69)
Jamaʿat-i Islami
Jerusalem
jihad
Jinnah, Mohammad ʿAli (1876–1948)
jizya
Jordan
judge judicial courts jurisprudence justice

Kadızadeli
Karbala
Karramis
Kharijis
Khilafat movement (1919–24)
Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89)
Khunji, Fazl Allah b. Ruzbihan (1455–1521) kinship knowledge leadership Lebanon

liberalism
liberation theology
libertarianism loyalty

madrasa
Mahdi
Mahdi of the Sudan (1844–85)
Malaysia
Malcolm X (1925–65)
Malik b. Anas (712–95)
Mamluks (1250–1517)
Maʾmun (786–833)
martyrdom
masses
Mawardi (974–1058)
Mawdudi, Abul al-Aʿla (1903–79)
mawlid
Mecca and Medina media messianism military minorities minorities, jurisprudence of Mir Damad (1561–1631)
Mirrors for Princes modernism modernity
Mohammed, W. D. (1933–2008)
monarchy
Mongols
Morocco
mosque
Muʿawiya (602–80)
mufti/grand mufti
Mughals (1526–1857)
Muhammad (570–632)
Muhammad, Elijah (1897–1975)
Muhammad ʿAli (1769–1849)
Mulla Sadra (ca. 1572–1640)
Mulla ʿUmar (b. 1959)
Murjiʾis
Muslim Brotherhood
Muslim League
Muʿtazilis

Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–70)
nationalism
Nation of Islam nation-state natural law
Nazim Hikmet (1902–63)
Nigeria
Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92)
Nizamiyya
Nizaris
nonviolence
North Africa
North America
notables

oath of allegiance
obedience
Ottomans (1299–1924)

Pakistan
Palestine
Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)
Pan-Islamism
Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS)
parliament patrimonial state patronage
People of the Book philosopher-king philosophy
piety and asceticism pilgrimage
Pillars of Islam pluralism and tolerance
police political ritual preaching privacy propaganda prophecy
public interest public opinion public sphere pulpit punishment

Qadaris
Qaddafi, Muʿammar (1942–2011)
al-Qaeda
Qajars (1789–1925)

al-Qaradawi, Yusuf (b. 1926)
al-Qarafi, Shihab al-Din (1228–85)
Qarmatians
quietism and activism
Qur'an
Quraysh

racism
Rahman, Fazlur (1919–88)
al-Razi, Fakhr al-Din (1149–1209)
rebellion
representation republicanism
revival and reform
revolutions
Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935)
Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61)
rights
royal court

al-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir (1935–80)
Safavids (1501–1722)
Sa'id Nursi (1877–1960)
Saladin (1138–93)
Salafis
Samanids (819–1005)
Saudi Arabia
Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98)
Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)
secularism
Seljuqs (1055–1194)
al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820) shāhānshāh
Shahnama
Shah Waliullah (1703–62)
Shamil (1797–1871)
shari'a
Shari'ati, 'Ali (1933–77)
al-Shawkani, Muhammad b. 'Ali (1760–1834) al-Shaybani, Muhammad b. al-Hasan (749–805)
shaykh, pir
shaykh al-Islam
Shi'ism
Shu'ubis
al-siyasa al-shar'iyya slavery socialism solidarity
source of emulation
South Africa
Southeast Asia
sovereignty
Spain and Portugal (Andalus) succession
Sudan
Sufism
al-Suhrawardi, Abu Hafs 'Umar (ca. 1145–1234)
suicide
Süleiman the Magnificent (1494–1566)
sultan
sunna Sunnism
Syria

Tablighi Jama'at
Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed (1909–85)
Taliban
Tamerlane (1336–1405)
Tanzimat
al-Tawhidi, Abu Hayyan (ca. 950–1023) taxation terrorism theocracy
theology
Thousand and One Nights
Timurids (1370–1506)
torture
trade and commerce
traditional political thought Transoxiana
treason Treaty of 'Umar tribalism
Tunisia
al-Turabi, Hasan (b. 1932)
Turkey
al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)
tyranny

Uighurs
'ulama'
'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (ca. 680–720)
'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644)
Umayyads (661–750)
usurper
'Uthman b. 'Affan (ca. 579–656) utopia veil violence

vizier

West, the West Africa
Westernization
women

Yemen
Young Turks

Zahiris
al-Zawahiri, Ayman (b. 1951)
Zaydis
Zia-ul-Haq (1924–88)

Topical List of Entries

Central Themes
Historical Developments, Sects and Schools, Regions and Dynasties
Modern Concepts, Institutions, Movements, and Parties
Islamic Law and Traditional Islamic Societies
Thinkers, Personalities, and Statesmen

Central Themes

Edited by Gerhard Bowering

authority
caliph, caliphate
fundamentalism
government
jihad knowledge minorities modernity
Muhammad (570–632)
pluralism and tolerance
Qur'an
revival and reform
shari'a traditional political thought
'ulama'

Historical Developments, Sects and Schools, Regions and Dynasties

Edited by Patricia Crone

Dynasties

Abbasids (750–1258)
Almohads (1130–1269)
Almoravids (1056–1147)
Ayyubids (1169–1250)
Buyids (945–1062)
Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526)
Fatimids (909–1171)
Ghaznavids (977–1086)
Ghurids (1009–1215)
Ilkhanids (1256–1336)
Mamluks (1250–1517)
Mughals (1526–1857)
Ottomans (1299–1924)
Safavids (1501–1722)
Samanids (819–1005)
Seljuqs (1055–1194)
Timurids (1370–1506)
Umayyads (661–750)

Historical Developments

alliances
bazaar
Brethren of Purity
city (philosophical) civil war
clients
coinage Crusades
difference of opinion
excommunication
ghazi
heresiography heresy and innovation
hypocrisy
inquisition
Mongols philosophy
privacy
Qajars (1789–1925)
Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61)
shahanshah Shahnama solidarity theology
Thousand and One Nights
trade and commerce
usurper

Regions

Afghanistan
Algeria
Baghdad
Bangladesh
Beirut
Cairo
Central Asia
China
Delhi
East Africa
Egypt
Ethiopia and Eritrea
Europe
India
Indonesia
Iran
Iraq
Istanbul
Jerusalem
Jordan
Karbala
Lebanon
Malaysia
Mecca and Medina
Morocco
Nigeria
North Africa
North America
Pakistan
Palestine
Saudi Arabia
South Africa
Southeast Asia
Spain and Portugal (Andalus)
Sudan
Syria
Transoxiana
Tunisia
Turkey
West Africa
Yemen

Sects and Schools

'Alawis
Ash'aris
Barelwis
Berbers
Druze
Ibadis
Isma'ilis
Kadizadeli
Karramis
Kharijis
Murji'is
Mu'tazilis
Nizaris
Qadaris
Qarmatians
Shi'ism
Shu'ubis
Sufism
Sunnism
Uighurs
Zahiris
Zaydis

Modern Concepts, Institutions, Movements, and Parties

Edited by Muhammad Qasim Zaman

absolutism
Ahmadis
Aligarh
Amal anarchism
apartheid
Arab nationalism
Azhar University
Ba'th Party
bazaar
capitalism
censorship
Christian-Muslim relations
citizenship
civil society colonialism
communism
community
constitutionalism
contracts
coup d'état
culture
democracy
demographics
Deobandis
diplomacy
economic theory education
elections
environment
equality
ethics
freedom
al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya
globalization
Hamas
Hizbullah
human rights
ideology
imperialism
individualism
international Islamic organizations
international relations
Islamic Jihad
Islamization
Jama'at-i Islami
judicial courts
Khilafat movement (1919–24)
leadership
liberalism
liberation theology
libertarianism
media minorities, jurisprudence of modernism
monarchy
Muslim Brotherhood
Muslim League
nationalism
Nation of Islam
nation-state natural law
nonviolence
Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)
Pan-Islamism
Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS)
parliament
preaching
public opinion public sphere
al-Qaeda
racism representation
republicanism
Salafis
secularism
socialism sovereignty
suicide
Tablighi Jama'at
Taliban
Tanzimat terrorism
theocracy
treason
veil violence
West, the Westernization
women
Young Turks

Islamic Law and Traditional Islamic Societies

Edited by Devin J. Stewart

abdication
abodes of Islam, war, and truce advice
apocalypse
apostasy
arbitration
'Ashura'
astrology
asylum
ayatollah
blasphemy
brotherhoods bureaucracy charity
chivalry
city
collective obligations
commanding right and forbidding wrong
Companions of the Prophet
consensus
Constitution of Medina consultation conversion
custom dissent, opposition, resistance
dissimulation
division of labor endowment ethnicity
exegesis
faith family
fatwa
free will Friday prayer
friendship
genealogy
God governance
grievance guardianship of the jurist guilds
hadith
hijra holy places honor household
human nature
ijtihād and taqlīd
imamate intercession jahiliyya jizya
judge jurisprudence
justice
kinship loyalty
madrasa
Mahdi
martyrdom masses
mawlid
messianism
military Mirrors for Princes
mosque
mufti/grand mufti
Nizamiyya

Modern Concepts, Institutions, Movements, and Parties

Edited by Muhammad Qasim Zaman

absolutism
Ahmadis
Aligarh
Amal anarchism
apartheid
Arab nationalism
Azhar University
Ba'th Party
bazaar
capitalism
censorship
Christian-Muslim relations
citizenship
civil society colonialism
communism
community
constitutionalism
contracts
coup d'état
culture
democracy
demographics
Deobandis
diplomacy
economic theory education
elections
environment
equality
ethics
freedom
al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya
globalization
Hamas
Hizbullah
human rights
ideology
imperialism
individualism
international Islamic organizations
international relations
Islamic Jihad
Islamization
Jama'at-i Islami
judicial courts
Khilafat movement (1919–24)
leadership
liberalism
liberation theology
libertarianism
media minorities, jurisprudence of modernism
monarchy
Muslim Brotherhood
Muslim League
nationalism
Nation of Islam
nation-state natural law
nonviolence
Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)
Pan-Islamism
Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS)
parliament
preaching
public opinion public sphere
al-Qaeda
racism representation
republicanism
Salafis
secularism
socialism sovereignty
suicide
Tablighi Jama'at
Taliban
Tanzimat terrorism
theocracy
treason
veil violence
West, the Westernization
women
Young Turks

Islamic Law and Traditional Islamic Societies

Edited by Devin J. Stewart

abdication
abodes of Islam, war, and truce advice
apocalypse
apostasy
arbitration
'Ashura'
astrology asylum
ayatollah
blasphemy
brotherhoods bureaucracy charity
chivalry
city
collective obligations
commanding right and forbidding wrong
Companions of the Prophet
consensus
Constitution of Medina consultation conversion
custom dissent, opposition, resistance
dissimulation
division of labor endowment ethnicity
exegesis
faith family
fatwa
free will Friday prayer
friendship
genealogy
God governance
grievance guardianship of the jurist guilds
hadith
hijra holy places honor household
human nature
ijtihād and taqlīd
imamate intercession jahiliyya jizya
judge jurisprudence justice
kinship loyalty
madrasa
Mahdi
martyrdom masses
mawlid
messianism
military Mirrors for Princes
mosque
mufti/grand mufti
Nizamiyya

notables
oath of allegiance
obedience
patrimonial state patronage
People of the Book
philosopher-king
piety and asceticism
pilgrimage
Pillars of Islam
police political ritual
propaganda
prophecy
public interest pulpit
punishment
quietism and activism
Quraysh
rebellion revolutions rights royal court
shaykh, pir
shaykh al-Islam
slavery
source of emulation
succession
sultan
sunna taxation
torture
Treaty of ʿUmar tribalism tyranny utopia
vizier

Thinkers, Personalities, and Statesmen

Edited by Wadad Kadi

ʿAbbas I (1571–1629)
ʿAbd al-Hamid al-Katib b. Yahya al-ʿAmiri (d. 750)
ʿAbd al-Qadir al-Jazaʾiri (1808–83)
ʿAbd al-Rahman, ʿUmar (b. 1938)
ʿAbd al-Raziq, ʿAli (1887–1966)
ʿAbduh, Muhammad (1849–1905)
Abdülhamid II (1842–1918)
Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634)
Abu Hanifa (699–767)
Abu Yusuf (ca. 731–98)
al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97)
ʿAflaq, Michel (1910–89)
Aga Khan
Ahmad, Israr (1932–2010)
Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855)
Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624)
ʿAʾisha (ca. 614–78)
Akbar the Great (1542–1605)
ʿAli b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661)
Arafat, Yasir (1929–2004)
Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938)
Aurangzeb (1618–1707)
Babur, Zahir al-Din (1483–1530)
al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49)
Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011)
Dan Fodio, Usman (1754–1817)
Dawani, Jalal al-Din (1427–1502)
Fadlallah, Muhammad Husayn (1935–2010)
al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950)
Faraj, Muhammad ʿAbd al-Salam (1954–82)
Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111)
Hakim bi-Amr Allah (985–1021)
Hasan b. ʿAli (ca. 624–70)
Husayn b. ʿAli (626–80)
Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, Muhammad (1703–92)
Ibn al-Muqaffaʿ (ca. 720–56)
Ibn Bajja (d. 1139)
Ibn Hazm (994–1064)
Ibn Jamaʿa (1241–1333)
Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406)
Ibn Rushd (1126–98)
Ibn Sina, Abu ʿAli (980–1037)
Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328)
Ibn Tufayl (ca. 1105–85)
Ibn Tumart (ca. 1080–1130)
Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938)
Ismaʿil I (1487–1524)
Jaʿfar al-Sadiq (702–65)
Jalal Al-i Ahmad (1923–69)
Jinnah, Mohammad ʿAli (1876–1948)
Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89)
Khunji, Fazl Allah b. Ruzbihan (1455–1521)
Mahdi of the Sudan (1844–85)
Malcolm X (1925–65)
Malik b. Anas (712–95)
Maʾmun (786–833)
Mawardi (974–1058)
Mawdudi, Abul al-Aʿla (1903–79)
Mir Damad (1561–1631)
Mohammed, W. D. (1933–2008)
Muʿawiya (602–80)
Muhammad (570–632)
Muhammad, Elijah (1897–1975)
Muhammad ʿAli (1769–1849)
Mulla Sadra (ca. 1572–1640)
Mulla ʿUmar (b. 1959)
Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–70)
Nazim Hikmet (1902–63)
Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92)
Qaddafi, Muʿammar (1942–2011)
al-Qaradawi, Yusuf (b. 1926)
al-Qarafi, Shihab al-Din (1228–85)
Rahman, Fazlur (1919–88)
al-Razi, Fakhr al-Din (1149–1209)
Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935)
al-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir (1935–80)
Saʿid Nursi (1877–1960)
Saladin (1138–93)
Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98)
Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)
al-Shafiʿi, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820)
Shah Waliullah (1703–62)
Shamil (1797–1871)
Shariʿati, ʿAli (1933–77)
al-Shawkani, Muhammad b. ʿAli (1760–1834)
al-Shaybani, Muhammad b. al-Hasan (749–805)
al-Suhrawardi, Abu Hafs ʿUmar (ca. 1145–1234)
Süleiman the Magnificent (1494–1566)
Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed (1909–85)
Tamerlane (1336–1405)
al-Tawhidi, Abu Hayyan (ca. 950–1023)
al-Turabi, Hasan (b. 1932)
al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)
ʿUmar b. ʿAbd al-ʿAziz (ca. 680–720)
ʿUmar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644)
ʿUthman b. ʿAffan (ca. 579–656)
al-Zawahiri, Ayman (b. 1951)
Zia-ul-Haq (1924–88)

Contributors

Ahmed Abdel Meguid, Syracuse University
Ash'aris; free will; human nature; prophecy

As'ad AbuKhalil, California State University, Stanislaus
Lebanon

Camilla Adang, Tel Aviv University
Ibn Hazm

Asma Afsaruddin, Indiana University
martyrdom

Ahmed Afzaal, Concordia College
nonviolence

Irfan Ahmad, Monash University (Australia)
Aligarh; Jama'at-i Islami; Mawdudi, Abul al-A'la; Sayyid Ahmad Khan

Sadaf Ahmad, Lahore University of Management Sciences (Pakistan)
veil

Farish Ahmad-Noor, Nanyang Technological University (Singapore) and Erasmus Universias Muhamadiyah Surakarta, Yogjarta (Indonesia)
Pan-Malaysian Islamic Party (PAS)

Rafiuddin Ahmed, Elmira College
Bangladesh

Shahrough Akhavi, University of South Carolina communism; guardianship of the jurist; socialism

Mehmetcan Akpinar, University of Chicago
Mawardi

Omar Ali-de Unzaga, Institute of Ismaili Studies (London)
Brethren of Purity

Adel Allouche, Yale University
Tunisia

Sean W. Anthony, University of Oregon
'Ali b. Abi Talib; Hasan b. 'Ali; 'Umar b. al-Khattab; 'Uthman b. 'Affan

Zayde Antrim, Trinity College (Connecticut)
Jerusalem; Mecca and Medina

Christopher Anzalone, McGill University
propaganda

Said Amir Arjomand, Stony Brook University
absolutism; monarchy; patrimonial state; al-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir

J. C. Arsenault, University of Pennsylvania community; culture

Mushegh Asatryan, Yale University
'Alawis

Fakhreddin Azimi, University of Connecticut
Iran

Kathryn Babayan, University of Michigan
Isma'il I

Irit Back, Tel Aviv University
East Africa; Ethiopia and Eritrea

Roswitha Badry, University of Freiburg (Germany)
consultation

Meir M. Bar-Asher, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Druze

Michael Barry, Princeton University
Afghanistan

Abbas Barzegar, Georgia State University
ayatollah; commanding right and forbidding wrong; source of emulation; al-Zawahiri, Ayman

Shahzad Bashir, Stanford University
messianism

Orit Bashkin, University of Chicago
'Abd al-Raziq, 'Ali

Mangol Bayat, Independent scholar
al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din

Amira K. Bennison, University of Cambridge
Algeria; Berbers; Morocco; North Africa

Lindsay J. Benstead, University of Michigan
parliament

Herbert Berg, University of North Carolina, Wilmington
Muhammad, Elijah; Nation of Islam

Jonathan P. Berkey, Davidson College
madrasa

Michal Biran, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Transoxiana

Khalid Yahya Blankinship, Temple University
Malik b. Anas; obedience; al-Shaybani, Muhammad b. al-Hasan

Antoine Borrut, University of Maryland
'Umar b. 'Abd al-'Aziz

John Bowen, Washington University in Saint Louis
West, the

Gerhard Bowering, Yale University
Egypt (coauthor); Muhammad; Qur'an; Syria

James Broucek, Florida State University
mufti/grand mufti

Jonathan A. C. Brown, University of Washington
hadith

Rainer Brunner, University of Freiburg (Germany)
Europe; Karbala; Rightly Guided Caliphate

Richard W. Bulliet, Columbia University
conversion

Heribert Busse, University of Kiel (Germany)
Buyids

Alexander Caeiro, Erlangen Centre for Islam and Law in Europe
minorities, jurisprudence of

Yousef Casewit, Yale University
Zahiris

Shaojin Chai, University of Notre Dame
Uighurs

Ayesha S. Chaudhry, University of British Columbia
women

Julia Clancy-Smith, University of Arizona
'Abd al-Qadir al-Jaza'iri
David Cook, Rice University
Mahdi
Michael Cook, Princeton University
freedom
Michael Cooperson, University of California, Los Angeles
Baghdad; Ma'mun; Thousand and One Nights
Robert D. Crews, Stanford University
Central Asia; imperialism
Patricia Crone, Institute for Advanced Study (Princeton, NJ)
clients; philosophy; Quraysh; sunna; traditional political thought; usurper Farhad Daftary, Institute of Ismaili Studies (London)
Aga Khan; Fatimids; Nizaris; Qarmatians
Hans Daiber, Frankfurt University (Germany)
philosopher-king
Stephen F. Dale, Ohio State University
Babur, Zahir al-Din
Linda Darling, University of Arizona
Ottomans
Lara Deeb, Scripps College
Amal; Hizbullah
John Donohue, Saint Joseph University (Lebanon)
Beirut; Jordan
Phil Dorroll, Emory University
holy places
Racha El Omari, University of California, Santa Barbara
theology
Sarah Eltantawi, Harvard University
Nigeria
Yanis Eshots, University of Latvia
city (philosophical); al-Farabi, Abu Nasr; Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali Roxanne L. Euben, Wellesley College
fundamentalism
Mohammad Fadel, University of Toronto arbitration; collective obligations; contracts; judicial courts Khaled Fahmy, New York University
Muhammad 'Ali
Schirin H. Fathi, University of Hamburg (Germany)
Shari'ati, 'Ali
Maribel Fierro, Center of Human and Social Sciences of the Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Madrid
Almohads; Almoravids; heresy and innovation; Ibn Tumart; Spain and Portugal (Andalus)
Melissa Finn, York University (Canada)
asylum; revolutions
Cornell H. Fleischer, University of Chicago
Süleiman the Magnificent (coauthor)
Finbarr Barry Flood, New York University
Ghurids
Kathleen Foody, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
utopia
Bernard K. Freamon, Seton Hall University
slavery
Yohanan Friedmann, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Ahmadis; Ahmad Sirhindi; minorities
Patrick D. Gaffney, University of Notre Dame al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya; mosque; preaching; pulpit Moshe Gammer, Tel Aviv University
Shamil
Behrooz Ghamari-Tabrizi, University of Illinois, Urbana-Champaign
Westernization
Kambiz GhaneaBassiri, Reed College
North America
Dru C. Gladney, Pomona College
China
Robert Gleave, University of Exeter (England)
Friday prayer; Shi'ism
Andreas Görke, University of Basel (Switzerland)
taxation
Frank Griffel, Yale University
apostasy; excommunication; natural law Sebastian Günther, University of Toronto
education
Li Guo, University of Notre Dame
Mamluks
Joseph Hammond, Independent scholar
anarchism; ethnicity
Andras Hamori, Princeton University
Ibn al-Muqaffa'
Dyala Hamzah, Zentrum Moderner Orient (Germany)
Rida, Muhammad Rashid
M. Şükrü Hanioğlu, Princeton University
Abdülhamid II; Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal; Tanizmat; Turkey; Young Turks Nicholas G. Harris, University of Pennsylvania censorship; punishment; treason
Jan-Peter Hartung, University of London—School of Oriental and African Studies
India
Nader Hashemi, University of Denver
sovereignty
Sohail H. Hashmi, Mount Holyoke College
abodes of Islam, war, and truce; diplomacy; rebellion
Jane Hathaway, Ohio State University
household
Bernard Haykel, New York University
Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab, Muhammad; Salafis; Saudi Arabia; al-Shawkani, Muhammad b. 'Ali; Yemen
Paul L. Heck, Georgetown University
Abu Yusuf; advice; Bin Laden, Osama; bureaucracy; knowledge; Mulla 'Umar
Robert W. Hefner, Boston University
Indonesia; Malaysia

Thomas Hegghammer, Norwegian Defence Research Establishment (Norway) and New York University Center on Law and Security
suicide; terrorism
Jocelyn Hendrickson, Whitman College
fatwa; hijra
Marcia Hermansen, Loyola University Chicago
Shah Waliullah
Edmund Herzig, University of Manchester (England)
Safavids
Carole Hillenbrand, University of Edinburgh
Crusades
Nathan Hofer, University of Missouri
brotherhoods; shaykh, pīr
David Hollenberg, James Madison University
Isma'ilis
Russell Hopley, Bowdoin College
leadership
Steve Howard, Ohio University
Taha, Mahmoud Mohamed
Murad Idris, University of Pennsylvania
Islamization; masses
Matthew B. Ingalls, University of Puget Sound
Tablighi Jama'at; vizier
Brannon Ingram, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
Zia-ul-Haq
Roy Jackson, University of Gloucestershire (England)
authority
Sherman A. Jackson, University of Michigan
al-Qarafi, Shihab al-Din
Tariq Jaffer, Boston University
Murji'is; al-Razi, Fakhr al-Din
Johannes J. G. Jansen, Leiden University (Netherlands)
Faraj, Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam
Maher Jarrar, American University of Beirut
Qadaris
Masoud Jafari Jazi, Teacher Training University, Tehran (Iran)
Jalal Al-i Ahmad
Shamil Jeppie, University of Cape Town (South Africa)
apartheid
David L. Johnston, University of Pennsylvania
Christian-Muslim relations; environment
Katrin Jomaa, Indiana University city; quietism and activism
Hadi Jorati, Yale University
bazaar; İstanbul
Wadad Kadi, University of Chicago
'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib b. Yahya al-'Amiri; Abu Bakr; caliph, caliphate (coauthor); al-Tawhidi, Abu Hayyan Ahmet T. Karamustafa, Washington University in Saint Louis
individualism
Rosemary B. Kellison, Florida State University dissent, opposition, resistance; military; republicanism
John Kelsay, Florida State University
jihad
Khaled M. G. Keshk, DePaul University
Mu'awiya
Nancy Khalek, Brown University
notables
Etan Kohlberg, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Ja'far al-Sadiq
Gudrun Krämer, Free University of Berlin (Germany)
al-Banna, Hasan; pluralism and tolerance
Sunil Kumar, Delhi University (India)
Delhi; Delhi Sultanate Mirjam Künkler, Princeton University
democracy; theocracy
Timur Kuran, Duke University
economic theory; public opinion
Charles Kurzman, University of North Carolina, Chapel Hill
liberalism; modernism
Michael Laffan, Princeton University
Southeast Asia
Ella Landau-Tasseron, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
alliances; Umayyads Christian Lange, Utrecht University (Netherlands)
privacy
Henri Lauziere, Northwestern University
secularism
Todd Lawson, University of Toronto
apocalypse
Marnia Lazreg, The City University of New York, Hunter College
torture
Michael Lecker, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Constitution of Medina
Amalia Levanoni, University of Haifa (Israel)
Ibn Jama'a
Milka Levy-Rubin, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
Treaty of 'Umar
Keith Lewinstein, Bridgewater State University
heresiography; Ibadis; Kharijis Franklin Lewis, University of Chicago
Shahnama
Gideon Libson, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
custom
Charles Lindholm, Boston University honor; kinship
Roman Loimeier, Humboldt University of Berlin (Germany)
West Africa
Matthew Long, University of Georgia
Ibn Khaldun; jizya
Joseph E. Lowry, University of Pennsylvania rights; al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris Scott C. Lucas, University of Arizona
Companions of the Prophet

Loren D. Lybarger, Ohio University
Arafat, Yasir; Hamas; Palestine; Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) Gregory Mack, McGill University
grievance; jurisprudence Anas Malik, Xavier University
libertarianism
Peter Mandaville, George Mason University
international relations
Beatrice Forbes Manz, Tufts University
Timurids
Andrew F. March, Yale University
constitutionalism; ethics; representation
L. Marlow, Wellesley College
Mirrors for Princes
Andrew Marsham, University of Edinburgh
oath of allegiance
Nabil Matar, University of Minnesota
Ibn Tufayl
Rudi Matthee, University of Delaware
'Abbas I
Jane Dammen McAuliffe, Georgetown University
exegesis; People of the Book
David Mednicoff, University of Massachusetts, Amherst
human rights
Christopher Melchert, University of Oxford
Ahmad b. Hanbal
Charles Melville, University of Cambridge
Ilkhanids
Matthew Melvin-Koushki, Yale University
Khunji, Fazl Allah b. Ruzbihan; Mongols; Qajars; Tamerlane Yahya M. Michot, University of Oxford
Ibn Taymiyya
Gail Minault, University of Texas at Austin
Khilafat movement
Mustansir Mir, Youngstown State University
Iqbal, Muhammad
Mahan Mirza, Zaytuna College
Ahmad, Israr; demographics
Jennifer Mitchell, Champlain Regional College and Vanier College (Canada)
citizenship
Yasien Mohamed, University of the Western Cape (South Africa)
South Africa
Ebrahim Moosa, Duke University
Rahman, Fazlur; revival and reform (coauthor) Suleiman Ali Mourad, Smith College
hypocrisy
Rose E. Muravchick, University of Pennsylvania
royal court
John A. Nawas, Catholic University of Leuven (Belgium)
inquisition; patronage
Daniel Neep, University of Exeter (England)
Arab nationalism; colonialism; coup d'état; nationalism
Nassima Neggaz, Georgetown University
Dan Fodio, Usman; Muslim League; Mu'tazilis; Nasser, Gamal Abdel; al-Qaeda; Saladin Martin Nguyen, Fairfield University
piety and asceticism
Erik S. Ohlander, Indiana University-Purdue University Fort Wayne
al-Suhrawardi, Abu Hafs 'Umar Jacob Olidort, Princeton University
political ritual
Felicitas Opwis, Georgetown University
public interest
Eva Orthmann, University of Bonn (Germany)
astrology
Carl F. Petry, Northwestern University
Cairo
Matthew Pierce, Fulbright Scholar Program
judge
Andrew Polk, Florida State University
Mohammed, W. D.
Yasir Qadhi, Yale University
Karramis; al-Qaradawi, Yusuf Junaid Quadri, McGill University
endowment
Tahera Qutbuddin, University of Chicago
Husayn b. 'Ali
Intisar A. Rabb, New York University governance; police
Bernde Radtke, Utrecht University (Netherlands)
Sufism
Shadaab Rahemtulla, Oxford University
justice; solidarity; tyranny Sayeed S. Rahman, Bryn Mawr College
mawlid
Ali-Ahmad Rasekh, Concordia University (Canada)
'Ashura'
Dietrich Reetz, Zentrum Moderner Orient (Germany)
Barelwis; Deobandis
Sajjad H. Rizvi, University of Exeter (England)
Dawani, Jalal al-Din; Mir Damad; al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din Chase W. Robinson, Royal Holloway, University of London
civil war
Jared Rubin, Chapman University
trade and commerce
Marina Rustow, Emory University
intercession; loyalty
Bruce K. Rutherford, Colgate University
elections
Kaya Şahin, Tulane University
Süleiman the Magnificent (coauthor)
Mashal Saif, Duke University
Abbasids

Noah Salomon, Carleton College
Sudan
Armando Salvatore, University of Naples-L'Orientale (Italy)
civil society; globalization; modernity; public sphere Sarah Bowen Savant, Aga Khan University-Institute for the Study of Muslim Civilisations (England)
genealogy; Shu'ubis
S. Abdallah Schleifer, American University in Cairo
media
Warren C. Schultz, DePaul University
coinage
Reinhard Schulze, University of Bern (Switzerland)
international Islamic organizations; Pan-Islamism Rachel M. Scott, Virginia Polytechnic Institute and State University
equality
Kim Searcy, Loyola University Chicago
Mahdi of the Sudan
Mark Sedgwick, Aarhus University (Denmark)
'Abduh, Muhammad
Rüdiger Seesemann, University of Bayreuth (Germany)
al-Turabi, Hasan Aram A. Shahin, James Madison University
caliph, caliphate (coauthor)
Emad El-Din Shahin, University of Notre Dame
Egypt (coauthor); government
Zaid Shakir, Zaytuna College
Malcolm X
Maya Shatzmiller, University of Western Ontario (Canada)
division of labor
William E. Shepard, University of Canterbury (New Zealand)
ideology; jāhilyya; Sayyid Qutb Fiazuddin Shu'ayb, University of California, Los Angeles
succession
Thomas Sizgorich, University of California, Irvine
violence
Denise Spellberg, University of Texas at Austin
'A'isha
Ronald Bruce St John, Independent scholar
Qaddafi, Mu'ammar
Amina Steinfels, Mount Holyoke College
Aurangzeb
Devin J. Stewart, Emory University
abdication; blasphemy; consensus; dissimulation; Fadlallah, Muhammad Husayn; faith; family; God; ijtihād and taqlīd; Nizamiyya; shari'a; shaykh al-Islam Frank H. Stewart, Hebrew University of Jerusalem
tribalism
W. Craig Streetman, University of Kentucky
Ibn Bajja
Mairaj Syed, Princeton University difference of opinion; Sunnism
Ian Talbot, University of Southampton (England)
Jinnah, Mohammad 'Ali; Pakistan
Daniella Talmon-Heller, Ben-Gurion University (Israel)
Ayyubids
Georges Tamer, University of Erlangen-Nuremberg (Germany)
Ibn Rushd
SherAli Tareen, Franklin and Marshall College charity; revival and reform (coauthor)
Amin Tarzi, Marine Corps University
Taliban
Sultan Tepe, University of Illinois at Chicago
nation-state
Baki Tezcan, University of California, Davis
Kadızadeli; racism
Shawkat M. Toorawa, Cornell University
friendship; pilgrimage; Pillars of Islam
D. G. Tor, University of Notre Dame
ghāzī; Ghaznavids; Samanids; Seljuqs; shāhānshāh; sultan Alexander Treiger, Dalhousie University
Ghazali
Charles Tripp, School of Oriental and African Studies, University of London
capitalism
Nurit Tsafrir, Tel Aviv University (Israel)
Abu Hanifa
Mete Tuncay, Istanbul Belgi University (Turkey)
Nazim Hikmet
Paul E. Walker, University of Chicago
Hakim bi-Amr Allah
Keith David Watenpaugh, University of California, Davis
'Aflaq, Michel; Ba'th Party
Neguin Yavari, Columbia University
Khomeini, Ayatollah; Nizam al-Mulk
Isra Yazicioglu, Saint Joseph's University
Sa'id Nursi
Hayrettin Yücesoy, Saint Louis University
imamate
Mohsen Zakeri, Frankfurt University (Germany)
chivalry
Muhammad Qasim Zaman, Princeton University
'ulama'
Taymiya R. Zaman, University of San Francisco
Akbar the Great; Mughals
Syed Rizwan Zamir, University of Virginia
guilds
Malika Zeghal, University of Chicago
'Abd al-Rahman, 'Umar; Azhar University; Muslim Brotherhood Homayra Ziad, Trinity College (Connecticut)
liberation theology
Hossein Ziai, University of California, Los Angeles
Mulla Sadra
Barbara Zollner, Birkbeck, University of London
Islamic Jihad
Aron Zysow, Princeton University
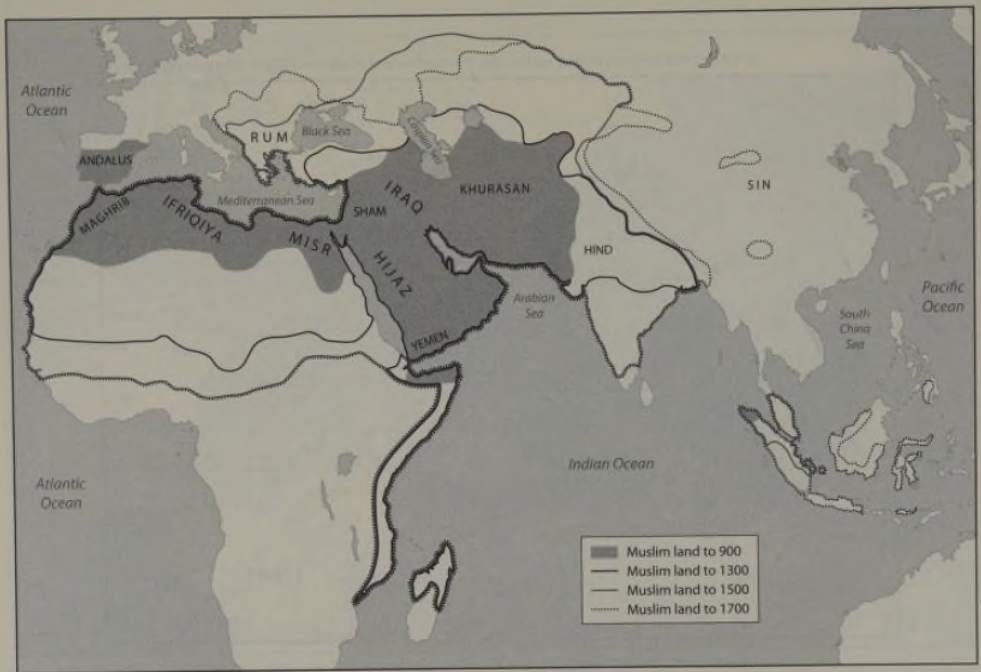
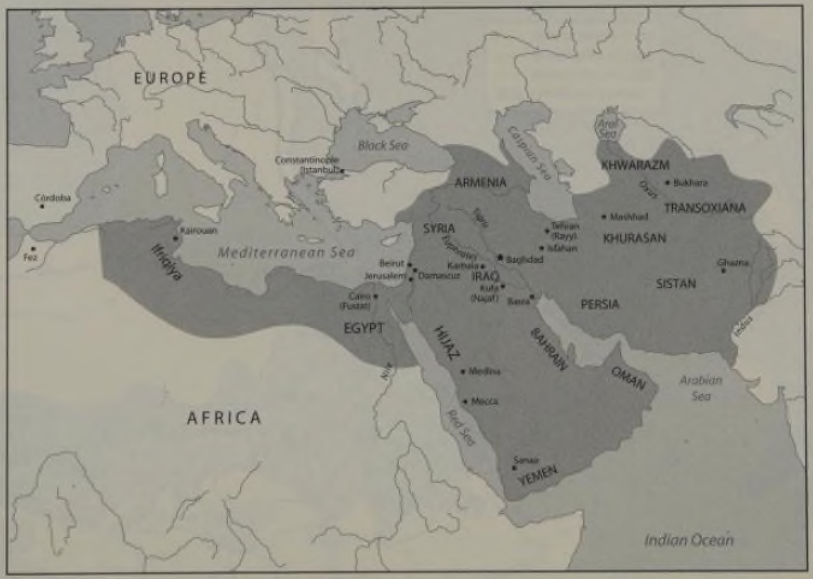
Zaydis



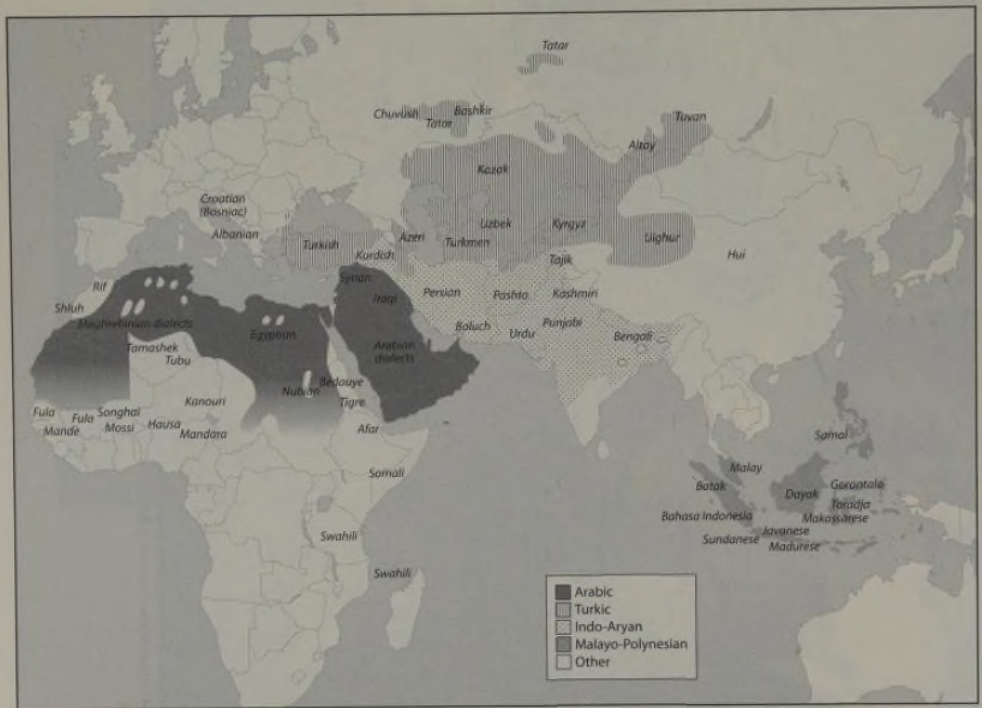
Map 1. The Spread of Islam, 750–1700. Adapted from Malise Ruthven, Historical Atlas of Islam, Harvard University Press, 2004, pp. 32–33.



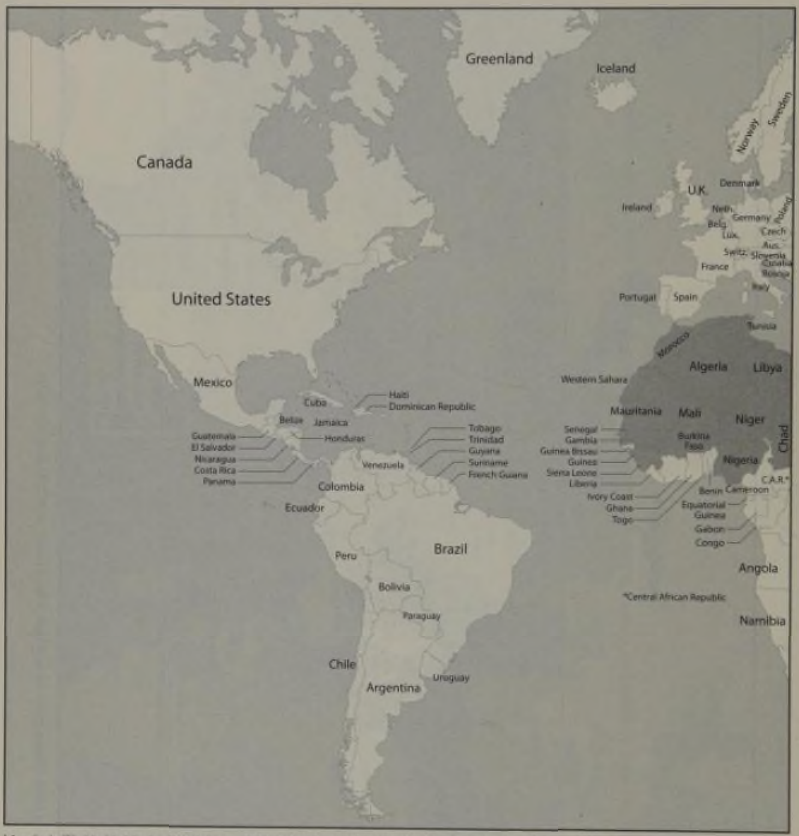
Map 2. The Abbasid Empire. Adapted from Malise Ruthven, Historical Atlas of Islam, Harvard University Press, 2004, p. 37.

Map 3. Premodern Islamic Empires and States. Adapted from Malise Ruthven, Historical Atlas of Islam, Harvard University Press, 2004, p. 54–55.

Map 4. The Muslim World under Colonial Domination (until World War II). Adapted from Malise Ruthven, Historical Atlas of Islam, Harvard University Press, 2004, p. 117.



Map 5. Linguistic Regions of Islam. Adapted from Andreas Birken, Atlas of Islam: 1800–2000, Brill, 2010, p. 21.



Map 6a–b. Worldwide Muslim Population in 2010 (see table, pp. xlii–xliv). Muslim-majority countries are shaded.

Russia
Sweden
Finland
Estonia
Latvia
Lithuania
Belarus
Poland
Czech
Slovakia Ukraine
Aus.
Hun.
Moldova
Rom.
Serbia
Bulg.
Albania
Greece
Georgia
Armenia
Azerbaijan
Turkey
Kazakhstan
Uzbekistan
Turkmenistan
Kyrgyzstan
Tajikistan
Mongolia
China
North Korea
South Korea
Japan
Syria
Lebanon
Israel
Iraq
Iran
Afghanistan
Pakistan
Jordan
Kuwait
Qatar
Saudi Arabia
U.A.E.
Libya
Egypt
Nepal
Bhutan
Bangladesh
India
Burma (Myanmar)
Laos
Thailand
Vietnam
Cambodia
Hong Kong
Taiwan
Philippines
Sri Lanka
Maldives
Brunei
Malaysia
Singapore
Indonesia
Papua New Guinea
Australia
New Zealand
Chad
Sudan
Eritrea
Yemen
Oman
Djibouti
Ethiopia
Central African Rep.
Uganda
Kenya
Somalia
Congo
Democratic Republic of Congo
Rwanda
Burundi
Tanzania
Malawi
Comoros
Mayotte
Angola
Zambia
Namibia
Zimbabwe
Mozambique
Botswana
Madagascar
Mauritius
Reunion
Swaziland
South Africa
Lesotho
Croatia
Bosnia
Serbia
Kosovo
Romania
Bulgaria
Italy
Greece
Montenegro
Macedonia
Cyprus
Palestinian Territories
Egypt
Libya
Saudi Arabia
Bahrain
Qatar

The Muslim World in 2010: Cultural Blocks and Populations

	Muslim population	Percentage of total population in country
Arabic-Speaking World
Algeria	34,780,000	98.2
Bahrain	655,000	81.2
Egypt	80,024,000	94.7
Iraq	31,108,000	98.9
Jordan	6,397,000	98.8
Kuwait	2,636,000	86.4
Lebanon	2,542,000	59.7
Libya	6,325,000	96.6
Mauritania	3,338,000	99.2
Morocco	32,381,000	99.9
Oman	2,547,000	87.7
Palestinian territories	4,298,000	97.5
Qatar	1,168,000	77.5
Saudi Arabia	25,493,000	97.1
Sudan	30,855,000	71.4
Syria	20,895,000	92.8
Tunisia	10,349,000	99.8
United Arab Emirates	3,577,000	76.0
Yemen	24,023,000	99.0
South Asia
Bangladesh	148,607,000	90.4
India	177,286,000	14.6
Maldives	309,000	98.4
Nepal	1,253,000	4.2
Pakistan	178,097,000	96.4
Sri Lanka	1,725,000	8.5
Southeast Asia
Brunei	211,000	51.9
Burma (Myanmar)	1,900,000	3.8
Cambodia	240,000	1.6
Indonesia	204,847,000	88.1
Malaysia	17,139,000	61.4
Philippines	4,737,000	5.1
Singapore	721,000	14.9
Thailand	3,952,000	5.8
Vietnam	160,000	0.2
Eurasia
Afghanistan	29,047,000	99.8
Albania	2,601,000	82.1
Azerbaijan	8,795,000	98.4
Belarus	19,000	0.2
Bosnia-Herzegovina	1,564,000	41.6
Bulgaria	1,002,000	13.4
China	23,308,000	1.8
Croatia	56,000	1.3
Cyprus	200,000	22.7
Georgia	442,000	10.5
Greece	527,000	4.7
Hong Kong	91,000	1.3

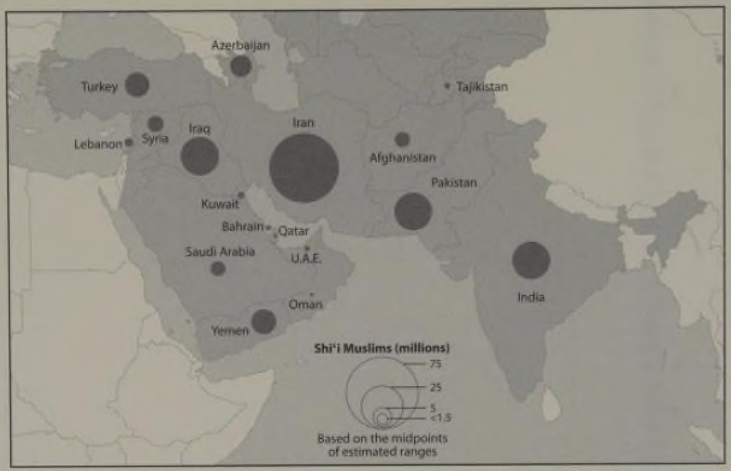
The Muslim World in 2010: Cultural Blocks and Populations (continued)

	Muslim population	Percentage of total population in country
Hungary	25,000	0.3
Iran	74,819,000	99.6
Kazakhstan	8,887,000	56.4
Kosovo	2,104,000	91.7
Kyrgyzstan	4,927,000	88.8
Moldova	15,000	0.4
Mongolia	120,000	4.4
Montenegro	116,000	18.5
Republic of Macedonia	713,000	34.9
Romania	73,000	0.3
Russia	16,379,000	11.7
Serbia	280,000	3.7
Slovenia	49,000	2.4
Taiwan	23,000	0.1
Tajikistan	7,006,000	99.0
Turkey	74,660,000	98.6
Turkmenistan	4,830,000	93.3
Ukraine	393,000	0.9
Uzbekistan	26,833,000	96.5
African Islam
Angola	195,000	1.0
Benin	2,259,000	24.5
Burkina Faso	9,600,000	58.9
Burundi	184,000	2.2
Cameroon	3,598,000	18.0
Central African Republic	403,000	8.9
Chad	6,404,000	55.7
Comoros	679,000	98.3
Congo	969,000	1.4
Djibouti	853,000	97.0
Equatorial Guinea	28,000	4.1
Eritrea	1,909,000	36.5
Ethiopia	28,721,000	33.8
Gabon	145,000	9.7
Gambia	1,669,000	95.3
Ghana	3,906,000	16.1
Guinea	8,693,000	84.2
Guinea Bissau	705,000	42.8
Ivory Coast	7,960,000	36.9
Kenya	2,868,000	7.0
Liberia	523,000	12.8
Madagascar	220,000	1.1
Malawi	2,011,000	12.8
Mali	12,316,000	92.4
Mauritius	216,000	16.6
Mayotte	197,000	98.8
Mozambique	5,340,000	22.8
Niger	15,627,000	98.3
Nigeria	75,728,000	47.9
Republic of Congo	60,000	1.6

The Muslim World in 2010: Cultural Blocks and Populations (continued)

	Muslim population	Percentage of total population in country
Reunion	35,000	4.2
Rwanda	188,000	1.8
Senegal	12,333,000	95.9
Sierra Leone	4,171,000	71.5
Somalia	9,231,000	98.6
South Africa	737,000	1.5
Tanzania	13,450,000	29.9
Togo	827,000	12.2
Uganda	4,060,000	12.0
Western Sahara	528,000	99.6
Zambia	59,000	0.4
Zimbabwe	109,000	0.9
Rest of the World
Argentina	1,000,000	2.5
Australia	399,000	1.9
Austria	475,000	5.7
Belgium	638,000	6.0
Brazil	204,000	0.1
Canada	940,000	2.8
Colombia	14,000	< 0.1
Cuba	10,000	0.1
Denmark	226,000	4.1
Fiji	54,000	6.3
Finland	42,000	0.8
France	4,704,000	7.5
Germany	4,119,000	5.0
Guyana	55,000	7.2
Honduras	11,000	0.1
Ireland	43,000	0.9
Israel	1,287,000	17.7
Italy	1,583,000	2.6
Japan	185,000	0.1
Luxembourg	11,000	2.3
Mexico	111,000	0.1
Netherlands	914,000	5.5
New Zealand	41,000	0.9
Norway	144,000	3.0
Panama	25,000	0.7
Poland	20,000	0.1
Portugal	65,000	0.6
South Korea	75,000	0.2
Spain	1,021,000	2.3
Suriname	84,000	15.9
Sweden	451,000	4.9
Switzerland	433,000	5.7
Trinidad and Tobago	78,000	5.8
United Kingdom	2,869,000	4.6
United States	2,595,000	0.8
Venezuela	95,000	0.3

Data is from the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life, The Future of the Global Muslim Population, Washington DC: Pew Research Center, January 2011.
Table excludes countries with fewer than 10,000 Muslims.



Map 7. Shi'i Population. Adapted from the Pew Forum on Religion & Public Life, Mapping the Global Muslim Population, Washington DC: Pew Research Center, October 2009, p. 11.

A

ʿAbbas I (1571–1629)

Shah ʿAbbas I, the third son of Shah Muhammad Khudabanda (r. 1578–87) and the fifth ruler of the Safavid dynasty (1501–1722), came to power at age 17, at a time when tribal factionalism tore at the fabric of the state and foreign invaders had greatly reduced Iran's territory. Once on the throne, the shah set out to reestablish the authority of his predecessors and to regain the lands they had lost. Unable to fight a war on two fronts, he took on the Uzbeks in the northeast after concluding a peace treaty with the more formidable Ottomans that forced him to give up substantial territory. The resulting stability allowed him to reform Iran's military and financial system. Intent on weakening the fractious Turkoman tribes who had brought the dynasty to power, the shah created a standing army composed of loyal slave soldiers (ghulāms), most of whom were Georgians captured during bloody raids in the Caucasus. The revenue required for these measures was raised by converting outlying provinces from state lands ruled as fiefs by tribal leaders to crown lands administered by ghulāms directly reporting to the shah.

Shah ʿAbbas's grandest achievement was his selection of Isfahan, a city located in the center of Iran, as the nation's capital. Isfahan was given a new administrative and commercial center consisting of a palace complex, several mosques, and a bazaar, all grouped around a splendid royal square. The shah took various other measures to encourage trade, increasing road security and building many caravansaries throughout the country. To the same end, he deported a large group of Armenians, known for their industriousness, to a newly built suburb of Isfahan, where they were given commercial privileges, including a monopoly on the export of the country's silk.

A master of co-opting rivals and playing off enemies, ʿAbbas conducted an astute, forward-looking foreign policy designed to maximize revenue and to create an anti-Ottoman alliance with Europe's Catholic powers. A desire to forge such an alliance and the need for intermediaries played a role in his decision to allow Christian missionaries to settle and operate in his country. He also welcomed English and Dutch merchants, offering them trading rights, and made use of English naval power to expel the Portuguese from the isle of Hormuz in 1622.

Considering Iran's political fragmentation and its resource-poor economy, Shah ʿAbbas was remarkably successful in his endeavors. In his 40-year reign, he retook the northwestern lands lost by his predecessors, added the Persian Gulf littoral to Safavid control, incorporated parts of Armenia and Georgia with a series of brutal campaigns, seized Qandahar from the Mughals in 1622, and halted the westward expansion of the Ottomans by taking Baghdad a year later. Despite this, some of his policies had long-term negative effects. For fear of a premature challenge to his authority, he brutally dealt with rivals within his family: he killed one of his sons, blinded several of his other sons, and kept their offspring immured in the royal harem. Consequences emerged in the form of inexperienced and mostly weak successors. His conversion of state lands to crown lands generated short-term income but led to long-term exploitation of peasants by landholders interested only in immediate revenue.

Famously down to Earth, Shah ʿAbbas kept an informal style, often mingling with the common people of Isfahan. As gregarious as he was shrewd, and as often cruel as generous, ʿAbbas ultimately was a pragmatic ruler. He is remembered as one of the few kings in Iranian history who was concerned about his people.

See also Iran; Safavids (1501–1722)

Further Reading

Rula Jurdi Abisaab, Converting Persia: Religion and Power in the Safavid Empire, 2004; Kathryn Babayan, Mystics, Monarchs, and Messiahs: Cultural Landscapes of Early Modern Iran, 2003; David Blow, Shah Abbas: The Ruthless King Who Became an Iranian Legend, 2009; Willem Floor, The Economy of Safavid Persia, 2000; Rudolph Matthee, The Politics of Trade in Safavid Iran: Silk for Silver, 1600–1730, 1999; Andrew Newman, Safavid Iran: Rebirth of a Persian Empire, 2006; Sholeh Quinn, Historical Writing during the Reign of Shah ʿAbbas: Ideology, Imitation and Legitimacy in Safavid Chronicles, 2000; Roger Savory, Iran under the Safavids, 1980.

RUDI MATTHEE

Abbasids (750–1258)

The Abbasids came to power in 750 by overthrowing their Umayyad predecessors. The Abbasid revolution represented more than a change of dynasty; Abbasid rule substantially transformed the Islamic tradition. Some of the more obvious effects of Abbasid rule were a new concept of the caliphate; a shift in the locus of political power to the eastern city of Baghdad; the establishment of Islam as a predominantly universalist and multiethnic faith (as opposed to an Arab religion); an increase in the rate of conversion; influence and borrowing from Persian culture; and substantial advancements in the fields of science, technology, literature, and philosophy.

The Abbasids derive their name from the Prophet Muhammad's uncle, 'Abbas (d. 653), from whom the first Abbasid caliph, Abu al-'Abbas al-Saffah (r. 750–54), traced his genealogy. By emphasizing this genealogical link, the Abbasids appealed for support from Muhammad's family and presented themselves as Muhammad's true successors. Moreover, in their rise to power, the Abbasids painted themselves as champions of Islamic justice who stood in contrast to the morally corrupt Umayyads. Although the Abbasids had begun as morally driven revolutionaries, they soon settled into a dynastic patrimonial monarchy. Shortly after assuming power, the Abbasids also abandoned their sympathy for minority groups such as the Shi'i factions and began pandering to the numerically stronger proto-Sunnis.

At the time of the Abbasids, the Islamic tradition was still in its nascent stage, and its political drift was unclear. Given the numerical strength of their Persian supporters, the Abbasids adopted both the Iranian tradition of centralized monarchy as well as Iranian practices of government. They developed a secret service and bureaucracy as well as a court culture. The main ideological initiative of the Abbasids was to emphasize their position as God's deputies and the Prophet's successors. Over the years, a number of Abbasid rulers echoed statements such as that made by Caliph Mansur (r. 754–75): "I am simply the authority of God on this Earth."

From among the Abbasids, Caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33) was the most determined to construct a high imperial ideal that would free the office of deputyship from reliance on the military as well popular religious leaders. To fulfill this aim, he appealed directly to his subjects and emphasized high culture and the intellectual prominence of the caliphate and the 'ulama'. Ma'mun's successor, Mu'tasim (r. 833–42), adopted a similar strategy, but in a more tempered manner. Under Mutawakkil (r. 847–61) the influence of the more literal-minded Sunnis increased and the Mu'tazilis and neo-Greek philosophers were pushed to the peripheries. Mutawakkil was assassinated by a band of Turkic slave-soldiers, who dominated Baghdadi politics until the Shi'i Buyids seized Baghdad in 945. Gradually, more and more of the provinces of the caliphate became independent under new dynasties. These new dynasties continued to follow the practices and ideology of patrimonial monarchy as developed under the Abbasids.

Although their empire soon fragmented, the Abbasids remained a local power that symbolically represented the caliphate. Their swift downfall can be attributed to a lack of consistent imperial strategy—they had no defining imperial or state ideology. Although they could have adopted the Shi'i view of the imamate as their state ideology, the Abbasids abandoned Shi'ism soon after they ascended to power. In the later Sunni milieu, the unclear role of the deputy was detrimental to their political hold. Moreover, the power of the centralized government was mitigated by the power shared with senior judges in major cities. These judges, although appointed by the deputy, ruled by a law in which they alone, and not the state, possessed authority.

Despite its swift fragmentation, the Abbasid empire had a lasting impact on the religious and political landscape of the current Muslim world. The Iranian tradition of patrimonial monarchy initially adopted by the Abbasids was emulated by all later Islamic dynasties. Moreover, the political precedent set by the Abbasids continued to govern how state officials and citizens understood political authority and the ruler–ruled relationship.

See also Baghdad; Ma'mun (786–833); Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought: From the Prophet to the Present, 2004; Amira K. Bennison, The Great Caliphs: The Golden Age of the 'Abbasid Empire, 2009; Hugh N. Kennedy, The Early Abbasid Caliphate: A Political History, 1981.

MASHAL SAIF

'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib b. Yahya al-'Amiri (d. 750)

An early epistolographer credited from medieval times with founding Arabic literary prose, 'Abd al-Hamid was a third-generation non-Arab Muslim born around 688, probably in al-Anbar in Iraq. He studied most likely in Kufa, where he later worked as a teacher and a peripatetic tutor. He then became a secretary in the Umayyad administration in Damascus, taking up a career that he kept until the end of his life. His work allowed him to be close to at least two influential Umayyad caliphs: Hisham b. 'Abd al-Malik (r. 724–43) and Marwan b. Muhammad (Marwan II; r. 744–50). This closeness allowed him to write letters on their behalf, to espouse fervently their political cause, and to be their mouthpiece in expressing their ideology. He paid the ultimate price for his loyalty to them when agents of the Abbasid rebels, successfully overthrowing the Umayyads, killed him in 750.

'Abd al-Hamid's letters were transmitted and studied by his students and descendants, many of whom served as secretaries in the Abbasid and Tulunid administrations. These and later secretaries and litterateurs praised 'Abd al-Hamid's style, crediting him with introducing several innovations into Arabic prose. Combining talent with memorization of fine literature and secretarial training in the chancery, he created a recognizable style that manipulated the possibilities of language and sound and made extensive and creative use of Qur'anic citations and allusions.

'Abd al-Hamid's letters filled about 1,000 folios in the late tenth century, but only about 100 pages of them survived. This corpus consists of about 62 complete or fragmentary letters or extracts of letters, 37 of which are major, in addition to several signatory notes and oral sayings. Some of the major letters are descriptive or personal, and one of them is his famous "Letter to the Secretaries," in which 'Abd al-Hamid counseled his peers on their education and their behavior toward superiors and colleagues. Most of those letters, however, are official, dealing by and large with public matters and often written on behalf of identified or unidentified Umayyad caliphs. Some of them address gubernatorial issues, others describe major caliphal activities, and still others hail the victories of the Muslims over the non-Muslims. They analyze potential dissent or actual rebellions, describe the suppression of rebels, or warn rebels or other groups engaged in illegitimate civil activities. Several also examine the issues of obedience, disobedience, and civil discord (fitna), and one of them, 'Abd al-Hamid's longest work (about 40 pages), is his famous "Testament to the Crown Prince," in which he counsels the heir apparent of Marwan II on matters moral, religious, political, and military in a manner reminiscent of the Mirrors for Princes political advice genre that was to develop later in Islamic political literature.

'Abd al-Hamid's main contribution to Islamic political thought in his official letters lies in constructing a theoretical framework for Umayyad ideology and in presenting the Umayyads as pious guardians of religion. Theoretically, 'Abd al-Hamid places the Umayyads in a universal historical context: God chose Islam to be his own religion; he sent the Prophet Muhammad at a moment of darkness in human history; and after Muhammad's demise, God created a new institution, the caliphate, which inherited prophethood. The caliphs are thus God's caliphs, whom he mandated to rule and to whom absolute obedience is due, just as it is to God. Therefore, obedience is the means of salvation for all Muslims in this world and the next; any engagement in disobedience or civil strife is fatal.

On the practical level, 'Abd al-Hamid painted a highly religious picture of the Umayyad caliphs. He described them as pious, God-fearing, and utterly helpless without God, and he highlighted several of their activities that had a religious context, such as performing the pilgrimage and fasting during the month of Ramadan. His victory letters hail each triumph as indicative of God's support of the Umayyad caliphs and their being his rightful appointees to the guardianship of the Muslim community. Although almost all of 'Abd al-Hamid's letters use Qur'anic citations and allusions, this use is particularly frequent in his ideologically oriented letters, where the support of God's word acts as the ultimate proof of the rightfulness of the Umayyads' cause.

See also Ibn al-Muqaffa' (ca. 720–56); Mirrors for Princes; Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Ihsan 'Abbas, 'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib wa-ma Tabaqa min Rasa'ilihi wa-Rasa'il Salim Abi al-Ala', 1988; Wadad Kadi, "Early Islamic State Letters: The Question of Authenticity," in The Byzantine and Early Islamic Near East, I. Problems in the Literary Source Material, edited by A. Cameron and L. Conrad, 1999; Idem, "The Religious Foundation od Late Umayyad Ideology and Practice," in Sober Religioso y Poder politico en el Islam, edited by Manuela Marin, 1994. Hannelore Schonig, Das Sendschreiben des 'Abdalhamid b. Yahya (gest. 132/750) an den Kronprinzen 'Abdallah b. Marwan II, 1985.

WADAD KADI

'Abd al-Qadir al-Jaza'iri (1808–83)

Amir 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jaza'iri is best known for his determined resistance to the invading French army in Algeria between 1832 and 1847 and his decisive role in protecting the Christian inhabitants of Damascus during the 1860 uprisings in Lebanon and Syria. He was also an original thinker and writer whose ideas were influenced by the nature of his early instruction; the years spent leading the jihad against, and negotiations with, the French; his time as a political prisoner in France; and his eventual settlement in Damascus.

Born in western Algeria near the city of Mascara to a family of religious notables, he was educated in the port of Azrew by a local scholar ('alim), Tahir b. Ahmad, who instilled in his young pupil an interest in geography, mathematics, and astronomy, in addition to a deep knowledge of the Islamic sciences. Another formative influence was his pilgrimage to the Hijaz in modern Saudi Arabia made with his father beginning in November 1825, which conferred additional socio-spiritual authority upon him. Their sojourn in Egypt during the implementation of Muhammad 'Ali's modernization program exposed the future amir to novel methods of political and military organization, which he later attempted to introduce in his native Algeria. After completing the pilgrimage, father and son spent four months in Damascus, where they studied Naqshbandi teachings and rituals from prominent shaykhs and formed ties of friendship with the local 'ulama'. The two Algerians returned home to the Oran just two years prior to France's occupation of Algeria in 1830.

In 1832, 'Abd al-Qadir was proclaimed the "sultan of the Arabs" for mobilizing tribesmen under his green-and-white flag, which became the symbol of the nationalist movement in the 20th century. After a decade and a half of fighting interspersed with cessations of hostilities against the French military, the amir's movement was exhausted and outnumbered. In 1847, he surrendered to General Louis de La Moricière in exchange for a promise of safe passage either to Alexandria or to Acre, in Palestine. In flagrant violation of the agreement, 'Abd al-Qadir and his large retinue were taken to France and imprisoned until 1852, when the prince-president Louis-Napoleon III released them. The Algerians first settled in Bursa (in Anatolia) and subsequently in Damascus in 1855, where some of his descendants reside to this day. The generous pension accorded by the French state conferred financial security upon the amir, his family, and his followers, allowing the Algerian leader to purchase considerable landholdings in the area. But it also alienated some Damascene notables and 'ulama', who condemned his close ties to the French government in a period of increasing European interventions in the affairs of the Ottoman Empire. Nevertheless, he held classes at the great Umayyad Mosque, lecturing on the Qur'an and the sunna.

During his four years in France, 'Abd al-Qadir entertained wide-ranging contacts with political, military, and even Catholic leaders and thinkers. Soon after his relocation to Damascus, the Paris-based Asiatic Society invited him to become a member. He submitted an essay discussing the thorny issues of Muslim-Christian relations and the relationship between revelation and human reason, which won him praise. In his treatise Reminding the Rational Man and Alerting the Neglectful Man, 'Abd al-Qadir sought to reconcile rational inquiry with religious belief and truth. As David D. Cummings points out, arguments in favor of reconciling modern science with revelation through a reinterpretation of the sources reflected an intellectual movement among some Islamic thinkers and represented a trend that later inspired the Salafis. This might be considered the first phase in the amir's religiospiritual and intellectual trajectory.

The second phase came after the events of the 1860 civil strife in Lebanon and the Hawran, during which 'Abd al-Qadir strove to calm Druze-Christian sectarian conflict, probably because he realized that civil war would provide a pretext for heightened European meddling—a lesson he had surely learned in Algeria. When his efforts failed, he provided shelter to several thousand Christians in his residence in Damascus, sparing them from death at the hands of mobs. His courageous actions earned him kudos not only from the European powers but also from President Abraham Lincoln, and it brought him to the attention of the Masons. In 1862, he performed another pilgrimage, staying in Mecca for an extended period, where he studied Shadhili Sufi teachings. On his way back to Damascus in 1864, he spent time in Alexandria, where he encountered Masonic ideas in one of the city's lodges. One of the biggest controversies among scholars of 'Abd al-Qadir's life and thought revolves around his relationship to the Masons: How receptive or sympathetic was he to Masonic ideas? And did he really become a member, if only for a short period?

From the mid-1860s on, however, his thinking shifted as he became less concerned with "shari'a-minded Sufism," which maintained that the sunna and the law must represent the core of the Sufi way. The amir died and was buried in Damascus in May 1883. But in 1968, the newly independent state of Algeria recalled 'Abd al-Qadir home, repatriating his remains to his native land after an exile of 121 years.

See also Algeria; North Africa

Further Reading

Charles Henry Churchill, The Life of Abdel Kader: Ex-Sultan of the Arabs of Algeria, 1868; Julia Clancy-Smith, Rebel and Saint: Muslim Notables, Populist Protest, Colonial Encounters (Algeria and Tunisia, 1800–1904), 1994; David Dean Cummings, Islamic Reform: Politics and Social Change in Late Ottoman Syria, 1990; Charles-André Julien, "La conquête et les débuts de la colonisation (1827–1871)," in Histoire de l'Algérie contemporaine 1 (1979).

JULIA CLANCY-SMITH

'Abd al-Rahman, 'Umar (b. 1938)

'Umar 'Abd al-Rahman was born in 1938 into a modest family of the rural region of Egypt's northern Nile Delta region. Having lost his sight at a young age, he was placed in the Qur'anic school of his village and followed the customary educational path of rural children at that time. By the age of 11 he had memorized the Qur'an, and after finishing his primary and secondary education, he enrolled in Azhar University in Cairo. In 1965, he graduated from Azhar's Department of Theology and was appointed imam of a provincial mosque by the Ministry of Religious Affairs. Influenced by the ideology of the Muslim Brotherhood, and in particular by the writings of Sayyid Qutb, he became after 1967 openly critical of the regime of Gamal Abdel Nasser; when Nasser died in 1970, 'Abd al-Rahman forbade in one of his sermons praying on Nasser's tomb. This was his first conspicuous opposition to the Egyptian government, and it earned him his first prison sentence.

Even as he was gaining a reputation as a political opponent, 'Abd al-Rahman continued his theological studies at Azhar and obtained a PhD in 1972. Between 1973 and 1977, while teaching in the southern town of Asyut, he came in contact with the Islamist youth of al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya. In the early 1980s, after having taught for some time in Saudi Arabia, he was consulted in matters of Islamic law (fiqh) by the leaders of the Gama'a, as well as by the leaders of al-Jihad al-Islami, the group that carried out the assassination of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat in 1981. He was among the defendants in the trial of Sadat's assassins, but in that case he was acquitted. During the 1980s, the Gama'a Islamiyya, though a fragmented group, continued to refer to 'Abd al-Rahman's theological rulings in order to justify its strategy of undertaking violent attacks against practices it deemed un-Islamic and to defend its confrontations with the police and military forces. In 1990, 'Abd al-Rahman left Egypt for the United States and settled in Jersey City, New Jersey, where he continued to preach and criticize the Egyptian regime and American foreign policy. The 1993 attack on the World Trade Center in New York City brought him again to the limelight through his trial over this attack with other codefendants. He was convicted of "seditious conspiracy" and sentenced to life in prison in the United States.

'Abd al-Rahman did not write any books, and his ideas are mainly accessible through his sermons and the transcripts of his testimonies at his trials in Egypt and the United States. Often referring to the body of legal rulings (fatāwā) of the influential jurist Ibn Taymiyya, 'Abd al-Rahman holds views of the ideal polity that are similar to those held by Sayyid Qutb and that view parliamentary democracy as a contradiction to the principle of God's sovereignty (hākimiyya). For him, impious leaders must be eliminated and divine sovereignty implemented through the shari'a in order to realize the ideal polity. The legitimacy of political power is exclusively defined through the concept of obedience (ṭa'a) to God and disobedience (ma'ṣiya) to whoever fails to obey God, thereby opening up the possibility of political rebellion. He is more precise than Qutb concerning his conception of jihad, which he describes as an armed war against the enemies of Islam and against those societies that, according to him, claim to be Muslim but are in fact societies of jāhiliyya, or "ignorance." 'Abd al-Rahman rejects modern interpretations of jihad as being exclusively a defensive war or as an inner struggle that takes place in the intellectual and spiritual domains. He also explicitly rejects the gradation of categories outlined in classical Islamic legal thought between permissible and impious behavior. For him, there is no category between impiety and Islam. This is why impiety can be immediately recognized and corrected "by the hand," as it is discernible by humans and is not exclusively identifiable by God. 'Abd al-Rahman's ideas, thus, legitimize the possibility—and even the duty—for any Muslim to intervene in the public sphere to correct behavior that does not conform to Islamic norms.

'Abd al-Rahman's influence on certain radical Islamist groups in Egypt and beyond has been significant. It seems that, in the eyes of members of a few radical groups in the 1980s and 1990s, he was a legal and theological counsel who played the role of a legitimizing figure: as a shaykh educated at Azhar, he was asked to provide religious justifications for political action. It was extremely rare, however, for scholars educated at Azhar in 20th-century Egypt to express such a radical opposition to the government and to associate themselves with groups advocating violence. Azhar University exemplified the tradition of nasiha, the act of speaking the truth—often in subtle ways—to the political sovereign without necessarily acting against him. On the other hand, like many 'ulama', 'Abd al-Rahman envisions the role of the 'ulama' as independent from any official religious institution. He conceives of his own function as that of a scholar belonging to an intellectual and religious elite characterized by its access to religious knowledge and piety rather than by its professional or institutional status. The case of 'Abd al-Rahman also illustrates the division of labor common in Sunni Islam between the carriers of religious knowledge and political activists: scholars might devise and publicly articulate political theologies, but they rarely participate in their implementation.

See also Azhar University; Faraj, Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam (1954–82); fundamentalism; al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya; Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); Islamic Jihad; jahiliyya; jihad; Muslim Brotherhood; Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–70); obedience; rebellion; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); sovereignty; tyranny; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Malika Zeghal, Gardiens de l'islam: Les oulémas d'al Azhar dans l'Egypte contemporaine, 1996.

MALIKA ZEGHAL

'Abd al-Raziq, 'Ali (1887–1966)

A judge, politician, and Islamic political theorist whose views on the caliphate galvanized the Egyptian public sphere during the interwar period, 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq was born in 1867 into a wealthy landowning family in the province of Minya, Egypt. The family was identified with the Liberal Constitutionalists Party (al-Ahrar al-Dusturiyyun), and their house in Cairo hosted prominent intellectuals such as Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), Rashid Rida (1865–1935), and Ahmad Lufti al-Sayyid (1872–1963). 'Abd al-Raziq was educated at the Egyptian University in Cairo and at Azhar University, from which he graduated in 1912. Between 1912 and 1915, he studied at Oxford, and upon his return to Egypt, he became a shari'a court judge in al-Mansura. He was dismissed from Azhar University in 1925 and did not return for two decades until his brother, Mustafa, was appointed grand shaykh of the university. He served as a minister of Awqaf (1948–49) and as a member of the Egyptian parliament, the senate, and the Egyptian Language Academy. He published several works, notably al-Ijma' fi al-Shari'a al-Islamiyya (Consensus in Islamic law) in 1947, a volume of his lectures, and an edited collection of his brother's works.

'Abd al-Raziq's most famous book is his 1925 al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm (Islam and the principles of governance), which at the time provoked wide discussion in the Egyptian public sphere. The major catalyst for its publication was the abolition of the caliphate by the Turkish state (March 3, 1924) and a series of conferences and public debates regarding the desirability of a new caliph in the modern period (debates in which the Egyptian king Fu'ad was very much involved). Many modern reformers, notably 'Abd al-Rahman al-Kawakibi (1849–1902) and Rashid Rida, had been fascinated by the concept of the caliph prior to the action of the Turkish state—and al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm continued these discussions. At that time, controversies were frequent and conformed to a pattern in Egypt: a famous scholar (e.g., Qasim Amin, 'Abd al-Raziq, Taha Husayn) publishes a text in which he challenges some assumptions; a scandal ensues in which the scholar, though persecuted, cements his position as a precursor of modernity, while Azhar University and the more conservative circles present themselves as the guardians of the shari'a. This was the case with 'Abd al-Raziq's work. On May 24, 1925, the noted intellectual and politician Muhammad Husayn Haykal (1888–1956) recommended in his journal al-Siyasa that people read al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm. The next month, Rida published an attack on the book. In August, Azhar University's rector and 24 of its leading 'ulama' (backed by King Fu'ad) responded by dismissing 'Abd al-Raziq from his judgeship, ousting him from Azhar University, and denouncing his book publicly. Husayn and Haykal defended 'Abd al-Raziq, while some Azharis published books refuting the main arguments of al-Islam wa Usul al-Hukm. The question that occupied many intellectuals then and later was whether 'Abd al-Raziq was advocating a separation between state and church under the veneer of accepting Islamic political theory or attempting to strengthen Islamic political theory from within. Was he, in other words, the Egyptian John Locke or a new Mawardi?

Like many modern Muslim political theorists before him, 'Abd al-Raziq relies heavily on the Qur'an, as well as on the philosophy of Ibn Khaldun, yet he also draws on scholars such as Aristotle, Plato, Thomas Hobbes, Locke, Thomas Arnold (notably, his work on the caliphate), and other political theorists who wrote on the question of governance.

'Abd al-Raziq opens al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm by presenting two opinions on the source of the caliph's power: God or (based on Locke's theories) the community (umma). Although he does not clarify his own views at this point, the text as a whole seems to support the latter contention.

'Abd al-Raziq's main argument is that the caliphate emerged as a recognized form of political authority during the time of Abu Bakr, not before him. His historical readings of the institution of the caliphate in the post-Rāshidūn (Rightly Guided Caliphs) era are rather pessimistic, if not Machiavellian. He argues that nearly every caliph, including Abu Bakr, faced political opposition. While it was possible to assume that the legitimacy of the caliphate should be drawn from the voluntary will of the Muslims (ikhtiyāriyya), in reality the caliphate was based on power, and most commonly military power. Rulers in Islam also limited scientific inquiry, and thus despite the flourishing of medieval Islamic sciences and the interest in Greek thought, political science (al-'ulūm al-siyāsiyya) was never developed in Islamic thought. This is because of the limitations on political and intellectual freedom under various leaders of the Islamic state, who promulgated the mistaken notion that obedience to political authority should be understood as obedience to God. This misguided view allowed them to establish tyrannies, lead the people astray, and manipulate the meaning of religion in order to rule. What enabled these leaders to control their nations—their command of Muslim armies, the development of cities, and the establishment of various ministries—had very little to do with religion and relied on reason, expertise, and technical knowledge. Nothing, then, prevented Muslims from being like other peoples and developing a theory of politics that would lay the groundwork for a different system of governance.

While 'Abd al-Raziq's opinions should be contextualized within the politics of King Fu'ad and the debates over the question of the caliphate in the Muslim world, the abuse of power under British colonialism in the Middle East also inspired his writings. 'Abd al-Raziq makes mention of the newly appointed Iraqi king, Faysal b. al-Husayn, whose father challenged Ottoman rule with British support, thus guaranteeing that his son, Faysal, would be installed as king. Faysal was made king of Iraq based on the false claims of the British that the Iraqi people had freely elected him. In the same manner that Mu'awiya and his son Yazid had achieved the bay'a (oath of allegiance) of their own people—namely, by power—Faysal owed his position to his British backers, yet his rule was represented as reflecting the will of the people. 'Abd al-Raziq was troubled by the new Arab leadership, whose authority had little to do with the will of the people and yet represented itself as democratic. While the need to limit the power of political leaders was a much-discussed theme in modern Islamic political thought (especially in the years preceding the constitutional revolutions in Iran and the Ottoman Empire), 'Abd al-Raziq suggests that the power of the political leader should not be limited (by the 'ulama', consultation, or whatever other power) but rethought altogether.

'Abd al-Raziq argues that neither the Qur'an nor the hadith devotes much space to the issue of the caliphate. To understand this, it was necessary to distinguish between political and religious governance. According to political scientists ('ulamā' al-siyāsa), some form of power is needed in order to govern any umma, whether it is secular (lā dīn lahā) or religious (Jewish, Christian, or Muslim). The nature of this power, however, differs according to whether the mode of governance is constitutional (dustūriyya), tyrannical (istibdādiyya), republican, or Bolshevik. In fact, part of the discourse of the 'ulama' on leadership (imāma) and the caliphate (khilāfa) centered on what political science calls governance (ḥukūma)—namely, political practices rather than religious ones.

Referencing the sīra (life of the Prophet), the chronicles of Tabari, and the hadith literature, 'Abd al-Raziq seeks to establish that the caliphate was an institution that developed historically from less developed forms to more complex ones in tandem with the growth of the Islamic state. The Prophet, in this sense, was a religious leader (rasūl da'wa dīniyya) and not a political leader in the fullest sense of the word. Many prophetic messengers (rasūl) were not necessarily political leaders; Jesus, one such figure, said famously, "Render unto Caesar the things which are Caesar's, and unto God the things that are God's" (Matthew 22:21). The Prophet did establish an entity that had elements (mazāhir) of governance and traces (āthār) of power. Even though jihad was used as a weapon for the expansion of the new faith, its promotion was mostly attained by spiritual and nonviolent means. Evoking the Qur'anic verse "There is no compulsion in religion" (2:256), 'Abd al-Raziq proposes that the Prophet attempted to persuade people to embrace his religion rather than use force and, by extension, establish a state. In fact, the prophetic state (al-namlaka al-nabawiyya, al-dawla al-nabawiyya) did not achieve perfection in terms of its political form but was rather a state in the primitive stages of development (dawlat al-basāṭa, ḥukūmat al-fiṭra) led by a man who loved simplicity and was close to the people. Therefore, the prophetic state was one of a kind; today a state without a fixed budget or ministries is inconceivable. The Prophet did not desire to establish a state, much less an empire, and in terms of leadership, he was more akin to Moses and Jesus than any political figure. The Muslims obeyed the Prophet without question because his authority emanated from the divine law. The rule of the Prophet, however, should not be confused with the rule of those who came after him. Islam was a call to reform mankind and a means to achieve happiness and not a political prescription for establishing a state. It was therefore possible that one day the world would experience religious unity, yet it was utterly impossible, and in contradiction to human nature, to have one state for all mankind.

Reflecting on current political theories (such as Pan-Arabism), 'Abd al-Raziq suggests that Islam, as a global and humanistic mission, was neither an Arab religion nor a manifestation of Arab unity, as the Islamic faith did not privilege one nation, language, or historical period over another. True, the Prophet was an Arab and the Qur'an was an Arabic book—yet the Arabs at the time were not unified. They spoke different dialects and lived under different political regimes (some were ruled by the Byzantines; others were independent). Islam did provide the Arabs with certain laws regarding war, culture, speech, and etiquette, thus offering some form of unity, yet this unity was not intended to form a state because the Prophet's authority was religious in nature, and the Arabs obeyed him based on their faith.

For 'Abd al-Raziq, the transformation to the rule of Abu Bakr typified the shift to an Arab state. It is in the debates between the muhājirūn (emigrants) and the anṣār (helpers) that 'Abd al-Raziq locates a new political vocabulary relating to governance. Abu Bakr did not intend to be a religious ruler, but his public persona and the people's admiration for him solidified this religious notion. Unlike the Prophet, he was a political leader who had to unite the Arabs as he faced the challenge of the ethnotribal loyalties ('aṣabiyya) emblematic of the Arabian political order. However, some of his followers wrongly believed that his authority was like that of Muhammad: Abu Bakr was not seen as replacing Muhammad but rather as a representative of Allah. In this context, the ridda (apostasy) wars should be understood as tribal rather than religious wars, relating to the rivalries between Quraysh and Tamim and the desire to keep the leadership of the Arab state within Quraysh. These processes of the consolidation of power, however, should be interpreted as arising out of the particular nature of the new state and not as articles of the Islamic faith. Certainly, there was a heretical group, such as false prophets, within the opposition to Abu Bakr. Yet some of those who rebelled against Abu Bakr could have been Muslims resisting the political hegemony offered by Abu Bakr, not the Islamic religion. The refusal to recognize Abu Bakr's political authority was not in itself a sign of ridda, for individuals such as 'Ali b. Abi Talib were not considered murtaddūn (apostates) or treated as such. Those who did not want to pay the zakat (alms tax) were not rejecting religion but rather the regime of Abu Bakr.

The ideas put forth by 'Abd al-Raziq were truly revolutionary. On the one hand, he intentionally downplayed or ignored many elements in the Prophet's biography (such as the signing of 'ahd al-umma, the covenant of the community) in order to support his contention that the Prophet's early community was not a political one. Moreover, by arguing that the prophetic state was a very primordial one at best and that the Prophet was a religious leader whose rule could not, and should not, be emulated by any other leader, 'Abd al-Raziq negated the view, widespread in his time, that the Prophet and the salaf (Islam's first generations) should serve as ideals for political figures. Going further, the implications of al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm were that Muslims should not attempt to emulate the political structure created at the time of the Prophet, as political systems, like all other systems, develop historically and change from time to time.

Unlike Islamists today, or even the Wahhabis during his time, 'Abd al-Raziq was extremely cautious in calling another Muslim murtadd, or apostate. His writings marked a clear separation between state and religion, which was reflected not only in his call for democratic regimes in the future but also in his interpretation of the Islamic past. As an Azhari intimately familiar with the Qur'an and the hadith, he was able to amass numerous verses and traditions that accentuated nonviolent methods of proselytization in Islam and illustrated the primitive nature of the early Islamic state. While he recognized the need for the stability brought about by a government, he was critical of the ways in which religiosity was used to support undemocratic regimes. The mentions of democracy, Bolshevism, and tyranny in his writing indicate that he was thinking about current political regimes. His technique was not different from those of many of his contemporaries, who offered their own Qur'anic exegesis to resolve political dilemmas and imbued medieval Islamic concepts with modern meanings. Yet unlike many of his contemporaries, who evoked the idea of shūrā (mutual consultation) as a means of curbing the power of the sovereign, 'Abd al-Raziq suggested a new reading of the past that rarely had been offered before—or would be after—to support radical political change.

See also 'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); modernity; Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935); secularism

Further Reading

Ali Abderraziq, L'Islam et les fondements du pouvoir, translated and introduction by Abdou Filali-Ansary, 1994; Souad T. Ali, A Religion, Not a State: Ali 'Abd al-Raziq's Islamic Justification of Political Secularism, 2009.

ORIT BASHKIN

abdication

Abdication is a ruler's unilateral decision to give up his position of power. Classical Islamic political theory, including theological and juridical discussions of the imamate, allows the caliph or imam, the supreme ruler of the Muslim community, to abdicate of his own volition. He may do so because he is physically disqualified, such as if his health has deteriorated and he is unable to carry out his duties; because he is morally disqualified, such as if his sinful acts have affected his moral probity; or simply because he no longer wishes to assume the tremendous obligations and grave moral responsibilities that accompany the office. Under the caliphal dynasties of the Umayyads (661–750) and the Abbasids (750–1258), it became standard practice to designate an heir apparent—often two under the Umayyads—who would assume the office in cases of abdication or death.

Abdications occurred quite frequently in the history of the Umayyad and Abbasid caliphates, but they were usually coerced pseudoabdications. For example, the Umayyad caliph Ibrahim b. al-Walid (r. 744) was forced to abdicate when his cousin Marwan II (r. 744–50) had surrounded Damascus and was about to overrun the capital. In 1031, the last Umayyad caliph in Córdoba abdicated under similar circumstances, and his realm was divided into petty principalities. Under the Abbasids, Turkish military commanders and palace factions often dictated caliphal abdications, removing one member of the ruling family and installing another in order to undermine rival factions. In 866, for example, the caliph Musta'in (r. 862–66) succumbed to pressures from the captains of the Turkish guard to abdicate in favor of his cousin Mu'tazz (r. 866–69); although he was promised that he would be able to retire to Medina with a sufficient income, Mu'tazz did not keep his word, confined Musta'in to Baghdad, then had him assassinated. When other caliphs refused to abdicate, the Turkish commanders deposed them by blinding them in order to disqualify them for the office in the future, imprisoning them indefinitely, or killing them.

The most famous abdication in Islamic history is that of Hasan b. ʿAli, the Prophet's eldest grandson, who in 661 relinquished his claim to the caliphate and recognized Mu'awiya (r. 661–80), governor of Damascus and founder of the Umayyad dynasty, as ruler of the Muslim community. This took place after the assassination of his father, ʿAli b. Abi Talib, by the Khariji rebel Ibn Muljam in Kufa. After ʿAli was assassinated, his followers, the Shi'is, took the oath of allegiance to his son Hasan as caliph. Hasan initially led them from Iraq toward Syria to face Mu'awiya's advancing forces, but ended up accepting a settlement with his opponent. While subsequent Sunni histories claim that Hasan stepped down in recognition of the legitimacy of his opponent's rule, demonstrated by Mu'awiya's ability to garner widespread support and unite the Islamic state and sealed by Hasan's acceptance of a large payment in return, Shi'is maintained that this was a tactical move that did not entail surrender of the 'Alids' claim to the caliphate. Rather, Hasan supposedly intended to avoid further bloodshed after the devastating First Islamic Civil War (656–61), which had erupted following the assassination of ʿUthman b. ʿAffan (r. 644–56), the third caliph, and pitted ʿAli against the Prophet's wife ʿA'isha and the Umayyad clan and their supporters, and to ensure the safety of his loyal followers, who were faced with overwhelming opposing forces as well as traitors in their midst. In fact, Shi'i sources report that he was wounded in the thigh by a Khariji who had infiltrated his own camp. In later Shi'i thought, Hasan's abdication provided a model for quietist resistance and accommodation with illegitimate political regimes, in contrast to the active resistance embodied by his brother Husayn, who died at the Battle of Karbala in 680 as he sought to lead a revolt against Mu'awiya's son Yazid I (r. 680–83), the first hereditary ruler in Islamic history. Ayatollah Khomeini and other ideologues of the Iranian Revolution of 1979 vocally contrasted the two stances, claiming the superiority of the latter in order to mobilize the populace of Iran against Muhammad Reza Shah (r. 1941–79), the secularizing king of Iran.

The tables would be turned after a fashion when Yazid's son Mu'awiya II (r. 683–84) abdicated for pious reasons in 684. Faced with the need to crush the counter-caliphate of Ibn al-Zubayr (r. 683–92) in the Hijaz, Mu'awiya II chose to abdicate rather than assume the responsibility for conducting what would likely be a bloody military campaign in Mecca, on Islam's holiest ground. Shi'is even claim that he had secretly converted to Shi'ism and did not want to be associated with the massacre of the descendants of the Prophet.

Subsequent Islamic history provides many examples of coerced pseudoabdications. A number of the Ottoman sultans, Safavid shahs, and other rulers were forced to abdicate by military factions aiming to exert greater control over the central government. Such abdications have continued until the present. In 1941, the Western powers forced Reza Shah (r. 1925–41) to abdicate in favor of his son Muhammad Reza Shah (r. 1941–79). Egypt's King Farouk I was forced to abdicate in 1952 after the coup d'etat led by the Free Officers and went into exile in Monaco and Italy. His infant son was proclaimed King Fu'ad II, but the monarchy was officially abolished the next year. The second Hashimi monarch of Jordan, Talal b. ʿAbdallah (r. 1951–52), abdicated in favor of his son Hussein in 1952 after he was declared unfit to rule by parliament due to mental illness. Most recently, Egyptian president Husni Mubarak (r. 1981–2011) abdicated under pressure from the Egyptian army after a massive wave of popular protests in the early months of 2011. A striking abdication in recent history is that of ʿAbd al-Rahman Siwar al-Dahab, the Sudanese general who overthrew Ja'far al-Numayri's government in 1985. After controlling an interim government as head of the transitional military council, he abdicated in May 1986, handing over power to a democratically elected civilian government headed by Sadiq al-Mahdi, surprising skeptics who doubted that the military would voluntarily relinquish power.

See also caliph, caliphate; military

Further Reading

Juwayni, A Guide to Conclusive Proofs for the Principles of Belief, translated by Paul Walker, 2000; Mawardi, Ordinances of Government, translated by Wafa H. Wahba, 2001; Al-Shaykh al-Mufid, Kitab al-Irshad: The Book of Guidance, translated by I.K.A. Howard, n.d.

DEVIN J. STEWART

ʿAbduh, Muhammad (1849–1905)

Editor of Egypt's government newspaper during the ʿUrabi revolt (1881–82), member of the Paris-based Pan-Islamic revolutionary organization al-ʿUrwa al-Wuthqa (The Firmest Bond) in 1884, later a member of various Egyptian government commissions, and finally mufti of Egypt (1899–1905), Muhammad ʿAbduh is best known as one of the chief founders of the rationalist and modernist movement known to Western scholars as Salafism. His name became synonymous with Islamic reform.

Born in a village in Buhayra province, Egypt, in about 1849, ʿAbduh studied at Azhar, where he was a young follower of Afghani (1838–97), a roving Persian intellectual and activist, under whose influence he joined a progressive Masonic lodge where he made connections that would continue throughout his subsequent career. After Afghani's expulsion from Egypt in 1879, ʿAbduh remained close to the reform-minded minister Mustafa Riyad Pasha, under whose patronage he became editor of the government newspaper, al-Waqa'i al-Misriyya (Egyptian events), a post that carried with it the duty of supervising the Egyptian press. Initially reluctant to join the 'Urabi revolt of 1881 and 1882 against Egypt's hereditary ruler the Khedive Tawfiq, 'Abduh eventually oriented al-Waqa'i in support of the rebels, evidently hoping that this might advance his constitutionalist agenda. Arrested and imprisoned in the repression that followed the revolt's failure, he was exiled from Egypt and, after a period in Beirut, joined Afghani in Paris in 1884. 'Abduh edited and wrote much of al-'Urwa al-Wuthqa (The firmest bond), a radical Pan-Islamist and anti-imperialist journal aimed at readers in Egypt and India, then both under British occupation. This journal ceased publication after eight months, partly because the British authorities forbade its distribution in Egypt and India and partly because it ran out of money, but nevertheless was widely influential. The Syrian Islamic activist and journalist Rashid Rida credited his own conversion to Islamic nationalism to his discovery of an old copy of the journal. The significance of the journal lay in its use of Islam and the Qur'an to encourage Pan-Islamic solidarity against Western imperialism. In some ways, it invented modern Islamic radicalism. Given that the journal's radicalism contrasted with 'Abduh's later moderate stance, some scholars have argued that the primary responsibility for this hard line lay with Afghani rather than 'Abduh, but others find the evidence for this unconvincing.

After breaking with Afghani in 1885 for reasons that are unclear, 'Abduh returned to Syria, where he was briefly employed at a pioneering modernist school and wrote one of his most famous works, Risalat al-Tawhid (translated into English as The Theology of Unity). This short volume, little read in 'Abduh's lifetime, argues for a rational and scientific understanding of Islam and shows the influence of the French historian François Guizot, whose schema of European history 'Abduh applied to the Muslim world. Where Guizot credited the Renaissance and Reformation with saving Europe from the Dark Ages and restoring it to the high rationality previously achieved in the Classical world, 'Abduh looked for an Islamic reformation and renaissance to save Islam from its Dark Age and restore the rationality of the high Abbasid period (750 to 10th century).

Evidently despairing of making much progress in Syria under the repressive regime of the Ottoman Sultan Abdülhamid II, 'Abduh secured permission to return to Egypt in 1888. He was initially given the minor post of a judge in the provincial town of Banha but gradually proved himself a reliable supporter of the government of Khedive 'Abbas Hilmi II. He assisted various reform projects and was rewarded in 1895 with a post on the newly created Azhar Administrative Council, where he represented the government's interests. Upon the forced resignation of Hasuna al-Nawawi as grand mufti of Egypt in 1899, 'Abduh was appointed as his replacement. 'Abduh's own relationship with the khedive later deteriorated, and as mufti he avoided a fate similar to that of his predecessor thanks only to the intervention of Lord Cromer, the British official who was the effective ruler of Egypt, with whom 'Abduh had formed an alliance based on common interests and, to some extent, on genuine personal and intellectual sympathy. Even so, 'Abduh might not have survived much longer as mufti had he not died of cancer in 1905, at the age of 56.

As a member of the Azhar Administrative Council, 'Abduh delivered at Azhar a series of well-attended public lectures based on Qur'anic texts; these were later collected and edited by Rashid Rida and published under the title Tafsir al-Manar (Al-Manar's exegesis), a work partly of Rashid Rida's own composition. In the role of mufti, 'Abduh performed his administrative duties as expected and also delivered a number of modernist fatwas endorsing such religiously problematic institutions as the wearing of the European-style brimmed hat and the use of insurance. These fatwas were published in Rashid Rida's journal al-Manar (The lighthouse), which was widely read and extremely influential throughout the Muslim world.

'Abduh's lectures, fatwas, and occasional newspaper articles during this period are not overtly political. They deal instead with the need for intellectual and social reform. They stress the value of reason, attack adherence to traditional precedent (taqlid), and call for new interpretations of Islam (ijtihad). They also stress the value of progressive education ('Abduh became a keen supporter of the theories of the English liberal philosopher Herbert Spencer) and condemn polygamy as a social and moral abuse. The silence on political issues may, however, be seen as a sort of political statement: that the way forward for the Muslims was, at least for a period, not through conflict with Europe but through cooperation and even emulation. 'Abduh himself set an example by remaining an active Mason, learning French, taking summer holidays in Switzerland, and dining regularly with Lord Cromer.

After 'Abduh's death, his writings were collected, edited, and promoted by Rashid Rida, who is thought by some to have used 'Abduh's name and fame to promote his own rather different agenda. 'Abduh's association with Rashid Rida, combined with the difference between his political positions before and after his break with Afghani in 1885, produced many different later interpretations of his life. Since his death, 'Abduh has been widely used to endorse a variety of religious and political positions and is remembered more as a religious than as a political figure.

See also al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); modernism; Pan-Islamism; Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935); Salafis

Further Reading

Muhammad 'Abduh, The Theology of Unity, translated by Ishaq Masa'ad and Kenneth Cragg, 1966; Charles Adams, Islam and Modernism in Egypt: A Study of the Modern Reform Movement Inaugurated by Muhammad 'Abduh, 1933; Muhammad al-Haddad, Muhammad 'Abduh: Qira'a Jadidah fi Khitab al-Islah al-Dini, 2003; Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939, 1962; Jacques Jomier, Le commentaire coranique du Manar: tendances modernes de l'exégèse coranique en Égypte, 1954; Elie Kedourie, Afghani and 'Abduh: An Essay on Religious Unbelief and Political Activism in Modern Islam, 1966; Mark Sedgwick, Muhammad Abduh, 2010.

MARK SEDGWICK

Abdülhamid II (1842–1918)

Abdülhamid II, the 34th Ottoman sultan, presided over the promulgation of the first Ottoman Constitution. Son of Sultan Abdülmecid (r. 1839–61), Abdülhamid II ascended the throne on August 31, 1876, amid international crisis and domestic instability. The Eastern Question, dormant since the Paris Treaty of 1856, flared up again in 1875, when rebellions engulfed first Herzegovina and then Bosnia. Subsequent clashes between Muslims and Christians in Bulgaria prompted diplomatic intervention by the Great Powers of Europe and provided the impetus for the deposition of Sultan Abdülaziz (r. 1861–76) by reformist statesmen on May 30, 1876. Abdülaziz's successor, the mentally ill Murad V, disappointed the high hopes of the reformers, who deposed him after a 93-day reign and anointed his younger brother, Abdülhamid, to rule.

The bureaucracy, which sought to reestablish the favorable balance of power that had existed between the imperial court and the Sublime Porte (Ottoman government) in the heyday of the "reforms" (Tanzimat), expected the new sultan to promulgate the empire's first constitution and otherwise keep a low profile. Abdülhamid II, however, had other ideas. Despite the urgent need to present the Europeans with the fait accompli of a constitutional monarchy and thereby deflect pressures for reform, the sultan engaged the bureaucrats in a protracted debate on the nature of the constitution. He insisted on protecting his sovereign rights and compelled the reformers to make crucial concessions, the most important of which was a clause stipulating that the sultan could exile, without trial, individuals who endangered public safety. The announcement of the 119-article constitution was timed to coincide with the opening of the conference of international powers in Istanbul on December 23, 1876. Nevertheless, the Great Powers, unimpressed by the promises of equality for all Ottoman citizens included in the constitution, insisted on sweeping reforms favoring non-Muslims.

In April 1877, soon after the Ottoman government had rejected these demands, Russia declared war. Within less than a year, Russian armies were at the gates of Istanbul, forcing the government to sign one of the most disadvantageous peace treaties in Ottoman history at San Stefano on March 3, 1878. However, the resulting disturbance to the status quo proved too much for the other Great Powers to stomach, and the Congress of Berlin (June–July 1878) reversed some of the treaty's most radical provisions and restored some stability to the region. Abdülhamid II seized the opportunity presented by the war to prorogue the Chamber of Deputies after a mere 162 days in session. Constitutional rule continued in theory, but thereafter the sultan worked relentlessly to strengthen his position and eliminate the threat posed by parliamentary democracy to a polyethnic empire.

Abdülhamid II created a neopatrimonial autocracy combining the legitimizing strictures of Islamic law with the modern ideals of a Rechtsstaat—a state ruled by law. As power flowed back to the palace, the Sublime Porte shrank to its former stature as a subservient administrative arm of the state. The sultan vigorously suppressed all forms of opposition and established an effective spy network and a strict mechanism of censorship, which sustained his autocratic rule for more than three decades. The Hamidian regime revived an old Ottoman emphasis on personal loyalty, replacing the reform-era concept of the officialdom's loyalty to the state with that of fealty to the sovereign. The sultan bestowed extra ranks, decorations, and sometimes extravagant personal gifts, such as cash awards and mansions, upon high-ranking bureaucrats who proved exceptionally faithful. However, Abdülhamid II's autocracy did not, as is often maintained, represent a wholesale return to the patrimonialism of the pre-reforms era, for the lower rungs of the bureaucracy answered to their superiors within a strict hierarchy, which was too similar to that found in equivalent European institutions.

Abdülhamid II regarded himself as one of the great reforming sultans of the late Ottoman era; Ottoman propaganda frequently likened him to Peter the Great. He initiated major changes in education, state infrastructure, and the use of technology. The modern system of education established during the reforms era gained further strength. Under his aegis, a host of new colleges sprang up, designed to furnish the bureaucracy with competent officials, ranging from customs officers and veterinarians to governors and experts on agriculture. The provinces were connected to the imperial center through an extensive network of telegraph lines. Extraordinary efforts were invested in developing the Ottoman railway system. Statistics, including socioeconomic ones, came to be widely employed in bureaucratic planning and decision making.

Abdülhamid II also sought to reinvent tradition in an effort to bolster his image and foster a new sense of belonging to a Pan-Ottoman community. He refashioned old Ottoman customs and turned them into pompous, European-style ceremonies. Even Friday sermons acquired ceremonial trappings resembling European imperial rites. The new imperial image was intended to create a sense of belonging among the subjects. Imperial symbols, such as the coat-of-arms, became ubiquitous, appearing on all kinds of objects, ranging from bookbindings to silver artifacts. New maps featured the empire in its glorious entirety, as opposed to the splintered representation of the separate continents in maps of the past.

Abdülhamid II also crafted a new foreign policy. Initially, he adopted a stance of noncommitment and studiously avoided any confrontation with the Great Powers. Acknowledging Ottoman military weakness, he sought to amplify the empire's power by deploying Pan-Islamism as an ideological weapon in his dealings with European colonial powers. He was not only the primary practitioner of Pan-Islamism but also one of its major ideologues, along with Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (d. 1897), whom he invited to Istanbul. Pan-Islamism served as a tool to cement the solidarity of the Muslim subjects of the empire and gave new substance to the official ideology, Ottomanism. It also served as a wild card to stave off pressure for pro-Christian reforms on the part of European powers by threatening them with jihad in their colonies. The Penjdeh crisis of 1885 between Great Britain and Russia and Lord Robert Salisbury's decision in 1896 to base the defense of British interests in the Near East on Egypt, rather than on efforts to preserve the status quo at the Ottoman Straits, strained Anglo-Ottoman relations and eliminated the 19th-century assurance of British support for the empire in a time of crisis. The loss of the British guarantee compelled Abdülhamid II to switch to a policy of armed neutrality and to promote cordial relations with Germany. The Germans had also altered their strategy toward the Ottoman Empire in favor of their new Drang nach Osten (thrust to the East) policy. Although the subsequent Anglo-Russian rapprochement made the sultan lean even more toward Germany, he did not abandon his policy of avoiding alliances with the Great Powers. Likewise, he stuck to his pragmatic aversion to crises with the Great Powers over territories that were already lost to the empire in all but name. Thus he accepted the Bulgarian annexation of Eastern Rumelia (1885) and the British occupation of Egypt (1882). On the other hand, he bitterly contested British expansionism in the Arabian Peninsula and European reform schemes for Macedonia and eastern Anatolia. Similarly, Abdülhamid II rejected the 1901–2 Zionist proposal for settling and organizing Jews in Palestine in exchange for the consolidation of the colossal Ottoman debt.

Soaring debt, exacerbated by the war with Russia and the Great Depression of 1873–96, took a heavy toll on the Ottoman economy. And yet, despite the establishment of the Ottoman Public Debt Organization in 1881, to which a considerable proportion of state revenues were channeled, the economy fared well under Abdülhamid II. He presided over the centralization of the Ottoman economy and the institution of a protectionist trade regime. At his behest, the state made major investments in infrastructure, such as the Baghdad and Hijaz railways, a large irrigation project in the Konya valley, and telegraph lines connecting the Ottoman provinces with the center.

A generation of intellectuals found Abdülhamid II's autocratic regime an oppressive anachronism and fought against it mainly from outside the country. The establishment of a link between these exiles and disaffected members of the military eventually created a revolution. In July 1908, the main Ottoman organization of opposition, the Committee of Union and Progress (CUP), launched the Young Turk Revolution in Macedonia. The CUP forced the sultan to reinstate the Constitution of 1876 and to reconvene the Chamber of Deputies, which had been prorogued for 30 years. Abdülhamid II's second term as a chastened constitutional monarch was considerably shorter than the previous term. On April 27, 1909, the General Assembly, convening after the suppression of the counterrevolution of April 13 and acting on the basis of CUP instructions and a fatwa, deposed Abdülhamid II and placed him under virtual house arrest in Salonica. In 1912, when the city was about to fall to the Greeks, the sultan was transferred back to Istanbul, where he spent his last years at Beylerbeyi Palace until his death.

See also constitutionalism; Europe; Ottomans (1299–1924); revival and reform; Turkey

Further Reading

Selim Deringil, The Well-Protected Domains: Ideology and the Legitimation of Power in the Ottoman Empire, 1876–1909, 1998; François Georgeon, Abdülhamid II: Le Sultan Calife, 1876–1909, 2003; M. Şükrü Hanioğlu, The Young Turks in Opposition, 1995; F.A.K. Yasamee, Ottoman Diplomacy: Abdülhamid II and the Great Powers, 1878–1888, 1996.

M. ŞÜKRÜ HANIOĞLU

abodes of Islam, war, and truce

The classical Islamic theory of world order, as outlined in legal treatises on the Islamic state's relations with non-Muslims (siyar), divided the world into different realms or abodes (in Arabic, dār [sing.], diyār [plural]). The number and names of such abodes varied widely in classical sources, but the three that received the most attention among jurists were the abode of Islam (dār al-islām), war (dār al-ḥarb), and truce (dār al-ṣulḥ). Even these three, however, did not receive detailed or consistent elaboration.

Dār al-islām was generally understood as the territory over which Muslims held political sovereignty and in which Islamic law (shari'a) was enforced. Dār al-islām was conceived as the abode of the Muslim umma, the community of believers, in which Muslim lives, property, honor, and faith were safeguarded. Dār al-islām also comprised non-Muslim communities (*dhimmī*s), whose lives, property, and religious autonomy were guaranteed by the Islamic state so long as they did not challenge Muslim sovereignty and paid the poll tax (the jizya mentioned in Q. 9:29) or a land tax (the kharāj).

Dār al-ḥarb was understood broadly as all territories in which Islamic law did not prevail. According to the majority of jurists, it was the duty of the Muslim ruler to undertake jihad—through peaceful means if possible but through forceful means if necessary—to reduce dār al-ḥarb and expand dār al-islām whenever the state was militarily and financially able to do so. An area of dār al-ḥarb could be incorporated into dār al-islām through capitulation (sulḥan) or through conquest ('anwatan). Conversely, according to jurists of the Hanafi school, three conditions caused a territory to revert from dār al-islām to dār al-ḥarb: (1) enforcement of non-Islamic laws, (2) contiguity with another territory of dār al-ḥarb, and (3) the absence of security for Muslims or *dhimmī*s.

Dār al-ṣulḥ, or the abode of truce, was a third category posited mainly by jurists of the Shafi'i school, although scholars from other schools also employed it or analogous terms. It included areas that could not be objects of jihad because of a truce or other agreement with the Islamic state. Drawing an analogy from the treaty of Hudaybiyya concluded by the Prophet and his Meccan opponents in 628, most jurists held that the maximum term for any truce was ten years, although nothing barred the Muslim ruler from indefinitely renewing it if he deemed such a truce to be in the Muslims' interest.

These terms are not found in either the Qur'an or the hadith. They appear to have entered Islamic parlance during the late eighth century (second Islamic century), perhaps in an effort by the jurists to revive Islamic unity through renewed military efforts (jihad) in order to expand Islamic rule. The theory of world order in which these abodes played an important part was thus never matched by reality. Yet the terms have continued to be used and debated by Muslims until the present. During the 19th century, Indian 'ulama' divided over the question of whether India under British rule remained dār al-islām or had become dār al-ḥarb. Similar debates took place from North Africa to Southeast Asia. The terms are still employed today, mainly by fundamentalist writers, although with profound differences from the classical usage. Dār al-islām does not exist; instead, it has been replaced by a new jāhiliyya, or a corrupted, un-Islamic order, as argued by Mawdudi (d. 1979), the founder of the Jama'at-i Islami in India and Pakistan, and Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), the chief ideologue of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood. For such theorists and activists, reconstituting an authentic dār al-islām is now the primary goal of jihad.

See also alliances; asylum; diplomacy; international relations; jihad

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, "Islamic Law and Muslim Minorities: The Juristic Discourse on Muslim Minorities from the Second/Eighth to the Eleventh/Seventeenth Centuries," Journal of Islamic Law and Society 22, no. 1 (1994); Muhammad Hamidullah, The Muslim Conduct of State, 1977; Sohail H. Hashmi, "Political Boundaries and Moral Communities: Islamic Perspectives," in States, Nations, and Borders: The Ethics of Making Boundaries, edited by Allen Buchanan and Margaret Moore, 2003; Majid Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, 1955; Rudolph Peters, Islam and Colonialism: The Doctrine of Jihad in Modern History, 1979.

SOHAIL H. HASHMI

absolutism

Traditional monarchy (salṭana) in Islam was autocratic. There were no formal checks on the ruler, but he was the protector of religion and enforcer of the divine law (shari'a). In theory, government was not arbitrary but subject to law. This form of government therefore should be characterized as autocracy. The legitimacy of autocracy depended on justice and the observance of divine law. Government without justice was tyranny (ẓulm). With political modernization in the latter part of the 19th century, traditional monarchy was described as absolutism (salṭana muṭlaqa), in contrast to modern constitutional or conditional (mashrūṭa) monarchy, and increasingly decried as despotism (istibdād). In the political literature of the late 19th and early 20th centuries, the latter term, istibdād, carried the brunt of the pejorative weight traditionally associated with tyranny.

In the 11th century, the historian Abu al-Fadl Muhammad b. Husayn al-Bayhaqi (d. 1077) used the term istibdād to describe the arbitrary decisions of the sultan. A few centuries later, Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406) used its derivative verbal forms to describe the consolidation of the power of a single ruler in periods of breakdown and transition within and between various Andalusian and North African dynasties. But the term in its modern sense must be considered a neologism. Aristotle had used the term despotēs for the authority of the master in the household, or oikos, and had further described Persian kingship as "hereditary despotic rule governing in conformity with law." Aristotle's Politics was, however, not available to Muslim thinkers in the 19th century. It was through the radical redefinition of absolutism as despotic rule by the great political thinker of the Enlightenment, Montesquieu (d. 1755), that the concept entered modern Muslim political thought, albeit indirectly. The Ottoman regime was depicted fairly favorably by Jean Bodin (d. 1596) in the 16th century, but a Venetian ambassador in 1637 described it as a power "most immoderate, absolute and despotic," and a century later, Montesquieu elaborated on his famous concept of Oriental despotism in sharp contrast to the "moderate" Christian monarchies of Europe. Montesquieu's pejorative reclassification of Aristotle's despotism was achieved by his artful collapse of law into religion in his discussion of the Ottoman (1299–1924) and Safavid (1501–1722) empires. Despotism was an important element of his project of enlightenment in the context of the growing de facto absolutism of the French state and was intended as a warning (through its projection to other civilizations). Although Montesquieu's Spirit of Laws was not translated into Arabic, Persian, or Turkish in the 19th century, his influence was transmitted by modern legal education and, more particularly, through Vittorio Alfieri's De Tirannide (1800). The term istibdād was used in the pejorative sense of absolutism in the last quarter of the 19th century by Khayr al-Din al-Tunisi (d. 1890) and Namık Kemal (d. 1888), and Abdullah Cevdet (d. 1895) used it as the title of his Turkish translation of Alfieri in 1898. Shortly thereafter in 1900, the Syrian 'Abd al-Rahman al-Kawakibi (d. 1902) published his famous Tabayi' al-Istibdad (Characteristics of despotism) in Cairo, drawing heavily on that translation (though mistaking Montesquieu for a poet). The constitutionalist writers in the Ottoman Empire, including Egypt and Iran, thus appropriated Montesquieu's characterization of despotism as arbitrary rule without law to describe the autocracy they wished to reform.

In the formal typologies of government in modern public law of the period, absolutism was contrasted to constitutional monarchy and republic, both interestingly rendered as "national sovereignty" (salṭanat-i millī) in the Persian tracts. In the polemical literature against despotism, the idea of absolutism constituted a complete break with traditional political thought. In fact, very little attention was paid to the traditional theory of monarchy that rested on the fear of anarchy and the necessity of order for the effective divine salvation of humankind. Kawakibi mentioned the traditional political philosophy (siyāsa madanīyya) a few times in passing and only once cited the hadiths and maxims justifying monarchy, adding that they were conditional upon justice, whereas monarchy loses its legitimacy when it practices tyranny—taken to be the usual form of absolutism.

More recent Pan-Islamic theories of the caliphate, promoted by the Ottoman sultan Abdülhamid II (d. 1918), were also set aside in the constitutionalist literature. In fact, Kawakibi had already put forward a theory of the caliphate as purely a spiritual authority when he moved from Aleppo to Cairo, presumably for the benefit of his uncle's pupil, 'Abbas Hilmi II, the khedive of Egypt. This idea was put forward without regard to the discussion of absolutism and was at odds with it. A quarter of a century later, when Muhammad Rashid Rida (d. 1935) drew on the medieval juristic literature to formulate his modern theory of the caliphate, its dissociation from the concept of absolutism was complete.

In Iran, absolutism was contrasted to the rule of law and became the battle cry of the Constitutional Revolution (1906–11). Kawakibi's Tabayi' al-Istibdad was translated into Persian with the same title and published in Tehran in 1907. The period during which autocracy was restored, from June 1908 to July 1909, was called the "Lesser Despotism" (istibdād-i saghīr). In Tanbih al-Umma wa-Tanzih al-Milla, published in Baghdad in 1909, Mirza Muhammad Husayn Gharavi Na'ini (d. 1936), a constitutionalist Shi'i mujtahid (authoritative jurist) of Najaf, drew on Kawakibi's Tabayi' al-Istibdad to underscore the illegitimacy of absolutism as a despotic form of government. It was contrasted with constitutional government, for which Na'ini offered a conditional justification within the framework of the traditional Shi'i jurisprudence as the least undesirable form of government during the occultation of the Twelfth Imam. Na'ini's treatise was republished in Tehran in 1955 by Mahmud Taleqani as a plea for the observance of the constitution of 1906 to 1907 and in order to delegitimize the incipient royal dictatorship of Muhammad Reza Shah Pahlavi (d. 1979). Although it was displaced by such terms as dictatorship, the notion of absolutism (istibdād) did not disappear entirely. Since the Islamic Revolution of 1979 in Iran, a powerful minority of Shi'i clerics have advocated theocratic government—led by clerics—as "healthy absolutism" in their inner circle, arguing publicly that Ayatollah Khomeini (d. 1989) had intended the "Islamic Republic" merely as a transitory form of Islamic government.

See also monarchy

Further Reading

Charles de Secondat Montesquieu, The Spirit of the Laws, translated by Anne M. Cohler, Basia Carolyn Miller, and Harold Samuel Stone, 1989; Lucette Valensi, The Birth of the Despot: Venice and the Sublime Porte, translated by A. Denner, 1993.

SAÏD AMIR ARJOMAND

Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634)

Abu Bakr b. Abi Quhafa b. 'Amir was the first caliph, or successor, to the Prophet Muhammad to head the Muslim community after Muhammad's death in 632 and until his own death in 634. Like Muhammad, he was a Meccan from the tribe of Quraysh, albeit from the clan of Taym rather than Muhammad's clan of Hashim. Allegedly one of the two earliest male converts to Islam, Abu Bakr had been a merchant in Mecca in pre-Islamic times, and upon his conversion he spent much of his moral and financial capital in support of the cause of Islam. Known as al-siddīq, "the trustworthy" or "the upright," Abu Bakr was Muhammad's close friend, chief adviser, and staunch ally, who defended the Prophet's account of his night journey (isrā') from Mecca to Jerusalem. In 622, Muhammad selected him to be his companion in his emigration journey from Mecca to Medina, as is referred to in the Qur'an (9:40), and he later participated in all the expeditions that Muhammad led in the Medinan period.

Political questions surrounded the selection and election of Abu Bakr as caliph since that office was without precedent in Arabia, and his tenure would begin to define it at a critical moment for the Islamic polity, as Muslims moved from God's rule under Muhammad to the appointment of his successors by mere mortals. Abu Bakr's appointment was not without controversy. Immediately following the Prophet's death, a power struggle took place in Medina on the saqīfa, or "portico," of the clan of Banu Sa'ida between the Medinan (anṣār) and Meccan (muhājirūn) Muslims, the former group attempting to share with the Quraysh the leadership of the Muslim community and the latter seeking to keep that leadership exclusively within Quraysh. The anṣār's attempt was thwarted by the decisive intervention of 'Umar b. al-Khattab (d. 644), an influential Companion of the Prophet from his tribe of Quraysh, who proposed that his friend Abu Bakr be the leader of a single, unified community. Later literature legitimates Abu Bakr's claim to rule by the Prophet's demonstrated esteem for him, by his precedence (sābiqa) in adopting the new faith and by the Prophet appointing him, during his final illness, to lead the prayer. His exalted position was confirmed when the Prophet married Abu Bakr's daughter 'A'isha (d. 678) when she was nine or ten. This could have been, initially, a political alliance, part of the Prophet's strategy that resulted in each of the first four caliphs being bound to him by marriage. Abu Bakr's prestige, however, was much enhanced when 'A'isha was later acknowledged as the Prophet's favorite wife.

Even after Abu Bakr's acclamation as caliph through an oath of allegiance (bay'a) of all Muslims in Medina, including a delayed one by 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661), the Prophet's son-in-law, some continued to believe that 'Ali had a greater claim to rule than Abu Bakr. This tension sowed the seeds for the later division of the Muslim community into Sunni and Shi'i Muslims. Within decades, and more so over the first Islamic centuries, the rift between the two groups widened. The Shi'is supported the political and religious preeminence of 'Ali and his descendants as imams, and some of them identified Abu Bakr (as well as his two successors) as a usurper who had seized power unjustly despite knowing that the Prophet had appointed 'Ali to lead his community prior to his death. The Sunnis reject as unsubstantiated the claim that the Prophet had designated a successor before he died.

Abu Bakr spent almost his entire reign of over two years (June 8, 632–August 23, 634) as caliph waging wars against the Arab tribes who carried out religiopolitical insurgencies in central and eastern Arabia and in Yemen against the Muslim authority in Medina. Islamic historical literature reads all the opposition movements during Abu Bakr's caliphate in a religious light and put all the activities related to them under the heading of "the apostasy" (al-ridda), simultaneously characterizing some of their leaders as "false prophets." Far from being a uniform body of rebellions, some the tribes simply rejected the supremacy of the Medinan authority, refused to pay the prescribed zakat (alms taxes), or declined the invitation to embrace Islam for the first time. The armies that Abu Bakr sent against these "apostates" quelled all their resistance. In the important battle at 'Aqraba' in May 633, Musaylima b. Thumama, the most serious religious and political opponent of the Muslims, was defeated and killed. By the time Abu Bakr had died, Arabia had become unified under Muslim rule, with its center in Medina.

Abu Bakr continued the Prophet's policy of sending expeditions into Syria. The conflicts that ensued with the Byzantines, under the leadership of Usama b. Zayd, signaled the first phase of the Islamic conquests of the vast lands between the Nile and Oxus rivers in 634. It was under Abu Bakr's rule that the incursion into Iraq by the Muslims, under the leadership of Khalid b. al-Walid, started.

Before his death of natural causes in 634, Abu Bakr designated 'Umar b. al-Khattab as his successor, and when he died he was buried next to the Prophet, beneath his own daughter's house in Medina. Overall, and despite its shortness, Abu Bakr's reign was pivotal in that it saved the Muslim community from internal dissolution and reestablished a unified control over fractious Arabian tribes. Sunni Muslims praise him as the first of the four Rāshidān, "Rightly Guided Caliphs" (caliphs who succeeded Muhammad), while many among the Shi'i Muslims malign him as a usurper.

See also 'A'isha (ca. 614–78); caliph, caliphate; Companions of the Prophet; Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); succession

Further Reading

Khalil Athamina, "The Pre-Islamic Roots of the Early Muslim Caliphate: The Emergence of Abū Bakr," Der Islam 76 (1999); Hugh Kennedy, The Prophet and the Age of the Caliphate, 1986; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad: A Study of the Early Caliphate, 1997; Miklos Muranyi, "Ein neuer Bericht über die Wahl des ersten Kalifen Abū Bakr," Arabica 25 (1978).

WADAD KADI

Abu Hanifa (699–767)

Abu Hanifa was the eponymous founder of the Hanafi school, one of the four orthodox Muslim schools of law, and a leader of the Murji'a, a religiopolitical movement that emerged in seventh-century Iraq in the context of disputes within the Muslim community regarding claims to the caliphate. In response to these disputes and to the schisms they produced (primarily the Shi'is and the Kharijis), the Murji'is proclaimed a neutral position regarding rights to the caliphate—in particular those of the third and fourth caliphs, 'Uthman b. 'Affan and 'Ali b. Abi Talib. They maintained that the judgment on these caliphs should be suspended and left to God. This position, together with a statement implying the renunciation of the extremist Shi'is' exclusive support of 'Ali, is found in al-Fiqh al-Absat (The plainest law), an early collection of dogmatic views attributed to Abu Hanifa. On the practical level, however, Abu Hanifa deviated from the Murji'i principle of political neutrality when he contributed money to support Zayd b. 'Ali, the eponym of the Zaydis, who revolted against the Umayyads in 740. Although he excused himself from active participation in Zayd's revolt, Abu Hanifa is said to have justified the uprising by comparing it to the Prophet's fight against the infidels. Moreover, Abu Hanifa advocated for the 'Alid Ibrahim b. 'Abdallah, who rebelled with his brother Muhammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya against the Abbasids in 762–63.

As Wilferd Madelung has shown, Abu Hanifa differed from the Umayyads regarding the status of newly converted non-Arab populations in the eastern areas of the caliphate. These new converts confessed their belief in Islam, yet they did not necessarily fulfill the requisite religious duties. In line with the Murji'i dogma, which identified faith with the mere confession of belief to the exclusion of performance of religious obligations, Abu Hanifa recognized these converts as Muslims, while the Umayyads denied them this status and continued to impose on them the jizya, the tax paid by non-Muslims only. In 734, the new converts' struggle for equality turned into a militant revolt led by extreme Murji'is. Abu Hanifa did not participate in the revolt and served as a mediator between the rebels and the Umayyad caliph Yazid III. This is one example of Abu Hanifa's complex relations with the government: on the one hand he disagreed with its policy, but on the other hand he enjoyed influence in the caliphal court and even cooperated with the caliph. The report that Abu Hanifa was invited by the Abbasid caliph Mansur to help in the construction of Baghdad demonstrates such cooperation.

Abu Hanifa's attitude toward the government was at times critical and reserved (an attitude not uncommon among contemporary religious scholars), but his level of activism in this regard is unclear. In al-Fiqh al-Absat, he proclaims the religious duty of al-amr bi-l-ma'rūf wa-l-nahy 'an al-munkar—namely, to enjoin a fellow Muslim what is proper and forbid him what is improper. The second part of this duty had an important political implication, for when applied to the authorities, it meant confronting them by condemning their misconduct. This political implication is related to the question of the religious status of an unjust ruler and the obligation to obey him. Such a ruler was, according to the Murji'i definition, a "sinful believer." This definition did not legitimize dethroning the ruler, but it left an opening for criticizing his wrongdoings. As demonstrated by Michael Cook, the nature of such criticism was the subject of various interpretations, ranging from armed rebellion to the mere avoidance of the authorities. The evidence regarding Abu Hanifa's view on this issue, as presented by Cook, is ambivalent. According to some reports Abu Hanifa espoused the militant option, and at least one person is said to have fought alongside (and have been killed with) the 'Alid Ibrahim upon Abu Hanifa's advice. Other accounts, however, portray him as a quietist who, without denying the religious duty of rebuking the unjust ruler—and the potential revolt this duty implied—discouraged rebellion in practice and refused to take an active part in it. Ultimately, while no evidence exists that Abu Hanifa's support of movements opposing the government ever amounted to actually participating in a revolt, it is clear that he was not of the quietist, obedient type of the following generation of Hanafi-Murji'is.

See also jurisprudence; Murji'is; theology

Further Reading

Abu Hanifa (attributed), al-Fiqh al-Absat, edited by M. Z. al-Kawthari, 1368; M. Abu Zahra, Abu Hanifa: Hayatuhu wa-'Asruhu, ara'uhu wa-Fiqhuhu, 1947; M. Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Encyclopaedia of Islam, Three, s.v. "Abū Ḥanīfa," by H. Yanagihashi, 2007, http://www.brillonline.nl/subscriber/entry?entry=ei3_COM-0151; al-Khatib al-Baghdadi, Ta'rikh Baghdad, 1966; W. Madelung, Religious Trends in Early Islamic Iran, 1988; J. van Ess, Theologie und Gesellschaft im 2. und 3. Jahrhundert Hidschra, 1991.

NURIT TSAFRIR

Abu Yusuf (ca. 731–98)

Abu Yusuf Ya'qub b. Ibrahim al-Ansari, better known as Abu Yusuf, was born in Kufa and died in Baghdad. As both a religious scholar and a dynastic official, he played a pioneering role in the amalgamation of the religious sciences and governing practices of the Abbasid dynasty, which he served in Baghdad first as judge and then as chief judge (qāḍī al-quḍāt). He was the first to occupy the post of chief judge, created during the caliphate of Harun al-Rashid for the sake of greater centralization of the judiciary (i.e., appointment and supervision of all Abbasid judgeships).

Abu Yusuf studied with several of the leading scholars of his day and was most devoted to Abu Hanifa (d. 767), whose teachings he and his pupil, Muhammad al-Hasan al-Shaybani (d. 805), developed into a distinct school (madhhab) of shari'a. According to Ibn al-Nadim (writing in the latter part of the tenth century), Abu Yusuf was first committed to the preservation of hadith (reports about the first Muslims, the Prophet Muhammad above all, as the source of religious and moral norms) but then, under the tutelage of Abu Hanifa, turned his attention to judicial reasoning (ra'y). His teachings are more grounded in prophetic traditions than those of Abu Hanifa, and one of his works, Kitab al-Athar (The book of traditions), is a collection of hadith transmitted in Kufa. His work overall, however, shows a strong interest in fiqh (i.e., comprehension and articulation of the law and not only transmission of the prophetic heritage). Two surviving works, al-Radd 'ala Siyar al-Awza'i (Refutation of the moral teachings of al-Awza'i) and Ikhtilaf Abi Hanifa wa-Ibn Abi Layla (The disagreement of Abu Hanifa and Ibn Abi Layla), and two lost works, Ikhtilaf al-Amsar and al-Radd 'ala Malik b. Anas (as reported by Ibn al-Nadim), as well as extracts from his Kitab al-Hiyal (Book of stratagems) preserved in Shaybani's work on the subject of legal artifices, all underscore a developing interest in the nature and purpose of law. His arguments, which sometimes disagree with his master, and his opinions, which sometimes contradict themselves, have been incorporated into the legacy of the Hanafi school of shari'a, as embodied in the legal compendium known as al-Asl (The origin), attributed to Shaybani, and al-Hidaya (The guidance), compiled by Burhan al-Din Abu l-Hasan 'Ali Marghinani (d. 1197).

The work for which Abu Yusuf is most celebrated is Kitab al-Kharaj (The book of the land tax), in which he responds at length to 28 questions posed by the caliph Harun al-Rashid on various aspects of governance. The work is chiefly devoted to fiscal matters but encompasses a wide range of administrative concerns, including the status of non-Muslim subjects, warfare, and the punishment of crime. It does not exhibit the scope and organization of later administrative works, such as the Kitab al-Kharaj wa-Sina'at al-Kitaba (The book of the land tax and art of administrative writing) by Qudama b. Ja'far (d. ca. 948), but it does reflect the ongoing Abbasid interest, first seen in Risala fi al-Sahaba (Epistle on the caliph's entourage) by Ibn al-Muqaffa' (d. 756), in having a single "book" (i.e., code) of administrative law, especially in matters pertaining to fiscal affairs.

Kitab al-Kharaj seeks to cull administrative and especially fiscal principles from prophetic and communal precedents; from the practices of the first Muslims, notably the Rightly Guided Caliphs; and also from Umayyad policies and the rulings and opinions of legal scholars. The introduction, set in the genre of advice literature, depicts the caliph as a figure who is entrusted by God with the just governance of His servants and who is thus mindful of the counsel of religious scholars. He can therefore expect the obedience of his subjects. The central Qur'anic theme of prosperity (ṣalāḥ) over corruption (fasād) is given political form in this work by being tied to the judgment (ra'y) of the caliph, which is understood to be the mechanism ensuring the achievement of God's will for human society.

This notion is reflected throughout the body of the work, notably in the reiterated confirmation of the authority of the caliph to make and change laws where no clearly revealed precedent exists, especially when doing so serves the interests of Muslims. For example, Abu Yusuf demonstrates that while the status of land in Arabia has been set by prophetic precedent, the caliph is free to adjust taxes as he sees fit for the sake of the public welfare by encouraging cultivation on parcels of land granted to dynastic officials or military commanders: "Do what you judge to be of greater interest for Muslims and more generally beneficial, for both the elite and the masses." Echoing Umayyad sentiment, Abu Yusuf posits that the caliphate, successor to the prophetic office, is indispensable for the political coherency of the abode of Islam, including its non-Muslim elements. The point is that the common good is the purpose of rule, making it worthy of religious obedience.

This early attempt to cast administrative policy as part of Islam's religious purview had far-reaching consequences, giving administrative rulings a firmer grounding in the jurisprudence of Islam (hukm kitābī mardūd ilā uṣūl al-fiqh, as Qudama b. Ja'far would put it in the seventh section of his aforementioned work). Abbasid policies, such as a system of proportional taxation (muqāsama), could henceforth be associated with the practices of 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), the second of the Rightly Guided Caliphs. On a more theoretical level, it could be said that Abu Yusuf sowed the seeds for the later Hanafi view that governance in Islam is advanced by the ruler's assessment of the public interest (maṣlaḥa), even if it cannot be tied to a particular shari'a precedent (dalīl juz'ī). In general, then, Abu Yusuf paved the way for the idea that policy making in Islam—including the role of shari'a in the process—is a function of principles and not only precedents.

See also Abu Hanifa (699–767); jurisprudence; taxation

Further Reading

Abu Yusuf, Kitab al-Kharaj, edited by I. 'Abbas, 1985; A. Ben Shemesh, Abu Yusuf's Kitab al-Kharaj, 1969; N. Calder, Studies in Early Muslim Jurisprudence, 1993; M. al-Kawthari, Husn al-Taqadi fi Sirat al-Imam Abi Yusuf al-Qadi, 1948; Ibn Nadim, al-Fihrist, edited by Yusuf 'Ali Tawil, 1996.

PAUL L. HECK

advice

Advice (naṣīḥa) usually implies counsel offered to a ruler to guide him in governing the realm. Islam has also produced a robust heritage of spiritual advice—a kind of mentoring on the path to God, as exemplified in al-Wasaya wa-l-Nasa'ih (Testimonies and advices) by Abu 'Abdallah al-Harith al-Muhasibi (d. 857) and Ayyuha al-Walad (Letter to a disciple) by Ghazali (d. 1111). In general, however, the term refers to political advice for rulers responsible for the affairs and interests of this world. A genre of literature arose around the term with the aim of explaining the art and nature of dynastic rule. A wide range of figures—administrative and court officials, religious scholars, litterateurs, spiritual masters, and philosophers—tried their hand at this genre. The most celebrated examples include Siyasatnama (Political administration) by the Seljuq vizier Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092), Nasihat al-Muluk (Advice for rulers) by Ghazali, and al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (The book of governance according to the shari'a) by Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328). Despite varied emphases (some works stress pragmatic considerations, whereas others stress piety), the attempt to formulate a model of effective and virtuous governance (i.e., rule pleasing to God) is common to the genre as a whole.

Some religious scholars did try to preserve principles of communal consensus and election when it came to political authority, but Muslim dynasties generally operated according to the divine right of kings (i.e., hereditary rule by a single family); authority implied a system of power based on a hierarchy of personal relations alongside administrative institutions as organs of governance. Yet political authority in this premodern form was still accountable to a set of expectations as elaborated in the genre of advice literature. This literature therefore had a constitutional purpose, applying basic assumptions and norms of governance in Islam to both the person of the ruler and the organization of the polity as a whole. Advice literature, which combined humanistic ethics and divinely revealed wisdom, was not simply a catch-all cultural reservoir but represented a distinct body of knowledge for realizing just and prosperous rule—a kind of premodern political science.

The Qur'an speaks of prophets extending advice to the ruling elite (mala'), who invariably dismiss it, jeopardizing not only their standing before God but also their standing among their subjects. (Echoing this, a canonical hadith speaks of religion as naṣīḥa in the sense of sincere devotion—to God, his book, his messenger, and both leaders and commoners alike among the Muslims.) In the Qur'anic narrative, this failure to comply with prophetic mentoring results in corruption (fasād) and, eventually, political demise, as opposed to the righteous prosperity (salāh) God intends for human society. In the absence of revealed directives on the constitution of such rule, the Qur'anic narrative thus encouraged Muslims to consider nonrevealed (i.e., secular) sources of advice, notably the works of Perso-Sasanian and Greco-Hellenistic provenance, which greatly contributed to the shaping of Muslim understanding of the characteristics of good governance. Alexander and his philosophical advisor, Aristotle, and Anushirvan and his ministerial counselor, Buzurgmihr, were often held up as exemplars of successful rule because they heeded the advice of the learned. Competence in administering justice was emphasized over personal piety, and an adage had it that rule could last with impiety but not with injustice.

Advice was delivered in the form of letters and treatises; two early pioneers in these forms were 'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib (d. 750) and Ibn al-Muqaffa' (d. 756), high-ranking secretaries in caliphal employ. Another form was the testimony (waṣ(iyya) of a ruler to his successor. This testimony functioned as a quasi-constitution of the dynastic rule in question, elucidating a theory of governance (usually the necessity of strong rule), the mechanisms of effective statecraft, and the intellectual and moral virtues expected of the ruler so as to be able to undertake the appropriate actions to secure the harmony and prosperity of the realm. Such actions typically included preserving law and order, ensuring justice, and fostering economic activity; managing both commoners and elites, including his own court servitors, administrative personnel, and military commanders; and protecting and promoting orthodox religion (another key component of successful rule), along with justice, which generated political solidarity and good behavior among the subjects.

From the eighth-century treatise of Abu Yusuf (d. 798), chief judge under the Abbasid caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809), to the 19th-century treatise of Khayr al-Din al-Tunisi (d. 1890), a high-ranking Ottoman official, advice was offered with the aim of promoting prosperity (salāḥ)—that is, the worldly interests (maṣāliḥ, sing. maṣlaḥa) of Muslim society—by methods above and beyond shari'a considerations. The ideal image of the Muslim ruler in advice literature did not look so much to prophetic descent or membership in Quraysh (the influential and respected tribe at the beginnings of Islam) as the essential criterion of governance in Islam (such was the concern of sectarian literature, kutub al-firaq). Rather, justice made a ruler worthy of being called the shadow of God on Earth insofar as the office he occupied existed to ensure God's purposes for Muslim society by permitting people to live in harmony and pursue their livelihood in peace. Advice literature, then, formed an important complement to shari'a in decision making relevant to the common good in Muslim society. Indeed, the genre of political advice can be said to have indirectly influenced a greater rationalization of the juristic conceptualization of the public purposes of shari'a (maqāṣid al-shari'a), as can be seen in Ghiyath al-Umam (Salvation of the nations) by the celebrated Ash'ari scholar of theology Juwayni (d. 1085).

It is then in the genre of advice literature—even in the case of the aforementioned work of Ibn Taymiyya (which is sometimes seen as driven by pious concerns more than political considerations)—that the idea of rule as a function of the common good is nurtured in Islam. This scenario changed dramatically with the introduction of the nation-state in place of the dynasty as ruler of Muslim society. Advice ceased to be the preserve of the learned elite and became, at least in principle, the work of the electorate (i.e., national citizenry). The purpose of rule here is not virtuous governance per se but rather technical expertise in protecting and promoting political interests—an idea that is not necessarily at odds with the Qur'anic goal of bringing about a just prosperity for believers. The legacy of advice literature, even if no longer produced in its traditional form, is no longer irrelevant to Muslim society, for it establishes an important "secular" aspect to rule in Islam. That is, while the Qur'an called for justice and prosperity, it did not spell out how to achieve such things, which, it would seem, were left to human resources to determine. Thus, advice to rulers, a nonrevealed genre of literature, sought to respond to a goal implied by the revealed message—namely, successful politics (i.e., good governance) as a divine mandate. Rule was never equated with religion but rather cast as its twin, making God's purposes for human society possible in this world. In contrast, the postcolonial moment has seen many Islamist voices advocating for the largely rejected idea in classical Islam that human rule is to be adjudicated and constitutionally defined in terms of shari'a rather than naẓṭha, thereby turning rule into religion—that is, assuming rule in Islam as a product of the revealed message alone, apart from cultural considerations. This is to ignore the long-standing assumption of advice literature, referred to earlier, that rule and religion are not the same even if working in complementary fashion for the overall welfare of Muslim society.

See also Mirrors for Princes

Further Reading

Paul L. Heck, "The Role of Law in 'Abbasid Political Thought: From Ibn al-Muqaffa' (d. 139/756) to Qudāma b. Ja'far (d. 337/948)," in Occasional Papers of the School of Abbasid Studies, Cambridge, 6–10 July 2002, edited by J. E. Montgomery, 2004; Louise Marlow and Beatrice Gruendler, eds., Writers and Rulers: Perspectives on Their Relationship from Abbasid to Safavid Times, 2004.

PAUL L. HECK

Advice-to-Kings. See Mirrors for Princes

al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97)

Best known as the founder and prime mover of Pan-Islamism in the second half of the 19th century, Afghani was born in Iran and educated in traditional Shi'i religious schools both in Iran and in the holy centers of Ottoman Iraq. His formal education consisted of Islamic jurisprudence, hadith traditions, and Arabic language, but he was mainly interested in mysticism, philosophy, and theological concepts and schools deemed controversial, if not heretical, by the 'ulama' establishment. He was mostly attracted to the ideas of Sadr al-Din al-Shirazi, known as Mulla Sadra (1572–1640), the brilliant thinker who attempted to reconcile mysticism and philosophy while satisfying religious fundamental principles, and Shaykh Ahmad al-Ahsa'i (1753–1826), the founder of Shaikhism, an important 19th-century speculative Shi'i school of theology that inspired successive generations of prominent Iranian intellectuals. Afghani was also allegedly sympathetic to Babism, the mid-19th-century revolutionary religious movement, but there is no evidence that he ever adhered to its doctrines.

In his late teens, Afghani fled Iran. His political consciousness was then awakened when he visited British-ruled India at the time of the Indian Rebellion of 1857, a revolt that was largely supported by India's Muslim population. Witnessing the event left its mark on the impressionable youth, and the resultant anti-British sentiment defined his future political career as a champion of Muslim struggle against imperialism. In 1870, Afghani arrived in Istanbul by way of Afghanistan and Arabia. At the university, a lecture in which he praised philosophy and discussed prophecy in Islamic philosophical terms led to his expulsion from the Ottoman capital upon the order of the 'ulama'. He then went to Cairo, where over the course of eight years he acquired a solid reputation as the most prominent Islamic intellectual and political leader of his time. In fact, his assumed Afghan Sunni identity dates back to this period, spread by his disciples, who most probably simply believed what he had told them. A Sunni identity proved to be an expedient passport for Afghani, one that facilitated an easy move in Arab and Turkish circles. He rallied around him a small but potentially influential group of Egyptian and Syrian intellectuals, including Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Rida, two important turn-of-the-century Muslim Arab religious reformers. In his lectures and private discussions, he severely criticized traditional Islamic teachings, holding the 'ulama' establishment responsible for Muslim intellectual decline. He called for a profound revision of the curriculum of Azhar University so it would include philosophy and science. He likewise directed his relentless assault at the ruling elite, accusing them of corruption, and his political message found eager reception among young Egyptian activists. It was also in Cairo that Afghani joined several British and French Masonic lodges and even attempted to independently establish one. His political intrigues within the Masonic lodges and his anti-British and antigovernment activities, in addition to his teachings declared heretical by the authorities of Azhar University, led to his expulsion from Egypt in 1879. He went back to India, where he stayed until 1882, when he went to Europe.

In Paris, Afghani published, together with fellow political exile Muhammad 'Abduh, an Arabic journal, al-'Urwa al-Wuthqa (The firmest bond), which became an important organ for a Pan-Islamic, anti-imperialist movement. It promoted religious institutional reforms to help raise a new generation of Muslims who would be aware of the social and political exigencies of modern times. Seeking solutions to the problems resulting from European encroachment in the Muslim world, Afghani revived the old concept of the Islamic community as a sociopolitical entity. He rose in defense of Islam, which the French freethinking writer Ernest Renan denounced as a backward faith, incompatible with science and responsible for Muslim social and intellectual decline. In London, he met Wilfrid Blunt, a pro-Arab amateur politician with important connections to British government officials to whom Afghani was introduced. He also traveled in the Russian Empire for a period of two years, visiting Moscow and the Muslim regions in the Caucasus and Azerbaijan. Back in Iran in 1886 and 1887 and then again at the end of 1889, he rapidly involved himself with the opposition movement, led by some individual members of the 'ulama' and wealthy merchants who were rising against government corruption and the sale of national economic assets through a growing number of concessions to foreigners. He also began to organize a mass revolt movement until he was once again forced into exile.

From London and Istanbul, where he spent the last six years of his life, Afghani relentlessly called for the formation in Iran of a united political opposition front composed of members of the 'ulama', the merchant class, and the intelligentsia to combat royal tyranny and corruption. He collaborated with other political exiles and religious dissidents at home and abroad to incite the 'ulama' to renounce the time-honored tradition of political quietism and lead the opposition movement against the shah's abuse of power. Two personal letters, one addressed to the leading mujtahid (legist) in Samarra and the other to a prominent mujtahid in Tehran, display Afghani's ambiguous attitude toward the religious leadership of his time. In both letters, he refers to them in highly exalted terms, acknowledging them as the representatives of the Hidden Imam, divinely appointed to lead the nation and rescue religion from the evildoing of the corrupt shah. He urges them to take action and exercise their power in deposing the "pharaoh" and destroying the "roots of tyranny," restoring "the creed of divine justice," and reviving the Islamic government. The entire nation, put under the control of the "party of the 'ulama'," would then enjoy divine protection. Thus Afghani forcefully promoted the idea that, during the Imam's occultation, the mujtahids' authority overpowers that of the temporal ruler. This idea, doctrinally well founded as it may be, was never before exploited by the 'ulama' establishment in either the Safavid or Qajar eras. It was Afghani and his collaborators who first enunciated in explicit terms the religious basis for potential 'ulama' claims to political power. Afghani's letters, while deferential in tone, also sharply criticize the Iranian 'ulama"s political acquiescence bordering on servility; he blames their "silence" for the nation's defenselessness in the hands of foreign powers. Simultaneously flattering and angry and almost threatening, his appeal hardly conceals his manipulative intentions to mobilize the 'ulama' for his own political ends.

The attempt to mobilize the religious leadership for a political rebellion was first successfully tested with the campaign to revoke the concession the shah had granted a British company for the curing and sale of Iran's entire tobacco crop. At the time of the Tobacco Protests (1891–92), Afghani was living abroad, and his own role in the protest was not as prominent as his contemporary and subsequent admirers claimed it to be, but his propaganda and rhetorical skills in staging a mass movement of protest—the first of its kind in modern Iranian history—left a lasting impact. The repeal of the concession marked the peak of Afghani's career as a revolutionary leader. His Pan-Islamic scheme to forge the political unification of all Muslims under the rule of one Muslim monarch, however, proved to be a failure: he was unable to win the ruler's confidence in Afghanistan, Egypt, or Iran. In Istanbul, Sultan Abdülhamid II, initially attracted to the idea of assuming the old Islamic title of caliph, granted his royal patronage until he, too, grew suspicious of the entire movement. Afghani was kept under close surveillance until he died of cancer, surrounded by his faithful followers, who were to keep up his spirit of revolt. At home and abroad, his so-called Pan-Islamic society included political malcontents, freethinkers and former Babis, social reformers and revolutionaries, as well as opponents of the current minister in power in Iran.

Afghani failed to influence the 'ulama' institutional establishment as he did the activist religious dissidents, who participated in the Tobacco Protests and most subsequent political events. High-ranking mujtahids, including Mirza Muhammad Hasan al-Shirazi, in whose name the fatwa banning the consumption of tobacco was issued in protest against the concession, and Mirza Hasan Ashtiyani, who led the revolt in Tehran, did not lay claim to political authority upon Afghani's incitement, despite their role in the movement. Threat of prolonged violence in Tehran realigned Ashtiyani with government forces to restore order. On the other hand, Afghani's reminder of the mujtahids' doctrinal authority was an expedient tactic to appeal to their support for a short-term goal: to arouse public opinion for a mass movement of popular revolt. Mass appeal, he believed, could be successful only in the name of religion, because rational arguments could only be understood by the few educated individuals. He and Malkum Khan, the Armenian convert to Islam who played a major role in the reformist movement, as well as their respective followers, did not seriously consider establishing a theocracy or even an 'ulama'-dominated government. His Pan-Islamism, formed with a group of disparate political and religious dissidents, never became a movement with its own organization, program, and leadership. The so-called Pan-Islamist group increasingly turned their attention to social and political causes, joining the lay reform-minded intelligentsia or more radical revolutionaries. They used the mosques and madrasas as effective forums for the dissemination of new ideas.

Inspired by medieval Islamic philosophy and Shaikhism, Afghani turned against the orthodox teachings of religion. In a notorious lecture delivered in Istanbul in 1870, he defined prophecy as a craft nobler than yet similar to any other. However, he judged philosophy to be loftier and universal. He argued that while prophecy is divinely inspired and varies according to times and conditions, philosophy is based on reason and is needed at all times to enlighten humanity. The Prophet is infallible, the philosopher is not, but the philosopher is the torchbearer leading the way out of ignorance. Elsewhere he attacked institutionalized religion for its anti-intellectualism and its stifling effect on scientific and philosophic inquiry. In his famous Answer to Renan, written in Paris, he specifically distinguished Islam from "the manner in which it was propagated in the world" and referred to Islamic science and philosophy as evidence of its past brilliant achievements despite the "heavy yoke" imposed on free investigation by the jurists, the guardians of the holy law. In most of his Persian essays, Afghani relentlessly called for the "renewal" of Muslim societies and culture, urging people to liberate themselves from the "heaviest and most humiliating yokes" imposed upon them by their educators. With the passage of time and his travels to Europe, he also came to denounce the very schools of Islamic philosophy and speculative theology he had earlier admired, although he often relapsed into traditional modes of thinking, attempting to reconcile science, philosophy, and religion in a manner reminiscent of the medieval philosophers. He condemned traditional Islamic thought for ignoring relevant social and political issues. He hailed European science and technology, which he believed to be the source of European world power. Assailing the 'ulama' for discouraging the faithful from learning from the non-Muslims, he wrote in one of his essays, "They have not understood that science is that noble thing that has no connection with any nation, and is not distinguished by anything but itself. . . . Men must be related to science, not science to men." It is this intellectual standing that most defines the legacy of Afghani's activism. He universalized the concept of 'ilm by divorcing it from the traditional Islamic conception of it as the knowledge of the divine and related religious disciplines, which does not distinguish the sacred from the profane. In fact, he desacralized the concept of 'ilm as no Muslim philosopher ever had, laying the ground for the secular reforms undertaken by the next generation of lay intellectuals and educators.

Afghani's dedication was not to the "philosophic outlook" in the traditional sense, as Muhsin Mahdi, the late scholar of Islamic philosophy, asserted. Far from being a philosopher, Afghani was a social critic and a polemicist who devoted his most vehement critiques to the 'ulama' establishment he held responsible for the Muslims' cultural and political stagnation. Yet, paradoxically, he appealed to them in deference to their religious authority and social status as the guardians of the holy law when he needed them most for his political activities. That may explain in part his tendencies to argue inconsistently and to contradict himself, leading scholars to depict him either as a true believer, a last representative of the Islamic philosophical tradition, an irreligious opportunist, an Islamic deist, or a genuine nationalist rising in defense of the Muslim struggle against European imperialism.

See also 'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); Pan-Islamism; revival and reform; Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935)

Further Reading

Sayyid Jamal al-Din Asadabudi al-Afghani, Maqalat-i Jamaliyya, 1933; Mangol Bayat, Mysticism and Dissent: Socioreligious Thought in Qajar Iran, 1982; Sir Hamilton A. R. Gibb, Modern Trends in Islam, 1947; Nikki R. Keddie, Sayyid Jamāl ad-Dīn "al-Afghānī": A Political Biography, 1972; Elie Kedourie, Afghani and 'Abduh: An Essay on Religious Unbelief and Political Activism in Modern Islam, 1966.

MANGOL BAYAT

Afghanistan

Landlocked between Iran, Pakistan, the former Soviet Central Asian Republics, and, at its narrowest northeastern tip, China, today's Islamic Republic of Afghanistan covers a mostly mountainous and arid territory slightly larger than France, with a population estimated in 2010 at about 30 million. Afghans today regard themselves as a nation distinct from neighboring Iran and Pakistan, however divided they may be by religion, ethnicity, or other factors.

In religious terms, most Afghans are Sunni Muslims of the Hanafi rite, but Shi'is (both Imami and Isma'ili) constitute a significant minority (some 19 percent as of 2010, according to the CIA World Factbook, for example). In ethnic terms, 42 percent of Afghans are Pashtuns, whose tribal values, code of honor, and rivalries between chiefs make up Pashtūnwalī, "the Pashtun way," perceived as seamlessly interwoven with Sunnat, or "Islamic tradition." The Pashtuns were politically divided by successive 19th-century redefinitions of the Afghan-Indian Frontier, which culminated in the "Durand Line" in 1893 that bisected tribal territories, as drawn by British civil servant Sir Mortimer Durand to ensure British-Indian military control of strategic ridges overlooking the eastern Afghan valleys. Nearly twice as many Pashtuns as in Afghanistan now live to the east of the Durand Line, in modern Pakistan. Within Afghanistan, the Pashtuns have long been divided by the rivalry between two main tribal groups: the Durrani and the Ghilzai.

About 30 percent of Afghans are Tajiks, who are best described as Eastern Iranians. Whereas Pashtuns speak Pashto, Tajiks speak Persian (Dari) and are ethnically related to the Tajiks in the neighboring Republic of Tajikistan and to the large Tajik minority in (predominantly Turkic) Uzbekistan. A third major ethnic group is the Persian-speaking Hazara (mostly Shi'i), who comprise roughly 9 percent of the population and whose descent from the Mongols shows in their distinctly "Asian" features. There are also Turkic-speaking Uzbeks (mostly Hanafis) in Afghanistan, as well as other minorities, such as the Turkmen, Baloch, Qizilbash, Nuristani, and a small number of Sikhs. Tribal political behavior is still extremely important in Afghanistan and northwest Pakistan, coloring religious language and affecting Great Power strategies—such as when both India and post-Soviet Russia between 1994 and 2001, and the United States in late 2001, chose to support an essentially non-Pashtun "Northern Alliance" (mainly ethnic Tajiks, Uzbeks, and Hazaras) against the largely Pashtun Taliban, themselves supplied until September 2001 by Pakistan. Ethnic, sectarian, and territorial splits and resentments—notably the Afghan kingdom's (then Indian- and Soviet-supported) official irredentist refusal to recognize either the Durand Line or Pakistan's retention of the eastern Pashtun zones after British withdrawal from the region in 1947—help explain the region's many conflicts in the recent past and present alike.

The concept of Afghanistan as a nation-state was fostered during the reign of King Amanullah (r. 1919–29). Advised by his mentor Mahmud Tarzi (1866–1935), he committed his government to radical modernizing or "Westernizing" reform along lines broadly similar to those of Atatürk in Turkey and Reza Shah in Iran. However, unlike his counterparts, Amanullah did not enjoy a long tradition of a centralized bureaucratic government buttressed by a powerful army: the king himself was forced into exile in the face of conservative tribal uprisings endorsed by leading clerics in 1929. Nevertheless, the legacy of Amanullah's ideals proved tenaciously successful among the small, urbanized minority. Many of Amanullah's reforms—in education, law, and women's rights and his insistence that all the country's citizens be named "Afghans" (a term reserved before 1923 to the Pashtuns only)—were thus cautiously reintroduced under kings Nadir (r. 1929–33) and Zahir (r. 1933–73) and much enforced under President Daoud (r. 1973–78). The Afghan nationalist idea notably withstood the repeated shocks of a Marxist-Leninist military coup (1978); a Soviet invasion (1979–89); a post-Soviet civil war involving non-Pashtun ethnic factions against Pashtun ones, the latter supported by the Pakistani military high command in the name of endangered Pashtun ethnic supremacy and strict Sunni orthodoxy (1989–96); a Pakistani-supported sectarian and ethnic-based Sunni Pashtun dictatorship (1996–2001); and military intervention from the United States and NATO (since 2001).

Afghans define themselves with reference to their largely successful resistance to British power in the three Anglo-Afghan Wars (1838–42, 1878–80, and 1919), in which they see themselves as having defended their fatherland and Islam alike. Heroes and villains from Islamists to communists are routinely compared to archetypes of the "Three Wars," such as Akbar Khan (the resistance hero of 1838–42), Shah Shuja' (the archtraitor of 1838–42), Malalai (the tribal heroine at the battle of Maiwand in 1880), and King Amanullah (the winner of full independence from Britain in 1919). The victories over the British at Gandamak in 1842 and at Maiwand in 1880, as well as the Independence Treaty of 1919, are commemorated in anniversaries and street names, and every Afghan leader since 1842 has dreaded identification as a treacherous Shah Shuja', relying on foreign troops.

The contemporary Afghan situation can best be understood in the light of this legacy of resistance against foreigners. Military technology, however superior, has never been able to break the recalcitrance of this tribal society, which identifies itself in strongly religious terms and has resisted centralized control when non-Muslim foreigners have threatened its autonomy, either directly or through a local puppet government. In such circumstances, the Afghan response would be to withhold obedience, deny collaboration, and cut communications to the accompaniment of religious denunciation. Targeted assassination of would-be collaborators (usually by members of their own clans to prevent blood feuds) would further reduce the pool of local administrative or military personnel available to the occupying power.

Afghanistan entered the 20th century as one of the two or three most conservative Islamic societies on Earth, a mountain bastion of traditional autonomous tribalism surrounding a handful of lowland towns under royal control. Tensions between tradition, tribalism, Islam, and modernity that continued under various rulers after Amanullah resulted in the development of a somewhat schizophrenic culture with a minuscule autocratic elite in Kabul dedicated to slow Westernizing modernization behind a facade of Islamic conservatism. In 1964, Afghanistan became a parliamentary monarchy with a constitution, free speech and press, political parties, and elected prime ministers. Nostalgic Afghans regard the Constitutional Period (1964–73) as their last years of peace before the gathering storm. In the course of this storm, the Communist Party, already a major ideological force in the capital and in the army, split into ethnic factions (the Durrani Pashtun Parcham, or "Banner," and the Ghilzai Pashtun Khalq, or "People," both pro-Soviet, and the non-Pashtun Shu'la-yi Jawed, or "Eternal Flame," pro-Chinese), while at the same time diverse Islamist opposition groups formed (e.g., Jamiat-i Islami, mainly Tajik, and Hizb-i Islami, mainly Pashtun, which in turn also further factionalized), all of which made Afghanistan amenable to foreign manipulation.

The Soviet occupation of Afghanistan in the 1980s provoked disparate Afghan factions to rise in generalized anti-Soviet insurgency in the name of both nationalism and Islam, with the direct backing of the United States, China, Pakistan, and Arab allies. But the Afghan mujahidin, or "holy warriors," were never united, again splitting along ethnic or sectarian lines, and after the defeat and withdrawal of the Soviet Army in 1989, their infighting disintegrated into factional war until the Taliban (Students) seized power in Kabul in 1996 with decisive Pakistani military support, claiming to restore stability and strict Sunni Islamic law. The Taliban, a movement of conservative Pashtun madrasa (Muslim school) students who had participated in the war against Soviet occupation, claimed control of over 90 percent of the Afghan territory by the mid-1990s but failed to receive international recognition (except by Pakistan, United Arab Emirates, and Saudi Arabia). In Afghanistan, the Taliban were opposed by what Pakistan called the "Northern Alliance" of mainly non-Pashtun ethnic groups, which, with foreign help, successfully resisted a complete Taliban takeover. Meanwhile, Islamists from outside Afghanistan (mainly the Arab world) who had participated in the jihad against the Soviets found refuge under the Taliban in Afghanistan. Having identified U.S. foreign policy as the root of all problems in the Muslim world, they initiated attacks on U.S. interests from Afghan soil, resulting in the U.S.-led invasion of Afghanistan and global "war on terror" after the attacks on the United States on September 11, 2001. Whether Afghanistan's hitherto remarkable resilience as a nation-state will survive remains to be seen.

See also Central Asia; Mulla 'Umar (b. 1959); Taliban

Further Reading

Thomas Barfield, Afghanistan, a Cultural and Political History, 2010; Michael Barry, Kabul's Long Shadows, Historical Perspectives, 2011; Idem, Le royaume de l'insolence, 2011; Louis Dupree, Afghanistan, 1980; Mountstuart Elphinstone, An Account of the Kingdom of Caubul, 1815; Vartan Gregorian, The Emergence of Modern Afghanistan (1838–1946), 1969; Leon Poullada, Reform and Rebellion in Afghanistan, 1919–1929, 1973; Ahmed Rashid, Taliban: Islam, Oil and the New Great Game in Central Asia, 2001.

MICHAEL BARRY

'Aflaq, Michel (1910–89)

A leading Arab intellectual, Michel 'Aflaq was a cofounder and chief ideologue of the Ba'th Party, which, while largely a secular nationalist movement, incorporated Islam as an elemental feature of Arab identity and culture.

Born into a commercial, middle-class, Orthodox Christian family in a suburb of Damascus in the last years of the Ottoman Empire, 'Aflaq came of age in the successor state of Syria during the French colonial rule of the interwar period. He was educated in the city's Orthodox Christian schools until the age of 19, whereupon he earned a scholarship to attend the University of Paris, Sorbonne (1929–34). Exposed to the intellectual and political ferment of Paris in the 1930s, 'Aflaq was increasingly drawn to nationalism, radical leftist politics, and the ideas of the French philosopher Henri Bergson, whose notion of élan vital is reproduced in 'Aflaq's concept of "Arab Spirit." Returning to Damascus upon completing his studies in history and philosophy, he taught at the city's main high school and formed, with fellow teacher Salah al-Din al-Bitar (d. 1980), a political discussion group of like-minded students and young professionals.

The discussion group grew in the early 1940s into a political party, the Hizb al-Ba'th al-'Arabi al-Ishtiraki (Party of Arab Socialist Rebirth), and it held its first congress in 1947, in which 'Aflaq was elected 'amid (dean) and served as its chief ideologue until his death. Ba'thism became the state ideology in Syria (1963) and Iraq (1968) and exerted tremendous power over the shape of midcentury nationalism throughout the Arab world, primarily in various Arab unity initiatives. 'Aflaq's influence waned in the 1970s with the rise of military dictatorships in both Syria and Iraq and a regional disaffection with nationalism; nevertheless, elements of his thought persist in the region's political culture, primarily in educational and religious policies.

In 'Aflaq's hands, Ba'thism was less a coherent political system than an eclectic mixture of fascism, Leninism, liberalism, and romantic nationalism. Among its central tenets was the assertion of a secular basis for society, making Arab identity the only prerequisite for membership in an ultramodern, pan-Arab national community. What made an Arab, and by extension the Arab nation, was the "Arab Spirit," and all Arabs—especially members of non-Muslim minorities, like 'Aflaq himself—were equal citizens of that nation.

Crucial to 'Aflaq's thought, and in a departure from the ideas of other non-Muslim Arab nationalists, is that Islam is the foundation of Arab nationalism. However, in his version, Islam was circumscribed as a discrete historical object and a transhistorical constituent element of the "Arab Spirit"; it could not, however, serve as the basis for a political system. This contrasts markedly with contemporary Salafists and mainstream Islamic theologians in its abandonment of the living and historically transcendent nature of Islam. By historicizing Islam as the definitive cultural practice of the Arab, 'Aflaq may have asserted a central place for Islam in Arab identity, but that place would be in the service of a largely secular, nationalist, and socialist agenda; any form of Islamic political theory was, by the same measure, inherently illiberal and antimodern.

A valediction he delivered at the Syrian National University in 1943 titled "In Remembrance of the Arab Prophet," which appears in the 1959 collection of his essays and speeches, Fī Sabīl al-Ba'th (For the cause of the Ba'th), confirms this role of Islam. 'Aflaq argued that "to the Arabs, the Islamic movement embodied in the life of [Muhammad] is not merely a historical occurrence . . . rather, it is at the very depths . . . and bound fiercely into the life of the Arab." He then concluded, "Islam has renewed the Arab nationality and completed it." Nevertheless, 'Aflaq's writings evidenced only a rudimentary understanding of the religion. In practice, Ba'thists were openly hostile to Islamism and conservative Islam and tended to refuse political accommodation with either, employing Islamic symbols and rhetoric only during moments of political necessity.

A telling example of the way Ba'thists employed Islam is that upon his death in 1989, it was announced that 'Aflaq, who had lived in Iraq since 1975, had converted to Islam and taken the first name Ahmad. Although later confirmed by his children, it is widely believed that the conversion was a ploy by the regime of Saddam Hussein (d. 2006) to help bolster its religious credentials in the face of growing Islamist influence following the Iran-Iraq War (1980–88). It also allowed the Ba'thist state to memorialize the party's founder in a mosque-tomb complex, a building imbued with more religious significance than a traditional monument. After the 2003 U.S.-led occupation of Iraq, 'Aflaq's body was disinterred from the complex, which is situated near Hussein's former presidential palace and was used as barracks by a contingent of U.S. Marines.

See also Arab nationalism; Ba'th Party; Iraq; modernity; nationalism; secularism; socialism; Syria

Further Reading

Michel 'Aflaq, Fī Sabīl al-Ba'th, 1952; Hanna Batatu, The Old Social Classes and the Revolutionary Movements in Iraq, 1978; Eric Davis, Memories of State, 2005; John F. Devlin, "The Ba'th Party: Rise and Metamorphosis," The American Historical Review 96, no. 5 (1991); Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1962.

KEITH DAVID WATENPAUGH

Africa. See East Africa; North Africa; South Africa; West Africa

Aga Khan

The title of Aga Khan (also Agha Khan), an honorific of Turkic-Mongol-Persian origins meaning "lord and master," was bestowed on the 46th Nizari Isma'ili imam, Hasan 'Ali Shah (1804–81), around 1820 by the contemporary Qajar monarch of Iran, Fath 'Ali Shah (r. 1797–1834). Thereafter, Nizari Isma'ili imams of Shi'i Muslims retained Aga Khan as a hereditary title, with Prince Karim Aga Khan IV, 49th imam, acceding to this position in 1957. He leads this Shi'i community officially designated as the "Shia Imami Ismaili Muslims," who are dispersed through more than 30 countries worldwide. Rooted in the teachings of the early Imami Shi'is, the Nizari imam's office is known as the imamate (or imāma) because it represents his hereditary authority as a descendant of the Prophet Muhammad through Muhammad's daughter Fatima and her husband, 'Ali (the first imam).

Hasan 'Ali Shah succeeded to the Isma'ili imamate upon the death of his father, Shah Khalil Allah, in 1817. By then, the Nizari imams had lived, as successors to their ancestors who ruled as the lords of Alamut, in different parts of Iran for more than seven centuries. Around 1820, Fath 'Ali Shah Qajar appointed the youthful Nizari imam to the governorship of Qum, gave him one of his daughters in marriage, and bestowed on him the honorific title of Aga Khan. After a prolonged conflict with the Qajar establishment, the first Aga Khan settled permanently in India in the 1840s. Subsequently, he preoccupied himself with defining the distinctive religious identity of his followers, especially those in South Asia known as the Khojas. The Nizari Isma'ilis frequently practiced taqiyya, or precautionary dissimulation, to protect themselves against persecution, disguising themselves variously as Sunnis, Sufis, Twelver Shi'is, or Hindus. As a result, their true religious identity was often obscured and confused.

The first Aga Khan's son and successor, 'Ali Shah Aga Khan II, led the community for a brief four-year period. Upon his death in 1885, his eight-year-old son, Sultan Muhammad Shah (1877–1957), succeeded to the Nizari Isma'ili imamate and became widely known, under his title of Aga Khan, as a Muslim reformer due to his prominent role in Indo-Muslim and international affairs. Guiding the Nizaris for 72 years as their 48th imam, Aga Khan III formulated numerous modernization policies and programs for his community while making further efforts to distinguish the Nizaris from other Muslims. The Nizari identity was specifically articulated in the constitutions that Aga Khan III promulgated for his followers, especially those in India, Pakistan, and East Africa. Reiterating the all-embracing authority of the imam and his office, these constitutions represented the personal law of the community, with articles on marriage, divorce, inheritance, and other matters.

Aga Khan III worked vigorously to reorganize his followers into a modern Muslim community with high standards of health, education, and social welfare, also paying special attention to the emancipation of Isma'ili women and their participation in community affairs. To implement his reforms, Aga Khan III developed a network of national and regional councils for the Nizaris of South Asia and East Africa. According to Nizari teachings, the concepts of dīn (religion) and dunyā (worldly affairs) are both integral components of the social order, and Aga

Khan III guided the religious and secular affairs of his followers, aiming to sustain a balance between these two dōmains of life. He often imparted his guidance through his speeches or farmāns (written edicts).

Aga Khan III designated his grandson, Karim, as his successor. Accordingly, Prince Karim Aga Khan IV succeeded to the imamate upon the death of his grandfather in 1957. Aga Khan IV continued and substantially extended the modernization policies of his grandfather, also developing a multitude of new programs and institutions of his own for the socioeconomic and educational benefit of his followers. At the same time, Aga Khan IV concerned himself with a variety of social, humanitarian, developmental, and cultural issues of wider interest to Muslims and citizens of Third World countries, especially Asia and Africa. With these objectives in mind, Aga Khan IV created a complex and global institutional network generally known as the Aga Khan Development Network.

Aga Khan IV closely supervised the spiritual and secular affairs of his community from his headquarters near Paris. He regularly visited his followers in different countries and gave them guidance by means of his own farmāns. He maintained the elaborate council system of communal organization developed by his grandfather and extended it into new regions in Europe and North America in recognition of the large-scale emigration of Nizaris from East Africa and South Asia to the West since the 1970s.

In 1986, Aga Khan IV issued a new universal constitution for all his followers throughout the world. The preamble of the new constitution, amended in 1998, affirmed all the fundamental Islamic beliefs and then specifically focused on the office of the imamate. It emphasized the imam's ta'līm, or authoritative teaching, which guides the Nizaris along the path of spiritual enlightenment as well as improved material life. Indeed, the new Isma'ili constitution stressed the all-important teaching and guiding role of the "imam of the time" by affirming that, by the virtue of his office and in accordance with the beliefs of the Nizari Isma'ilis, the imam enjoys full authority of governance in respect to all religious and communal matters of his followers. The office of the imamate thus provides the Nizari Isma'ilis with appropriate guidance and organizational structures to contextualize and practice their faith under changing circumstances.

See also imamate; Isma'ilis; Nizaris; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Aga Khan III, Sultān Muḥammad Shāh. Selected Speeches and Writings of Sir Sultan Muhammad Shah, 2 vols., edited by K. K. Aziz, 1997–98; Michel Boivin, La Rénovation du Shī'isme Ismaélien en Inde et au Pakistan, 2003; The Constitution of the Shia Imami Ismaili Muslims, 1986; Farhad Daftary, The Ismā'īlīs: Their History and Doctrines, 2nd ed., 2007; Willi Frischauer, The Aga Khans, 1970.

FARHAD DAFTARY

Ahmad, Israr (1932–2010)

Founder of the Islamic revolutionary movement Tanzeem-e-Islami (the Islamic Organization); the research, instructional, and outreach institute Anjuman Khuddam-ul-Qur'an Lahore (Society of the Servants of the Qur'an); and the populist Tehreek-e-Khilafat (Caliphate movement), Israr Ahmad is best known as a scholar of the Qur'an. Born in Hisar (Haryana, India) on April 26, 1932, he was attracted to the Muslim League before moving to Lahore, Pakistan, after partition in 1947. Influenced from a young age by the poet-philosopher Muhammad Iqbal (d. 1938), Ahmad became a sympathizer of the revivalist Mawdudi (d. 1979) and his religiopolitical movement Jama'at-i Islami, as well as an organizer for its student wing, while studying medicine at King Edward Medical College (1950–54). After graduating, Ahmad joined the Jama'at but resigned his membership in 1957 to pursue a popular revolution rather than engage in electoral politics.

Ahmad established himself as an activist-scholar through public lectures and workshops on the Qur'an (durās-i Qur'ān). Soon after receiving a master's degree in Islamic studies from Karachi University in 1965, he published two short Urdu pamphlets (translated into English) that became the cornerstones of his future endeavors. The first, Obligations Muslims Owe to the Qur'ān, states that the Qur'an is for the soul what nourishment is for the body. Rather than celebrating the glory of the Qur'an through hollow praise, Ahmad writes that Muslims should recite and study it so as to establish its laws in society and preach its tenets to humanity. The second work, Islamic Renaissance: The Real Task Ahead, attributes the failure of revivalist movements such as the Jama'at to the pride of place they give to the legal and political aspects of Islam over its inner dimensions of faith. Ahmad argues that for any Islamic movement to be successful, it must first revitalize the faith of both the masses and intelligentsia by translating and preaching the Qur'an at the popular and philosophical levels.

In devotion to his cause, Ahmad relinquished his medical practice in 1971. He founded the Anjuman in 1972 to fulfill his vision of an intellectual "Islamic Renaissance" and the Tanzeem in 1975 as a revolutionary movement to establish Islamic ethics and law (shari'a) in economics, polity, and society, first in Pakistan and then across the globe. In the early 1980s, during Zia-ul-Haq's regime (1977–88), Ahmad delivered a series of lectures interpreting the life of the Prophet as a revolutionary movement, drawing inspiration from the Indian nationalist leader Mohandas Gandhi and Ayatollah Khomeini's Islamic revolution in Iran. Concerned that his message was not reaching the masses, Ahmad launched the Tehreek-e-Khilafat as a populist front in 1991. Ahmad upheld a nonviolent strategy of civil disobedience and advocated for a political framework identical to that of the United States, complete with its system of checks and balances but with three constitutional provisions: (1) sovereignty would belong to God and not the people, (2) no law could be made contrary to the Qur'an and sunna, and (3) non-Muslims would be protected minorities rather than equal citizens. Ahmad couched his political thought within a comprehensive theology, cosmogony, and philosophy of history by synthesizing elements of modern thought with the Qur'an and Islamic traditions. He traced his intellectual roots to five influences: (1) traditional Islamic consensus (ijmā'-i ahl al-sunna wa-l-jamā'a, Deoband), (2) revivalist thought (iqāmat-i dīn, Mawdudi), (3) thematic cohesion in the Qur'an (nazm-i Qur'ān, Amin Ahsan Islahi, d. 1997), (4) perennial wisdom in the Qur'an (hikmat-i Qur'ān, Iqbal), and (5) his scientific training. In two larger Urdu works, Jama'at-i Shaykh al-Hind awr Tanzim-i Islami (The party of Shaykh al-Hind and the Tanzeem) and Da'wat-i Ruju' ila al-Qur'an ka Manzar wa-pass Manzar (The historical background of the movement for the return to the Qur'an), Ahmad outlined the development and continuity of Islamic revivalist thought in India from the second Islamic millennium until his time. According to Ahmad, the center of Islamic thought shifted from the Arab world to the Indian subcontinent in the 17th century with the advent of the renewer (mujaddid) Ahmad Sirhindi (d. 1624). Ahmad viewed his own contribution as one in a series toward the global revival of Islam, which he believed was destined to emerge from the chosen land of Pakistan at the end of time.

Although the Tanzeem established branches in other parts of the world, including North America, it remained politically insignificant. Having lectured widely in public forums and on television, Ahmad became known primarily as a wise teacher of the Qur'an rather than a jurist-scholar (faqīh) or revolutionary leader. In 2002, he transferred leadership of the Tanzeem to his second son but remained president of the Anjuman until his death due to natural causes on April 14, 2010. The Anjuman has carefully recorded and catalogued his various speeches and tracts for dissemination.

See also fundamentalism; Jama'at-i Islami; Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la (1903–79); nonviolence; Pakistan

Further Reading

Shagufta Ahmad, Dr. Israr Ahmad's Political Thought and Activities, 1996; Tanzeem-e-Islami, http://www.tanzeem.org.

MAHAN MIRZA

Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855)

Abu 'Abdallah Ahmad b. Muhammad, hadith collector and critic, jurist, and dogmatist, was born in Baghdad in 780 and died there in 855. Premodern sources refer to him as "Abu 'Abdallah," "Ibn Hanbal," "Ahmad b. Hanbal," or most often simply "Ahmad." He was descended from Arabs who had gone to Khurasan (now northeastern Iran and parts of Afghanistan) and served the Abbasids. At the age of 15, he dedicated himself to the study of the hadith. He first studied in Baghdad, where he had grown up, and then traveled to Kufa, Basra, Mecca, Yemen, and Syria before finally settling down in Baghdad after 820. His first and second wives died after bearing one son each, and a concubine then bore him several more children. They all lived together in a large house, supported mainly by commercial and probably residential properties in Baghdad.

Ibn Hanbal famously suffered in the inquisition (miḥna) that the Abbasid caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33) instituted in 833, requiring religious scholars to testify that the Qur'an was created. The caliph believed he was the arbiter of Islamic orthodoxy. Ibn Hanbal was one of the few to refuse to testify. He was imprisoned and then tried, probably a year later, before Ma'mun's successor, Mu'tasim (r. 833–42). He finally was flogged and released. Hostile sources assert that he confessed, while Hanbali sources say that he lost consciousness (and so could not have been responsible for anything he said). The caliph Mutawakkil (r. 847–61) dismantled the inquisition during the first five years of his reign. Near the end of this period, he summoned Ibn Hanbal to Samarra to teach; however, Ibn Hanbal did not want anything to do with the ruler, refused to eat, and was finally sent home.

Ibn Hanbal's greatest literary monument is the Musnad (Solid tradition), a collection of almost 28,000 prophetic hadiths, about 80 percent of which are repeats with variant chains of transmitters (compared to the Sahīh [Sound collection] of Bukhari [d. 870] with 7,400 hadiths, about 60 percent of which are repeats). The Musnad seems to have been assembled by Ibn Hanbal's son 'Abdallah (d. 903). Ibn Hanbal generally evaluated hadiths by comparing variant chains of transmitters. If someone's transmissions were too often uncorroborated by parallels from contemporaries, Ibn Hanbal considered that person unreliable. Later hadith critics often quoted his evaluations.

Ibn Hanbal's second greatest literary monument is the Kitab al-Zuhd (On renunciation), a collection of sayings concerning the pious life, especially from the early eighth century. The extant version of the book comprises around 2,400 items, but the original was apparently two or three times longer. Perhaps half of it was the contribution of Ibn Hanbal himself, while the remaining half was added by his son 'Abdallah as he assembled it. Prominent features of the work are a focus on otherworldliness (hence little concern for service in this world), nighttime devotions (which are preferred, as they are less likely to be performed for the sake of being seen), austerity (such as eating little and requiring only the plainest dress and furniture), and the cultivation of sadness and fear (i.e., sadness over past sins and fear of the Judgment to come).

Various followers transmitted Ibn Hanbal's legal opinions, of which several collections (called masā'il) are extant. From these early collections, it is evident that he strongly preferred to infer rules from the hadith, from the Prophet if possible, and from Companions if necessary. When confronted with two contradictory hadith reports, he tested their chains of transmitters to see which was more reliable. If they seemed equally good, he might simply state the alternatives without imposing his own opinion. Ibn Hanbal's jurisprudence is distinguished by its ethical character. For example, he regularly tried to protect against exploitation, condemned ḥiyal

(legal devices) that respected the letter of the law but contravened its spirit, and required words and actions to have consequences. Many of the opinions ascribed to him in later sources were evidently generated by takhrīj, meaning the attribution to Ibn Hanbal of opinions thought to ensue naturally from his principles, even if they were not actually enunciated by him. The Hanbali Sunni school of law takes its name from him.

In theology, he rejected almost all speculation that went beyond what was expressly stated in the Qur'an and hadith. Both friendly and hostile accounts of his stance at the inquisition stress his refusal to debate on rational grounds. He was, if anything, even more hostile to would-be proponents of Sunni kalām (dialectical theology) than he was to Murji'is, Qadaris, and other non-Sunni theological groups. He was associated especially with bitter denunciations of those who conceded that, although the Qur'an was not itself created, one's pronunciation of the Qur'an was created. Ibn Hanbal preferred that the question not be discussed.

In politics, Ibn Hanbal was a quietist Sunni. By all accounts, he recognized 'Ali b. Abi Talib as the legitimate fourth caliph, against those who considered that Mu'awiya (r. 661–80) had directly succeeded 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56). However, he staunchly rejected Shi'i assertions that some of the Companions had been unrighteous, notably those who acclaimed Abu Bakr (r. 632–34) 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44) and opposed 'Ali. He recognized as the imam of his time whoever was the subject of universal agreement. One Hanbali source goes so far as to quote him: "Whoever overcomes them by the sword, so that he becomes caliph and is called the Commander of the Faithful, it is not licit for anyone who believes in God and the Last Day to spend a night not considering him an imam, whether he is pious or reprobate." Accordingly, in 846 he discouraged rebellion against the persecuting caliph Wathiq (r. 842–47).

At the same time, there runs through sources purporting to quote Ibn Hanbal a strong concern on the part of Ibn Hanbal with commanding right and forbidding wrong, meaning rebuke of misbehaving rulers and private correction of misbehavior where the ruler has failed to enforce the law. Ibn Hanbal recognized the duty but recommended caution to avoid provoking any violent reaction from the ruler; he warned not to expect too much of people and not to seek out misbehavior but only to correct such as it presented itself publicly (e.g., to pour out wine in an uncovered container but not to uncover a container one suspects of holding wine). Ibn Hanbal himself went so far as to avoid public prayer in the mosque, which he thought normally to be required, so as to avoid both the caliph's blandishments and the duty of openly rebuking him.

See also hadith; inquisition; Ma'mun (786–833); Sunnism

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Michael Cooperson, Classical Arabic Biography: The Heirs of the Prophets in the Age of al-Ma'mun, 2000; Nimrod Hurvitz, The Formation of Hanbalism: Piety into Power, 2002; Christopher Melchert, Ahmad ibn Hanbal, 2006; Susan A. Spectorsky, "Ahmad ibn Hanbal's Fiqh," Journal of the American Oriental Society 102 (1982); Idem, Chapters on Marriage and Divorce: Responses of ibn Hanbal and ibn Rahwayh, 1993.

CHRISTOPHER MELCHERT

Ahmadis

The Ahmadi or Ahmadiyya movement in Islam is a modern Muslim messianic movement. It was founded in 1889 in the Indian province of the Punjab by Ghulam Ahmad (1835–1908). Accused of rejecting the Muslim dogma asserting the finality of Muhammad's prophethood, the movement aroused the fierce opposition of the Sunni mainstream. During the period of British rule in India, the controversy was merely a doctrinal dispute between private individuals or voluntary organizations, but when most Ahmadis moved in 1947 to the professedly Islamic state of Pakistan, the issue was transformed into a major constitutional problem. The Sunni Muslim mainstream demanded the formal exclusion of the Ahmadis from the Muslim fold. This objective was attained in 1974: against fierce opposition from the Ahmadis, the Pakistani parliament adopted a constitutional amendment declaring them non-Muslims. In 1984, in the framework of General Zia-ul-Haq's (d. 1988) Islamization trend in Pakistan, the presidential Ordinance no. XX of 1984 transformed the religious observance of the Ahmadis into a criminal offense punishable by three years of imprisonment. The ordinance became an instrument for the harassment and judicial persecution of the Ahmadi community. Following the promulgation of this legal restriction, the headquarters of the Ahmadi movement moved from Rabwa (in Pakistan) to London.

As far as constitutional procedure is concerned, the 1974 amendment is extraordinary. Politicians elected through a secular process arrogated to themselves the authority of an assembly of theologians, discussed a subtle issue of Muslim theology, dealt with matters concerning faith and infidelity, and pronounced judgment on the religious affiliation of a group of citizens. With the adoption of the amendment, Ahmadis, who passionately believed in being Muslims in the fullest sense of the word, were transformed into a non-Muslim minority. Legally, the constitutional amendment should have prevented the Ahmadis only from serving as president and prime minister of Pakistan, who must be Muslims according to the constitution. In practice, it had more serious repercussions. Ahmadis were removed from senior positions in the army, and international Muslim organizations began to adopt anti-Ahmadi resolutions and urged Muslim governments to declare Ahmadis as apostates. In 1975, Pakistan's minister of religious affairs declared that Ahmadis would not be allowed to perform the pilgrimage (hajj) to Mecca, and any Pakistani who wished to perform it would be obliged to sign a declaration affirming his or her belief in the finality of Muhammad's prophethood.

Before the establishment of Pakistan, Ahmadis developed distinct political thought. Grateful that the British administration allowed them to preach and propagate their version of Islam, the Ahmadis were loyal to the British government. While Ghulam Ahmad would brook no compromise with Christianity and its missionaries in India, he carefully distinguished between Christian missionaries and the British rule to which he gave his staunch support. He repeatedly paid tribute to the British for creating conditions in which the Ahmadis were able not only to extol Islam but also to criticize Christianity. The Ahmadis did not identify with issues that agitated the Muslim world at the beginning of the 20th century. The reverses suffered by the Ottomans during the Balkan wars, which aroused intense feelings of sympathy among mainstream Muslims, left the Ahmadis untouched. Similarly, the Ahmadi movement remained aloof during the anti-British noncooperation movement in the early 1920s. Ahmadi attitudes toward the struggle for Indian independence were ambivalent. Although the Ahmadi leadership expressed sympathy with the aim of the Indian National Congress to improve India's political status, it also maintained that the government must be obeyed and rejected the use of civil disobedience in the political struggle. In the last years before independence and partition, the Ahmadi pronouncements became more outspoken in favor of Indian independence, but even then the movement did not identify with any of the parties that led the nationalist struggle. This allowed the adversaries of the Ahmadis to stigmatize it as a movement that stood by the imperial power and did not share the aspirations of the Indian people at a crucial stage in their history.

The Ahmadis have a distinctive interpretation of jihad. In their view, jihad should be waged in a way appropriate to the threat facing Islam. In the early Muslim period, nascent Islam was in danger of physical extinction, and therefore military jihad was called for. In Ghulam Ahmad's lifetime, Muslims faced the onslaught of Christian missionaries who engaged in slander against Islam and its Prophet. In such a situation, Ahmadis believed Muslims should respond in kind and defend Islam by preaching and refuting the slander rather than by military means. Though this interpretation is specific to the situation of Indian Muslims under British rule, it came to be considered an unchanging principle of the Ahmadi worldview.

In their relationship with the non-Muslim world, the Ahmadis have been engaged in depicting Islam as a liberal, humane, and progressive religion, systematically misrepresented by non-Muslims. This aspect of Ahmadi teaching is well in line with that of modernist Muslim thinkers, though in other matters, such as the seclusion of women, the Ahmadis follow the traditional point of view. One of the most distinctive features of the movement is that the Ahmadis consider the peaceful propagation of their version of Islam among Muslims and non-Muslims alike as essential.

See also apostasy; India; messianism; Pakistan

Further Reading

Bashir al-Din Mahmud Ahmad, Indian Problem and Its Solution, ca. 1926; Idem, Invitation to Ahmadiyyat, 1961; Idem, The Nehru Report and Muslim Rights, 1930; Ghulam Ahmad, "Government-i angrezi awr jihad" [The British government and jihad], in Ruhani Khaza'in [The collected works of Ghulam Ahmad], vol. 17, 1965. English translation: Review of Religions 10 (1911); Leonard Binder, Religion and Politics in Pakistan, 1961; S. E. Brush, "Ahmadiyyat in Pakistan: Rabwa and the Ahmadis," Muslim World 45 (1955); Yohanan Friedmann, Prophecy Continuous: Aspects of Ahmadi Religious Thought and Its Medieval Background, 2nd ed., 2003; Pakistan National Assembly's Verdict on Finality of Prophethood of Hazrat Muhammad (Peace be upon him), 1974; Muhammad Zafrullah Khan, Ahmadiyyat: The Renaissance of Islam, 1978.

YOHANAN FRIEDMANN

Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624)

An Indian Muslim Sufi, considered by his followers as "the renewer of the second millennium" (of the Islamic era; mujaddid-i alf-i thānī), Ahmad Sirhindi was born in Sirhind in East Punjab and received his religious education from several teachers in Sialkot. Because of his scholarship, he was later invited to the court of Emperor Akbar (r. 1556–1605) in Agra. A turning point in his life came in 1599–1600, when he went to Delhi and was initiated into the Naqshbandi order of Sufis by Khwaja Muhammad al-Baqi bi-llah, a prominent Naqshbandi teacher. Subsequently he devoted himself to the propagation of Naqshbandi ideas on Sufism and wrote hundreds of letters in which he explained various points in the doctrine of the Naqshbandis. These letters included ideas that Emperor Jahangir (r. 1605–27) considered arrogant and conducive to heresy. In 1619, Jahangir summoned Sirhindi to his court and imprisoned him. His imprisonment lasted for a year. After his release, Sirhindi continued his Sufi activities until he died in 1624.

Sirhindi's celebrated collection of letters, titled Maktubat-i Imam-i Rabbani (Letters of the divine guide), is regarded as a landmark in the development of Islam in the Indian subcontinent. Most letters deal with aspects of Islamic mysticism, but some are relevant to questions of political thought. In a few letters, Sirhindi expresses his views on the desirability of a relationship between devout Muslims and their rulers. At times, he writes that a devout Muslim must refrain from any relationship of this kind and should flee from the rulers' company as he would flee from lions. Nevertheless, he wrote letters to Mughul officials. In some of those letters, he recommended certain individuals for governmental posts or for stipends. In other letters, he urged the officials to strive for the strict implementation of the shari'a by the state. In particular, he demanded the humiliation of the Hindus and the merciless imposition of the poll tax (jizya) on them. He also expressed his joy at the 1606 execution of Arjun, the fifth guru of the Sikhs.

On the basis of these few letters, many modern scholars and thinkers maintain that Sirhindi brought about major changes in the development of Islam in the subcontinent. According to these scholars, Sirhindi reversed the heretical trends of the period of Akbar, restored the pristine purity of Islam, and inspired the orthodox reforms of Emperor Aurangzeb (r. 1658–1707). In mainstream Pakistani historiography, Sirhindi is portrayed as a figure who saved Indian Islam from disintegration. The decisive majority of Sirhindi's letters, however, deal with mystical rather than political issues, and there is no evidence that the Mughal Empire heeded Sirhindi's advice concerning the imposition of Islamic laws on the state. It is reasonably clear that in the 17th century, Sirhindi was not considered a political activist but rather a Sufi who suffered from delusions of grandeur and whose writings were replete with heretical ideas. In addition to his imprisonment by Emperor Jahangir in 1619, Emperor Aurangzeb—who is supposed to have been influenced by Sirhindi's views—proscribed the study of his Maktubat in 1679. Sirhindi's primary influence was not as a political thinker but as a mystic: the Mujaddidi branch of the Naqshbandi order that came into being under his influence spread from India into the Ottoman lands in the 18th century and also was influential in Turkey and in Syria.

See also India; Mughals (1526–1857); Sufism

Further Reading

Butrus Abu-Manneh, "The Naqshbandiyya-Mujaddidiyya in the Ottoman Lands in the Early 19th Century," Die Welt des Islams 22 (1982); Aziz Ahmad, "Religious and Political Ideas of Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi," Rivista degli Studi Orientali 36 (1961); Burhan Ahmad Faruqi, The Mujaddid's Conception of Tawhid, 1940; Yohanan Friedmann, Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi: An Outline of His Thought and a Study of His Image in the Eyes of Posterity, 2000; J. G. J. ter Haar, Follower and Heir of the Prophet: Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624) as Mystic, 1992; Shaykh Ahmad Sirhindi, Ithbat al-nubuwwa. Haydarabad (Sindh), 1963–64; Idem, Maktubat-i Imam-i Rabbani, 1889.

YOHANAN FRIEDMANN

'A'isha (ca. 614–78)

'A'isha was the most prominent of the Prophet Muhammad's wives. Daughter of Abu Bakr, Muhammad's close companion and the future first caliph of the Muslim community, she was born in Mecca and was married to the Prophet at the age of nine or ten in a union that some early sources attributed to divine arrangement by the angel Gabriel. Her youth gave her a special status during the Prophet's life, although it did occasionally cause uneasy relations within the Prophet's extended household, such as an accusation of adultery (al-ifk), of which she was fully exonerated by a Qur'anic revelation (Q. 24:11–20) containing a sharp rebuke of her accusers.

When the Prophet was ill toward the end of his life in 632, 'A'isha, only 18 and with no children, was acknowledged as his favorite wife, and thus she nursed him in her quarters, where he died and was buried beneath the house. Like all the Prophet's surviving wives, she was forbidden by Qur'anic injunction to remarry (Q. 33:53) and became part of a new female elite known as ummahāt al-mu'minīn, or "the Mothers of the Believers." This unique status elevated the Prophet's widows to higher standards of conduct than other women, including the unique command that they speak to men not of their immediate family from behind a hijāb, or curtain (Q. 33:53).

'A'isha seems to have led a quiet life during the successive caliphates of her father, Abu Bakr, and 'Umar b. al-Khattab. She criticized the policies of the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (d. 656), however, claiming that they deviated from her husband's. Muslims heatedly disagreed about 'A'isha's right to publicly criticize the caliph, and 'Uthman rebuked her, reminding her of the Qur'anic verse commanding the wives of the Prophet to "stay in your houses" (Q. 33:33), a reference meant to silence her. This injunction, although never followed literally by the wives of the Prophet, echoed later in the rhetoric of those who condemned 'A'isha.

When 'Uthman was assassinated by Muslim rebels in 656, 'A'isha demanded that his murderers be punished, thus pitting her against the newly elected fourth caliph, 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661). 'Ali had been one of her vocal critics during the incident of the ifk (adultery) and had suggested that the Prophet divorce her, but her reasons also included a belief in the importance of establishing iṣlāḥ, a final peaceful resolution between 'Ali's party and her own allies (Q. 49:9–10). 'A'isha was supported in her quest by two brothers-in-law and aspirants to the caliphate: her cousin Talha b. 'Ubaydallah and Zubayr b. al-'Awwam (both d. 656).

Speaking in Mecca from behind the curtained sanctuary of the Ka'ba, 'A'isha rallied her male followers to march to war against 'Ali in Basra, Iraq. There, she watched as 'Ali's more numerous forces defeated hers in 656. As Zubayr and Talha perished, 'A'isha did not wield a sword in the conflict but instead urged her troops on to victory from a curtained palanquin. The fiercest fighting took place around her camel, where 70 men are said to have died defending her. When her camel was hamstrung, the conflict, known thereafter as the Battle of the Camel, ended. 'A'isha was treated with respect by 'Ali and was returned by his troops to Medina, where she retired from politics.

'A'isha became a major conduit for her husband's sunna, the precedent that later became a source of Islamic law; about 300 of the "sound," or most authentic, prophetic traditions preserved in the canonical work of Muslim (d. 875) and Bukhari (d. 870) were narrated by her, although the full corpus of her transmission is much larger—more than one thousand traditions.

In medieval Shi'i historiography, 'A'isha is portrayed consistently as the leader of the opposition, a headstrong but powerful woman and ultimately the antithesis of ideal Muslim womanhood. Sunni historians praised her as the Prophet's favorite wife but shifted the blame for her political involvement to her male allies, emphasizing her lack of leadership. Both Shi'i and Sunni accounts, authored exclusively by men in the premodern period, found in 'A'isha's defeat a precedent to exclude all women from politics.

In the seventh century, 'A'isha's age prompted only praise, which is recorded in the earliest sources. Contemporary non-Muslims, however, often use 'A'isha's marital age in broader critiques of Islam. Many websites, both Muslim and non-Muslim, have focused on 'A'isha's youth as a vexed issue. As a result, her original seventh-century political importance has been overshadowed in contemporary Western debate by what some believe are anachronistic readings of the era in which she lived.

In the 20th and 21st centuries, some Sunni Muslim women found a positive political model in 'A'isha. She left no first-person defense of her political motivations. In only one early account, displaying grief for the dead after her defeat, did she admit "wrongdoing." This suggests that, until her defeat, 'A'isha assumed it was her prerogative to participate in the political life of the first Muslim polity.

See also Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634); 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); 'Uthman b. 'Affan (ca. 579–656); women

Further Reading

Nabia Abbott, 'A'ishah: The Beloved of Mohammed, 1942; Kecia Ali, Sexual Ethics & Islam: Feminist Reflections on Qur'an, Hadith, and Jurisprudence, 2006; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad: A Study of the Early Caliphate, 1997; Fatima Mernissi, The Veil and the Male Elite: A Feminist Interpretation of Women's Rights in Islam, translated by Mary Jo Lakeland, 1991; D. A. Spellberg, Politics, Gender, and the Islamic Past: The Legacy of 'A'isha bint Abi Bakr, 1994; Barbara Freyer Stowasser, Women in the Qu'ran, Traditions, and Interpretation, 1994.

DENISE SPELLBERG

Akbar the Great (1542–1605)

The third and arguably the greatest king of the Mughal Empire, Akbar is responsible for consolidating Mughal power in India. At his accession in 1556, the young king faced threats from supporters of Afghan leader Islam Shah Suri. One of Islam Shah's generals, Samrat Hem Chandra (popularly known as Hemu), challenged Akbar for control of North India, but his forces were defeated by Akbar at Panipat. Within the next five years, Akbar successfully wrested control of India away from the remaining Sur princes.

Akbar's next challenge came from his regent Bairam Khan, whose family had traveled to India from Central Asia with Akbar's grandfather, Zahiruddin Babur. (Babur conquered India in 1526 to establish the Mughal Empire.) Akbar dismissed Bairam Khan from office, sent him on a pilgrimage to Mecca, and replaced him with his own foster brother, Adham Khan. Adham Khan displeased Akbar when he kept all the spoils of a campaign he led into Malwa, and Khan further angered Akbar when he assassinated Akbar's chief minister. Akbar reportedly struck Adham Khan and threw him off a balcony to ensure his death. This event—illustrated in Abu al-Fadl's Akbarnama (The book of Akbar), a lavish chronicle commissioned by Akbar—came to be one of the many stories associated with the charisma and power of Akbar.

To secure his power, Akbar marginalized the Uzbek elite at court by cultivating a Persian elite and by forming new alliances with the landed Indian aristocracy. The Uzbek nobles at court had supported the claims of Akbar's half brother, Mirza Hakim, to the throne of Delhi, and Akbar wished to counter their power by forming local alliances. Akbar's campaigns into Rajasthan, his marriage to a Rajput woman, and his appointment of Rajput chiefs to high posts in the government paved the way for a new administrative order. Akbar also constructed four impressive fortresses in the cities of Agra, Lahore, Allahabad, and Ajmer and commissioned the building of a new city, Fatehpur Sikri, which he would use as his capital. In Fatehpur Sikri, Akbar built a tomb for Salim Chishti (d. 1572), the mystic to whose prayers Akbar credited the birth of his son and successor, Prince Salim. Akbar actively recruited the family of Salim Chishti into Mughal service and, by doing so, gained for himself another valuable source of local authority. To challenge the power held by the 'ulama', Akbar seized religious land grants they had gained under Sur rulers and distributed these land grants to learned men of all religious communities. Akbar also abolished the poll tax (jizya) and gave himself religious authority over the body of 'ulama' and over all figures who held spiritual legitimacy.

The arrival of the second Islamic millennium in 1592 formed the backdrop for Akbar's personal theology. In Abu al-Fadl's Akbarnama, Akbar is portrayed as the embodiment of the divine and as a messianic figure whose coming was foretold by seers and astrologers. As Akbar's historian, Abu al-Fadl created for the king a genealogy beginning with Adam, continuing through the line of Abrahamic prophets, and finally arriving at the immaculate conception that began the line of Akbar's ancestor Timur Gurgan (the legendary Central Asian conqueror known as Tamerlane). A close-knit circle of noblemen at Akbar's court was bound to him by ties of discipleship, similar to the ties between the heads of Sufi orders and their followers. Akbar's religious claims were pluralistic in nature; the emperor embodied the divine at the heart of all religions, and his military prowess, combined with his administrative skills, added to his mystique. When Akbar died in 1605, he left behind a legacy of successful military campaigns, a full treasury, and a centralized, efficient state.

See also messianism; Mughals (1526–1857)

Further Reading

Irfan Habib, ed., Akbar and His India, 1992; Ruby Lal, Domesticity and Power in the Early Mughal World, 2005; J. F. Richards, The Cambridge History of India: The Mughal Empire, 1993; Douglas E. Streusand, The Formation of the Mughal Empire, 1989; André Wink, Akbar, 2009.

TAYMIYA R. ZAMAN

ʿAlawis

ʿAlawis are a religious group who live in the southeast of Turkey and Lebanon, as well as in Syria, where they are both the largest religious minority and the ruling political elite. They emerged as a distinct religious movement in the tenth-century Shiʿi milieu of Iraq and were later transplanted to Syria. During the French mandate of Syria after World War I, the French army included large numbers of ʿAlawis, whose military experience enabled them to take power in Syria after France's withdrawal.

The name of the sect (Arabic, ʿAlawī) refers to their deification of the first Shiʿi imam ʿAli b. Abi Talib (d. 661). Originally, however, they were called Nusayris, after their eponymous founder Muhammad b. Nusayr, who lived in the second half of the ninth century. He was succeeded by Husayn al-Khusaybi (d. 957 or 969), who played an important role in the formulation of the Nusayri doctrine. ʿAlawi teachings were preserved in a considerable number of medieval and early modern treatises written by members of the sect, together with accounts of its critics.

Before the second half of the 20th century, ʿAlawis never held political power, so their doctrines pay little attention to the state and politics, mainly focusing on the supernatural realm and man's relation to it. The core of their belief is the divine nature of ʿAli, who in different texts is depicted as either God or His manifestation in human form. The creation of the human race is followed by their sin, causing them to fall from the luminous divine realm into the evil material world. However, virtuous believers are able to return to the divine realm along a path (sirāṭ) that includes numerous degrees of spiritual perfection. Conversely, the sinful are punished by being reborn into other human bodies (naskh), or worse, by undergoing transformation (musūkhiyya) into animals, plants, and inanimate objects, according to the degree of their sins.

God is imagined as a triad, consisting of the supreme member called Meaning (maʿnā) and His two emanations—His Name (ism), also called Veil (ḥijāb), and His Gate (bāb). The Meaning is utterly transcendent. His first emanation has two functions: to name and conceal Him, hence his two epithets, Name and Veil. The second emanation, the Gate, is called so because he serves as a link between the Meaning and the believers. The divinity's three aspects are not completely detached from the world of humans but appear to them from time to time in the form of various persons. Most commonly, they appeared to humans in the forms of, respectively, ʿAli, the Prophet Muhammad, and Salman al-Farisi, Muhammad's well-known Companion. Besides the triad, there are a number of other spiritual beings, the most important of whom are the five Unique Ones (aytām, sing. yatīm) who have emanated from the three divine persons.

The three personifications of God are manifested in the material world in seven historical cycles, called Domes (qibāb, sing. qubba), centered on the persons of biblical and Islamic characters, including prophets and imams. The present cycle is called the qubba Muhammadiyya, referring to the Prophet Muhammad. Some ʿAlawi authors have viewed human history as finite. Thus, according to a 19th-century catechism, at the end of time ʿAli will appear to free the souls of believers from their graves and return them to the luminous realm. But others believe that the cycles are endless: this world will come to an end, but another will be created thereafter. Despite the numerous common elements between ʿAlawi teachings and mainstream Islam (especially in its Shiʿi form), many of their beliefs have appeared scandalous to both Shiʿi and Sunni Muslims, who have consistently accused them of heresy and immoral practices. Charges of heresy and the lack of political power led ʿAlawis to view secrecy as an essential part of their belief and a condition for belonging to the community. Divulging religious secrets to outsiders became equal to unbelief and led to banishment.

See also ʿAli b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); Shiʿism; Syria

Further Reading

Meir Bar-Asher and Aryeh Kofsky, The Nuṣayrī-ʿAlawī Religion: An Enquiry into Its Theology and Religion, 2002; Yaron Friedman, The Nuṣayrī-ʿAlawīs, 2010; Heinz Halm, Die Islamische Gnosis, 1982; Matti Moosa, Extremist Shiites, 1988; Tord Olsson, "The Gnosis of Mountaineers and Townspeople: The Religion of the Syrian Alawites, or the Nuṣayrīs," in Alevi Identity: Cultural, Religious and Social Perspectives, edited by Tord Olsson, Elisabeth Özdalga, and Catharina Raudvere, 1998; Edward Salisbury, "The Book of Sulaimān's First Ripe Fruit, Disclosing the Mysteries of the Nusairian Religion," Journal of the American Oriental Society 8 (1866).

MUSHEGH ASATRYAN

Algeria

Modern political thought in Algeria emerged in the vacuum created by the systemic French conquest of the territories of the Ottoman Beylik (province) of Algiers in the 1840s. This conquest destroyed all but the most resilient local indigenous political institutions, represented by the tribes and Sufi brotherhoods, and immediately implanted French political institutions at the upper levels of the state. It took decades for the traumatized population to regain its political vision. In the early 20th century, however, a new French-educated class of Algerians, patronizingly described by the French as évolués (evolved, developed), began to consider both the past and future of their country, thereby laying the foundations of modern Algerian national identity and political thought. This identity was complex: on the one hand, it was traceable to the ancient Berber and Phoenician kingdoms of antiquity, but on the other, it was firmly Arab and politically secular but at the same time culturally Islamic. Whether Algeria existed before l'Algérie française was a moot point, and in the face of French colonialism, it was impossible to imagine reconstituting it in anything but a modern guise.

The Algerian political community, however, consisting of groups in both Algeria and France, was divided over what modern Algeria should be. At one end of the spectrum stood the secular socialist trade unionists and at the other end the reformist 'ulama' led by the eminent scholar 'Abd al-Hamid b. Badis (d. 1940). Ibn Badis introduced the Salafism of Muhammad 'Abduh to Algeria and launched an attack on folk Islam, as represented primarily by the Sufi brotherhoods, in favor of an urban middle-class interpretation of the faith consistent with modernity. Although the Algerian War of Independence, spearheaded by the Front de Libération National, traditionally has been seen as both a war of national liberation and a socialist revolution, recent studies indicate the importance of Islam as a popular idiom and motivator of political action, especially in the countryside where jihad rather than revolution galvanized people to participate.

Although the independent state of Algeria prided itself on its nationalist socialist credentials, its citizens proved to be the most open in the region to the Islamist discourse that swept across the Middle East and North Africa from the 1970s onward. One reason for this was the almost complete absence of continuity between the precolonial and postcolonial eras and the consequent alienation of many from the political structures of the new state. Education and an adequate response to the country's social and economic problems might have alleviated this alienation, but in any case, the new political discourse of Islamism received an immediate and significant welcome, especially in cities such as Algiers. What was distinctive about Islamism in Algeria was its strongly nationalist color, despite the apparent contradiction between the communities of Islam and the nation respectively. This can be traced to Ibn Badis himself and his understanding of Salafism as a tool for national revival and identity formation in opposition to external European, and specifically French, attempts to undermine the Algerian political persona. This link between Algerian nationalism and Islam was assisted by the association of the French Empire with Christianity—a link made most clearly by the Cathedral of Notre Dame d'Afrique, established by Cardinal Lavigerie (d. 1892), which sits atop a cliff overlooking the Bay of Algiers.

Although submerged in the halcyon days of the revolution, the Islamic strand had been present from the start of Algeria's engagement with modernity. In the late 20th century, it offered Algerians not a means to evade the nation-state but instead a means to make it accountable and give it authenticity. Islamism is by definition a hegemonic interpretation of Islam, however, and it was rejected not only by the secular-minded army but also by important sectors of the population, most notably the Berber population of Kabylia, who saw it as part of a program of Islamization and Arabization that ignored their contribution to the formation of Algeria and devalued their approach to Islam. The result was the vicious civil war that erupted when the Front Islamique du Salut won the elections in 1992 but were prevented from acceding to power by the army.

See also colonialism; fundamentalism; modernity; nationalism; North Africa; secularism

Further Reading

Amira Bennison, "Opposition and Accommodation to French Colonialism in Early Nineteenth Century Algeria," Cambridge Review of International Affairs 11, no. 2 (1998); Alistair Horne, A Savage War of Peace: Algeria 1954–1962, 1987; James McDougall, History and the Culture of Nationalism in Algeria, 2006; Hugh Roberts, The Battlefield: Algeria 1988–2002, 2003; Michael Willis, The Islamist Challenge in Algeria: A Political History, 1996.

AMIRA K. BENNISON

'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661)

Cousin and son-in-law to the Prophet by marriage to his eldest daughter, Fatima, 'Ali is revered by Shi'is as the first imam and, therefore, the true successor and inheritor (waṣī) to the Prophet's legacy (waṣiyya) to whom absolute devotion (walāya) serves as the precondition of true knowledge of Islam. Sunnis regard him as the last of the so-called Rightly Guided Caliphs (al-khulafā' al-rāshidūn). Although universally revered, the biography and station of 'Ali within the Muslim community remain the locus classicus of the profoundest sectarian disputes between Sunni and Shi'i believers. 'Ali's bid for the caliphate came in the midst of the Great Schism (al-fitna al-kubrā) following the assassination of 'Uthman b. 'Affan in 656. His brief and beleaguered efforts to reunite the umma under his leadership ended tragically with his assassination by the blade of one of his renegade followers on January 27, 661.

'Ali's political influence and, for some, his political right (ḥaqq) to leadership derives from his early and intimate ties with Muhammad, which originate from his early youth. 'Ali ranks among the earliest converts to the new religion (a dispute exists over whether Abu Bakr's conversion preceded 'Ali's or whether 'Ali's status as a minor rendered Abu Bakr's conversion more meritorious). The prominence of place in the political arena publicly accorded to 'Ali by the Prophet, particularly in Medina, is often striking. When instituting the brotherhood pact between prominent Meccan emigrants (muhājirūn) and Medinan helpers (anṣār), the Prophet chose 'Ali as his brother designate. Muhammad also charged 'Ali, who was renowned as a fierce warrior, with leading numerous raids and key diplomatic missions—for example, the Yemeni tribe Banu Hamdan allegedly converted at his hands—and twice Muhammad delegated him to destroy idols (first those of the Aws and Khazraj, then those of the Ka'ba). Most important for Shi'is, however, was the event transpiring in 632 at Ghadir Khumm, a marsh located between Mecca and Medina. After his return from his final pilgrimage, Muhammad declared to a congregation of Muslims, "Whosoever regards me as his master [mawlā], 'Ali is his master." This declaration is vague—the word mawlā by no means unambiguously conveys the sense of political or religious leadership.

Shi'is, however, interpreted the event as the Prophet's investiture (nass) of 'Ali with the leadership of the umma upon the death of the Prophet, whereas Sunni traditionalists usually regarded the event as evidence of 'Ali's high station in the community, though little more.

After the Prophet's death, Abu Bakr's initiation of the Qurashi caliphate with the help of 'Umar b. al-Khattab and Abu 'Ubayda b. al-Jarrah transpired without 'Ali's consultation, as he reportedly remained in the Prophet's home preparing his corpse for burial. 'Ali was not immediately forthcoming in granting Abu Bakr the oath of allegiance (bay'a). The relations between the two worsened when Abu Bakr rejected Fatima's claim to the Prophet's orchard in Fadak. Fatima refused to meet with Abu Bakr ever again and died six months later, at which time 'Ali swore his oath of allegiance. The ownership of Fadak remained a contested issue for centuries; caliphs periodically returned the property to Fatima's descendents or seized it in varying contexts.

Even after the bay'a, 'Ali remained disconsolate and at a considerable distance from public life. In marked contrast to his exploits during Muhammad's lifetime, 'Ali participated in neither the wars of apostasy (ridda) under Abu Bakr nor the conquests undertaken by 'Umar and 'Uthman. 'Umar, who reportedly disdained 'Ali's "foolishness" (du'aba), may have played a direct role in marginalizing his influence from an early date. 'Ali's self-imposed distance and disenfranchisement apparently manifested a silent censure of the first three caliphs. Potentially revealing as well are the reports of his allegedly noncommittal (and consequentially negative) reply to 'Abd al-Rahman b. 'Awf's inquiry during the consultation (shura) that elected 'Uthman caliph as to whether or not he would follow the policies of Abu Bakr and 'Umar.

'Ali's gradual reemergence onto the stage of public life coincides with the coalescing of opposition forces against the policies of 'Uthman. When garrison rebels marched on Medina in 656, 'Ali attempted but failed to mitigate their grievances. After the caliph's assassination, many of the rebels, not all of whom had wished 'Uthman dead, rallied to 'Ali as their natural leader per the entreaties of the rebels. 'Ali swiftly stepped into the power vacuum left by 'Uthman's death, quelling the chaos that had upended Medina's peace. 'Ali's hastily convened shura, unlike 'Uthman's, incorporated not merely the emigrants, but also the helpers. Numerous prominent Meccan Quraysh fled the city—especially 'Uthman's Umayyad clansmen—to avoid yielding to 'Ali's authority, whereas others, such as the prominent Companions Zubayr b. 'Awwam and Talha b. 'Ubaydallah, offered their allegiance only under duress.

'Ali's relationship with the rebels on an ideological level is difficult to discern. His criticism of 'Uthman was markedly more public than his criticism toward Abu Bakr and 'Umar. However, it remains clear that the rebels, along with the ansar whom 'Uthman severely alienated, quickly filled the ranks of his political and military base and 'Ali, perhaps out of necessity, readily acquiesced to a number of their demands: most famously the distribution of the funds of the treasury and the dismissal of 'Uthman's governors from the provinces.

The factions that took up arms against 'Ali universally decried his leniency with the rebels and even accused him as equally guilty of 'Uthman's murder. In Iraq, Zubayr and Talha, along with the Prophet's wife 'A'isha, formed a coalition that was swiftly crushed by 'Ali's forces at the Battle of the Camel in 656. 'Uthman's governor, Mu'awiya b. Abi Sufyan, led the Umayyad opposition to 'Ali in Syria. Mu'awiya demanded that 'Ali surrender 'Uthman's murderers to him so that he could determine the murderers' fate, a right he regarded as his by Qur'anic decree due to his status as 'Uthman's next of kin (wali; cf. Q. 17:33). After failing to successfully negotiate these demands at Siffin, the armies met in pitched battle. To prevent defeat, the Syrians signaled their desire for arbitration on the basis of the Qur'an by raising sheets (masahif) of the text on the tip of their lances in the midst of the battle. The Syrian and Iraqi factions each put forward a representative arbiter (hakam) to render a judgment on the dispute.

'Ali's consent to this agreement proved to be his ultimate undoing; the arbiters' decision proved untenable for 'Ali. Rejecting the rebels' claims of 'Uthman's guilt, it buttressed Mu'awiya's claims to pursue vengeance for 'Uthman's death and, therefore, also spurred the Syrians to pledge allegiance to Mu'awiya as caliph in 659. 'Ali's coalition, rather than being galvanized like the Syrians', disintegrated, with large numbers of his followers, later known as Kharijis, censuring the decision as abandoning Qur'anic authority in favor of the decisions of men. They regarded 'Ali's agreement as tantamount to disbelief (kufr), crying, "There is no judgment but God's [la hukma illa li-llah]!" After attempts at reconciliation, 'Ali eventually met, defeated, and massacred this group at Nahrawan in 658, though at a considerable cost to his coalition's morale. Mu'awiya could subsequently act aggressively as a rival caliph rather than a rebel governor, seizing swaths of territory in Egypt, Arabia, and even Iraq. A Khariji assassin, Ibn Muljam al-Muradi, murdered 'Ali as he plotted to remobilize his forces against Mu'awiya to avenge the deaths of his companions at Nahrawan.

Sharif al-Radi (d. 1015) collected the political orations, discourses, and letters of 'Ali in the Nahj al-Balagha (Peak of eloquence) that today serves as an authoritative text among Shi'is. It putatively contains many of 'Ali's views on sundry political and religious topics and has been published in numerous English translations.

See also Companions of the Prophet; imamate; Shi'ism; succession

Further Reading

Asma Afsaruddin, Excellence and Precedence: Medieval Islamic Discourse on Legitimate Leadership, 2002; Sean W. Anthony, The Caliph and the Heretic: Ibn Saba' and the Origins of Shi'ism, 2011; Martin Hinds, "The Siffin Arbitration Agreement," JSS 17, no. 1 (1972); I.K.A. Howard, trans., Kitab al-Irshad, or The Book of Guidance into the Lives of the Twelve Imams by al-Shaykh al-Mufid, 1981; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad, 1996; Erling L. Petersen, 'Ali and Mu'awiya in Early Arabic Tradition, 1974; Abu Ja'far Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari, The Community Divided (The History of al-Tabari, vol. 16), translated by Adrian Brockett, 1997; Idem, The First Civil War (The History of al-Tabari, vol. 17), translated by G. R. Hawting, 1996; Maya Yazigi, "'Ali, Muhammad, and the Ansar: The Issue of Succession," JSS 53, no. 2 (2008).

SEAN W. ANTHONY

Aligarh

Located some 77 miles southeast of Delhi and 46 miles north of Agra, where the Taj Mahal stands, Aligarh underwent significant transformation after its conquest in 1801 by the British, who justified the conquest as the populace's liberation from an "intolerable yoke of oppression." In 1864, the British laid the railway line in Aligarh, dividing it into two: the old part, called shahr (town), and the new part, called the Civil Lines. Prior to the British conquest, the Civil Lines was largely uninhabited. When the British arrived, they built cantonments and bungalows there. The Civil Lines further developed when Sayyid Ahmad Khan founded the Muhammadan Anglo-Oriental (MAO) College, a "Muslim Cambridge," there in 1875. In 1920, the MAO College flowered into Aligarh Muslim University (AMU). The Civil Lines thus emerged as a small town with elites drawn from diverse locations. It symbolized colonial-aristocratic modernity. The district administrative buildings, court, railway station, post office, and so on were all in the Civil Lines. In the 20th century, the Civil Lines became famous worldwide for its university and the shahr for its locksmithing industry. With MAO College's foundation, Aligarh became a key network of what David Lelyveld has called "Muslim solidarity." For Indian Muslims under colonialism, Aligarh emerged as a crucial venue for multiple and diverse dialogues with their coreligionists, coinhabitants, the West, and the Muslim world. In particular, it became a vehicle for conversation with modern science and education. As the dialogues were diverse, so were the participants who belonged to many ideological shades.

Described by Fazlur Rahman (d. 1988) as the central figure of "Muslim modernism," Khan intended to orient Muslims toward a Western education. He sought to do this first by translating European knowledge into Indian languages. To this end, he formed the Scientific Society in 1866 and launched a journal called the Aligarh Institute Gazette. Later, he realized that Muslims could progress only when they directly acquired knowledge of the Western sciences. On his return in 1870 to India from a 17-month trip to Britain, Khan launched an Urdu journal called Tahzibul Akhlaq (Rectifying the morals). Its aim was to advocate social and educational reform of Muslims. It also issued a call to establish a college for Muslims. Khan hoped that the graduates of MAO College would "preach the gospel of free inquiry, of large-hearted toleration and of pure morality." The MAO College—its doors open to students of all faiths—began with four students, but enrollment increased every subsequent year. The first graduate was a Hindu, Ishvar Prasad. To attract more Muslim students to the college, in 1886 Khan established the pan-Indian Mohammadan Education Conference, held at a different place each year, where intellectuals such as Deputy (Dipti) Nazir Ahmad (1836–1912) delivered lectures and recited poems and representatives from all provinces passed resolutions.

Religion played an important role in the boarding houses of MAO College. Most students observed the daily prayers voluntarily. With Theodore Beck as the principal of MAO College, prayers were made mandatory, and punishments were introduced for not performing them. The annual ritual of Eid (the festival marking the end of Ramadan, the month when Muslims observe day-long fasting) was observed; so was the celebration of the Prophet's birthday (mawlid). The Turkish fez was part of the college uniform. These religious observances went hand in hand with the secular Western ones: observing the queen's birthday, participating in or attending debating clubs, and playing or watching cricket matches.

MAO College received both applause and criticisms at once. In a couplet, Akbar Allahbadi (1846–1921) worried that Khan's college would douse the students' Muslimness: "Thank God, they [students] attained much qualification / But alas they did not remain Muslim." In the novel Ibnul Waqt (Son of the moment/time), Nazir Ahmad satirized Khan's Westernism. In contrast, Altaf Husain Hali (1837–1914), who later wrote Khan's biography, applauded his mission and its outcome. He exhorted his readers to come to Aligarh College if they wanted to see a fine example of Hindu-Muslim friendship.

Notably, Aligarh became an important center of Urdu, which Muslims regarded not simply as a cosmopolitan language or literature but also as a rich, vibrant culture. But the dominant image of Aligarh—shared by the majority community (across ideological divides) as well as the enthusiasts for Pakistan—is as a center of "Muslim separatism" because, according to the popular assumption, it led and supported the movement for the creation of Pakistan in 1947. The established frameworks that construe Aligarh as a center of "separatism" (by Indian nationalists) or the birthplace of "Muslim nationalism" (by Pakistani enthusiasts) only show the extent to which our language is captive to nationalist sentiment. A different description is due—perhaps that of Rashid Ahmad Siddiqi, a noted Urdu litterateur: "Aligarh is neither a paradise nor a hell . . . it is a world where everyone has the freedom to make their own paradise or hell."

Although a trend in revisionist history within South Asian scholarship has questioned the discourse of "separatism," it continues to prevail. In postcolonial India, Aligarh became the symbol of the struggle for Muslim identity. The Indian state constantly sought to "nationalize" AMU by eradicating its Muslim minority character. Aligarh also became a site of activism to protect the Urdu language, which successive governments had tried to undermine. While the majoritarian nationalists rendered Urdu as a "foreign" language, for people such as Siddiqi, "Urdu's name is also Aligarh" (meaning how Aligarh and Urdu are inseparable from each other). Given the conjunction of such factors, Aligarh is seen, especially by the majoritarian nationalists, as a "mini-Pakistan" within the nation-space of India: a place of "national infidelity" where Muslims supposedly nurse, secretly if not publicly, sympathy for Pakistan. In 1998, Mahmudur Rahman, then vice chancellor of AMU, said that AMU was "bristling with ISI [Pakistan's Inter-Services Intelligence] agents." Since September 11, 2001, this image only sharpened, partly because the president of the Student Islamic Movement of India (SIMI), an organization banned by the state on allegations of terrorism, was an AMU alumnus, and SIMI was headquartered in Aligarh until the early 1980s. However, such prejudiced images of Aligarh—abundant in popular media of all hues (print, visual, English, or vernacular)—seldom depict how Muslims in Aligarh experience their lives in their full complexity and diversity.

See also India; madrasa; modernism; Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98)

Further Reading

Irfan Ahmad, Islamism and Democracy in India: The Transformation of Jamaat-e-Islami, 2009; David Lelyveld, Aligarh's First Generation: Muslim Solidarity in British India, 2003; Khaliq Ahmad Nizami, Secular Tradition at Aligarh Muslim University, 1991; Jamal Muhammad Siddiqi. Aligarh District: A Historical Survey from Ancient Times to 1803 AD, 1981; Rashid Ahmad Siddiqi, Maghribi Ta'lim ka Tassawur aur uska Nifaz 'Aligarh men, 1993.

IRFAN AHMAD

alliances

In tribal pre-Islamic Arabia, alliances (hilf) sometimes supplemented or even replaced common descent as a force holding groups together. Alliances were concluded through ceremonies and oaths. Three types may be discerned:

Cooperation between tribal groups for specific military or political purposes. Sometimes a group would act against its own tribe by forming an alliance with outsiders. Alliances also could be formed within the same tribe. The duration of such alliances varied, sometimes outlasting their original specific purpose; occasionally, the parties involved in the alliances took permanent oaths.

General cooperation. Pairs of tribal groups (or sometimes three groups) that were committed to cooperating with each other in a general way were known as "the [pair of] allies." Alliances of this kind sometimes led to a gradual merging of the parties involved.

Attachment of people to descent groups other than their original ones. A small tribal group would be accepted as "guest allies" by a larger, stronger group and sometimes would eventually merge with it. Such "hosting alliances" entailed specific rights and obligations, such as shared legal responsibility and mutual inheritance. Mutual assistance would be given in a variety of circumstances.

Alliances can hardly be considered an Islamic institution. In principle, Islamic solidarity was supposed to exclude groupings within the Muslim community (umma) because the whole of the umma is supposed to constitute one unified entity; yet historical sources reflect diverse attitudes. The Prophet Muhammad is reported to have been involved in pre-Islamic alliances. He also is reported to have said, "There are no alliances in Islam; but you should adhere to the pre-Islamic alliances." The two parts of this statement are sometimes recorded independently of one another, thus reflecting contradictory attitudes: one banning alliances and the other endorsing adherence at least to the pre-Islamic alliances. In any case, this statement bans new alliances. Some scholars claim that the ban applied only to specific alliances that contradicted Islamic rules and principles, such as the rules of inheritance (in the case of "hosting alliances") and the principle of unity among all Muslims. However, pre-Islamic alliances of all types continued to function in Islamic times, and new alliances were forged, too, regardless of whether they conformed to Islamic principles or not. Modifications of the pre-Islamic institution also occurred. For example, in Islamic times "guest allies" of a given descent group were counted as part of that group for administrative purposes.

The tribal political alliances typical of the Umayyad period (660–750) certainly infringed upon Islamic unity, as they reflected and further caused deep rifts within the community. This was one possible source of the widespread opposition to newly inaugurated alliances. Legal discussions of the subject remained vague. No attempt was made, for instance, to specify legal stipulations for new alliances that would make them conform to Islamic principles.

"Hosting alliances" continued to be established as late as the 13th century. Certain Muslim scholars rejected some or all of the legal effects of such alliances. Instead, they devised a substitute, though only for individuals and only for the purpose of attaching them to Arab groups. This substitute was the contractual relationships between nonagnates called walā' al-muwālāt, or walā' bi-l-hilf (contractual patronate, or patronate by alliance). Apart from that, political and military alliances in the later Middle Ages far exceeded the boundaries of the archaic hilf, and Muslim sources do not usually refer to them as such. The principle of Islamic unity was constantly violated by elite groups conspiring against governments and Muslim states forming alliances, sometimes with infidels, against other Muslim states. As this phenomenon was unacceptable in theory, Muslim scholars as a rule ignored it.

See also clients; tribalism

Further Reading

R. Amitai-Preiss, Mongols and Mamluks: The Mamluk-Ilkhanid War 1260–1281, 1995; J. A. Boyle, ed., The Cambridge History of Iran, vol. 5, The Saljuq and Mongol Periods, 1968; P. M. Holt, The Age of the Crusades: The Near East from the Eleventh Century to 1517, 1986; Idem, Early Mamluk Diplomacy (1260–1290): Treaties of Baybars and Qalāwūn with Christian Rulers, 1995; E. Landau-Tasseron, "Alliances among the Arabs," Al-Qantara 26 (2005); Idem, "Alliances in Islam," in Patronate and Patronage in Early and Classical Islam: Origin, Legal Regulations and Social Practice, edited by M. Bernards and J. Nawas, 2005; Idem, "The Status of Allies in Pre-Islamic and Early Islamic Arabian Society," Islamic Law and Society 13, no. 1 (2006).

ELLA LANDAU-TASSERON

Almohads (1130–1269)

The Almohad (or Mu'minid) dynasty was the first to rule a unified Islamic West (North Africa, excluding Egypt and the Iberian Peninsula) from 1130 to 1269.

The dynasty's first ruler was 'Abd al-Mu'min (r. 1130–63), a Zanata Berber from the area of Tlemcen and the conqueror of what are now Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia, as well as Andalus (Muslim Spain and Portugal). 'Abd al-Mu'min was a pupil of the Masmuda Berber Ibn Tumart (d. 1130), the founder of the Almohad (Arabic al-muwaḥḥid) movement, so-called because of the insistence on God's unity (tawḥīd) and the rejection of the anthropomorphist beliefs with which the previous dynasty, the Almoravids, were charged. Characterized as a Mahdi—meaning a messianic figure whose doctrine guaranteed religious certainty and truth—and as the inheritor of the station of prophecy and infallibility (wārith maqām al-nubuwwa wa-l-'iṣma), Ibn Tumart paved the way for 'Abd al-Mu'min's adoption of the caliphal title of "Commander of the Faithful" (amīr al-mu'minīn), first adopted in North Africa by the Fatimids. After defeating the Arab tribes (Qays 'Aylan) Banu Sulaym and Banu Hilal at Sétif in 1153, 'Abd al-Mu'min incorporated them into the Almohad army to free himself from the original Almohad (mostly Masmuda) tribes whose shaykhs constituted the backbone of the political and military organization. 'Abd al-Mu'min then adopted a Qaysi genealogy that included the Prophet Muhammad and the pre-Islamic Prophet Khalid b. Sinan, which—being a lineage of prophecy—was also a lineage entitled to the caliphate. In order to rule an extended empire, 'Abd al-Mu'min created new political and religious elites, the talaba and the ḥuffāẓ, who, after having received religious, intellectual, and military training, were sent to all the districts of the empire, charged with teaching Ibn Tumart's creeds and implementing Almohad policies recorded in official epistles, some of which have been preserved. Jews and Christians were forced to convert in the same way that Muslims were obliged to adhere to Ibn Tumart's understanding of true Islam. Changes were introduced in the direction and architecture of the mosques, new formulas were pronounced in the call to prayer, and the square shape came to characterize Almohad coins; all of these signs of the new era were brought on by the Mahdi. The Almohad anti-madhhab stance (i.e., rejection of legal discrepancies and therefore of the existing legal schools) led to a rapprochement to Zahirism and Ibn Hazm's legal and doctrinal views. The Almohad caliph's rule was assimilated to God's order (amr Allāh).

Under 'Abd al-Mu'min's successors, Abu Ya'qub Yusuf (r. 1163–84) and Abu Yusuf Ya'qub al-Mansur (r. 1184–99), Sufism and philosophy flourished as possible developments of the Almohad reformulation of Islamic doctrinal and political thought, producing the important works of Ibn Tufayl (d. 1185), Ibn Rushd (d. 1198), and Ibn al-'Arabi (d. 1240). Sufis and philosophers, however, were also subject to charges of heresy, with most Sufis emigrating to the Islamic East, as their claims to God's friendship were seen as a threat to Almohad "totalism" (tawḥīd). The use of the Berber language declined as the original local focus (the Islamic West as a sort of "new Hijaz") was gradually abandoned in favor of more universalistic tendencies, as shown in Ibn Jubayr's (d. 1217) Riḥla (Travels).

Fights against the Christians in the Iberian Peninsula did not succeed in the permanent recovery of lost territories, and the victory at Alarcos (1195) was shortly followed by the defeat at Las Navas de Tolosa (1212) and the loss of Córdoba and Valencia (1236 and 1238) and later Jaén and Sevilla (1248). In North Africa, the Almoravid Banu Ghaniya posed a constant military threat, while internal opponents—sometimes with Mahdist claims—had to be fought. Internal divisions among the Mu'minids and the Almohad elites eventually led to civil strife and even rejection of Ibn Tumart's figure and doctrine. The disintegration of the empire manifested itself in autonomous Hafsid rule in Tunisia and Eastern Algeria (1229) and in the conquest of Marrakesh by the Marinids in 1269, after their occupation of northern Morocco, while the 'Abd al-Wadids carved out a kingdom of their own in western Algeria with their capital at Tlemcen.

See also Almoravids (1056–1147); Ibn Tumart (ca. 1080–1130); Spain and Portugal (Andalus)

Further Reading

P. Cressier, M. Fierro, and L. Molina, eds., Los almohades: Problemas y perspectivas, 2005; H. Ferhat, Le Maghreb aux XIIème et XIIIème siècles: Les siècles de la foi, 1993; J.F.P. Hopkins, Medieval Muslim Government in Barbary until the Sixth Century of the Hijra, 1958; R. Le Tourneau, The Almohad Movement in North Africa in the Twelfth and Thirteenth Centuries, 1969.

MARIBEL FIERRO

Almoravids (1056–1147)

The Almoravid dynasty was a Berber (Sanhaja) dynasty that ruled over the extreme Maghrib (now Morocco and part of Algeria) and Andalus (Muslim Spain and Portugal) from the 11th century to the first half of the 12th century. Their name derives from murābiṭūn, "performers of ribāṭ'," usually interpreted as indicating their links with a fortified convent on the frontiers of Islam, although most likely referring to a way of life that united both spiritual and military discipline.

The Almoravid movement began among Judala and Lamtuna nomads in Southern Morocco and the Sahara who were involved in the salt, gold, and slave trade with West Africa. According to the accepted story, after performing the pilgrimage, a Judala chief asked Abu 'Imran al-Fasi (d. 1039), a reputed Qayrawani Maliki jurist and Ash'ari theologian, to accompany him to the desert to teach his tribesmen. Abu 'Imran refused but recommended he contact his pupil Wajjaj b. Zallu, who lived closer to their settlements. It was Wajjaj's pupil, the Maliki scholar 'Abdallah b. Yasin al-Jazuli, who followed the Judala chief Yahya b. Ibrahim to what is now Mauritania. Ibn Yasin eventually became the politico-religious leader, while Yahya b. 'Umar—from the Lamtuna branch of the Sanhaja—commanded the army.

Under their joint leadership, the Almoravids became the masters of the Sahara and Southern Morocco. Yahya b. 'Umar died in 1056 and was succeeded by his brother Abu Bakr b. 'Umar. Ibn Yasin died in 1058 while fighting the heretical Barghawata Berbers. His successor in religious leadership died shortly after. Meanwhile, Abu Bakr left for the Sahara accompanied by the Qayrawani scholar Muradi (d. 1095–96)—later to become the Mauritanian saint al-Imam al-Hadrami—leaving his cousin Yusuf b. Tashfin (d. 1106) as commander of the army in Morocco. It was under Ibn Tashfin—responsible for the conquest of the rest of Morocco, part of Algeria, and Andalus—that the movement united under a single religious, political, and military leadership, with the capital of the empire established in the newly founded Marrakesh.

Treatment of the Almoravids in historical sources shares many features with that of the Seljuqs, Turkish tribesmen who became the actual rulers of the central Abbasid lands and who were presented as champions of Sunnism with strong links to Sufi shaykhs. Like the Seljuqs, the Almoravids were invited by the ruling powers of the time to take control of the state. In the case of the Almoravids, the Andalusi Taifa kings—unable to stop Christian military advances in the Iberian Peninsula—reportedly asked for Ibn Tashfin's intervention in the Iberian Peninsula. Ibn Tashfin won the battle of Zallaqa (1086) and eventually incorporated Andalus into the Almoravid Empire. The new rulers and their Berber troops were seen by the Andalusis as aliens who inverted the normal rules, with the men veiling their faces—like the Tuaregs—and the women enjoying a high degree of freedom and influence.

Ibn Tashfin and his successors, who claimed a Himyari (Southern Arab) genealogy, adopted the title of "Commander of the Muslims" (amīr al-muslimīn) and acknowledged the Abbasid caliphate. The Sevillan Maliki scholar Abu Bakr b. al-'Arabi (d. 1148) was highly influential in this political move, having brought from Baghdad letters from Ghazali, Turtushi (d. 1126), and the Abbasid caliph that legitimized Almoravid rule. According to Abu 'Ubayd al-Bakri (d. 1094), such rule aimed at "propagating truth, repressing injustice and abolishing illegal taxes" (da'wat al-ḥaqq wa-radd al-maẓālim wa-qaṭ' al-maghārim). The Maliki jurists played an important religious and political role, with the Almoravid rulers asking for their legal opinions (fatāwā) to back their policies. At the same time, interest in Ash'ari theology grew. The Mirrors for Princes genre found fertile ground: Muradi wrote Kitab al-Ishara fi Tadbir al-Imara and Turtushi—settled in Alexandria—wrote Siraj al-Muluk.

Sufism flourished under the Almoravids to such an extent that those who claimed to be in God's proximity became suspect. Ghazali's works were burned and Sufi leaders with a great following—such as Ibn Barrajan and Ibn al-'Arif—were eliminated. However, the late Almoravid rulers were inclined to portray themselves as "friends of God" (awliyā' Allāh).

The Almohads considered the Almoravids heretics because of their alleged anthropomorphism, and they fought the Almoravids in Morocco, conquering Marrakesh in 1147. In Andalus, the weakening of Almoravid power in the fight against the Christians led to the formation of independent polities led by charismatic leaders (such as the Sufi Ibn Qasi), military men, or urban notables (mostly judges). Almohad intervention in the Iberian Peninsula eventually put an end to those new political entities and to the surviving Almoravid rule, with only the Massufa Banu Ghaniya managing to preserve their independence, ruling first in the Balearic Islands and then in Ifriqiya (Tunisia and Algeria).

See also Almohads (1130–1269); Berbers; North Africa; Spain and Portugal (Andalus)

Further Reading

J. Bosch Vila, Los almorávides, 1956 (repr. 1990); V. Lagardère, Les almoravides jusqu'au regne de Yusuf b. Tashfin (1039–1106), 1989; Idem, Les almoravides: Le djihad andalou (1106–1143), 1998; N. Levtzion, "'Abd Allah b. Yasin and the Almoravids," in Studies in West African Islamic History, vol. 1, edited by J. R. Willis, 1977; H. T. Norris, "New Evidence on the Life of 'Abdullah b. Yasin and the Origins of the Almoravid Movement," Journal of African History 12, no. 2 (1971).

MARIBEL FIERRO

Amal

Amal—an acronym for Afwaj al-Muqawama al-Lubnaniyya (the Lebanese Resistance Brigades), which also means "hope" in Arabic—was initially founded as the militia branch of Harakat al-Mahrumin (the Movement of the Deprived) in 1975. The Movement of the Deprived was established in 1974 by the charismatic religious leader Sayyid Musa al-Sadr. Born to an Iranian father and a Lebanese mother in Qum and trained at Najaf, Sadr had come to Lebanon from Iran in 1958. During the 1960s, a rapidly growing urban population of mostly Shi'i poor in Lebanon was mobilized through leftist parties such as the Lebanese Communist Party and the Syrian Socialist Nationalist Party. Sadr began to challenge the leftist parties for the loyalty of Shi'i youth by offering in their stead a movement dedicated to attaining political rights for the underrepresented Shi'is within the structures of the Lebanese state. In 1969, he founded the Islamic Shi'i Higher Council and later, in 1974, established the Movement of the Deprived.

Although the Movement of the Deprived initially called for greater rights for the politically and economically marginalized in Lebanon, it quickly became a Shi'i movement. Sadr drew on religious symbolism, and especially on the Battle of Karbala and the model of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson Imam Husayn, who was martyred at that battle in 680, to mobilize people and underscore the importance of resistance against oppression. In 1975, as the Lebanese civil war began, he formed Amal as the new movement's military branch.

In August 1978, while on a visit to Libya, Sadr mysteriously vanished, leading to a surge in his popularity. The unexplained nature of his disappearance suggested to many of his followers that he was still alive, and he was simultaneously catapulted into the Shi'i narrative of the Hidden Imam, such that some of his followers awaited his eventual return. That same year, to push back the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) fighters then based in Lebanon, Israel invaded the south, displacing nearly 250,000 people. The initial consequence of these two events was Amal's revitalization, as Amal militiamen fought PLO guerrillas in south Lebanon. Amal's popularity was also fueled by increasing Shi'i perceptions that the Lebanese left had failed both in securing greater rights for the poor and in protecting the south from the fighting between the PLO and Israel.

Following the 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran and the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon and the siege of Beirut, many prominent members of Amal left the party, accusing it and its leader, Nabih Berri, of having become increasingly involved in patronage politics and detached from the larger struggles against poverty and Israeli occupation. Berri's decision to join the National Salvation Committee, led by Lebanese president Elias Sarkis, in 1982 during the Israeli siege was especially viewed as selling out the resistance. Many of those who left, including Sayyid Hasan Nasrallah, who became Hizbullah's secretary general in 1992, went on to join Hizbullah, the Shi'i militia that gained prominence in Lebanon in the mid-1980s and by the mid-1990s was the most popular Shi'i political party in Lebanon.

Amal, however, persisted and in 2010 was one of the two Lebanese Shi'i-specific political parties led by Berri. Although Amal did not highlight an Islamic ideology in the way that Hizbullah did and never called for the establishment of an Islamic state in Lebanon, a religious undercurrent existed in the party's official statements. Belief in God was highlighted in its founding charter, as was the trope of Karbala and Imam Husayn's martyrdom for the side of good in that battle as a model of resistance against oppression, Lebanese nationalism, and an anti-Zionist stance. Furthermore, Amal continued to highlight its heritage and cast its members as the rightful heirs to Sadr's original movement. In this, Amal competed not only with Hizbullah but also with other social welfare institutions originally founded by Sadr and then led by his sister, Rabab al-Sadr.

See also Hizbullah; Lebanon; Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO); Shi'ism

Further Reading

Augustus Richard Norton, Amal and the Shi'a: Struggle for the Soul of Lebanon, 1987; Idem, Hezbollah: A Short History, 2007.

LARA DEEB

anarchism

Anarchism, the idea of abolishing government, has a long tradition in Muslim thinking. In part, the origins of Islamic anarchism can be found in the Qur'an, which is vague on issues of government and political succession. Islamic anarchism began when a large group seceded from the forces of the caliph 'Ali b. Abi Talib (r. 656–61) during the First Islamic Civil War. This group became the Kharijis, whose rallying cry was "judgment belongs only to God." Some of these Kharijis extended this idea to political anarchism. The Kharijis from Najd region, in particular, earned a reputation in early Islamic history for maintaining that the people were obligated and able to uphold God's law without the rule of an imam or other leaders.

The Najdis' rejectionist attitude was kept alive in Islamic discourse over the centuries. Ninth-century Basra was home to Mu'tazili thinkers and also some Zaydi Shi'is who were sympathetic to the Najdi view of government. Ja'far b. Harb (d. 850), a Mu'tazili writer, noted that a belief in anarchy was common among Mu'tazilis of the period. A popular Mu'tazili argument was that since the rulers continually set themselves and their kinsmen as kings, it was better to do away with government altogether. Prominent Mu'tazilis, including al-Asamm (d. ca. 817), Hisham al-Fuwati (d. ca. 833), al-Nazzam (d. between 835 and 845), and 'Abbad b. Sulayman (d. 874), articulated similar views.

The Sunni response was to concede that anarchism was possible in theory but impossible in practice. Later Islamic thinkers accepted this compromise. Ghazali (d. 1111) concluded that government was necessary, but he did not go on to characterize those who held dissenting views as infidels. Later, Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406) agreed with the Mu'tazilis that if people could live by God's law, then there was no need for an imam.

Another anarchist trend within Islam originated with Sufi groups, some of whom preached antiauthoritarian ideas. Their often intentionally vague declarations spoke of the unnecessary nature of state power. These Sufis may have inspired 20th-century Muslim anarchists as well. Sufi groups were often prominent in resistance to state control, as is evident in their involvement with the Chechen resistance to the Tsarist Empire or the North African Arab resistance to the French.

In the 19th century, the ideas of Western anarchists began to circulate in the Arab and Muslim world. The Lebanese writer Butrus al-Bustani, while critical of Western socialism, repeated the observation of previous Muslim thinkers that anarchism was a part of the political tradition of Bedouin tribes. In the early 20th century, a number of European anarchists and adventurers converted to Islam. A prominent example is the Swiss-Russian adventurer Isabelle Burchart, who converted to Islam in Algeria and became involved with the Sufi resistance to the French occupation. Other examples include the Swedish painter Ivan Agueli and the French cartoonist Gustave-Henri Jossot, who both were part of anarchist circles and hostile to statist Christianity before their conversion. In 2005, Yakob Islam, a British Muslim convert, published the Muslim Anarchist Charter, which calls for the creation of communities in which "peaceful cultural evolution is uninhibited by power, greed, or ignorance." European anarchist converts to Islam found in Sufism a facet of Islam that was nonhierarchical, exemplified anarchist principles, and was a counterbalance to statist Christianity. They also found Islam compatible with the Western anarchist tradition, though they were largely unaware of the doctrines of the Kharijis and Mu'tazilis.

See also government; individualism; libertarianism; shari'a

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Eadem, "Ninth-Century Muslim Anarchists," Past & Present, no. 167 (2000); Yakob Islam, Muslim Anarchist Charter, 2005; Cecily Mackworth, The Destiny of Isabelle Eberhardt, 1977; Elie Adib Salem, Political Theory and Institution of the Khawarij, 1956.

JOSEPH HAMMOND

apartheid

The word "apartheid" entered South African politics in the post–World War II years and became an official ideology upon the National Party's victory in the 1948 general elections. Until the first democratic elections of 1994, which brought majority rule to the country, the white National Party ruled the country on the basis of its philosophy of apartheid. "Apartheid" is Afrikaans (a creole language made by European settlers and slaves by the early 19th century) and translates as "separateness" or "apartness." Its defenders argued that blacks were inferior and found biblical justification for these views; thus whites, with a superior civilization, had the right and responsibility to govern over blacks. After the end of apartheid, apologists argued that it had simply expressed a badly implemented belief in cultural autonomy for the separate groups that made up the country.

The National Party of Prime Minister D. F. Malan, from 1948 until the end of apartheid rule, implemented policies of separate and unequal development that radically discriminated against the country's majority nonwhite population. Later administrations refined the legal and administrative practices by which apartheid was implemented. Apartheid entailed a series of laws such as the prohibition of marriage between whites and nonwhites, residential segregation and the appropriation of nonwhites' property by whites, a register that classified the population into "races," and other practices that seriously discriminated against the majority population. Apartheid also gave support to an exploitative economic system based on cheap labor, especially in the important mining sectors, and continued an extensive process of land dispossession in rural and urban areas. Although apartheid became the official ideology of the state only from the late 1940s, in many ways it had been the practice of the previous governments as well.

Given the cold war context in which it emerged, the major Western powers never condemned the apartheid state; instead, it was a Western ally in the sub-Saharan region. The apartheid state developed very close ties with Israel. Egypt and Lebanon were the only Arab states with representation in South Africa, but they cut ties with South Africa in the 1950s, and the Arab bloc countries came to be major supporters of the antiapartheid movement. Al-nizām al-'unṣuriyya, which is how apartheid came to be translated into Arabic, was heavily attacked in the Arabic media, not least for its connection to Israel. However, the Shah's Iran maintained close ties to South Africa until the revolution of 1979, and Turkey never cut its ties with South Africa. Other Muslim states kept a safe distance from the apartheid state. Informal networks, however, existed with the country's Muslim population.

Apartheid was provided with significant legitimacy by the Dutch Reformed Church, and the country was conceived as a "Christian country" ruled by Christian values and led by believing Christians. Opposition to apartheid was routinely dismissed as communist inspired and anti-Christian in origin. The country's small Muslim population was largely classified as "Malay" or "Indian" and, in most cases, lived among the urban-based, nonwhite working class and small middle class. The Muslim religious leadership taught that, since Muslims were a minority and were allowed to practice their basic religious duties, they should not engage in antiapartheid political campaigns. Indeed, Muslims could build mosques, make the call to prayer, take days off for the religious festivals ('id), perform the annual pilgrimage to Mecca, and so forth. However, there was a long history of Muslims articulating various forms of resistance to segregation policies.

Opposition to apartheid by the black majority became increasingly radical throughout the 1950s, and eventually an armed struggle was launched in the early 1960s. Muslims were involved in all the major campaigns. But a response against racial discrimination based in the teachings of Islam took root among the youth only in the later 1950s, becoming more radical and finding a larger following with the 1976 countrywide student uprising until the end of apartheid. Imam Abdullah Haron, a young activist imam at a Cape Town mosque, represented this opposition to apartheid on firmly Islamic grounds. He was ultimately killed by the police while in detention in 1969. After his death, a series of Islamic initiatives addressed the apartheid question as a necessary issue for South African Muslims on explicitly Islamic grounds. Political action was an integral part of the faith as prayer was.

Islamic views of social justice, explicated in English translations of works by Sayyid Qutb and Abul al-A'la Mawdudi, were popular in the 1980s. After the Iranian revolution, the ideas of 'Ali Shari'ati, the Iranian thinker who had produced a body of thought founded on Islam and Marxism, circulated in the country. These ideas went beyond a condemnation of racial discrimination and also comprised a critique of class inequality and, later, of gender-based discrimination.

See also South Africa

Further Reading

William Beinart, Twentieth-Century South Africa, 2001; Deborah Posel, The Making of Apartheid, 1948–1961: Conflict and Compromise, 1991; Muhammed Haron, Muslims in South Africa: An Annotated Bibliography, 1997; Abdul Kader Tayob, "Muslims' Discourse on Alliance against Apartheid," Journal for the Study of Religion 3, no. 2 (1990).

SHAMIL JEPPIE

apocalypse

Deriving from the New Testament's Apocalypse or Book of Revelation, the first work to bear such a generic designation, the term "apocalypse" refers to dire and violent happenings that presage the end of the world, and/or consummation of the divine plan, as well as to the end of the world itself. Scholarship in religious studies over the last 50 years suggests that apocalypse is a complex literary and social historical phenomenon that comprises three separate categories intimately related in history and individual religious experience: eschatology, social movement, and literary genre. The Islamic instance provides an instructive example of how these three modes or manifestations of apocalypse influence one another and then separate into self-contained categories once again.

Islamic eschatology is clearly apocalyptic in form and content, focusing as it does on ultimate judgment of the wicked and the good, another world, an end to time, and so on. In his trailblazing work Muhammad et le fin du monde (Muhammad and the end of the world), Paul Casanova recognized a distinct and characteristic eschatological vision in the Qur'an and identified in it two major relevant moments corresponding with the Meccan and Medinan phases of the Prophet's career. In the first, Muhammad expects the imminent end of the world and warns his audience about it, while in the second, the responsibilities of the newly formed Islamic community divert his attention from preoccupation with the world's end, which causes him to focus on the welfare of the community. The Qur'an nonetheless remains permeated with eschatological motifs and scenarios, and these are, perhaps somewhat unequally, spread over these two traditional periods of revelation. The end time of the world and the end time of the Muslim community or individual are somehow conflated. Individual salvation or damnation replaces concern with the actual end of the world. The apocalyptic vision frames Qur'anic eschatology and conditions the entire text, regardless of specific topic or subject otherwise at hand. Key Qur'anic terms such as the hereafter (al-ākhira), paradise (al-janna), and hell (jahannam) are pertinent markers of apocalypse as eschatology. Even more important is "the [approaching] Hour" (al-sā'a), or "the Appointed Time," a phrase that appears 48 times in the Qur'an. The hour is inevitable (Q. 40:59) and cannot be delayed or hastened (Q. 35:12). Its time is known only to God (Q. 43:85). Nonetheless, the heavens and the Earth are even now "heavy" with the hour (Q. 7:187). The approaching event, however designated, is a prominent topic in both Meccan and Medinan suras, where, together with descriptions of paradise and hell, it ranks as one of major themes of the Qur'an. Among the most dramatic events associated with the hour, synonymous with impending occurrences referred to as al-amr (the cause), al-wāqi'a (the event), al-qiyāma (the resurrection), and al-qāri'ah (the calamity), are the following: the splitting of the moon (Q. 54:1), a massive earthquake accompanied by mass terror (Q. 22:1–2), disbelievers surrounded by clouds of fire (Q. 39:16), mountains crushed and scattered "like carded wool" (Q. 20:105; 27:88; 52:10; 56:5; 70:9; 101:5), the Earth illuminated by divine light (Q. 39:69), the presence of all previous prophets (Q. 39:69), the broadcasting of the deeds of all humankind (Q. 39:69), universal judgment and dispensing of justice (Q. 39:69), believers' entrance into paradise, and polytheists' abandonment by their gods (Q. 30:12–16). In addition, many hadith reports attributed to the Prophet speak of the nearness of the hour in greater detail, sometimes including specific dates. Such a focus in Islam's scripture is naturally and inevitably linked to those numerous messianic or apocalyptic movements that have been a feature of Islamic history from the very beginning, eventually emerging also from Sunni, Shi'i, and Sufi traditions. The apocalyptic, messianic, and visionary-cum-experiential élan of the Qur'an and the hadith is such that numerous "Islamicate" individuals, groups, and movements continue to derive their identities and orientation in direct reference to it to the present day.

The early Islamic community has a remarkable affinity with the type of religious community (e.g., Qumran) classified in the literature as apocalyptic. The factions that emerged after the Prophet's death also employed and exploited the rhetoric of apocalypse: proto-Shi'is, with their multiple fissiparous developments, and their opponents. Muhammad's preaching was interpreted as involving the establishment of a saved community in an Islamic iteration of the Abrahamic theme of a divine remnant (baqiyyat allāh; Q. 11:86). Quite apart from the portents of the end found frequently in the short "hymnic" suras of the Qur'an, the hadith literature also portrays an urgent expectation of an end to history that must be faced by the community. A dramatic example of this is the "booth like the booth of Moses" hadith, which features the Prophet instructing two of the faithful not to bother making overly sturdy mosques of brick and wood but rather counseling them to use more convenient thatch structures because the apocalypse (al-amr) was due to happen at any moment. In the history and development of subsequent apocalyptic social and military developments, there is remarkably scant concern with the Qur'an itself as a reflection or source of an apocalyptic ethos (see Cook).

A significant stratum of post-Qur'anic apocalyptic literature focuses on events in the five holy cities of Jerusalem, Alexandria, Antioch, Constantinople, and even Rome—something that may indicate a vision among early Muslim groups of the conquest of all Christendom in one triumphant gesture. Much apocalyptic and messianic lore is used as validation, sometimes post-eventum, for the major political dynasties of Islam, including the Umayyads, the Abbasids, the Fatimids, the Ottomans, the Safavids, and others. Likewise, groups and movements who disputed the authority of such triumphant religiopolitical powers all relied to one degree or another on a specific interpretation of Qur'anic apocalyptica, especially with regard to eschatology and the centerpiece of Islamicate religious authority: the institution known as walāya, a complex term that suggests numinous presence, devotion, and guardianship as well as political, moral, and spiritual authority simultaneously with allegiance to this same authority. Such apocalyptic historical movements include the Kharijis, the 'Uthmanis, the Kaysanis, the Qarmatians, the Khurramis, some of the activities of Hallaj (d. 922) and his followers, the Abbasid revolution (749–50), the Hurufis, the Nuqtawis, the Sarbadarids, the Ni'matullahis, the Shaykhis, the Babis, the Baha'is, the Mahdi of Sudan, the Ahmadis, the Iranian Revolution (1978–79), al-Qaeda, and others. So pronounced and pervasive is this feature of Islam that it stimulated various apocalyptic and messianic movements among Jews and Christians within the abode of Islam. It was not only the marginalized of Islamicate society who sought to calculate the precise time of the end of the world and to offer descriptions, based on the Qur'an and the hadith, of the events that will accompany it, but also such prominent figures, among others, as Kindi, Ghazali, Suhrawardi, Ibn al-'Arabi, Ibn Taymiyya, Ahmad Sirhindi, Sayyid Qutb, Mawdudi, and Ayatollah Khomeini. Of course, contemplation of such themes and imagery need not result in a political or historical vision, and many of the mystics of Islam offered a more purely existential and personal interpretation of such material.

There is almost a perfect fit between the contemporary theory of apocalypse (see Collins) and the Qur'an text (see Lawson, Gnostic). The Qur'an is as much about revelation as it is about God or His prophets, so it may be viewed as a kind of meta-apocalypse, one that is conscious of itself and in which it is, in fact, the main character of the revelatory communication. In the Qur'an, several interrelated subthemes are markers of the apocalypse as a literary genre. Perhaps the most important is the agency of the angel in the process of revelation. Some others include the interplay of duality and opposition (the enantiodromia of the church fathers), revelation, glory, justice, history and its periodization, story, otherworldly beings, and paradise. Typological figuration is a potent Qur'anic literary device by which the apocalyptic élan of the Qur'an is expressed, whether in relation to itself and its immediate audience or through taking account of previous religious history to demonstrate that Muhammad's mission is of the same order of authority and vision as previous messages. In this way, the Qur'an functions as a commentary on previous scripture in much the same way that the New Testament functions as a commentary on the Old Testament. Apocalypse also involves an overall atmosphere or voice of urgency and intensity that characterizes both the delivery and reception of the revelation (see Lawson, "Duality")—the sense of being on the verge of something, as if waking from a dream, when the supralogical device of typological figuration engages with the imagination of the audience. Time collapses, the voice of the Qur'an is heard as the message of all prophets, and the impending reckoning is yet another in a cycle. This cyclical pattern of apocalypse is demonstrated in the Qur'an through the stories of several previous prophets and their communities. An excellent example is in the Qur'an's narrative about the communities of 'Ad and Thamud and their prophet Salih. In this story, there occurs a great mysterious scream or cry that is heard by 'Ad and Thamud symbolizing the irruption of the divine into the world to call it to account (see Stetkevych). It dramatizes the nearness of the overwhelming, divine power that is "closer than the jugular vein" (Q. 50:16) yet simultaneously utterly remote: "its like is not comparable to anything" (Q. 42:11; 112:4). In a fine example of serene self-consciousness, the Qur'an calls this the divine presence (sakīna, e.g., 48:4, 26; 9:40), a complex notion involving tranquility and the occasional aid of invisible hosts. It descends, according to the tradition, with the chanting of the Qur'an, and it is seen to have much in common with the descent of other powers and energies, such as the angels and the spirit mentioned in connection with the Night of Power (laylat al-qadr; Q. 97). The Qur'an presents an articulation and dramatization of many, if not all, of the themes and phenomena associated with the genre of apocalypse, and this category of religious expression and action was not only an integral part of the mission of the Prophet and the life of his movement but also a formative feature of various historical Islamic societies' major forms of thought, social rhythms, and political and spiritual institutions.

See also messianism; Qur'an; utopia

Further Reading

Suliman Bashear, "Early Muslim Apocalyptic Materials," Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society 3, no. 1 (1991); Shahzad Bashir, Messianic Hopes and Mystical Visions: The Nūrbakhshīya between Medieval and Modern Islam, 2003; Norman O. Brown, "The Apocalypse of Islam," Social Text, no. 8. (1983–84); Paul Casanova, Mohammed et la Fin du Monde: Étude critique sur l'Islam primitif, 1911–24; John J. Collins, The Apocalyptic Imagination: An Introduction to the Jewish Matrix of Christianity, 1989; David L. Cook, Studies in Muslim Apocalyptic, 2002; Todd Lawson, "Duality, Opposition and Typology in the Qur'an: The Apocalyptic Substrate," Journal of Qur'anic Studies 10, no. 2 (2008); Idem, Gnostic Apocalypse in Islam: The Literary Beginnings of the Babi Movement, 2010; Jaroslav Stetkevych, Muhammad and the Golden Bough: Reconstructing Arabian Myth, 1996.

TODD LAWSON

apostasy

Apostasy is the abandonment of Islam either by a declared desertion in favor of another religion or by a clandestine rejection of Islam often combined with the secret practice of another religion. From the earliest period of Islamic law in the seventh century, Muslim jurists agreed that apostasy bears the death penalty. During the early period, however, jurists also developed legal institutions to circumvent this harsh punishment. These institutions set the standard for what counts as apostasy from Islam so high that before the 11th century practically no judgment of apostasy could be passed. This changed during the 11th century, when jurists lowered the criteria that prevented the death penalty from being applied. In the following centuries, judges could interpret the law in various ways, setting either high or low criteria for punishing apostates from Islam.

The Qur'an does not mention the case of explicit rejection of Islam after conversion. However, it does address the assumed clandestine apostasy of a group of people at Medina called al-munāfiqūn (the hypocrites). No worldly penalty is ordained for them so long as they refrain from rebellion, but harsh punishments are proclaimed for them in the afterlife. In the Qur'an (49:14), a group of Bedouins is described as Muslims but not believers. This led to lively discussions of the criteria for being a Muslim, understood in terms of legal membership in the Islamic community, versus being a believer (mu'min), understood as someone deserving otherworldly salvation.

The dispute about the meaning of "Muslim" and of "mu'min" is one of the subjects that led to the First Islamic Civil War (656–61). One party, the Kharijis, claimed that committing a capital sin (kabīra) reveals unbelief (kufr). A group of radical Kharijis felt justified in killing grave sinners as unbelievers and thus legitimated the killing of the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56). At about the same time, Muslims agreed that the penalty for apostasy from Islam should be death. This judgment is based on the authority of a hadith of the Prophet that states, "Whoever changes his religion is to have his head cut off." After the Kharijis lost the civil war, the various groups of their enemies, who dominated the early development of Islamic law, were terrified by the prospect of Muslims killing each other over accusations of apostasy and worked to abate the harsh punishment prescribed in the hadith.

Early Muslim jurists agreed that actions other than the explicit rejection of belief in Islam could not constitute apostasy. To commit a sin could not be an act of apostasy. Apostasy was regarded as the declared rejection of Islam and could only be sufficiently established after a person accused of apostasy had rejected three offers to repent and return to Islam. The legal institution of the "invitation to repent" (istitāba) is mentioned neither in the Qur'an nor in the hadith. In early Islamic law, it nevertheless became a necessary condition for convicting an apostate. It safeguarded that an accused apostate had a chance to return to Islam, to fully avert punishment, and to be reinstated in all rights as a Muslim. Subsequently, only those Muslim apostates who openly declared their abandonment of Islam and who maintained their rejection in the face of capital punishment could be punished.

Most early jurists understood that the general application of istitāba effectively ruled out any penalty for apostasy. They allowed persons accused of apostasy to declare their return to Islam even when it was understood to be nominal. This became the accepted position in the early Hanafi and Shafi'i schools of law. Their views fitted well into a situation during the eighth and ninth centuries when conversion to Islam happened collectively and often only nominally. Malik b. Anas (d. 795), the founder of the Maliki school of law, ruled differently, saying that zanādiqa (which could be translated as "heretics") should not be given the right to repent and could thus be killed straightaway. What he meant by zanādiqa here is not entirely clear. Later Maliki jurists understood it to mean clandestine apostates—in other words, people who broke away from Islam but still paid lip service to it in order to avoid punishment. Some Maliki jurists went still further and applied this judgment even in cases when the apostasy was only implied—for example, when a person expressed opinions that were deemed contrary to Islam. This ruling meant that the Maliki school of jurisprudence was, in practice, less tolerant of heterodox Muslim views than others. It allowed Maliki jurists to apply the death penalty against accused apostates who had never explicitly abandoned Islam. In some cases, heterodox views were regarded as evidence of clandestine apostasy.

During the 11th century, the consensus of the Hanafi and Shafi'i jurists regarding the general application of the "invitation to repent" broke down. Hanbali jurists had already argued that some points of religious doctrine were so central to the Muslim creed that a violation should be regarded as apostasy from Islam and punished by death. During the mid-11th century, scholars from all schools argued that in the case of the political agents of the Isma'ili-Shi'i countercaliphate, no "invitation to repent" should be granted and the agents could be killed as apostates even if they repented. This view was shared by the influential Shafi'i jurist Ghazali (d. 1111), who wrote systematically about the criteria of apostasy and developed the judgment of apostasy into a legal tool that could be used to pass capital punishment on Muslims who held views that violated central elements of the Muslim creed.

After the 11th century, Muslim jurists had a choice between applying either the tolerant rules of the early Islamic period aimed at preventing the application of the judgment of apostasy or the rules established by Ghazali and others that allowed the application of the judgment even in cases where the apostasy was not openly declared. While the Hanafi school, for instance, generally maintained the early, tolerant principles, the other three schools of Sunni law were open to the stricter application.

In the modern period, Muslim fundamentalist thinkers like Mawdudi justified the death penalty for apostasy from Islam. Mawdudi compared it to the punishment of high treason in, for instance, the British legal system. The judgment of apostasy played an important role in the attempts of radical fundamentalist groups such as the Egyptian al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya to legitimate violence against the state and its representatives. In the recent past, there have also been cases in which fundamentalist Muslims applied the judgment of apostasy in its stricter interpretation against secular or liberal thinkers in Islam.

See also excommunication; Faraj, Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam (1954–82); al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya; Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); hadith; Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la (1903–79)

Further Reading

Frank Griffel, "Toleration and Exclusion: al-Shāfi'ī and al-Ghazālī on the Treatment of Apostates," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 64, no. 3 (2001); Sherman A. Jackson, On the Boundaries of Theological Tolerance in Islam: Abū Ḥāmid al-Ghazālī's Faysal al-Tafriqa bayna al-Islām wa al-Zandaqa, 2002; Abu al-A'la Mawdudi, Punishment of the Apostate According to Islamic Law, translated by Syed Silas Husain and Ernest Hahn, 1994; Rudolph Peters and Gert J. J. de Vries, "Apostasy in Islam," Die Welt des Islams 17, no. 1 (1976).

FRANK GRIFFEL

Arab nationalism

"Arab nationalism" (al-qawmiyya al-'arabiyya) conventionally refers to the belief that, by virtue of their common history, language, and culture, the Arabs constitute a single nation whose political destiny can only be realized by uniting their divided people into one single, sovereign, national state. The political doctrine of Arab nationalism is thought to have emerged in reaction to imperial despotism during the late Ottoman Empire before being confounded by British and French machinations at the time of World War I, when the region was carved up into separate subnational states. Arab nationalism experienced a revival during the 1940s and 1950s in the romantic nationalist ideologies of Sati' al-Husri (d. 1968) and the Ba'th Party and the anticolonial nationalism of Gamal Abdel Nasser. Yet following the collective failure of the Arab nations to prevent the territorial expansion of Israel in the Six Day War of 1967, Arab nationalism has largely been considered a spent force. National identities attached to local states seem to have superseded Pan-Arabism. When revanchist movements do exist, they are couched in the language of Islam, not secular nationalism. While Arab nationalism can be understood either as a consciously articulated political doctrine or as an objective expression of an essential and immutable sociocultural truth, these are not the only options, as recent sociological work has shown.

The first generation of Western scholars to study Arab nationalism was largely concerned with accounting for its origins as a cultural movement during the late Ottoman Empire and tracing its evolution into a fully fledged doctrine of nationalism by the 1940s. Historians such as Albert Hourani, Nikki R. Keddie, and Sylvia G. Haim adopted an implicitly idealist view of nationalism, which led them to focus on intellectual production in their search for the precursors of nationalist consciousness. Works by intellectuals, reformers, and literary writers in Syria and Lebanon during the cultural renaissance of the late 19th century provided the first hints of a distinctly Arab identity. Increased educational activity by Christian missionaries from the United States, France, and Russia sparked new interest in reinvigorating Arabic literature: belles-lettrists such as Butrus al-Bustani (d. 1883) and his contemporaries opened the door to innovation by editing dictionaries, compiling encyclopedias, and adapting the Arabic language to suit the demands of scientific discoveries made in Europe. Cultural salons and literary clubs, which sprang up in Beirut and other cities in the 1860s and 1870s, became a key channel for the dissemination of a revived Arab identity that became increasingly valuable as a way to mobilize against the despotic policies of Sultan Abdülhamid (d. 1909) and the trend toward the increasing Turkification of the Ottoman Empire. In addition to the secular, mostly Christian writers of the Nahḍa (Awakening), Islamic reformists such as Afghani and Muhammad 'Abduh were similarly identified as protonationalists. According to this narrative, nationalism was essentially an idea imported from Europe and then adapted to suit conditions local to the Arab world.

Arab nationalists writing in the 1940s and 1950s took a dim view of the notion that they had "borrowed" their political doctrine; to them, their Arab identity was so deeply rooted in their culture that it was almost biological. Husri is perhaps the most influential advocate of the thesis that the Arabic language formed the essence of the historical Arab nation. Husri argued strongly against the French theory of a voluntaristic, civic nationalism and espoused a romantic, organic view of the nation derived from German philosophers such as Johann Gottlieb Fichte and Johann Gottfried Herder. The appeal of German nationalist theories can partly be explained by the reaction against Britain and France following their dismemberment of the Arab body politic after World War I. Husri's writings did much to popularize the idea that nations were natural features of human society: unique groups united by ancient ties of blood and race. Such notions had a profound influence on Michel 'Aflaq, a founder of the Ba'th Party. Gamal Abdel Nasser, however, understood Arab nationalism in more pragmatic terms: for him it was less a cultural or spiritual entity than a political instrument to mobilize support for his position as head of state. The unification of Egypt and Syria (1958–61) proved to be a disastrous experiment, permanently dividing Nasser and the Ba'thists and splitting the Arab nationalist movement. The Arab defeat of 1967 and Nasser's death in 1970 seemed to mark the defeat of nationalist dreams of Arab unity by the harsh truths of real-world politics.

While earlier narratives of Arab nationalism were based on this idealist-materialist divide, since the 1980s this dichotomy has been rejected in favor of a more nuanced sociological approach. The revisionist narrative of Arab nationalism is inspired by works such as Ernest Gellner's Nations and Nationalisms (1983) and Benedict

Anderson's Imagined Communities (1991), which propose that nationalism is the product not of a particular intellectual genealogy but of a particular configuration of modern sociological processes. These processes include urbanization, modern education, industrialization, the conjunction of the printing press and capitalism, and the modern representational technologies of cartography and census-taking. Gellner and Anderson's "modernist" approach implies that a focus on elites is misplaced: Middle East scholars such as James Gelvin, Israel Gershoni, and Keith Watenpaugh show how the nation is instead produced through the everyday practices of the popular classes. This new wave of writing inscribes both subaltern agency and the oft-overlooked decade of the 1920s into the old narrative of Arab nationalism.

While much of this work focuses on the creation of local rather than Pan-Arab nationalisms (e.g., Joseph Massad's Colonial Effects [2001]), it also highlights that practices of nationalism can simultaneously serve apparently contradictory ends. Local state nationalism does not necessarily oppose broader, suprastate identities, whether religious or ethnonational. From this perspective, the consolidation of local national identities need not entail the retreat of Arab nationalism. Indeed, recent work on the proliferation of satellite and Internet communication across the Arab world argues that this new transnational space is giving rise to a revived (and considerably revised) understanding of the "Arab nation." Only by attending to what nationalism means to a given population—rather than applying 19th-century formulas—can we even begin to assess the state of contemporary Arab nationalism.

See also Ba'th Party; nationalism; Pan-Islamism

Further Reading

James L. Gelvin, "Modernity and Its Discontents: On the Durability of Nationalism in the Arab Middle East," Nations and Nationalism 5, no. 1 (1999); Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1962; Israel Jankowski and Israel Gershoni, eds., Rethinking Nationalism in the Arab Middle East, 1997; Bassam Tibi, Arab Nationalism: Between Islam and the Nation-State, 1997.

DANIEL NEEP

Arafat, Yasir (1929–2004)

For four decades, Yasir Arafat served as a leader and a symbol of the Palestinian national cause. His rise to prominence paralleled the ascendancy of the Palestinian National Liberation Movement (Harakat al-Tahrir al-Watani al-Filastini), known commonly as Fatah. Arafat cofounded Fatah in 1959 with other Palestinian university students and activists, all of whom had become refugees during the war of 1948 to 1949. Arafat's significance lies in his legacy as leader of the Palestinian national movement. From 1968 to 1969, Fatah took control of the Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO), a body originally established under the auspices of the Arab League and intended as a means to sublimate and thus control Palestinian nationalist sentiments. As a result of the takeover, Arafat became the chairman of the PLO and thereby acquired diplomatic recognition, at least initially among Arab states, as the leader of the Palestinian people. From this platform, Arafat projected a distinct interpretation of what it meant to be Palestinian and, in doing so, established the terms of political identity for all other competing movements, including Pan-Arab nationalists and Islamists.

In contrast to Pan-Arabists, Arafat insisted on the priority of independent action, particularly through armed struggle, to (1) catalyze a specifically Palestinian nationalist identity among the dispersed and fractured Palestinian communities and (2) provoke wider Arab involvement by capturing the imagination and sympathy of the Arab masses. Pragmatic to the core, Arafat worked with individuals and groups espousing diverging orientations—from Islamism to secular nationalism and Marxism. The sole criterion for cooperation was shared commitment to liberating the territories lost in 1948.

The Six Day War of June 1967 proved decisive in the definitive rise of Fatah and the approach it advocated. The war left Pan-Arabism and its state sponsors in disarray. Fatah, at Arafat's urging, stepped into the gap by organizing armed cells within the territories newly occupied by Israel. Although tactically ineffective, Fatah-led guerrilla attacks inspired a generation of Palestinian youths to align with the movement and its message of Palestinian self-assertion. Appearing consistently in military fatigues, with a pistol at his side and a scruffy beard on his face, Arafat quickly became the symbol of this newfound empowerment.

Exploiting its growing prominence, Fatah took control of the PLO from 1968 to 1969. Soon after, the Palestinian National Council (PNC), the PLO's governing body, elected Arafat chairman of the executive committee, the organization's main day-to-day decision-making unit. He held that position continuously and later assumed the presidency of the Palestinian National Authority (PNA) until his death in 2004.

Under Arafat, the PLO became a state-in-exile that worked to integrate the dispersed Palestinian constituencies. Arafat enticed political competitors into the organization, using a combination of patronage, allocation of seats in the PNC, and coercion to maintain cohesion. He also cultivated the backing of prominent families and personalities as well as religious groups. He reserved positions in the PLO for Christians and integrated Muslim Brotherhood activists by, for example, promoting "Islamic Fatah" (Fath al-Islam) in 1969.

Increasingly, Arafat moved to centralize decision-making authority, forging a "neopatrimonial" style of leadership that fused loyalty to the national cause with loyalty to the PLO chairman as father of the nation. This development accompanied Arafat's gradual embrace of diplomacy and a two-state solution. The shift coincided with key events—particularly, the first Intifada (1987–93), the mass uprising against the Israeli occupation that brought to prominence a new generation of PLO and Islamic movement activists within the Occupied Territories, and the Oslo Peace Process (1993–2000), a diplomatic initiative that rehabilitated the external PLO leadership and created quasi-state structures for the Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip—leading to the creation of a PNA in circumscribed areas of the West Bank and Gaza Strip.

This same period saw the rise of the Islamic Resistance (Harakat al-Muqawama al-Islamiyya), also known as Hamas. Shunning absorption into the PLO, Hamas sought to return Palestinians to the original, uncompromising vision of total territorial liberation. In doing so, Hamas effectively subordinated global Islamic solidarity to national concerns: the liberation of Palestine was the necessary first step toward the umma's revivification—an assertion that echoed Fatah's inversion of the Pan-Arabist hierarchy of solidarity three decades earlier. By the late 1980s, any movement seeking legitimacy among Palestinians had to justify its raison d'être in the terms set by Arafat and the Fatah-led PLO.

The PLO-Israel negotiations collapsed violently in 2000. In response, Israel systematically crippled PNA institutions and placed Arafat under extended siege in his Ramallah headquarters—a building, known as "al-muqāta'a," which once housed the local British Mandate administrative offices and prison and continued to serve the same purpose during the Jordanian annexation (1948–67) as well as during the period of direct Israeli occupation after 1967. On October 29, 2004, after contracting an unspecified illness, Arafat was flown to a French military hospital, where he gradually fell into a coma and never recovered. He was pronounced dead on November 11, 2004. Fatah's hold on Palestinian politics rapidly dissolved shortly thereafter. In January 2006, Hamas won Palestinian Legislative Council elections and 18 months later routed Fatah forces from the Gaza Strip entirely.

See also Hamas; Palestine; Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)

Further Reading

Yasser Arafat, "Palestine at the United Nations: The Speech of Yasser Arafat," Journal of Palestine Studies 4, no. 2 (1975); Idem, "Vision of Coexistence," Presidents & Prime Ministers 3, no. 4 (1994); Rex Brynen, "The Neopatrimonial Dimensions of Palestinian Politics," Journal of Palestine Studies 25, no. 1 (1995); Alain Hart, Arafat: A Political Biography, 1984, reprinted 1989; Barry M. Rubin and Judith Colp Rubin, Yasir Arafat: A Political Biography, 2003; Yezid Sayigh, Armed Struggle and the Search for State: The Palestinian National Movement, 1949–1993, 1997; Janet Wallach and John Wallach, Arafat: In the Eyes of the Beholder, 1990, reprinted 1997.

LOREN D. LYBARGER

arbitration

Arbitration, as a privatized system of justice, was virtually the only form of justice known to the pre-Islamic Arabs. Confirmed by the Qur'an, it continued to be recognized as a valid means of dispute resolution after the advent of Islam. The Prophet Muhammad's position at Medina was modeled at least in part on that of the pre-Islamic arbiter appointed to settle intertribal disputes. For Sunnis, arbitration was available even if a government-appointed judge was available to hear the dispute. For the Twelver Shi'is, arbitration could take place only if an imam was present. Upon the occurrence of his occultation (ghayba), arbitration was no longer possible.

The best-known incident involving arbitration in Islamic history occurred during the Battle of Siffin (657), when Mu'awiya sought to escape defeat at the hands of 'Ali b. Abi Talib by suggesting that the two warring parties submit their differences to binding arbitration for resolution. According to most reports, Mu'awiya appointed 'Amr b. al-'As as his arbitrator, while 'Ali appointed Abu Musa al-Ash'ari. The two arbitrators were charged with resolving the dispute between the two parties in accordance with the teachings of the Qur'an. Traditional accounts of the arbitration present a picture of a cunning 'Amr b. al-'As, who was able to take advantage of the less sophisticated Ash'ari to enhance substantially the prestige of Mu'awiya at the expense of 'Ali, even if the result of the arbitration was inconclusive. Perhaps because of the inconclusive nature of this early attempt to use arbitration to resolve political disputes within the Muslim community, it appears that later generations of Muslim rulers never again attempted to resolve political disputes using arbitration. According to Qalqashandi, later Muslim dynasts looked at the arbitration between 'Ali and Mu'awiya as providing the model for peace treaties between rival Muslim rulers. It was the practice of later Muslim rulers, in connection with the assumption of solemn obligations toward their political rivals, to secure their obligations by oaths of divorce, manumission, and other penalties against the ruler in the event he violated his undertaking. One such example is the succession of Amin and Ma'mun to the caliphate of their father, Harun al-Rashid. The terms of the succession agreement were enforceable by oaths of divorce, manumission, and even excommunication.

While all four surviving schools of Sunni law recognized arbitration as valid, they differed regarding the scope of an arbitrator's jurisdiction and the legal effect of an arbitrator's judgment. For the Hanafis, the Shafi'is, and the Malikis, the authority of an arbitrator in principle derived from the will of the private persons who had appointed him. Accordingly, the arbitrator's jurisdiction was generally limited to matters amenable to the private resolution of the disputing parties, in other words, disputes involving claims of money. For the same reason, the parties of the dispute could withdraw from the arbitration at any time prior to the arbitrator's judgment.

The Hanafis, however, did not recognize the finality of an arbitrator's judgment: if the enforcing court disagreed with the outcome, it could reverse the arbitrator's verdict. For the Malikis, Shafi'is, and Hanbalis, in contrast, an arbitrator's verdict—assuming it was otherwise legal—had the same force as a judgment issued by a state-appointed judge and consequently could not be reversed simply because the judge would have applied a different rule. Malikis, de facto, and Hanbalis, de jure, in contrast to the Hanafis and Shafi'is, were willing to give arbitrators powers that exceeded the powers of the parties to the dispute. According to the Hanbalis, an arbitrator could hear all legal claims, including cases involving marriage, divorce, and canonical punishments (hudūd). While Malikis held that an arbitrator had no original jurisdiction to hear such claims, should an arbitrator exceed his jurisdiction and rule on those cases, his rulings would be enforced to the extent that they were substantively correct. If the arbitrator attempted to enforce such rulings, however, he could be criminally liable for exceeding his jurisdiction.

As a general rule, an arbitrator needed to have the same qualifications as a judge, but, as in the case of the arbitrator who exceeded his jurisdiction, the Malikis were willing to enforce the judgment of female arbitrators, arbitrators who were slaves, or arbitrators who were hostile to one of the disputing parties, on the condition in each case that the decision was substantively correct, even if in principle only free males who were neutral could serve as arbitrators. These relaxed procedural and jurisdictional principles were no doubt a reflection of the fact that the parties themselves chose the arbitrator, in contrast to the judge, whose jurisdiction was not subject to the parties' consent.

See also difference of opinion; succession

Further Reading

Fatima Muhammad al-'Awa, 'Aqd al-Tahkim fi al-Shari'a al-Qanun, 2002.

MOHAMMAD FADEL

Ash'aris

Founded by Abu al-Hasan al-Ash'ari (d. 935), the Ash'ari tradition is considered one of the most influential theological schools of Sunni Islam. In his famous Muqaddima (Prolegomena), the historian Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406) gives a succinct sketch of how Ash'ari theology is generally viewed in Sunni Islam. According to him, the Ash'ari tradition represents the golden mean between extreme traditionalism and rationalism on one hand and determinism and free will on the other.

Ash'ari doctrine emerged against a background of debate between traditionalists, such as Ahmad b. Hanbal (d. 855), and rationalists, such as the Mu'tazilis and the early Hanafi legal scholars. One of their main disagreements was over the interpretation of ambiguous verses (āyāt mutshābihāt) in the Qur'an, such as those that attribute anthropomorphic characteristics to God. The traditionalists called for tafwīḍ, or the avoidance of interpreting these verses and of any attempt to tackle complex metaphysical problems, pointing to the example of the early Muslims (al-salaf al-ṣālih), who had supposedly restricted themselves to the literal meaning of the Qur'an and traditions attributed to Muhammad. The rationalists held interpretation (ta'wīl) to be necessary, claiming that this method had been employed by Muhammad's Companions, especially in connection with textual ambiguities and the application of the Qur'an to problems without precedent in the Prophet's life. Ash'ari took a middle position, neither rejecting interpretation nor counseling the avoidance of it. Rather, he accepted it within the limits set by other verses of the Qur'an and the tradition of the Prophet, thereby ensuring that its result would be traditional.

Another problem between Mu'tazilis and the traditionalists concerned free will. The traditions credited to the Prophet are overwhelmingly determinist, or indeed predeterminist, and determinism was also represented in other theological schools, such as that of Jahm b. Safwan. Determinists (jabriyya) held that God was the creator of all acts and that His omnipotence was incompatible with the freedom of the human agent. By contrast, Mu'tazilis argued that the human being has both the capacity (qudra) and the will (mashi'a) to act and that determinism was incompatible with God's justice ('adl)—for, as all agreed, humans were responsible for their own actions and would be punished or rewarded for them in the hereafter. Ash'ari argued that actions are created by God and then acquired (muktasab) by the human agent; God creates them in an atomistic manner on the basis of a temporary will in the human agent, and the human agent acquires the result of these actions thanks to that will. God remains the ultimate cause of good and evil, but the ambiguity of the theory of acquisition (kasb) made a later thinker such as the famous theologian and heresiographer Shahrastani (d. 1153) classify Ash'ari as an intermediate determinist.

Ash'ari's position on dialectical reasoning (kalām) has been much debated. In two books (Kitab al-Luma' [Flashes of insight] and Risala Istihsan al-Khawd fi 'Ilm al-Kalam [The epistle on applying critical examination in theology]), he seems to endorse dialectical reasoning, but in another (Kitab al-Ibana 'an Usul al-Diyana [The book of elucidation on the principles of religion]) he seems to oppose it in full agreement with the traditionalist Ahmad b. Hanbal. Later Ash'aris held him to have endorsed the use of dialectical reasoning, sometimes arguing that his apparent rejection of it in the Ibana represents an early traditionalist phase that he later abandoned in favor of acceptance of his mature view—namely, that dialectical reasoning was valid and that interpretation could be practiced within the limits set by the tradition. Famous Ash'ari scholars such as Juwayni (d. 1085), Ghazali (d. 1111), and Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1208) all practiced the dialectical method.

The political position of the Ash'aris is that of the Sunnis at large: the first four caliphs are accepted as legitimate and exemplary, the law remains valid even under wrong-doing rulers, all rulers must be obeyed as long as this does not entail the violation of divine commands, and keeping the community together and rightly guided is more important than ensuring the rectitude of person in temporary control of it.

See also free will; Mu'tazilis; theology

Further Reading

Richard M. Frank and Dimitri Gutas, Early Islamic Theology: The Mu'tazilis and the Ash'aris: Texts and Studies, 2007; Daniel Gimaret, La Doctrine de al-Ahs'ari, 1990; George Makdisi, "The Ahs'arī and the Ash'arites in Islamic Religions History I," Studia Islamica 17 (1962); Idem, "The Ahs'arī and the Ash'arites in Islamic Religions History I," Studia Islamica 18 (1963); Richard J. McCarthy, The Theology of Al-Ahs'ari, 1953; Harry Wolfson, The Theology of the Kalam, 1979.

AHMED ABDEL MEGUID

'Ashura'

'Ashura' refers to the tenth day of Muharram, the first month of the Islamic calendar, when Husayn b. 'Ali, the third Shi'i imam and the grandson of the Prophet Muhammad, was martyred at Karbala, Iraq, in 680. Husayn was on his way from Medina to Kufa, the former capital of 'Ali's caliphate, where local supporters had invited him to lead them as their imam. 'Ubaydallah b. Ziyad, the Umayyad governor of Kufa, feared a rebellion and sent troops to stop Husayn's caravan at Karbala before it reached Kufa. He ordered his commanders to make clear to Husayn that he had no choice other than to pledge allegiance to Yazid, the second Umayyad caliph (r. 680–83). Though his party was prevented from reaching water in the Karbala desert and his followers were so few in comparison with the Umayyad troops, Husayn rejected submission to the Umayyad caliph, whom he viewed as a usurper caliph and, consequently, an illegitimate ruler. After some days, on 'Ashura', 72 males (from Husayn's 6-month-old baby to a 75-year-old man) were killed by Umayyad troops. The women and children were taken as prisoners to Yazid's palace in Damascus, the capital of the Umayyad caliphate, where Zaynab, Husayn's sister, confronted and shamed Yazid in a memorable speech. She is therefore known as the messenger of 'Ashura'.

Shi'i devotees throughout the world mourn on 'Ashura' to commemorate and lament the martyrdom of Husayn and his companions at Karbala. The ceremonies, which often begin on the first day of Muharram, culminate on the 10th day, and continue until the 12th day, involve (with some differences from place to place) dramatic processions in which the participants chant "O Husayn!" and other slogans; beat their breasts; strike their backs with chains; carry massive devotional displays; perform other gestures associated with mourning, such as strewing the head or face with dust or mud; and stage elaborate passion plays, or reenactments of the events leading up to the martyrdom and the Battle of Karbala itself. The open, organized commemoration of 'Ashura' began under Mu'izz al-Dawla in Baghdad in 964, after the Shi'i Buyids had established dominance in Iraq (945–1055). Not long after, 'Ashura' rituals became popular in Cairo under the Fatimids (969–1171), and they have been popular ever since in areas where Shi'is form a significant part of the population. In some environments where the community includes large Sunni and Shi'i groups, 'Ashura' has often been a time when sectarian violence can flare up, leading to fights and riots. Buyid Baghdad, for example, witnessed scores of such riots on 'Ashura', some of which resulted in fires that burned large quarters of the city, and similar outbreaks of violence have taken place in modern Iraq and Pakistan. Some Sunni groups in some areas of the world, such as Syria and Egypt, have developed traditions of celebrating on 'Ashura' that include eating particular delicacies as a way to advertise Sunni identity and spite the Shi'is, whereas other Sunnis in other parts of the world, such as in Afghanistan, retain traditions of fasting, reading the Qur'an, or visiting cemeteries on 'Ashura'.

Husayn's martyrdom has retained a strong symbolic significance in Islamic history, especially for Shi'is, who have used it as a marker for their distinct identity within the Islamic world and as ideological grounds for their religiopolitical movements. The commemoration of 'Ashura' stresses the iniquity of tyrannical rule and Shi'i existence as an oppressed minority. In addition, it stresses the failure of Husayn's supporters from Kufa—the Shi'is—to come to his aid. Very soon after the Battle of Karbala, rebellions and resistance against the Umayyad caliphate emerged that adopted the memory of Karbala as a rallying cry, including the rebellion of the Penitents (Tawwabun), led by Sulayman b. Surad al-Khuza'i in 684; the rebellion of Mukhtar al-Thaqafi in 685; and many other revolts in the name of descendants of 'Ali. 'Ashura' has therefore often lent itself to a contemporary political interpretation, supporting a potential uprising against any political system that is viewed as unjust.

See also Husayn b. 'Ali (626–80); Karbala; martyrdom

Further Reading

Mahmoud Ayoub, Redemptive Suffering in Islam: A Study of the Devotional Aspects of 'Ashura in Twelver Shiism, 1978; Gustave E. von Grunebaum, Muhammadan Festivals, 1951; Sayyid Jafar Shahidi, "The Significance of 'Ashura in Shi'i History," in Shi'ite Heritage: Essays on Classical and Modern Traditions, edited and translated by L. Clarke, 2001.

ALI-AHMAD RASEKH

Asia. See Central Asia; Southeast Asia

astrology

Astrology deals with the observation of celestial phenomena for the purpose of explaining past, present, and future events on Earth. It is based on the assumption that the movement of the celestial bodies has an influence on the sublunar world and that this influence can be observed and used for prognostication. Such prognostications might be used for private purposes. In the context of politics in Islam, they have helped in decision making and have been an important tool for propaganda.

The science of astronomy and astrology was highly developed in the medieval Islamic world. Astronomers, including Jews, Christians, and Muslims, drew extensively on the scientific traditions of both the Greeks and the Indians but made significant advances to the practice, including correcting the Ptolemaic model of the planet's orbits or proposing heliocentric models of the solar system. Major observatories were built in Baghdad, Maragha, Samarqand, Istanbul, and Jaipur, and extensive programs of astronomical observations were carried out and recorded in tabulations. The use of astronomy to determine the correct direction of prayer (qibla) and precise prayer times for different geographical regions caused it to gain acceptance with religious scholars, too.

Astronomy proper usually was not sharply distinguished from astrology. One of the main employment opportunities for the scientists who investigated the heavens was as astrological advisors to rulers, charged with predicting the outcomes of important decisions and determining propitious times for important undertakings. Astrological predictions were generally disapproved by Sunni scholars, while the Shi'i position toward astrology was more favorable.

Astrology is divided into two main branches: individual astrology and mundane astrology. Individual astrology deals with the fate of a single person, while mundane astrology focuses on the fate of the entire world, or at least the fate of a region or town. Changes of rulers and dynasties also fit under the rubric of mundane astrology. Individual astrology includes nativities, interrogations, and elections. Nativities are horoscopes cast at the moment of birth that are used to predict general aspects of a newborn's life. These predictions might be refined every year by birthday horoscopes. Astrologers also answer specific questions of their clients (interrogations/masā'il) regarding, for example, the fate of a missing husband or the whereabouts of a runaway slave. Katarchai (elections/ikhtiyārāt) serve to determine the best timing for undertaking or beginning such actions as marriage or travel. All three types of horoscopes were used not only by ordinary men but also by officials and rulers. Thousands of birth horoscopes for princes have been cast in the history of the Islamic world. Some of these horoscopes were collected in a kind of family album, while others constitute entire books, sometimes lavishly produced, with up to more than 350 pages. The birth horoscope of Iskandar Sultan, a Timurid ruler of Shiraz, even contains a circular miniature showing the zodiac and the planets at the moment of his birth. Such extensive birth horoscopes usually predict the future importance and glory of the prince. They were presumably produced long after the fact, following the accession of the prince in question. This was certainly the case not only with the birth horoscope of Iskandar Sultan but also with the four different birth horoscopes of the Mughal emperor Akbar the Great (r. 1556–1605) given in the Akbarnama. Predicting his religious and political reforms, they were completed only after the implementation of his reform program and therefore clearly served propagandistic aims.

Katarchai were often used in the context of political decision making. They helped to decide when to hold a coronation, when to set out for a campaign, when to enter a town, when to break ground for a construction project, and especially when to begin a battle. The events so determined varied in importance. Cairo owes its name (al-Qāhira in Arabic, meaning "the Conquering One") to the ascendant position of Mars, qāhir al-aflāk (Subduer of the Heavens), at the moment the city walls were raised at the order of Caliph Mu'izz (953–75) shortly after the Fatimid conquest of Egypt in 969. In contrast, many rulers did not even go on a hunt without consulting their astrologers. Some of a ruler's responsibility was thus delegated to the astrologer, who was to blame in case of failure. Under such dynasties as the Ottomans and the Safavids, the court astrologers, and particularly the chief astrologer (munajjimbāshi), were consulted constantly for propitious dates to begin campaigns, conclude treaties, make diplomatic overtures, and even receive guests. The standard procedure was for the chief astrologer, or a group of several court astrologers, to propose a couple of dates from which the sovereign would choose the most fitting. Some rulers shared the misgivings of the pious or religious scholars with regard to astrology. The Ottoman sultan Abdülhamid I (1774–89) refused to delay setting out on a military campaign when his astrologer cautioned him to wait for a more propitious time, remarking that his affairs were in the hands of God, not the stars. He was in the decided minority among the other members of the dynasty, as the chief astrologer was a trusted and influential advisor for many of them. His namesake, Sultan Abdülhamid II (r. 1870–1909), was so dependent on the advice of his chief astrologer, Ebu al-Huda, that he would not meet an ambassador or make any administrative decision without consulting him. Ebu al-Huda reportedly increased his influence with the assistance of an accomplice in the telegraph office who would reveal to him the messages from the provinces before delivering them to the sultan. Ebu al-Huda would immediately present predictions about affairs in the provinces to Abdülhamid II, and the telegrams would inevitably prove his "predictions" correct, reinforcing the sultan's belief in his abilities. The astrologer fell out of favor only when he failed to predict the revolution of the Young Turks in 1908 and, condemned for high treason, was incarcerated on an island in the Sea of Marmara.

In the field of mundane astrology, the annual return of the sun to the vernal equinox at the New Year underlies all calculations. The years are not equally important, however, but are grouped into so-called World Years. These World Years are fixed periods of time that divide history into cyclically returning segments of similar length. The beginning of each new World Year indicates an important event such as the ascension of a new dynasty, and the horoscope of the corresponding vernal equinox is of foremost importance for prognostication. The most common of these World Years depends on the conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter, which happens about every 20 years. Great conjunctions, which are time cycles of approximately 240 years, result from grouping together 12 to 13 of these conjunctions depending on their location in the zodiac. Great conjunctions are the unit most frequently used in mundane astrology, although cycles (dawr, adwār) of 360 years and other time intervals were also taken into consideration. The political relevance of these cycles results from their association with specific regions, religions, and ethnic groups. According to this doctrine, the people, the religion, and the region of the actual cycle dominate politics and society during their interval of time. The fate of rulers and dynasties and especially their impending end was therefore predicted with the help of this theory, but as periods of 240 years are too long to be very useful for political propaganda, cycles of 360 years and 240 years and subdivisions of both were intermixed. By this combination, the number of potentially significant vernal equinoxes was considerably increased.

Mundane astrology, which was widespread in the Late Sasanid Empire, probably gained popularity in the Islamic world with the rise of Iranian influence after the Abbasid revolution. Astrological arguments were frequently used in the context of anti-Abbasid or anti-Arab propaganda and eschatological expectations. The need to confront such propaganda on equal footing might initially have been the strongest incentive on the Arab side for tackling the foundations of astrology. The discipline was more or less unknown in pre-Islamic Arabia, where the stars were observed mainly for information on the seasons and guidance in the desert. After the Arab conquest, pro-Iranian restoration movements referred to astrological arguments for claiming that the end of Arab dominance was near. In the Kitāb al-Dawr al-ʿUtaridī (The book of the cycle of Mercury), a cyclic world history based on the theory of conjunctions and adwār, predictions of the final collapse of the Abbasid dynasty in the year 1001 went together with expectations of the end of Arab rule and a return of Iranian supremacy. Such ideas were especially popular with the Isma'ili, and they proved long-lived: in the 16th century, we still find speculations about the beginning of eschatological times, which were based on the approach of a Great Conjunction. The Safavid ruler Shah ʿAbbas I took these predictions of an impending change so seriously that he resigned for three days at the ominous date and had himself replaced by a Nuqtawi shaykh, who was killed afterward. The title ṣāḥib-qirān (Lord of the Auspicious Conjunction), attributed to Tamerlane (r. 1370–1405) and later to Shah Jahan (r. 1627–58), as well as the tendency to correlate the birth date of important rulers with specific Saturn-Jupiter conjunctions also testify to the enduring importance of conjunctional astrology.

Political astrology lost its outright importance in the Islamic world only at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century. Its persistence in private context is unknown.

See also knowledge

Further Reading

Edward S. Kennedy and David Pingree, The Astrological History of Masha'allah, 1971; Fatemeh Keshavarz, "The Horoscope of Iskandar Sultan," Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain & Ireland 2 (1984); Eva Orthmann, "Circular Motions: Private Pleasure and Public Prognostication in the Nativities of the Mughal Emperor Akbar," in Horoscopes and Public Spheres: Essays on the History of Astrology, edited by Günther Oestmann, H. Darrel Rutkin, and Kocku von Stuckrad, 2005; George Saliba, "The Role of the Astrologer in Medieval Islamic Society," Bulletin d'Etudes Orientales 44 (1992); Sergei Tourkin, "The Horoscope of Shah Tahmasp," in Hunt for Paradise: Court Arts of Safavid Iran 1501–1576, edited by Jon Thompson and Sheila R. Canby, 2003; Keiji Yamamoto and Charles Burnett, Abū Maʿšar on Historical Astrology: The Book of Religions and Dynasties (On the Great Conjunctions), 2 vols., 2000.

EVA ORTHMANN

asylum

The concepts of asylum and sanctuary go back to antiquity, especially among the Egyptians, Greeks, and Phoenicians. Migration, sanctuary, and asylum are perennial features of religion. Almost every prophet of the world's religious traditions experienced abandonment, displacement, or exile. Hospitality toward strangers was a deep source of pride in pre-Islamic Arab and Bedouin cultures, and solidarity with one's neighbors was necessary for survival in the harsh Arabian desert. According to the Qur'an, the Kaʿba (meaning "cube" in Arabic—a place of prestige and honor) in Mecca was built by the Prophet Abraham and his son Ishmael as the first house to be dedicated solely to the worship of God. The Kaʿba was a sanctuary because God established a sacred precinct (ḥaram) around it. Violation of a person's claim to immunity within the sacred confines of the Kaʿba was considered a sacrilegious act. The concept of asylum in Islamic thought developed out of earlier frameworks of sanctuary in Judaic, Christian, and Arab custom and practice and the specific experiences of the Prophet Muhammad himself.

Pre-Islamic Arab custom recognized various rights and duties related to asylum, as seen in the concepts of istijāra, which is the requesting of protection of a benefactor on the grounds of proximity (a form of territorial asylum), and ijāra, which is the granting of protection by the benefactor in such a case. This culture of granting asylum was built on the ideals of Arab morality, driven by honor, chivalry, bravery, and generosity—qualities celebrated in pre-Islamic Arabic poetry. The Prophet Muhammad preached in this cultural milieu, and despite the Meccans' disapproval of his message, Muhammad was, for many years, protected from danger by ʿaṣabiyya (clan solidarity); any harm to Muhammad against the wishes of his powerful uncle Abu Talib would have dishonored his entire clan, the Banu Hashim, and would have provoked serious reprisals.

Many verses in the Qur'an address the imperative of active resistance to oppression and advocate, when that is not possible, migration to more peaceful lands (4:97, 100; 16:41; 22:58–59). In addition, two significant events in early Islamic history led to the development and institutionalization of asylum within the precepts of Islamic law. Around 615, in response to early persecution of the Muslims in Mecca, Muhammad instructed some of his followers to migrate (as muhājirūn, or migrants) to the lands of the Christian king, or Negus, of Abyssinia. Overwhelmed by the Negus's generosity, a group of Meccan ambassadors, bearing numerous gifts, attempted to convince him to extradite the Muslims to Mecca. The Negus's magnanimous response and his rejection of the ambassadors' request are thought to have had a profound impact on the development of the legal sanctity of asylum in the Constitution of Medina and subsequent Islamic law. Following the death of Abu Talib, the Meccans' hostility toward the prophetic mission could no longer be contained, and the Prophet Muhammad lost the protection of his own clan. When it became clear that the fledgling Muslim community would not be viable in Mecca, Muhammad and his followers emigrated to and sought refuge in the northern Arabian city of Yathrib (present-day Medina), where they were warmly received by the anṣār, faithful Islamic partisans who resided in that town. This migration, called the hijra, marks the beginning date of the Islamic calendar.

The institution of asylum in Islam is founded on two central principles: amān (safety), or a grant of protection, guarantee of safety, or pledge for safe passage, and dhimma (pact), an agreement extending temporary or permanent protection to those requesting it. Asylum is a legal right and duty in Islamic law. Any person within the territory of Islam (called dār al-islām, or the abode of Islam), and not just state elites as in modern times, was capable of offering protection to a musta'min (beneficiary of safeguard), rendering the musta'min sacred and inviolable for a minimum of a year. This action was considered part of the ethical obligation to honor a guest. The musta'min had full rights to protect life, family, religion, and property; to undertake economic activity; and to marry people of beneficiary status. A musta'min who wished to reside in dār al-islām after a year's time was transferred to the status of dhimma (permanent guest). Dhimma is often called perpetual amān, a duty of protection incumbent on all Muslims and the Muslim state. Within the spirit of Islamic law, the concept of amān and the sacred rights afforded to the musta'min mandated the rule of nonextradition. Islam was one of the first political and religious systems to adopt the principle of nonrefoulement (protection of refugees fearing for their lives) and the prohibition on extradition for all political émigrés.

Contemporary application of international law divides asylum seekers into various categories, including refugees, stateless persons, internally displaced persons, asylum seekers, returners, and persons at risk of displacement, and endows them with differing rights. While some migrants traverse borders freely under peaceful conditions, the "forced migrant" (muhājir) is the migrant displaced by war or strife (i.e., on account of violence, political or religious persecution, or instability). The universalist message of Islam facilitated the granting of equal rights to all migrants under Islamic law, with some provisions for those who had committed crimes in their former lands.

The development of the principles of amān and nonextradition were likely influenced by the early Muslim experience in Abyssinia. Islamic thought on the issue of asylum was also built on the general Islamic principle of respect for difference—toleration and generosity toward all people regardless of race, religion, nationality, and gender—expressed, for example, in the verse of the Qur'an that prohibits compulsion in religion (2:256) and in the final sermon of the Prophet Muhammad concerning the unwavering humanity of all people. Voluntary repatriation, or the breaking of amān before the end of a year, was only possible by the spontaneous decision of the musta'min or by proper and sufficient notice of the benefactor.

Islamic ideology and indeed the spirit that characterized the Islamic golden ages in Spain and India, for example, were premised on the sacredness of asylum and justice. The Mogul Emperor Akbar (r. 1556–1605) in India advanced progressive policies toward his disparate population through the ideals of unity and ecumenical spirit. A great deal of Islamic history was marked specifically by a lack of xenophobia; the political subject of Islam was, for the most part, comfortable with difference. One model of this respect for difference was the Constitution of Medina (622), which attempted to bridge the various Muslim and Jewish groups of Medina under a single community structure. Another model was the Convention of Najran (632), which ensured the Christians of Najran protection and freedom from humiliation. This spirit is quite unlike that of the modern-day nation-state, which attempts to regulate with mechanical precision the inflow and outflow of strangers. The 1981 Universal Islamic Declaration of Human Rights, especially article 9, was a contemporary attempt to mandate a rule consonant with the Islamic rule of asylum.

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; hijra

Further Reading

Muddathir Abd al-Rahim, "Asylum: A Moral and Legal Right in Islam," Refugee Survey Quarterly 27, no. 2 (2008); Ahmed Abou el-Wafa, The Right to Asylum between Islamic Shari'ah and International Refugee Law: A Comparative Study, 2009; Ghassan Maarouf Arnaout, Asylum in the Arab-Islamic Tradition, 1987; Khadija Elmadmad, "Asylum in Islam and in Modern Refugee Law," Refugee Survey Quarterly 27, no. 2 (2008); Volker Turk, "Reflections on Asylum and Islam," Refugee Survey Quarterly 27, no. 2 (2008).

MELISSA FINN

Atatürk, Mustafa Kemal (1881–1938)

Mustafa Kemal Atatürk was the founder and first president of the Republic of Turkey. Born in Salonica to a middle-class Muslim Ottoman family, he graduated from the Royal Military Academy in Istanbul in 1902 and from the Staff Officer College, also in the capital, in 1905. Like many cadets, he developed a sympathy for the Young Turk movement and participated in some clandestine activities.

After graduating from the Staff Officer College, he was briefly arrested in connection with a plot against the life of the sultan and was then assigned to serve in Damascus, far from the capital of Istanbul. There he made some attempts to establish an opposition society. He also participated in the work of Ottoman dissidents in his hometown of Salonica, where they founded the Ottoman Freedom Society, a major opposition organization, in 1906. A year later, the society merged with the Paris-based Ottoman Committee of Progress and Union and became its internal headquarters and power base within the Ottoman military. These organizations played a decisive role in carrying out the Young Turk Revolution of 1908.

Following the revolution, Mustafa Kemal became an important figure in the military ranks of the Ottoman Committee of Union and Progress (CUP) as a protégé of Major Cemal Bey (who later became a pasha, or general). Immediately after the revolution, the CUP dispatched him to Tripoli of Barbary to quell the disturbances there. In April 1909, he served on the staff officer committee of the Action Army that marched on to Istanbul to crush the counterrevolution. Despite these important contributions, his relationship with the CUP leadership was strained by statements he made against direct intervention by the military in politics. In 1911, he volunteered for service in Tripoli of Barbary to organize a local militia against the Italian invasion and served in Darnah, the capital of Cyrenaica, for less than a year. Upon his return to the capital, he participated in the later stages of the Balkan Wars and then assumed the post of military attaché in Sofia. The Ottoman Empire's entry into World War I prompted his return to active military service, where he gained fame for his successes at Gallipoli in 1915. He later served on the Ottoman eastern front and accompanied the Ottoman heir apparent during a visit to Germany in 1917–18.

At the time of the surrender in October 1918, Mustafa Kemal was in Aleppo trying to organize an orderly retreat of Ottoman forces. The harsh terms imposed by the Entente powers on the empire, followed by the Greek occupation of Izmir in May 1919, provoked a backlash of Turkish nationalist sentiment. The ensuing Turkish War of Independence lasted until 1922. Mustafa Kemal, sent to Samsun in May 1919 with orders to pacify central and eastern Anatolia and the Black Sea coast and to monitor the implementation of the Mudros armistice, instead assumed leadership of the national movement against the Entente's partition plans. In July 1919, he resigned from the military. He was the driving force behind the national congresses in Erzurum and Sivas, which rejected foreign mandates and pledged to fight for the independence and territorial integrity of the country. The British occupation of Istanbul in March 1920 and the prorogation of the Ottoman Chamber of Deputies drove the nationalists to convene the Grand National Assembly in Ankara in April. In addition to his political portfolio as speaker of this chamber, Mustafa Kemal also served as commander in chief of the nationalist troops, which defeated the Greeks in September 1922.

On the heels of victory and the subsequent Treaty of Lausanne (1923), Mustafa Kemal became the natural leader of the new Turkish State. Although the sultanate had already been abolished in November 1922, the republic was founded in October 1923. Mustafa Kemal became the first president of the republic, a capacity in which he served until his death. In September 1922, he announced the establishment of a political party called the People's Party (later Republican People's Party). This organization subsequently became his civilian basis of power and the only party of significance in the state. Following a Kurdish revolt with strong Islamist undertones in 1925 and an assassination attempt against Mustafa Kemal in 1926, the party cracked down on the opposition and tolerated little dissent.

Mustafa Kemal immediately launched an ambitious reform program aimed at the creation of a modern, secular state and the construction of a new identity for its citizens. His education and years of military service exposed him to many of the ideas shared by the educated elite of his generation. Among these ideas were popular scientism, based on the mid-19th-century German Vulgärmaterialismus (pseudoscientific elitism), based on Gustave Le Bon's theory of crowd behavior; Turkism and Turkish nationalism; and a view of modernization that privileged science as the engine of Western-style progress. Mustafa Kemal was broadly familiar with all of these ideas, but his reading was limited and he was no theorist. Although his reform program bears a remarkable resemblance to proposals drawn up in 1913 by Kiliçzâde Hakkı, a leading Westernist of the Second Constitutional Period of 1908–18, his personal touch was undeniable. It was especially evident in the radicalism of the reform program, which unflinchingly refused to countenance the persistence of dualism in Turkish society. Rejecting the Ottoman reform legacy, Mustafa Kemal aimed at eradicating old habits and institutions instead of allowing them to coexist alongside the new. At the same time, his pragmatism saved the program from excessive ideological rigidity. By the time of his death, Mustafa Kemal, who took the family name Atatürk (Father of Turks) in 1934, had transformed Turkish society. The secular republic he helped to build was a novelty in the Muslim world. The strict control of the state over religion, the banning of time-honored Islamic institutions such as religious orders and dervish lodges, the acceptance of European legal codes, the unabashed promotion of a European way of life, and the deification of the nation were all virtually unknown in Islam up to his time. Mustafa Kemal's decision in 1928 to adopt a modified Latin alphabet to replace the Arabo-Persian set of characters used for centuries demonstrated his desire to remove yet another traditional symbol that had gained religious connotation. To Mustafa Kemal, these changes were not only justified but also necessitated by science, "the most truthful guide in life."

Mustafa Kemal also promoted a new identity for the Turks, founded upon notions of a glorious historical and linguistic past that stretched back in time to the pre-Ottoman era. The state-sponsored Thesis of Turkish History sought to explain all major historical developments as Turkish achievements. Similarly, the Sun Language Theory maintained that Turkish is the main language of humankind from which all other languages derive. Although these state-sponsored theories had some initial impact among Turkish intellectual and nationalist circles, they have long since been forgotten.

Mustafa Kemal Atatürk was one of the foremost leaders of the 20th century. Inside Turkey, his legacy has been revered by Kemalists, who have refined his ideas to produce a strictly secular state ideology. In the wider Muslim world, his work has been viewed by secularists as an exemplary reform project and by conservatives as one of the greatest heresies in the history of Islam.

See also Ottomans (1299–1924); Turkey; Westernization

Further Reading

Atatürk'ün Bütün Eserleri, 2008; Klaus Kreiser, Atatürk: Eine Biographie, 2008; Andrew Mango, Ataturk, 2000.

M. ŞÜKRÜ HANIOĞLU

Aurangzeb (1618–1707)

Aurangzeb 'Alamgir, Muhyi al-Din Muhammad, sixth ruler of the Mughal Empire (India) and last of the "Great Mughals," was the third son of Emperor Shah Jahan and Mumtaz Mahal. Aurangzeb reigned for half a century, from 1658 until his death in 1707. During his reign, the empire reached its greatest territorial extent but also saw the rise of the internal weaknesses and external threats that brought about its decline.

After defeating his brothers in a bloody war of succession, Aurangzeb crowned himself emperor and took the regnal title of 'Alamgir ('Ālamgīr, "conqueror of the world") on July 21, 1658. He was already a seasoned administrator and military commander, having served as governor of Gujarat for three years and of the Mughal territories in the Deccan for eight years. From the beginning of his reign, Aurangzeb pursued an expansionist policy and attempted to extend the empire's sway in Bengal and Assam in the northeast and in the Deccan in the south.

Aurangzeb's reign was repeatedly challenged by rebellions and insurrections from various quarters. The Pathan tribes on the western front of the empire rebelled: the Yusufza'is in 1667 and the Afridis and Khattaks in 1672. The latter rebellion was a more serious challenge, requiring Aurangzeb's personal intervention, and was not quelled until 1676. Beginning in 1678, an internal succession dispute among the Rajputs resulted in rebellion and provided the opportunity for Aurangzeb's son, Prince Akbar, to rebel against his father and attempt to claim the throne. Aurangzeb's defeat of both the Pathan and Rajput rebellions resulted from a successful combination of military might, diplomacy, bribery, and misinformation. Popular uprisings of the Jat peasantry in the region of Agra (1669, 1681, 1689) and the Satnami community (1672) were mercilessly crushed. In 1696, a revolt of the zamīndārs (landowners) in Bengal required both a military response and an administrative reorganization of the province.

During the latter half of his reign, Aurangzeb was occupied in continuous warfare in the Deccan. In order to crush the Maratha state and the Deccan sultanates, he brought the imperial army south and from 1681 onward made the military encampments his capital. By 1689, Bijapur, Golconda, and much of the Maratha territory had been conquered and annexed. However, Maratha resistance and raids continued and the war dragged on, causing great destruction and the impoverishment of both the populace and the imperial treasury.

Aurangzeb attempted to better regulate revenue collection and, during the early part of his reign, reduce the power of the nobility in relation to the royal household. However, by the end of his reign, the Mughal jāgīrdārī system, under which a military commander was paid with the revenue of an assigned area (or jāgīr), was in crisis. The policy of giving appointments to buy the loyalty of enemy commanders or conquered vassals resulted in a disproportionate number of appointments relative to jāgīrs available for assignment. At the same time, the power of the English, French, and Dutch East India Companies was rising. Aurangzeb was unable or, occupied with the Deccan War, unwilling to seize control of the autonomous fortified European trading centers at Bombay, Madras, Pondicherry, and Calcutta.

Many of Aurangzeb's policies, especially in religious matters, reflected his sober and pious personality and his commitment to a shari'a-oriented Islam. In a departure from the practice of his predecessors, he disallowed wine drinking, opium use, music, and dance at court; forbade the building of new Hindu temples and the repair of existing ones; restricted tax-free grants to only Muslim recipients; and, most radically, imposed the jizya (poll tax) on non-Muslims in 1679. Aurangzeb was not the patron of the arts that his father and grandfather had been. Instead, he commissioned the important compendium of Hanafi law, Fatawa-yi 'Alamgiri (The 'Alamgir compendium of legal rulings), and personally occupied himself with copying the Qur'an. Aurangzeb's discriminatory policies toward his non-Muslim subjects have been seen by some scholars as a factor in the Rajput and Maratha rebellions and as a cause of general discontent and the ultimate destabilization of the empire.

See also Akbar the Great (1542–1605); Mughals (1526–1857)

Further Reading

Muzaffar Alam and Sanjay Subramanyam, eds., The Mughal State 1526–1750, 1998; Robert C. Hallissey, The Rajput Rebellion against Aurangzeb: A Study of the Mughal Empire in Seventeenth-Century India, 1977; John F. Richards, The Mughal Empire, 1993.

AMINA STEINFELS

authority

From the laylat al-qadr, the "night of power" in which the Qur'an symbolically "came down" from God, to the death of the Prophet, Muslim affairs were governed by the special authority of that prophetic-revelatory event, and it remains the primary paradigm of political authority in Islam. Muhammad was a religious, political, and military leader who founded a new form of community, an umma, that was both spiritual and worldly in nature. The development of this new community, which defined itself in terms of faith rather than national or tribal boundaries, marked a transition from polytheism to monotheism, and was ultimately shaped by both Arab tribal bonds and Persian monarchic systems.

The Arab Bedouin were not anarchic. Their society was governed by what the 14th-century North African philosopher of history Ibn Khaldun referred to as solidarity ('aṣabiyya). 'Aṣabiyya signifies internal cohesion, often brought about by the unity of blood or faith. Islam universalized this sense of belonging by replacing local, tribal customs with the sunna (the normative conduct of the Prophet) of the universal tribe called the umma, made concrete through the hadith (reports of the Prophet's sunna) and shari'a (sacred law). In understanding political authority in the Islamic world, this "post-tribal" element is essential, as authority does not rely necessarily on formal state structures. First and foremost, Muslims adhere to God and to the expression of God's commands through the medium of prophethood.

The Qur'an is composed in a rhythmic style that makes considerable use of symbolic and allegorical imagery. Its allusions and indirect explanations allow for a multitude of interpretations. Consequently, it is difficult to determine any firm principles of government within the text. The Qur'an provides examples of the proper use of authority, such as Muhammad's consultation with his Companions (3:159) or the imperative to abide by the principles of justice and kindness (e.g., 4:58, 65, 105, 135, and 16:90), but it is concerned more with general principles such as fairness, equity, and discipline than with specific details of government. Political theory in the Qur'an focuses on the status of Muhammad as Prophet and the authority he wielded as long as he was alive, although the Qur'an does suggest that his authority could be questioned and that his role was often one of arbiter among a federation of tribes rather than the possessor of absolute, unquestioned authority.

According to Sunni tradition, Muhammad did not specify a successor, while Shi'is believed that Muhammad had chosen his cousin and son-in-law 'Ali b. Abi Talib to succeed him. As a result of this conflict, a fitna, or civil war, divided the umma between 656 and 661. The title khātam al-nabiyyīn (usually translated as "seal of the prophets"), given to Muhammad in the Qur'an (33:40), has traditionally been interpreted to mean that there were to be no prophets after Muhammad, and so an important symbol of religious and political authority was lost after his death. Abu Bakr was selected as caliph (deputy) partly because he came from a relatively insignificant clan with no pretensions to power; it was a falta, an affair concluded with haste and without much reflection, to preserve the unity of the umma and avoid the very real danger of tribal conflict. In fact, Abu Bakr's status of successor to the messenger of God (khalīfat rasūl Allāh) did not come with great power. At the beginning of his reign he was only a part-time caliph, spending the rest of his time as a merchant. In his short reign of only two years, however, he maintained the Medinan regime, bringing the breakaway tribes back into the fold of the umma through the policy of wars of apostasy (al-ridda). Abu Bakr and the three caliphs that followed are known as the Rāshidūn, or the "Rightly Guided Caliphs," because they knew the Prophet personally and, it is believed, assimilated some of his charisma and values. As such, Muslims looked to the actions and words of the Rāshidūn as a source of authority.

Divisions within this new community nonetheless continued. The third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan, was assassinated, and the umma was divided between those who supported and those who opposed 'Ali as the fourth caliph. 'Ali was subsequently assassinated by a puritan "seceder" (khārijī), and the majority of Muslims accepted his opponent, Mu'awiya b. Abi Sufyan (602–80), as the leader of the fledgling umma, thus beginning the reign of the Umayyads. The Sunnis eventually took the Rāshidūn as their model, stating that the leader should be elected by a council from within the Quraysh (the dominant tribe in Mecca), whereas Shi'is developed the notion of the imamate, in which leadership belonged to Muhammad's direct biological descendents.

The Umayyads and Abbasids

The period between 661 and 750 marks the era of two great Islamic dynasties: the Umayyad followed by the Abbasid. With the rapid spread of Islam, the umma came to include not only Arabs but also many other races and traditions, which affected its political makeup. As the religion spread, it encountered a patrimonial bureaucracy, prevalent in Iran. This absolutist notion of authority placed power in the hands of the monarch and his family, who ruled on behalf of the people. This model was in many respects adopted by both the Umayyad and Abbasid caliphs as the most efficient system to preserve order. Rule of law and stability trumped piety. A shift in title accompanied the shift in style of government: Umayyad and Abbasid caliphs preferred to be known as God's deputy (khalīfat Allāh) instead of successor or vicegerent of God's messenger (khalīfat rasūl Allāh). This claim to absolute authority was opposed not only by Shi'is but also by some Sunnis.

The Abbasids came to power following the Third Fitna (744–50) and claimed to represent justice, opposing themselves to the monarchical Umayyad regime and thus garnering support from Shi'is. Yet before long, they too became patrimonial, incorporating Iranian practices of government to an even greater extent than their predecessors. An early work on political thought was the Risala fi al-Sahaba (Epistle on the caliph's entourage, written 754–56) by Ibn al-Muqaffa', who served as secretary to Umayyad and Abbasid caliphs. In response, one suspects, to the views expressed by the Kharijis, he stated that all men are not, in fact, equal before God. Second, he stated that it was erroneous to obey a leader unconditionally, which seemed to reflect a Shi'i view. Ibn al-Muqaffa' argued for obedience to the caliph only so long as he acted according to the shari'a. This may at first suggest that the ultimate authority is Islamic law, with its basis in the Qur'an and the sunna of Muhammad especially, but Ibn al-Muqaffa' states that while shari'a is dominant, it is the role of the caliph to not only administer the law but also interpret it. This effectively takes power out of the hands of the 'ulama' (the religious body) and places it firmly in those of the caliph as God's deputy. This conflict of authority between the 'ulama' and the political body, symbolized by the caliph, has been a concern throughout much of Islamic history, with the 'ulama', on the whole, remaining silent on political matters, especially in the Sunni tradition. The political theory of Ibn al-Muqaffa', though simply presented, was best reflected in the career of the Abbasid caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33), who put into practice Ibn al-Muqaffa''s view that leadership must have a strong ideological basis. Ma'mun associated himself closely with the Shi'i view of the imam and encouraged the translation of Greek philosophical texts by founding the House of Wisdom (Bayt al-Hikma) in Baghdad. These respected Greek works helped to portray monarchical leadership as more enlightened and therefore legitimized the caliphate, although many within the 'ulama' were suspicious of appealing to a philosophy that they considered "un-Islamic." This presents another conflict that has existed throughout Islamic history: the authority of theological "Islamic" sources as opposed to philosophical "non-Islamic" sources or, put another way, faith versus reason. Ma'mun argued for leadership on rational rather than religious grounds and promoted Mu'tazili teachings on the subject. This led to a Platonic conception of authority with a pessimistic view of human nature, which called for the masses to be ruled by a rational and enlightened caliphate. These views are perhaps best expressed by the Mu'tazili philosopher Jahiz (d. 869).

Although the Abbasids continued to hold the office of caliph, real power was eventually exercised by the Shi'i Buyids (932–1075), followed by the Sunni Seljuqs (1075–1258). From this point, what had been understood as "caliphate authority" transferred to the 'ulama', who also came to be known as imams. In Sunni Islam, the head of state no longer had religious authority. In 1258, the Abbasid capital of Baghdad fell to Mongol rule and the Abbasid caliphate became extinct. Consequently, authority became more communal or neotribal in nature with the development of jurisprudence (fiqh). In time the four legal schools (madhhab) were recognized and the influence of the legal scholar Shafi'i (d. 820) redefined authority. Shafi'i effectively put religious authority back into the hands of the 'ulama' rather than the caliphate.

Shi'i Leadership

The Zaydi Shi'i Qasim b. Ibrahim (785–860) also argued for a largely Platonic conception of political authority: obedience to the leader is a necessity due to the imperfections of human nature. In Sunni Islam, this meant that the caliphs had to legitimize their power by proclaiming themselves to be less susceptible to desires and emotions than other human beings, while not going so far as to declare themselves prophets. For Shi'is, this claim to legitimacy was made somewhat easier due to the semidivine status accorded to their imams. In Twelver Shi'ism, the imams are considered essential to the existence of the universe, especially the twelfth, Hidden Imam. This doctrine of leadership was developed under the Buyids by such notable figures as Mufid (d. 1022), Murtada (d. 1044), and Tusi (d. 1067). It is the belief of the "Twelver," or Imami, Shi'is that the Twelfth Imam, Muhammad al-Mahdi, went into occultation (ghayba, a period of concealment) in 873. While the Mahdi is in occultation, guidance must be provided by the religious scholars who are essentially the Mahdi's representatives. Only when the Twelfth Imam returns are Shi'is obliged to take over the political reins. Until then, they remain politically quiet under illegitimate rulers. In contemporary times, this doctrine led many to believe that Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89) was the Mahdi.

Imami quietism was countered by a much more politically active Isma'ili doctrine that consisted of a hierarchy of seven emanations of God, with the seventh being the human world, and seven major historical epochs, each having its own prophet and seven imams. Their political hierarchy corresponds with this metaphysical pattern. In 909, the Fatimids declared 'Ubaydallah al-Mahdi (d. 934) to be the Mahdi; he went on to conquer Sicily, North Africa, and Egypt and took control of Mecca and Medina. No longer in hiding, the Fatimid imams could claim much greater political and religious authority than the Sunni caliphs.

The Seljuqs and a New Doctrine of the Caliphate

The creation of the Isma'ili Fatimid caliphate in Cairo, together with the existence of the Umayyad caliphate now residing in Andalusia, raised the question of who was the legitimate caliph and whether more than one caliph could exist at the same time. In addition, a military dynasty called the Buyids had effectively seized power within Baghdad, retaining the Sunni Abbasid caliphate as a symbol of unity, despite the fact that the Buyids were Shi'i sympathizers. Further, another force was on the horizon: the Seljuq Turks, who conquered Baghdad in 1055.

With the rise of the Seljuqs from the 11th century, a new Sunni polity emerged that, to a great extent, rejected rational, philosophical speculation in favor of legalism and literalism. One key figure of this period was Mawardi (972–1058), whose main political work, On the Principles of Power (also often translated as On the Ordinances of Government, Kitab al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya), was written between 1045 and 1058, during the Seljuq Turks' rise to power in Baghdad. In this treatise, he expresses his preference for a strong caliphate based on revelation. Mawardi criticized the view of philosophers that reason alone was sufficient for an understanding of how to rule a state. For Mawardi, reason—a human construct—has its limitations, whereas revelation is God's word. Like the Christian thinker St. Thomas Aquinas, Mawardi saw a direct link between divinely revealed order and political order.

Another important figure during the Seljuq ascendancy was the theologian, jurist, philosopher, and mystic Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111), universally known as the "proof of Islam" (hujjat al-islām) and the great "renewer" (mujtahid) of the faith. He attempted to synthesize the three main strands of Islamic rationality: theoretical and philosophical enquiry, juridical legislation, and mystical practice. His writings redirected and reinvigorated Sunni religious thought in the aftermath of the Shi'i intellectual dominance of the previous century. In 1085, Ghazali went to Baghdad and joined the court of the celebrated Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092), who, though merely a vizier, was effectively monarch in all but name and was at the height of his power. Ghazali's best-known work is The Revival of the Religious Sciences (Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din), in which he argues that the essence of the human being is the soul (nafs), which, in its original state—that is, before being attached to the body—is a pure, angelic, and eternal substance. Through reason, the soul has the potential to know the essence of things and acquire knowledge of God, but to achieve this potential it must attach itself to a body, for the body is the vehicle that carries the soul on its journey to God. The body, however, is a corrupting influence that succumbs to anger, desire, and evil. Consequently, the soul, though still possessing its divine elements, also has "animal" elements. To perfect the soul, the person must subordinate the animal qualities and pursue the virtues of temperance, courage, wisdom, and justice. This can be achieved through Sufi practices, which shut the gate to worldly desires. Ghazali points out, however, that it also is important to engage in the rituals associated with Islam, such as pilgrimage, prayer, ablutions, alms, fasting, reading the Qur'an, following the shari'a, and so on. Ghazali's views on religion and mysticism have political implications that are also Platonist in character, for only the few can truly manage to come close to perfecting their soul, and their knowledge of Islam gives them greater political authority. This was Ghazali's attempt to "revive" Islam by making knowledge of religion synonymous with political knowledge, for the religious and the worldly are interdependent.

Andalusian Politics

In the 11th and 12th centuries especially, efforts were made to determine a Sunni religious polity in opposition to the Christian Reconquista (the Spanish and Portuguese word for "reconquest," referring to the retaking of Andalus from the Muslims). Whereas the first major movement led by the Almoravid dynasty emphasized Hanbali literalism and even burned Ghazali's books, the second movement under the Almohads championed Islamic philosophy. This policy was supported by the Aristotelian philosopher Ibn Rushd (also known by the Latin name Averroes, 1126–98). For Ibn Rushd, the truth achieved through the study of philosophy does not differ from the truths of revelation as contained in the Qur'an. What may appear as difference is a matter of interpretation. Ibn Rushd argues that just as reason, through philosophy, can be used to reach truth, so can reason be used to interpret the Qur'anic text. The Qur'an contains many symbols, allegories, and analogies that can be instructive to the less learned, but, Ibn Rushd argues, those possessed of suitable intellect should determine their real meaning rather than treat them literally. It follows from this that the best qualified to interpret shari'a are philosophers, not the theologians. Ibn Rushd wrote commentaries on both Plato's and Aristotle's works, and the influence of these two Greek philosophers is evident in his political views, particularly his view that the leader should be a philosopher-king possessed of a rational intellect.

The Reign of the Mamluks

During the Mamluk regime (1250–1517), there were two great figures of Sunni Islamic political thought: Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) and Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406). Ibn Taymiyya was a jurist of the Hanbali school of law, a strict traditionalist who railed against what he saw as the "innovations" (bid'a) of such authorities in Islam as Ghazali, Ibn al-'Arabi, and the Sufis. He emphasized the need to return to what he perceived as the pristine ideals and practices of Islam at the time of the Prophet Muhammad. In his main political work, Treatise on the Government of the Religious Law, he argues that under the Rāshidūn the Islamic state achieved moral and political purity and that this should be the main aim of Islamic law. In Ibn Taymiyya's view, rulers since the Rāshidūn have failed to achieve such perfection. The ruler should follow rigorously the tenets of the shari'a, applying it firmly but fairly and relying on it for all legal opinions and rulings. Those who are ruled should obey the authority of the caliph provided he, in turn, obeys the shari'a. Ibn Taymiyya was dogmatic in his view that religion cannot be practiced without state power. The religious duty of "commanding right and forbidding wrong" (hisba), he argues, cannot be achieved without a central power and authority, and so there is a necessary link between state and religion. Controversial in his own lifetime, he had few followers and little influence until long after his death. A small number of Ottoman scholars studied him in the 16th century, but in the 18th century, Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab (d. 1792) drew on Ibn Taymiyya's ideas to create Wahhabism, which, together with his military endeavors, led to the creation of the first Saudi state in 1744. Since that time, Ibn Taymiyya has been seen as the champion of revivalism and the founder of many reform movements that look to the time of Muhammad and the principles inculcated in the Qur'an to counter what is perceived as the threat of modernism.

Ibn Taymiyya's idea that religion and government need each other was explored empirically by the great Muslim philosopher of history, Ibn Khaldun. His major work on history (Kitab al-'Ibar) is divided into three books. The famous first book, the Prolegomena, outlines his methodology and outlook on history as well as the dynamics of human society. The second book concerns the history of the Arabs, and the third deals with the history of the Berbers. Although the emphasis of the work is political and focuses on the rise and fall of dynasties, it also explores what politics tells us about human nature. Having studied philosophy, theology, and history, Ibn Khaldun noted that philosophical concepts and reasoning had been applied to theology but not to history. The central theme in the Prolegomena is the sociology of human society, which he called the science of civilization ('ilm al-'umran). Studying 'ilm al-'umran would reveal the dynamics of human society, which in turn would enable the historian to sift through historical records and separate fact from fiction. Hence, historical facts are those that correspond to the logic of societies' dynamics and their rules of evolution. To Ibn Khaldun, the power base of each state depends on its 'asabiyya, or group solidarity based on family ties and lineage, which is to be found mostly among nomadic people and savage nations. Ibn Khaldun argues that the power of each 'aṣabiyya extends basically to four generations. The first generation, driven by tribal expansionism or religious mission, would conquer the settled nations and establish a powerful state. The second generation would consolidate and expand the state, build its institutions, and still enjoy strong solidarity due to its close connection with a tribal ethos. The third generation would enjoy the prosperity of the state and provide support for arts, sciences, and culture but would have less solidarity as a result of its urban upbringing. The fourth generation would waste the achievements of its ancestors. Confined to a life of palace machinations and the pursuit of material gratification, members of this generation would concern themselves mostly with raising money to spend on their own welfare and the preservation of their thrones, which would lead to an intensified tax burden on the populace. The resulting injustices would lead to the dissolution of the state and the annihilation of its civilization, making it vulnerable to invasions from other nomadic or savage groups. The cycle then starts anew. Despite the originality of his thought, however, it seems that his principles were neither applied nor studied by his Muslim successors.

Muslim Rulers as "Masters of the Age"

Although little new political theory was produced during the period of the Ottoman dynasty, the ruler Süleiman "the Lawgiver" (al-Qānūnī, d. 1566), known in the West as "the Magnificent" due largely to his military conquests, oversaw the most detailed codification of Qur'anic and sultanic law that any Islamic state had ever experienced. Süleiman's update of the law codes that had been largely produced by the Ottoman sultan Mehmed II (d. 1481) later became known as "Süleiman's law-code." What came into existence was nonreligious law, known as kanun, which was the law of the sultan or Ottoman law (kanuni osmani). Kanun dealt with criminal infractions and was intended to supplement shari'a by specifying penalties, although the punishments actually tended to be harsher than those under shari'a. It also dealt with the collection of taxes, land tenure, and other matters. Finally, it was concerned with the form of government and the relationships between the various spheres of authority. Because of the integration of kanun and shari'a, the judges implemented secular as well as religious law in Islamic law courts. The justification for kanun was that shari'a simply could not cover everything required to maintain social order in such a huge empire with a diversity of cultures and beliefs, so, as shari'a law only applied to Muslims, another law was needed. Both systems of law, it was argued, were after the same thing, which was public order and justice. The problem was that kanun often conflicted with shari'a, although this raised less concern during Süleiman's reign than it did later, when the Ottoman Empire was in its decline. Süleiman, especially in his early years, considered himself the ṣāḥib-qirān (Lord of the Auspicious Conjunction), the very embodiment of human perfection, and thus a reflection of God Himself. The Mughal emperor Akbar (1542–1605) had likewise given himself such a title, for it also meant that the ruler saw himself as the universal ruler of Islam who was responsible for guiding Muslims along the right path. Süleiman also called himself "caliph of the whole world." The Ottomans had claimed the title of caliph for some time, especially when Sultan Selim I (d. 1520) brought Mecca and Medina into his realm. It was believed that the sultan-caliph had not only the responsibility to execute shari'a in all parts of the world but also the power to interpret the law, hence the creation of kanun, the product of a ruler guided by divine inspiration.

Responses to Modernity

Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan (1817–98) was an influential modernist thinker who, rather than shun Western influence, adopted it wholeheartedly. His importance rests in his realization that Islam needed to reform if it was to survive, although he remained a controversial figure due to his collaboration with the British, who occupied India at the time. Khan was a great believer in the need for Islam to modernize, and he saw in Western thought, especially in the realm of science, a force that he did not regard as antithetical to Islam. Like his counterparts in the Middle East, he believed that the survival of Islam required the abandonment of blind imitation (taqlīd). He undertook the reinterpretation of the Qur'an, believing the more obscure passages had to be interpreted symbolically, allegorically, or analytically in order to reveal their true meaning. He believed that reason played an important part in this process and that the main principles in the Qur'an were in tune with scientific progress and reason in accordance with nature. Like Ibn Rushd, Khan believed Islam was the religion of reason and nature. Heavily influenced by 19th-century European rationalism and natural philosophy, he also drew heavily on both the reformism of Shah Waliullah as well as the rationalism of Mu'tazilis and the Ikhwan al-Safa' (the Isma'ili-influenced "Brothers of Purity").

Khan's fellow Indian Sir Muhammad Iqbal (1873–1938) remains an important influence not only in South Asia but also in the Middle East. He is renowned and admired for his passionate poetry, but he was also a philosopher, political thinker, and the spiritual father of Pakistan. He was aware of the problems faced by Islam when confronted with so-called modernity, in particular the failure to respond to Western encroachment not only in the political and social spheres but also in the technological and scientific arenas. His more philosophical works culminated in his Secrets of the Self (Asrar-i-Khudi), which speaks of the need for Muslims to reawaken their souls and act. His rejection of territorial nationalism was based on his belief in the umma: a community of like-minded individuals that existed beyond national boundaries. He saw in the Prophet Muhammad the exemplar of the Muslim community: a prophet-statesman who founded a society based on freedom, equality, and brotherhood reflected in the central tenet of "unity" (tawḥīd). In the practical sense, Iqbal believed that a requisite of being a good Muslim was to live under Islamic law, which acts as the blueprint for the perfect Islamic society as envisioned by the Prophet Muhammad. In 1937, Iqbal sent a letter to Muhammad 'Ali Jinnah, the leader of the Muslim League and future founder of Pakistan, in which he emphasized the importance of Islamic law if Islam was to remain a force in the region. Aside from the need for shari'a to exist in any Islamic state, Iqbal also stressed the importance of absolute equality. He believed that democracy was the best form of government, whereas aristocracy suppressed human individuality. When Iqbal talked of democracy, however, he was not referring to Western forms of democracy, which give the franchise to any individual over a certain age regardless of educational level. In this sense, Iqbal shared a view of democracy not dissimilar from his compatriot Mawdudi (1903–79): democracy is only for those who are sufficiently learned to know what they are voting for.

Mawdudi was head and founder of the political movement Jama'at-i Islami, the Indo-Pakistan equivalent of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, and was the most controversial and significant Islamic thinker and activist in the region until his death. In many respects, his views echo those of the modernist movement known as the Salafis. Mawdudi's writings and activities contributed greatly to the founding of Pakistan in 1947. His concentration on leaders rather than on the common man is reflected in his doctrine of al-Jihad fi al-Islam, in which the social order flows from the top down. This necessarily implies a form of authoritarianism: he believed that practical social change was impossible unless the views of the leadership changed first. On this point, he frequently makes reference to the authority of the Prophet, the caliphs, and the great jurists as prime examples of forces for change. Mawdudi considered an Islamic form of government to be a moral imperative: the system by which the laws of God are given form. Many Islamists, Mawdudi among them, make reference to a "golden era" of Islam, a period that is portrayed as a pure Islamic state, an age of unity between the religious and the secular with Muhammad as its head. In appealing to traditional hadith and histories, the Islamist sees ultimate authority resting with the Rāshidūn. Mawdudi does not detail exactly how much authority the rulings of past great jurists would have in his Islamic state, nor does he specify which rulings. In Mawdudi's Islamic state, authority—the power to make and enforce laws—would rest with a small number of individuals, acting as representatives of God. This conception of authority, which he calls "theo-democracy," is reminiscent of medieval European societies rather than any modern democratic system.

Together with his friend and colleague Afghani (1838–97), Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905) is the founder of the Salafis. Although considered modernist, this movement looks back to the time of Muhammad and his Companions as a guide to the right way to live. Together, these two figures were the most influential spokesmen for Egyptian Islamic modernism in the 19th century. 'Abduh's writings have had an immense and lasting influence on the Muslim world. His most distinguished follower was the Syrian Rashid Rida (1865–1935). 'Abduh and Rida are considered the great synthesizers of modern Islam. The general policy of the Salafis was to look to the "pious ancestors" (al-salaf al-sālih, the Prophet Muhammad and his Companions primarily) for guidance but also to appeal to man's rational capacity. While those laws that governed worship, such as prayer, fasting, and pilgrimage, were unchangeable, the majority of legislation, such as regulation on family law and the penal codes, were open to change according to the social and cultural traditions of the time. In theory, then, a Salafi approach to Islam should allow for independent reasoning, although there is always the danger that interpreters would be unwilling to adopt anything other than a literal approach to the "pious ancestors" and the Qur'an, in the same way some Muslim scholars have been reluctant to contradict the rulings of traditional legal scholars.

The Tunisian Rachid al-Gannouchi (b. 1941) is a controversial political and social activist who represents the generation following that of the Salafis. While maintaining essential Islamic values, he sees no contradiction between a multiparty system, pluralism, or women's rights, for example, and Islam. Gannouchi argues that what is at fault with Islam, at least in his own society, is its failure to identify itself with the impoverished working classes and with women. In his view, Islam should be seen as a liberating force, not an oppressive one. In fact, he argues that democracy originates in Islam and that the Western concept was inherited from Islamic civilization during the Middle Ages. For Gannouchi, a state that upholds such values as human rights, the rule of law, a multiparty system, and freedom of speech is in effect a Muslim state, regardless of its secular credentials. He argues that he would rather live in a free secular state than any state that imposes an oppressive version of Islam. As his paradigm, he cites Andalusia (Muslim Spain) as a time when Islam embraced diversity and pluralism and thrived from it.

Recent Shi'i Political Thought

'Ali Shari'ati (1933–77) is regarded as the ideological father of the 1979 Iranian Revolution. His writings were certainly revolutionary, modern in style, and radical in approach, targeting the oppression and alienation experienced by Muslims under the Pahlavi regime in Iran. Shari'ati combined Islamic concepts with Western political philosophy. While acknowledging the popular appeal of Marxist ideology, he criticized it for treating people as mere units of production. Islam, he argued, was always inherently a mass movement but also possessed humanistic values that Marxism lacked. Shari'ati placed great emphasis on the role of man as God's vicegerent on Earth. In other words, God had given man the responsibility of ruling the Earth: "man" did not mean, for Shari'ati, a small minority or a caliph, but all people. Therefore, God's vicegerency was synonymous with the power of the masses, of al-nās (the people). To Shari'ati, the umma is a classless society over which only God's will can reign. While Shari'ati's ideas owe much to the revolutionary values of Karl Marx and the existential values of Jean-Paul Sartre, he also takes a great deal from the works of mystical Muslims such as Ibn Sina (commonly known by his Latinized name, Avicenna, 980–1037) and Sadr ad-Din Muhammad Shirazi (also called Mulla Sadra, 1571–1641). In his well-known work The Sociology of Islam, Shari'ati writes of the "theomorphic man": a "Perfect Man" who possesses the qualities of truth, goodness, and beauty, a rebellious spirit who combines the virtues of Jesus, Caesar, and Socrates. This vision of a "theomorphic being" owes much to the concept of the Perfect Man (insān-i kāmil) as promulgated by Ibn al-'Arabi and the Sufis, which was also developed by the Indian poet and reformer Iqbal. In fact, Shari'ati's writings on science and nature are highly reminiscent of Iqbal, for he also regarded the Qur'anic view of nature as close to the scientific view of the world, and perhaps surprisingly, Shari'ati sees Iqbal, a Sunni Muslim, as typical of the Perfect Man.

If Shari'ati was the ideological father of the revolution, Khomeini was its living symbol and guide. In his writings and lectures, Khomeini argued that if Islam was to be rejuvenated, it needed to look toward the Perfect Man for guidance, and he sets out the qualities required. He argued that monarchy is incompatible with Islam and rejects Iranian nationalism in favor of an Islamic universalism, albeit of the Shi'i variety. By the 1970s, Khomeini was arguing that in the absence of the imam, the clergy should do more than simply advise the government; instead, the clergy should rule directly. This doctrine of "rule by the jurists" (wilāyat al-faqīh) had little Qur'anic support and was rejected by virtually all the Shi'i clergy. For Khomeini, however, the concept of rule by jurists was a logical conclusion to the much more widely held view that an Islamic state, if it were to be truly Islamic, must be governed by shari'a. It was believed that shari'a amounted to a complete social system, providing regulations for all aspects of life: if this was indeed the case, then all legislation has been provided for by God. The problem rests, however, in interpreting divine law so that it may adapt to changing circumstances. Shi'ism has a long tradition of ijtihād (independent reasoning), and Khomeini argued that those best qualified for ijtihād are the jurists. Khomeini presents a view of his Republic of Iran not unlike Plato's hypothetical Republic: a state governed by philosopher-kings who should rule because they have access to moral truths.

Counter to Khomeini is Abdolkarim Soroush (b. 1945), who has offended the traditional clergy by questioning the validity of the concept of wilāyat al-faqīh. Soroush argues that, as the knowledge of the jurists is human rather than sacred, they should not be allowed to claim infallible authority. Instead of obeying the dictates of the ayatollahs, or any person claiming a monopoly in religious knowledge, Soroush argues that the student of religion should struggle to determine his own understanding of the body of religious knowledge through dialogue and questioning. Soroush's democratic approach to knowledge encourages people not to imitate or obey previous rulings but to search for themselves; otherwise, jurists will become power hungry and hypocritical. He has championed the cause of democracy on the basis that Islam cannot thrive unless such a political system exists: people must be free to believe or not, and Islam, or any religion, cannot be imposed upon a people from above.

See also caliph, caliphate; traditional political thought

Further Reading

Aziz Ahmad, An Intellectual History of Islam in India, 1969; Hamid Algar, Religion and State in Iran 1785–1906: The Role of the Ulema in the Qajar Period, 1969; Joel Beinin and Joe Stork, eds., Political Islam: Essays from Middle Eastern Reports, 1997; Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph: Religious Authority in the First Centuries of Islam, 1986; Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 1982; John Esposito, ed., Voices of Resurgent Islam, 1983; Marshall G. S. Hodgson, The Venture of Islam: Conscience and History in a World Civilization, 3 vols., 1974; Albert Hourani, Arabic Thought in the Liberal Age, 1798–1939, 1983; Roy Jackson, Fifty Key Figures in Islam, 2006; Idem, Mawlana Mawdudi and Political Islam: Authority and the Islamic State, 2011; Ira M. Lapidus, A History of Islamic Societies, 1988; W. Montgomery Watt, Islamic Political Thought, 1968.

ROY JACKSON

ayatollah

"Ayatollah" is an honorific title with political significance that emerged in Twelver Shi'i tradition during the late Qajar dynasty (1848–1925). The word "ayatollah" combines the Arabic words āyah (sign) and Allāh (God) and designates members in the uppermost tier of jurists capable of independent legal reasoning (mujtahids). The term is closely related to the highest clerical rank in Twelver Shi'ism, marja' al-taqlīd (source of emulation), now synonymous with the title "grand ayatollah" (ayatollah 'uzmā), the holder of which may be adopted as an authority by lay Shi'is (muqallids) who have chosen him as the most accomplished living expert on Islamic law. Because the bearers of the title ayatollah have often played a pivotal role in the entrance of the traditionally quietist Shi'i clerical class into the contemporary political spheres, this entry focuses on the relationship between ayatollahs and Shi'i Islamic activism.

The consolidation of the Shi'i 'ulama' as an independent political class coincided with the decline of the Qajar monarchy under the long reign of Nasir al-Din Shah (r. 1848–96). The Qajars' demise was hastened not only by formidable military defeats but also by a set of modernizing reforms that destabilized the domestic economy and an increased Iranian reliance on foreign financial and technical assistance. In this context, Nasir al-Din Shah granted, in 1890, a 50-year concession over the production, distribution, and export of Iran's tobacco to a British firm. Encouraged by the anticolonial Pan-Islamist Afghani (d. 1897), Iraq's then leading religious authority, Grand Ayatollah Mirza Hasan al-Shirazi (d. 1896), issued a fatwa banning all forms of involvement in the production and sale of tobacco. The fatwa triggered the Tobacco Protest of 1891–92, which led to a halt of the tobacco industry, violent demonstrations across Iraq and Iran, and the eventual withdrawal of the concession.

The Iranian Constitutional Revolution of 1905–11 was the next major event in which the Shi'i religious hierarchy asserted its political will. Although the converging forces of the constitutional movement did not originate from a specific political act on the part of the clergy, many of the demands of the movement were carried by the Sayyids (descendants of the Prophet Muhammad) 'Abdallah Bihbihani (d. 1910) and Muhammad Tabatabai (d. 1918), who came to be called ayatollahs despite not belonging to the highest clerical orders of the time. The popular bestowal of the title upon them marked an early precedent in which political credentials trumped traditional scholarly merit in the establishment of religious authority. The Constitutional Revolution also marked one of the first times in which nationalist political mobilization coincided with the Shi'i mourning rituals of 'Ashura' and employed the material resources of the religious establishment in direct opposition to the state, as in, for instance, the use of shrine complexes as asylums and seminaries as centers of protest mobilization. In this period, clerical groups in Iran also began to organize independent political associations and networks (anjaman) that paralleled those of other emerging groups in civil society. Other constitutionalist clerics of the period included Ayatollah Muhammad Kazim Khurasani (d. 1911) and his influential student Ayatollah Muhammad Husayn Na'ini (d. 1936).

By 1921, when Reza Khan's coup consolidated his control over the powers of state, the awkward alliance between the 'ulama' and liberals had sufficiently weakened. Furthermore, the leading traditional cleric of the period, Ayatollah 'Abd al-Karim al-Ha'iri (d. 1937), had withdrawn from political activity, focusing instead on strengthening Qum as a center of religious scholarship. The bulk of the Shi'i 'ulama' thus retained a conventional quietist posture. Out of fear of encroaching secularization and foreign domination (as had occurred in Turkey and Iraq, respectively), leading figures such as Ayatollahs Abu al-Hasan Isfahani (d. 1946) and Na'ini—who were expelled from Najaf after openly opposing British occupation—quietly consented to Reza Khan's rise to power, seeing him as the least of three evils.

This political arrangement came to an abrupt halt as Reza Shah instituted rapid modernizing reforms such as compulsory conscription, the emancipation of women, and the state administration of religious education. Qum, relatively immune from the reforms, became the de facto center of underground religious opposition and later fostered the rise of militant groups such as Navab Safavi's (d. 1955) Fida'iyyin-i Islam (sacrificers of Islam). Ayatollah Hossein Burujirdi (d. 1961), who succeeded Ha'iri as the sole marja' al-taqlid, shunned political activism but endorsed a militant anti-Baha'i campaign and was particularly active in religious propagation (da'wa).

Shortly after Burujirdi's death, Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89) began an outspoken campaign against the Pahlavi monarchy, which was catalyzed by the government's attack on the Fayziyah Madrasa in 1963. Khomeini also criticized quietist 'ulama' who did not confront the state. His efforts were supported by figures like Ayatollahs Muhammad Bihishti (d. 1981), Mahmud Taliqani (d. 1979), and Murtada Mutaharri (d. 1979), who promoted the success of the clerical movement headed by Khomeini. It is in this context that the influential doctrine of the rule of the jurist (wilayat al-faqih) was consolidated as a justification for modern governance by the 'ulama'.

In Iraq, Ayatollah Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, along with Mahdi al-Hakim, the son of Grand Ayatollah Muhsin al-Hakim (1889–1970), had already helped form the Da'wa Party in 1957, which advocated an Islamic alternative to Arab socialist nationalism. Meanwhile, Lebanese Shi'is' efforts to achieve greater communitarian recognition and civil rights were led by Imam Musa al-Sadr (disappeared in 1978), who, as the son of Ayatollah Sadr al-Din al-Sadr (d. 1954), was raised and educated in Qum's religious and political milieu.

When Khomeini's Islamic Republican Party emerged triumphant in the aftermath of the Iranian Revolution of 1979, the activist current among the Shi'i 'ulama' became militarized, and they forced their quietist opponents underground or out of power. Ayatollah Shari'atmadari (d. 1986) bore the brunt of this action when he was forcibly demoted from his rank as marja' al-taqlid. The Islamic Republic then patronized and further militarized the preexisting Shi'i movements of Lebanon and Iraq, which had themselves splintered over related ideological differences. For example, Ayatollah Kho'i (d. 1992) of Najaf remained quietist and opposed to the doctrine of wilayat al-faqih, while members of the Hakim family who had survived assassination attempts established the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq, sharing a Khomeinist program and receiving ample material support from the Islamic Republic of Iran.

In the 1990s and 2000s, both Lebanese and Iraqi Shi'i movements gravitated toward local interests. For example, Ayatollah Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah (1935–2010), regarded as the spiritual father of the Lebanese Shi'i movement Hizbullah, advocated a secular-based religious communitarian social order rather than a state governed in accordance with Islamic law in order to suit the interconfessional context of Lebanon. After the American invasion of Iraq in 2003, Ayatollah Kho'i's successor, Ayatollah Sistani (b. 1930), though not a supporter of the doctrine of wilayat al-faqih, nonetheless exerted his de facto political authority as marja' al-taqlid to demand popular elections and thus ensure a Shi'i rise to power. Ayatollah 'Abd al-'Aziz al-Hakim's (d. 2009) revolutionary movement changed its name from the Supreme Council for the Islamic Revolution in Iraq to the Islamic Supreme Council of Iraq and began to operate within a secular constitutionalist framework. The power of Shi'i clerical-based Iraqi political parties directly influenced the formation of a rival Sunni organization, the Association of Muslim Scholars, in 2003.

In the Persian Gulf states of Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and Bahrain, clerical authorities largely followed the quietist policies of Ayatollahs Kho'i and Sistani. Having for the most part shunned Khomeini's doctrine, they nonetheless mobilized to seek greater communitarian rights within existing political frameworks. In Iran, authorities such as Grand Ayatollahs Montazeri (d. 2009) and Sani'i (b. 1937), despite attempts to silence them, continued to oppose the supreme rule of the jurist, while the majority of Iranian ayatollahs remained either de facto or de jure supporters of the doctrine and operated within or in tandem with the state apparatus.

See also al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); Fadlallah, Muhammad Husayn (1935–2010); guardianship of the jurist; Iran; Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89); al-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir (1935–80); Shi'ism; source of emulation

Further Reading

Hamid Algar, Religion and State in Iran, 1785–1906: The Role of the Ulama in the Qajar Period, 1969; Hamid Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundation of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, 2006; Nikki R. Keddie, Sayyid Jamal ad-Din "al-Afghani": A Political Biography, 1972; Ruhollah Khomeini, Islam and Revolution, translated by Hamid Algar, 1981; Laurence Louer, Transnational Shia Politics: Religious and Political Networks in the Gulf, 2008; Yitzhak Nakash, Reaching for Power: The Shi'a in the Modern Arab World, 2006; Vali Nasr, The Shia Revival, 2006.

ABBAS BARZEGAR

Ayyubids (1169–1250)

The Ayyubid dynasty was founded by Saladin (Salah al-Din b. Ayyub, d. 1193), a military commander of Kurdish descent, who deposed the Fatimids and assumed control over Egypt in 1171. The commitment to jihad, the abolition of taxes deemed illegal by Islamic law, and the patronage of religious learning and Sufism, all spearheaded by Saladin, were presented as part of the wider ideology of the revivification of the sunna (prophetic traditions). His victory over the army of the Latin kingdom of Jerusalem and reconquest of Jerusalem in 1187, the apex of his career, immortalized him in Arabic historiography and popular culture as a heroic prince of virtue.

Before his death in 1193, Saladin concluded a peace treaty with Richard the Lionheart, leader of the Third Crusade, and bequeathed his domain to 17 of his sons, brothers, and nephews, who formed a confederation of autonomous principalities of varied size and importance. It was a novel political organization for Syria and Egypt, reminiscent of the Buyid confederation (946–1012). Cohesion largely depended on the authority of the sultan—the reigning head of the clan, usually situated in Cairo. Prerogatives of sultans included the vow of allegiance from the lesser princes and the mention of their names on coins and in the Friday noon sermon (khuṭba). The sultan in turn recognized the authority of the Abbasid caliph and repeatedly sought his formal investiture. Conflicting interests, a mobile military elite, and shifting alliances—some forged with external enemies—undermined familial solidarity and the confederation's stability, yet most internal conflicts ended in agreements and territorial adjustments. Diplomacy and coexistence were also preferred to warfare with the Franks.

In 1250, Mamluk conspirators murdered the heir of the Ayyubid sultan who had made Turkish slaves the principal element in his army. By 1260, following the Mongol onslaught, only the principality of Hama in northern Syria remained in the hands of Ayyubid princes (until 1342).

Ayyubid rule brought economic renewal. Changes in the system of iqṭāʿ (grants of land to the military) and the reclamation of land led to greater agricultural production; cities and commerce expanded. Culturally, Syria assumed the leading position in the Arab-speaking lands, attracting immigrants and refugees.

The Ayyubids inherited most of their civil and military institutions from the Fatimids, Abbasids, and Seljuqs, including the division of the administration into three main offices: the chancellery (dīwān al-inshāʾ), the office of military affairs (dīwān al-juyūsh), and the treasury (dīwān al-māl). The armies had no clear system of ranks and command; the officer corps was by and large hereditary. Toward the end of Ayyubid rule, Syria and Egypt underwent a steady process of militarization, strikingly reflected in the appointment of the mushidd—a military official entrusted with the supervision of the civil administration.

The Ayyubid period does not seem to have produced political thinkers of great caliber, yet three contributors to the field of governance and administration deserve to be mentioned: 'Ali al-Harawi (d. 1215), better known as the author of the first pilgrims' guide to Syria, wrote his Tadhkira Harawiyya fi al-Hiyal al-Harbiyya (On the ruses of war) and Wasiyya Harawiyya (Last counsels) in the tradition of Mirrors for Princes for al-Malik al-Zahir (d. 1216) of Aleppo. He addresses warfare and governance, recommending piety, justice, sound fiscal and economic administration, surveillance of judges and officials, respect toward religious scholars and foreign ambassadors, wariness of bad counselors, secrecy and discreetness, and caution and patience. Above all, he calls for fidelity to the shari'a and military might, in light of Saladin's example.

Sibt b. al-Jawzi (d. 1257), Damascene historian and popular preacher, is considered author of another Mirrors for Princes, Al-Jalis al-Salih wa-l-Anis al-Nasih (The good counselor), composed for al-Malik al-Ashraf (d. 1239) of Damascus, in his praise. Sibt b. al-Jawzi lists trustworthiness, grace (faḍl), justice, piety, the patronage of scholars, and the love of beneficence and munificence as attributes of a good ruler. He ends his book with stories (ḥikāyāt) of exemplary rulers of the past.

As'ad b. al-Mammati (d. 1209), author of Qawanin al-Dawawin (Rules of administration), provides a detailed description of the administration of Egypt under the Fatimids and the Ayyubids, written as a guide for state officials (kuttāb) for the sultan al-'Aziz 'Uthman.

See also Mirrors for Princes; Saladin (1138–93)

Further Reading

R. Stephen Humphreys, From Saladin to the Mongols, 1977; Tryggve Kronholm, "Dedication and Devotion: The Introduction to the Kitāb al-Jalṭs as-Ṣālih wa-l-Anīṣ an-Nāṣih, Ascribed to Sibṭ ibn al-Jawzī (d. 654/1257)," Orientalia Suecana 38–39 (1989–1990); Daniella Talmon-Heller, Islamic Piety in Medieval Syria, 2007.

DANIELLA TALMON-HELLER

Azhar University

The history of Azhar, a mosque and an institution of religious learning situated in Cairo, Egypt, has reflected shifts in political power since its foundation in 970 by the Fatimids. Historians have disagreed about the role of Azhar as a tool for political and religious propaganda under the Fatimids, and there is no consensus on when Azhar became a central institution of learning. Under the Mamluks, it was a major institution for the transmission of knowledge, and this continued in the early Ottoman period, with the top positions within the institution occupied by Ottoman officials. Its influence and reach went beyond Egypt, and Azhar became a site where knowledge, religious authority, and politics were tightly linked. Its prominent 'ulama' (religious scholars) participated in a partnership with the rulers, but the 'ulama' rarely held the upper hand. They mediated between the rulers and the Egyptian populace, relaying the demands of the general public to the sovereign and vice versa and helping maintain social stability. Thus Azhar participated in politics through negotiation rather than overt opposition or strong political leadership. The 'ulama' would articulate political advice (naṣīḥa) to the ruler but rarely expressed overt opposition.

In the early 19th century, Azhar and its 'ulama' were politically marginalized by the emergence of a strong state that aimed at reforming its own administrative structures and transforming the domains of law and education. Through these reforms, Islam lost its preeminence in the two domains where the 'ulama' had previously been the main actors. New channels for educating the elites were created, and Azhar's scholars and the student body suffered from the competition with new schools (such as Dar al-'Ulum, established in 1872). Muslim scholars and reformers in the 18th and 19th centuries also articulated strong critiques of Azhar and its 'ulama', who they said had become passive and were more interested in life in this world than in the defense of their religion. This economic and social marginalization did not mean that Azhar entirely lost its significance. Rather, its 'ulama' still had relevance in normative and political debates, at least as individuals if not as representatives of their institution. The political constraints around them changed, however, as the modern state's reach and regulatory power in society weakened Azhar's influence on Egyptians. This transformation of state power found its apex in postcolonial Egypt when President Gamal Abdel Nasser's regime nationalized the religious endowments (waqfs; 1952–53), put an end to the existence of shari'a courts (1955), and introduced wide-ranging reforms at Azhar itself (1961). This series of changes circumscribed the power of Azhar further: its 'ulama' were deprived of their judicial domain, they lost their economic independence, and they became civil servants within a bureaucracy at the service of the state. They did not all accept this new set of circumstances; some prominent 'ulama' resigned in opposition. The curriculum of Azhari institutes and of the university was transformed with the introduction of new subjects, in particular faculties for secular knowledge that were added to the older faculties of theology (uṣūl al-dīn), law (sharī'a wa-qānūn), and Arabic language (lugha 'arabiyya). The Nasserist regime echoed many of the criticisms directed earlier at Azhar for its passivity, in particular the Muslim Brotherhood's criticisms of Azhar as a dormant institution, which had helped justify the state's reforms. The reinvigoration of Islam had become the task of the state.

Many 'ulama' from Azhar continued, however, to view themselves as the guardians of the tradition, and they resented Nasser's transformation of their institution. For instance, Azhar was forced to condemn the Muslim Brotherhood when the state fought them and to legitimate socialism from an Islamic point of view. During the presidency of Anwar Sadat, however, gaining greater space to maneuver and armed with the large state bureaucracy that Nasser had created, the 'ulama' attempted to reform politics through their own articulation of Islamic norms. They did this, for instance, by appealing to the state for the implementation of Islamic law in the 1970s and by providing their own draft of an "Islamic constitution" in 1979. Far from losing their ability to participate in political debates, the 'ulama' insisted on the necessity of implementing societal and political Islamic norms as they understood them. They also reinvigorated a classical political trope in the history of Sunni Islam: in a state whose religion is Islam and for which the shari'a is the main source of legislation—as is stated in the Egyptian constitution of 1980—it is the duty of the 'ulama' to articulate the Islamic norms to be followed by the state. Hence it is the responsibility of the 'ulama' to lay down the Islamic norms—but certainly never to govern on their own—and it is the responsibility of the policy makers who are in power to implement them. This reinvigoration of the partnership between those who have the knowledge of the foundations of Islamic law and those who devise state policy did not always provide Azhar with more legitimacy, however. This very partnership with the authoritarian state, and the administrative status of Azhar as a state institution, put Azhar's officials at odds with members of Islamist movements. Within Azhar, this partnership paradoxically created resistance against state policies through the voice of some 'ulama' aligned with Islamist discourses on diverse subjects from the criteria for pious public behavior to international relations. Whereas Islamist movements in general have had a negative view of Azhar's 'ulama' as the scholars "of the state," Azhar's leadership has been able to show some autonomy at times to force its way into politics and to make its voice heard, especially through 'ulama' expressing themselves in the Egyptian public arena and beyond.

See also Egypt; madrasa; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Rainer Brunner, Islamic Ecumenism in the 20th Century: The Azhar and Shiism between Rapprochement and Restraint, 2004; Chris Eccel, Egypt, Islam, and Social Change: Al-Azhar in Conflict and Accommodation, 1984; Afaf Lutfi al-Sayyid Marsot, "The Ulama of Cairo in the 18th and the 19th Centuries," in Scholars, Saints, and Sufis: Muslim Religious Institutions in the Middle East since 1500, edited by Nikki R. Keddie, 1972; Malika Zeghal, Gardiens de l'Islam: Les oulémas d'Al Azhar dans l'Égypte contemporaine, 1996

MALIKA ZEGHAL

B

Babur, Zahir al-Din (1483–1530)

Zahir al-Din Muhammad Babur is known for three achievements. First, he survived the internecine conflict in his Central Asian homeland of modern Uzbekistan (mā warā' al-nahr) in the 15th and early 16th centuries. Second, he founded a Timurid state in India in 1526 generally known as the Mughal Empire. Third, he wrote a memoir that has endured as one of the richest examples of that genre.

Babur, which is a Perso-Turkish name that means lion or tiger, was a patrilineal descendant of the Turkic conqueror Timur (d. 1405), or Tamerlane in European parlance, and a matrilineal descendant of the Mongol Chingiz Khan (d. 1227). Babur was born as a Muslim in the Ferghana Valley, east-southeast of Tashkent, at a time when the region was contested by three groups, who by the late 15th century were also Muslims: his own relatives, the Timurids; the Chaghatay branch of the Mongols; and the Uzbeks, a Mongol-led Turkic tribal confederation. After inheriting his father's small Ferghana appanage in 1494 at the age of 12, he spent the next decade struggling with members of all three groups to capture Samarqand, Timur's capital, and establish himself as the recognized heir of his ancestor. After twice occupying but failing to hold the city, Babur abandoned Transoxiana in 1504 and, with fewer than 300 supporters, seized Kabul, a former Timurid outpost.

During the next decade, he fought to survive in this desolate outpost while simultaneously struggling to recapture Samarqand and his homeland. After occupying Samarqand for a third time in 1511 with help from Shah Isma'il, the Uzbeks forced him to flee the city, and by 1514 he had abandoned his attempt to return to the Timurid homeland. Babur subsequently focused his self-described mulkgirliq, or "kingdom-seizing," ambitions on India. Timur had invaded India in 1398 and sacked Delhi and established a Timurid claim to rule Hindustan. Babur invoked his Timurid descent to legitimize the campaigns that he began in northwestern India in 1519. After conducting a series of probing actions in territories then ruled by members of the unstable Afghan Lodi dynasty, Babur marched from Kabul in December 1525 with no more than 12,000 men and camp followers. In April 1526, he defeated the Lodhis at Panipat, a small town about 50 miles north of Delhi. Following a subsequent victory over a formidable Hindu Rajput army the following year, he spent the next three years trying to consolidate his hold over the agriculturally rich regions of the Punjab, the Ganges-Jumna Duab, and the Gangetic Valley.

Babur modeled his fragile new regime on the city-state of Herat, the city where the last great Timurid ruler, Husayn Bayqara (d. 1506), had presided over a florescence of Perso-Islamic art and literature that Ottomans, Safavids, and Indian Muslims alike idealized as a cultural golden age. As Babur demonstrates in his remarkable autobiography, his political ideal was a sedentary state dominated by Timurid and Chingizid Hanafi Sunni Muslims, who patronized Perso-Islamic literary and artistic culture, and before his death in 1530, he welcomed to his capital at Agra political, religious, and cultural refugees from the former Timurid lands in Transoxiana and Afghanistan. These included Turco-Mongol warriors; Naqshbandi Sufis, who practiced a restrained form of Sunni piety; and artistic and literary representatives of late-Timurid high culture. While Babur's Indian state is usually called the Mughal Empire, Mughal (the Persian term for Mongol) is a misleading name for a state that represented a Timurid renaissance.

See also Delhi; India; Mughals (1526–1857)

Further Reading

Jean-Louis Bacqué-Grammont, trans., Le Livre de Babur, 1980; Annette Susanah Beveridge, The Bābur-nāma in English, 1969; Stephen F. Dale, The Garden of the Eight Paradises: Babur and the Culture of Empire in Central Asia, Afghanistan and India 1483–1530, 2004; W. M. Thackston Jr., The Baburnama: Memoirs of Babur, Prince and Emperor, 2002.

STEPHEN F. DALE

Baghdad

Baghdad has been the principal city of Iraq since the eighth century. The origin and meaning of the city's name are unknown. At least one settlement by this name existed in ancient times. In 762, it was chosen by Abu Ja'far al-Mansur, second Abbasid caliph, as the site of the dynasty's new capital, evidently because of its arable land and its proximity to trade routes and because—unlike the other places where the Abbasids had tried to establish a capital—its inhabitants were not hostile or otherwise dangerous to the dynasty. Mansur's city-complex consisted of concentric circles formed by fortified walls. The space between the first and second walls was divided into lots distributed among his allies and clients. The inner circle contained Mansur's palace, the great mosque, and government offices. The soldiery was housed outside the walls to the northwest, and the bulk of the population, along with many of the markets, was accommodated in Karkh to the south. The caliph's city was thus an extension of his private domain. It served both to seclude him and to emphasize his centrality. The doors of the main gates were brought from the Umayyad city of Wasit and a Pharaonic site in Syria, thus symbolizing both the appropriation of the land and of the past. The city's official name was "the city of peace" (madīnat al-salām), perhaps reflecting the doctrine that allegiance to the imam—in this case, the Abbasid caliph—guaranteed bliss in the hereafter. The division into quadrants, the central dome, and other features may have had cosmological implications, though modern arguments to this effect are circumstantial.

Also known as the Round City, Baghdad served only intermittently as the seat of government. Mansur's successors and their dependents built new residences outside it to the northeast as well as across the river in al-Rusafah. Later caliphs left the city altogether. From 813 to 819, 'Abdallah al-Ma'mun, who had overthrown his predecessor in a destructive civil war, governed the empire from distant Marv, in what is now Turkmenistan. In 836, the caliph Abu Ishaq al-Mu'tasim transferred the seat of government to Samarra in order to accommodate his army of mostly Central Asian slave soldiers. In 892, Abu al-Abbas al-Mu'tamid returned the government to Baghdad. Under the Buyid and Seljuq emirates, which governed Iran and Iraq in the 10th and 11th centuries, the caliphs continued to live there, often under virtual house arrest. Secluded from view, they became objects of popular veneration. Sunni rulers customarily affirmed their allegiance to the caliph in Baghdad even after the caliph had ceased to exercise real authority. This state of affairs constitutes the background to the theories of the sultanate espoused by Mawardi (d. 1058) and Abu Ya'la b. al-Farra' (d. 1066).

During the two centuries that followed its foundation, Baghdad was the center of commercial and intellectual life in southwest Asia. It inherited the traditions of Medina, Kufa, and Basra in such fields as Arabic grammar, hadith, theology, and law and attracted representatives of numerous sects and schools, including Jewish and Christian as well as Muslim sects. The city itself was the subject of at least two ethical debates: one on the legality of its capture by the Muslims and the other on the permissibility of pronouncing its name, which was thought to mean "gift of the idol" in Persian. It was the birthplace of activist Hanbalism (the rigorist Sunni movement led by admirers of the hadith scholar Ahmad b. Hanbal, d. 855) and the site of frequent altercations between Sunnis and Shi'is, especially in the tenth century.

In 1258, the Mongols sacked the city and massacred many of its inhabitants, including the caliph Abu Ahmad al-Musta'sim. The city was never again to house a caliph, though a nominal Abbasid line persisted in Cairo until 1517. After a century of Turkoman rule (1410–1508) and a brief period of Safavid control, the city came under the sovereignty of the Ottomans (1534). It remained in Ottoman hands until World War I, after which Iraq came under a British mandate.

Since 1932, Baghdad has served as the capital of the modern nation of Iraq. Although the early Islamic-period structures, built of perishable mud brick, have completely disappeared, modern Baghdad contains numerous memorials that recall the Islamic and pre-Islamic past. Many Muslims, especially Arab Muslims, associate the city with the golden age of Arab-Islamic culture. After the U.S.-led invasion and occupation of Iraq (2003) and the civil conflicts between Sunni and Shi'i factions that ensued, the city became an especially poignant symbol of tarnished glory.

See also city; Iraq

Further Reading

Amatzia Baram, Culture, History, and Ideology in the Formation of Ba'thist Iraq, 1968–89, 1991; K.A.C. Creswell, A Short Account of Early Muslim Architecture, revised by James W. Allan, 1989; Jacob Lassner, The Shaping of Abbasid Rule, 1980; Idem, The Topography of Baghdad in the Early Middle Ages: Text and Studies, 1970; Guy Le Strange, Baghdad during the Abbasid Caliphate from Contemporary Arabic and Persian Sources, 1900, repr. 1972.

MICHAEL COOPERSON

Bangladesh

Long considered the backwoods of Indian Islam, Bangladesh has become one of the largest Muslim countries in the world. Concentrated in an area approximately the size of Wisconsin, its total population as of 2010 exceeds 150 million, 87 percent of whom are Sunnis. Part of a larger political-linguistic entity called Bengal, the region was divided into two halves in 1947 when the British left India and handed over the eastern half (then known as East Bengal), with an overwhelming Muslim majority, to Pakistan and the other half (called West Bengal), with a Hindu majority, to India, even though both halves shared a common ethnic and linguistic tradition and history. East Bengal, renamed East Pakistan in 1947, soon came into conflict with the dominant Pakistani landowning military and bureaucratic elite based in West Pakistan, principally over the sharing of resources but also on the question of autonomy for the province and the status of the Bengali language.

The Language Movement of 1952, which demanded recognition of Bengali as one of the state languages, was the first political manifestation of this discontent. The killing of several university students on February 21 by police dramatically transformed the language issue into a resistance movement against the policies of the central government and brought it to the center of political and cultural discourse in Bangladesh. Widely celebrated as the Martyrs' Day through annual marches, cultural events, songs, and literature, the incident galvanized increasing popular support during the next few years. By 1969, this support developed into a mass movement for greater autonomy and finally, by 1970, into a full-fledged war of liberation, resulting in the creation of Bangladesh on March 26, 1971, under the leadership of Shaykh Mujibur Rahman (d. 1975).

The region came under Muslim political control gradually under the Delhi Sultanate starting in the 13th century. Through a long process of Sufi propagation, acculturation, land reclamation, and immigration from outside Bengal, a greater part of the area ultimately became Muslim. However, the religious tradition that developed there was a unique mix of orthodoxy and Sufism, which, coupled with accretions from local popular cultural symbols and rituals, was unique to Bangladesh. Since the 19th century, a powerful purist trend initiated by a series of Islamic reform movements, notably the Faraizi and the Tariqah-i-Muhammadiya, seriously challenged the older traditions. This tension, manifested through conflicting ideologies and symbols, led to continued violence and dissension. The fundamentalist group Jama'at-i Islami, which opposed the Bangladesh Liberation War and collaborated with the Pakistani regime, became one of the most divisive forces in the country. Several other underground extremist Islamist organizations, such as the Harkat-ul-Jihad-i-Islami and the Jama'atul Mujahideen Bangladesh, kept the tension alive. Corruption at all levels of government, the lack of political will and determination, the politicization of the police force, and the growing ambition of the armed forces further complicated the situation.

Notwithstanding the tension, Bangladesh has made great strides in alleviating poverty in recent years under the leadership of several nongovernmental organizations (NGOs), notably the Grameen Bank, initiated by Muhammad Yunus in 1983. Designed to address the problems of those in extreme poverty, especially women, through a unique microcredit system, Yunus and his bank were awarded the Nobel Peace Prize in 2006. The initiative made Bangladesh a leader in empowering the poor despite being one of the poorest countries in the world.

See also India; Jama'at-i Islami; Pakistan

Further Reading

Rafiuddin Ahmed, ed., Religion, Nationalism, and Politics in Bangladesh, 1990; Richard M. Eaton, The Rise of Islam and the Bengal Frontier 1204–1760, 1993.

RAFIUDDIN AHMED

al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49)

Hasan al-Banna (1906–49) was the founder and lifetime leader of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood (al-Ikhwan al-Muslimun, MB), for decades the largest and most influential Islamic movement in the Arab Middle East. Formed in 1928, the MB was still active in Egypt and many other Muslim countries at the beginning of the 21st century. Information on Banna's life, career, and character derives mostly from his so-called memoirs (Mudhakkirat al-Da'wa wa-l-Da'iya), probably compiled in 1947–48, as well as sympathetic reports from his family and members of the MB. His own writings, which in addition to his "memoirs" include editorials, tracts, sermons, and fatwas (legal opinions), constitute functional prose, written almost exclusively for the Muslim Brothers and published by their press.

From an early age, Banna was influenced by Salafi reformism; "sober," shari'a-oriented popular Sufism; and Egyptian patriotism, as understood in his particular sociocultural milieu. Banna was born in the small town of Mahmudiyya in the western Nile Delta near Rosetta (Rashid). He was the eldest son of Shaykh Ahmad al-Banna al-Sa'ati (1882–1958), a clockmaker with a good religious education; his mother was the daughter of a local merchant, whose family included men of religious learning. It is worthy to note that Shaykh Ahmad, who represented the familiar type of the artisan-cum-scholar, published several works on Sufi texts and prophetic traditions, including Ahmad b. Hanbal's Musnad, which he rearranged according to subject matter, testifying to the enduring attraction of hadith studies in a Muslim milieu that was at the same time reform-minded and rooted in tradition.

Banna's education was a blend of Qur'anic schooling (kuttāb) and government schooling, where he specialized in the Arabic language. In this field, secular government education retained core elements of traditional religious learning, both in subject matter and methods of instruction. In 1919, he enrolled in the primary teachers' training school in Damanhur, a commercial center in the Nile Delta. From 1923 to 1927, he attended Dar al-'Ulum in Cairo, founded in 1872 to train teachers for the new government schools. This training college was a prime example of the educational crossover between the religious and the secular, the traditional and the modern. However, it was not his education that singled Banna out but his early commitment to an "Islamic morality" combining core concepts of Islamic reform with Sufi teachings. His efforts started with individual acts of vigilantism, undertaken as a schoolboy in Mahmudiyya. While still in primary school, he joined with friends in an association to "form" their character and manners (takwīn al-akhlāq) and to fulfill the Qur'anic injunction "to command right and forbid wrong" (al-amr bi-l-ma'rūf wa-l-nahy 'an al-munkar), which was to play a crucial role in Banna's career as an Islamic activist. Outside school, in a Sufi setting, he and his friends formed the Hasafi Benevolent Society to spread the call to Islam (da'wa). Banna had been attracted to the Hasafi Shadhili brotherhood when he was 12 years old, and his affiliation with them greatly eased his transition from country town to provincial city to capital.

In 1927, Banna was sent to Isma'iliyya on the Suez Canal to teach Arabic at a primary school. Although not yet 21, he had vowed to engage in da'wa to call his fellow Muslims to true Islam. There is no indication that Banna ever thought of proselytizing among non-Muslims or of engaging in interreligious dialogue. What the mission did include was the fight against Christian missionaries from Europe and America who were increasingly active in the Egyptian countryside at the time.

In March 1928, Banna joined with six young men from modest backgrounds to create the MB. The MB recruited mainly through personal contacts based on kinship, friendship, and worship; mosques and schools were their principal recruiting grounds. In contrast to the existing political parties in the country, their press effort was insignificant. Indoctrination played a crucial role in enhancing internal cohesion and public appeal, with instruction being based almost exclusively on Banna's speeches, articles, and tracts or treatises (rasā'il). Several of these tracts were required reading, ideally to be memorized by members; some were later supplemented with commentaries (sharh) by members of the MB. The journalistic style and format Banna employed places him in the tradition of modern Arab and Islamic reformism. His objective, however, was not to invite critical debate and reflection but to offer "guidance" and "correct instruction." It is no coincidence that his title as leader of the MB was "general" or "supreme guide" (al-murshid al-'āmm).

Banna and his associates built an organization with a solid structure and trained cadres that took Islamic education beyond the mosque, the school, and the press and linked it to larger social and political concerns, giving it a new shape and momentum. In just over a decade and a half, the MB changed from a charitable association with a strong Sufi touch into a nonelite mass movement. With its popular base, style, and agenda, it appealed mostly to the educated and semieducated urban middle class (efendiyya). Over the course of the 1930s, it spread to the Suez Canal, the Delta, and Upper Egypt, yet it was only during World War II that the MB emerged as a mass movement on par with the nationalist Wafd Party. In 1944, estimates ranged from 100,000 to 500,000 members (out of a population of some 19 million). By that time, the organization consisted of several units. The MB Organization and its Section of Welfare and Social Services as well as the Rover Scouts (jawwāla) and the Battalions (katā'ib) all operated in the open, whereas a Special Section, probably created around 1940, operated underground. The MB's military support of the Palestinian Arabs before and after the foundation of the State of Israel in May 1948 earned them respect; the terrorist activities of the Special Section raised widespread alarm. On December 8, 1948, the government declared the MB dissolved; on December 28, 1948, the prime minister was assassinated by a young member of the organization; and on February 12, 1949, Banna was shot by the secret police.

As a thinker, Banna was neither original nor sophisticated, nor did he wish to be so. He was an activist who essentially "put to work" what Muslim reformers had been advocating since the 1870s. His objective was to establish a moral order based on true Islam, which was to end all forms of foreign influence in the country and the Islamic world at large. From this perspective, Islam served as a source of empowerment with the potential to liberate Egypt and the Muslim community and indeed to save humanity. This required a program of individual and communal reform, struggle, and dedication, involving da'wa as well as jihad. The MB offered an Islamic education (tarbiya) and moral orientation (tahdhīb) to their fellow Muslims in order to make them "understand Islam correctly." Education and da'wa were thus intimately linked. But Banna also propagated jihad, covering the broad range of meanings from self-discipline to armed struggle, also described in the Islamic tradition as the "greater" and the "lesser" jihad. Thus he extolled the military spirit of the earliest generations of Muslims, al-salaf al-ṣālih, and famously celebrated "the art of death" (fann al-mawt) to be cultivated by the Muslim activist. Yet his choice of words remained open to interpretation. On many occasions, he also advocated peace, and in contrast to later Islamists such as Sayyid Qutb (1906–66), he did not encourage takfīr (i.e., excluding believers from the Muslim community and declaring jihad against them licit).

Banna's "activist thinking" (fikr ḥarakī) was characteristic of modern Islamic discourse in that it integrated established terms and references in a new framework, subtly modifying their status and meaning. It was nothing new to state, as he did, that Islam provided the moral foundation of community and society. But it was decidedly modern to claim that Islam was a comprehensive "system" or "order" (nizām) regulating individual life as well as public affairs. According to Banna, Islam was eternal, universal, and all encompassing; simple, easy, and practical; and comprised not just faith, dogma, and ritual obligations but also work and action ('amal). His aim was to create "a modern Islamic style" (minhāj 'aṣrī islāmī), a style that adapted to contemporary needs and aspirations while remaining firmly rooted in the Qur'an and sunna. In Islam, Banna asserted, religion and politics could not be separated. The state fulfilled crucial functions: namely, to implement the Islamic way of life, or the Islamic order, based on the shari'a; to defend Islam; to ensure social justice; and to exert moral control. The caliphate played no prominent role in Banna's vision; he thought in terms of the modern nation-state. With regard to the political system, Banna advocated "constitutional consultative rule" (ḥukm dustūrī shūrawī) based on consultation (shūrā) and a written constitution, but he rejected a multiparty system and party politics (ḥizbiyya). His position on the status of non-Muslims in the "Islamic order" was less clear: the terms he used in this context—umma (nation), waṭan (homeland), muwāṭin (citizen or compatriot), and jinsiyya islāmiyya (Islamic citizenship)—remained vague and ill-defined.

With regard to socioeconomic issues, Banna invoked the ideal of a community beyond race and class, building on the tradition of "Islamic egalitarianism" (as described by Louise Marlow). He denounced class struggle; anticommunism was a cornerstone of his worldview. To effect change, he encouraged individual thrift and industry and decried the pervading spirit of materialism and consumerism, while he simultaneously advocated state intervention to eradicate poverty, illiteracy, and disease. More specifically, he called for a ban on interest (ribā) and saw the Islamic alms tax (zakat) as an instrument to promote social justice.

Banna did not underrate the importance of material resources in achieving liberation from foreign domination. But he put even greater emphasis on interior strength or moral fiber and was convinced that men could improve their lot through their own efforts. Banna thus thoroughly embraced 19th-century faith in self-help and moral improvement with an emphasis on individual responsibility, not individual freedom. His aim was not to foster individualism but to form the self and reform the community to render them capable of installing the "Islamic order." His concern with discipline, self-observation, and time management may have been influenced by Ghazali's Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din (The revival of the religious sciences), which Banna read with one of his Sufi shaykhs. The influence is there, but the differences must not be ignored: it is not introspection and self-purification that Banna sought to promote but an active involvement in the world with energies directed outward, not inward. Throughout, he espoused a decidedly masculine ethos, which he wished to instill in Muslim youths. With regard to women's rights, he opposed female liberation or emancipation and endorsed the principle of male guardianship over women (qiwāma, based on Q. 4:34), denying women access to leading positions in society, as well as in the MB, as not befitting their sex and nature.

Banna's death threw the MB into profound disarray, yet it survived and reemerged in the 1980s. Together with Sayyid Qutb, who joined the MB in the early 1950s, Banna remains one of the central figures of modern Sunni Islamism, whose legacy continues to be invoked by the MB and their critics alike.

See also Egypt; fundamentalism; jihad; Muslim Brotherhood; revival and reform

Further Reading

Gudrun Krämer, Hasan al-Banna, 2010; Brynjar Lia, The Society of the Muslim Brothers in Egypt: The Rise of an Islamic Mass Movement 1928–1942, 1998; Richard P. Mitchell, The Society of the Muslim Brothers, 1993; Gregory Starrett, Putting Islam to Work: Education, Politics, and Religious Transformation in Egypt, 1998; Charles Wendell, Five Tracts of Hasan Al-Banna' (1906–1949): A Selection from Majmū'at Rasā'il al-Imām al-Shahīd Hasan al-Bannā', 1978.

GUDRUN KRÄMER

Barelwis

The Barelwi movement represents the devotional tradition of Sufi-related Sunni scholars and schools from South Asia, which has expanded to many countries hosting Muslim migrants from the region. It derived from the legacy of the religious scholar Ahmad Raza Khan Barelwi (1856–1921) in the town of Bareilly in North India. He gathered guardians of Sufi shrines (pīrs) and Muslim theologians (mawlānā) of devotional Islam around the turn of the 20th century to counter the critique of their beliefs and practice by puritan reformist scholars of the Deobandi tradition, which emanated from the Islamic school of Deoband (1866), not far from Bareilly. Their doctrinal differences were small, as both followed orthodox adherence (taqlīd) to the Hanafi school of law. But the Barelwis held on to Sufi-influenced rituals, such as the expression of special praise for the Prophet, public celebrations of his birthday (mawlid), and the worship of saints and their shrines with their associated powers of intercession, based on their reading of the Qur'an and the hadith (i.e., the prophetic traditions). The Barelwis are also linked to some of the Sufi brotherhoods (tarīqa), mostly branches of the Qadiri and the Naqshbandi orders. Their cultural style has been exuberant, and their politics were often marked by loyalty to the ruling powers during the colonial period and afterward to the independent states of South Asia. Unlike the Deobandis, they fully supported the Pakistan movement for the partition of British India.

The Barelwi network significantly expanded and emulated the Deobandi institutions with which they saw themselves in strong competition. In 1900, they created an umbrella group of theologians, the Jama'at-e Ahl-e Sunnat—that is, the party of the people following the traditions of the Prophet and his Companions (sunna), showing that they regard themselves as the only true Sunnis. From there they appropriated the label "Sunni" as their trademark designation in South Asian Islam. In 1920, they created the All-India Sunni Conference (AISC) to champion their religious and political interests during the late colonial era. The Barelwis formalized their system of religious education by establishing a large number of new madrasas and dār-ul-'ulūms. In Pakistan, they formed their own Board of Religious Education (Tanzim-ul-Madaris), working on parallel lines with the Deobandis. Across South Asia their relative influence among the Muslim population was estimated as being roughly on par with the Deobandis.

The Barelwis developed close links with the ruling families and political culture of Pakistan. They established their own political party, the Jam'iat-e 'Ulama'-e Pakistan (JUP, Party of Religious Scholars of Pakistan), which emerged in 1948 out of the AISC. Since the 1990s, Barelwi leaders in Pakistan increasingly cooperated with the Deobandis in public life. To push back sectarianism, they joined forces in 1995 in the National Reconciliation Council (Milli Yakjehti Council), led by the late Barelwi leader Maulana Shah Ahmad Noorani (1926–2003). He initiated a formal alliance of religious parties in Pakistan in 2001, the Muttahida Majlis-e-'Amal (MMA). During the Afghan war in the 1990s, the Barelwis also became part of the emerging mujahidin culture in Pakistan. Their own religious militias participated in the conflicts of Kashmir and Afghanistan. Barelwi representatives also sat on the coordinating body of the Afghan Jihad Council. Since the 1980s, militant sectarian groups confronted Deobandi radicals in deadly strife over the control of mosques and "un-Islamic" rituals and behavior. Sectarian beliefs were as influential among the Barelwis as among Deobandis. They denounced all dissenting sects as un-Islamic and joined forces against groups such as the Ahmadis, whom they saw as heretical. Arshad-ul-Qadri (1925–2002) was one of the most prominent Barelwi polemicists.

To compete with the rising influence of the Deobandi-dominated missionary movement of the Tablighi Jama'at (Preaching Movement), the Barelwis created the Da'wat-e Islami (Islamic Mission) in 1981, with affiliated groups in India under the name of the Sunni Da'wat-i Islami (Sunni Islamic Mission). The Barelwi doctrine also influenced followers of modern groups such as the political-educational movement of the Minhaj-ul-Qur'an (Quranic Path) and the Muttahida Qaumi Movement (MQM, United National Movement). The World Islamic Mission, based in Britain, is the oldest international Barelwi platform. The global Barelwi and related Sufi network serves the wider Pakistani diaspora and other South Asian migrant communities around the globe, although the Barelwi groups do not commonly attract followers beyond the limitations of their ethnic South Asian descent.

See also Deobandis; India; Pakistan

Further Reading

Arshad-ul Qadri, Tahleeghi Jamaat in the Light of Facts and Truth, 1996; Dietrich Reetz, Islam in the Public Sphere: Religious Groups in India, 1900–1947, 2006; Usha Sanyal, Devotional Islam and Politics in British India: Ahmad Riza Khan Barelwi and His Movement, 1870–1920, 1996; Oskar Verkaaik, Migrants and Militants: Fun and Urban Violence in Pakistan, 2004.

DIETRICH REETZ

Ba'th Party

Hizb al-Ba'th al-'Arabi al-Ishtiraki (Party of Arab Socialist Resurrection) is a Pan-Arab nationalist party founded in the 1940s that exerted far-reaching political and cultural influence on the Arab world, particularly in Syria and Iraq. Though conceived as a secular nationalist movement, its ideology considered Islam a vital part of Arab heritage but not the basis for politics. In practice, Ba'thists have been antagonistic to members of the traditional Muslim elite as well as violent opponents of Salafism and Shi'i religious movements.

Party Origins

Upon their return to Damascus, Syria, from university studies in Europe, Michel 'Aflaq and Salah al-Din al-Bitar (1912–80) began a discussion circle among the city's educated young men that would form the nucleus of the Ba'th Party (1942). Both 'Aflaq, a Greek Orthodox Christian, and Bitar, a Sunni Muslim, were of solid middle-class origins and brought to the party their distrust of the elite and bourgeois nationalists of a previous generation who had failed to rid Syria of colonial rule. The party's ranks were swelled by the addition of the followers of an embittered 'Alawi refugee intellectual from the Sanjak of Alexandretta, Zaki al-Arsuzi (1901–68), who also brought to the party an emphasis on social justice, the cult of personality, and Arab chauvinism. The party's socialism and secularism held little appeal for Syria's Sunni elite or its middle class. Nevertheless, the party proved particularly attractive to non-Sunni landowners and rural smallholders, Arab Christians, and junior officers.

The Ba'th Party in Syria and Iraq

The party held its first congress in 1947. Branches of the party were founded in Iraq, Jordan, and Lebanon in the early 1950s. Gamal Abdel Nasser's rise to power and his advocacy of Arab unity gave a considerable boost to the party's program. In 1958, Syrian Ba'thists engineered the short-lived period of unity with Egypt (1958–61), creating the United Arab Republic (UAR). After the failure of the UAR, the center of gravity in the Syrian wing of the party shifted to military cadres dominated by 'Alawis and Sunnis of rural and peasant origin. This faction, led by Minister of Defense Hafiz al-Asad (1930–2000), took control of Syria (1970) following a bloodless coup. Asad rejected many of the more radical dimensions of Ba'thism and Pan-Arabism in favor of regionalism. An 'Alawi from the area of Latakia in northwestern Syria, Asad placed 'Alawis and Christians in positions of leadership in the state and party apparatus, further supplanting members of the Sunni middle class and elite in the process.

The Ba'th Party had a similar trajectory in Iraq. As in Syria, Ba'thism proved initially attractive to non-Sunni-Arab educated young men, in this case Shi'is. Shi'i leadership gave way in the years before the 1968 coup, which brought the Ba'thists to power, as 'Aflaq, then still party leader, appointed men from Iraq's Sunni minority, including a young Saddam Hussein (1937–2006), to key regional leadership positions. Throughout the 1970s, Hussein and his kinsmen from the city of Takrit methodically took control of the state and the party. The régime that emerged was authoritarian in nature and sought to control all aspects of culture, religion, and thought through a vast secret police network and the party's ideological domination of education, the arts, and media. Though weakened in the period following the Gulf War (1991), the Iraqi Ba'thists under Hussein remained in tight control of the majority of Iraq until 2003 when the U.S.-led occupation of Iraq and the systematic program of de-Ba'thification eliminated the party as a viable entity.

Ba'thism and Islam

Ba'thism is an amalgamation of leftist and ultranationalist ideas from 1930s and 1940s Europe. The basic tenets of the party are embodied in its slogan, "Freedom, Unity, and Socialism." The party is secular in its view of citizenship and political participation, seeing religious distinction as antimodern and an impediment to Arab unity. However, Ba'thism does reserve a special role for Islam in the formation of the "Arab spirit" and character and considers it, with language, as the essential element of Arab heritage (turāth). As the party's chief ideologue, 'Aflaq developed this idea first in his essay "Valediction for the Arab Prophet" (1943), in which he identifies Muhammad as the ideal prototype of the fully realized Arab ("Muhammad was all the Arabs. May all the Arabs today be Muhammad") and sees Islam as the basis for a particular Arab humanism. Later essays explicitly identify Islam as the genius of the Arabs and argue that the manner in which Ba'thism incorporates Islam into its ideology prevents Arab nationalism from becoming a sterile copy of European nationalism and precludes the need to use Islam as the basis of a reactionary political movement. While 'Aflaq represents the dominant trend in Ba'thist thought, others in the party, including Arsuzi, were more reluctant to valorize Islam in such a way, preferring atheism. Nevertheless, mainstream Ba'thism secularized Islam, making it exterior to politics but seeking to capture it as a feature of Arab history and culture.

Throughout the 1980s and 1990s, both Ba'thist régimes suffered crises of legitimacy in part based on their lack of credible Muslim credentials. In response, the Syrian Ba'thist leadership sought greater accommodation with Islam by making changes to the constitution to guarantee that the head of state would be a Muslim, more closely identifying heterodox 'Alawism with Twelver Shi'ism, and assuring the president's attendance at Friday prayers at Damascus's Umayyad Mosque. In Iraq, the crisis emerged during the war with Iran (1980–88) and worsened with the Gulf War and its aftermath. Saddam Hussein responded with largely symbolic measures, including renouncing Ba'thist secularism, adding the takbīr ("God is great") in his own handwriting to the Iraqi flag, banning the sale of alcohol, rescinding some women's rights, encouraging veiling, and embarking on massive mosque-building programs.

To many mainstream Muslims, Ba'thism is inherently un-Islamic. This is, in part, based on the leading role Christians and heterodox Muslims have played—and continue to play—in the formulation of party ideology and leadership. It also derives from episodes like the massacre of members of the Muslim Brotherhood (an organization that was outlawed in Syria) and its supporters during an abortive uprising in Syria in 1983, the most violent moment of which occurred in the central Syrian city of Hama when Syrian forces killed an estimated 20,000 people and destroyed several of the city's important mosques and shrines. Systematic Ba'thist persecution of religious Shi'is took place in Iraq, the most noteworthy examples being the murder of Ayatollah Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr (1935–80) and members of his family and the mass killings and desecration of holy sites during the Shi'i uprising following the Gulf War.

See also 'Aflaq, Michel (1910–89); Arab nationalism; Iraq; Syria

Further Reading

Michel 'Aflaq, al-Ba'th wa-l-Turath, 1976; Eric Davis, Memories of State: Politics, History, and Collective Identity in Modern Iraq, 2005; Ray Hinnesbusch, Syria: Revolution from Above, 2002; Patrick Seale, Asad: The Struggle for the Middle East, 1990.

KEITH DAVID WATENPAUGH

bazaar

The word "bazaar" can refer to a periodic market such as a weekly farmers' market or a fair held at specific times of the year. But in modern Persian, it usually refers to a permanent and more abstract entity—namely, the sector of the economy comprising all levels of trade, from wholesale, brokerage, midlevel business, and distribution, to small-scale businesses and shops. It can also refer to the physical establishment in which trade is conducted or the underlying financial system.

In the cultural region roughly encompassing Iran, Afghanistan, northern India, and Central Asia, the term usually applies to an architectural complex that houses merchants, brokers, retailers, and craftsmen, divided into sections according to the commodity sold. These complexes usually comprise a row or several rows of two-story buildings. The buildings are connected by a brick ceiling consisting of small domes over the alleyways. There is an opening at the center of each minidome for light and ventilation. This design provides the alleyways with some light and keeps the complex cool in summer. In a typical bazaar, the top level of the buildings is usually used by wholesalers and brokers and sometimes for storage, while the lower level houses shopkeepers and craftsmen. Additionally, the bazaar complex may contain social institutions such as mosques and madrasas (Muslim schools). Sometimes there are also interior courtyards and smaller caravansaries adjacent to the bazaar. Caravansaries are hostel-like establishments for merchants from out of town. In larger cities, some caravansaries could be at the outskirts of the town and spatially separated from the bazaar.

The bazaar complex can have anywhere from two hundred shops to several thousand in major cities. The Friday mosque is sometimes next to or part of the bazaar complex, which adds a religious aspect to the otherwise mostly economical and social significance of the bazaar. In most major cities, the bazaar complex is in a central position in the city, which gives it prominence. A perfect example is the Safavid capital Isfahan, where the complex of Maydan-i Shah houses the palace, several mosques, and a new bazaar.

There are no (permanent) residences within the bazaar complex, so it can be locked at night or on holidays. It can also be closed for political protest. For instance, during the Iranian revolution of 1979, prolonged planned closure of the bazaar of Tehran was used as a means of protest.

See also capitalism; trade and commerce

Further Readings

P. W. English, City and Village in Iran, 1966; M. Scharabi, Der Bazar, 1985.

HADI JORATI

Beirut

Beirut, a port on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean Sea at the foot of Mount Lebanon and the capital of Lebanon, became a Roman colony town in 14 BCE and developed into an important center of commerce and learning in Roman times. Destroyed by an earthquake in 551, it was easily conquered by the Muslim Arabs in 635. The Umayyads and Fatimids transformed it into a fortified city, but it fell to the onslaught of the Crusaders in 1110. Retaken by Saladin in 1187, it was lost again to the Crusaders, who were finally driven out by the Mamluks in 1291. Under Mamluk rule, the defenses of Beirut were reinforced and its commerce with Italian cities flourished. From 1516 onward, the city passed under Ottoman rule and, in the 18th century, fell under the control of local feudal lords. Because of an influx of Christian refugees from Syria from 1860 onward, it acquired a growing Christian minority. During the French Mandate (1920–43), Beirut became the capital of an independent Lebanese Republic in 1926 in which Maronite and Orthodox Christians played an important role. It developed into an important intellectual center of the Middle East, with three universities (American, French, and Lebanese) and a National Library.

Since the late 19th century, Beirut has served as the gateway to the Middle East. Its port harbored early steam ships that carried passengers and freight, and it remains a regional center of shipping and trade. Its highways extend north and east over the Lebanon range of mountains to Syria. Beirut has a mercantile, cosmopolitan spirit that some Lebanese trace to their Phoenician origins. The mix of Christian and Muslim populations makes Beirut unique among the cities of the Arab Middle East.

At the end of the 19th century, the population of the city was mainly Sunni Muslim and Greek Orthodox, but the centrality of the city also drew in Maronites from the mountains and some Shi'is from the Biqaa valley. In 1948, Palestinian refugees were crowded into camps on the periphery of Beirut; In the 1970s, Israeli retaliation for attacks by the Palestine resistance drove Shi'is from their villages in the south to the suburbs of Beirut to form the southern suburbs (dāhiyya). This completely changed the makeup of the city, which had traditionally consisted of Sunnis and Christians and now also included an increasing number of Shi'is.

In 1973, Israeli Defense Forces raided Palestinian targets in Beirut in retaliation for the Munich massacre of the previous year, in which militant Palestinians had kidnapped and executed Israeli Olympians. The general breakdown in order erupted into civil war in April 1975. The Palestinians living in camps on the outskirts of the city were able for a time to cut Beirut off completely from the rest of the country. After the civil war, Beirut was a divided city with Christians on the east and Muslims on the west. Another Israeli incursion in 1982, this time as far as Beirut, led to the emergence of Hizbullah, a Shi'i militant resistance movement that has evolved into an influential political party. Following the Ta'if Accords of 1989, peace was established and Beirut began the process of reunification. Prime Minister Rafiq al-Hariri is to be largely credited for the normalization following the civil war, a task he was unable to complete because of his assassination in 2005.

In spite of the trauma that Beirut has experienced in recent history, Lebanese publishing houses continue to publish literature from all corners of the Arab world and participate in book fairs. Bank secrecy laws have made Beirut the banking hub of the region. Centers of learning such as the American University of Beirut continue to attract international scholars. It appears that the city's cosmopolitanism combined with a Mediterranean climate will continue to provide the capital necessary for its place as a cultural hub in the modern Arab world.

See also Jordan; minorities; Palestine; Syria

Further Reading

Samir Khalaf, Heart of Beirut: Reclaiming the Bourj, 2006; Samir Khalaf and Philip Khoury, Recovering Beirut, 1993; Samir Kassir, Beirut, translated by M. B. Bebevoise, 2010.

JOHN DONOHUE

Berbers

The Berbers are the indigenous inhabitants of North Africa from the oasis of Siwa in Egypt to the Atlantic Ocean. Their distant origins are much contested, and their conceptualization as a single people rests primarily on the understanding that their languages belong to a single linguistic family, variously classified as Afro-Asian or Hamitic. At the time of the Arabo-Islamic conquest, the Arabs understood them to be one of the major non-Arab (ʿAjam) peoples who accepted Islam. Over time, however, ʿAjam increasingly denoted the Persians, while barābira, a term probably derived from the perjorative Greek barbaroi or Latin barbari, came to be used for the "barbarian" tribes of the Islamic "wild west." There is little evidence that the Berbers considered themselves a united people prior to the 20th century, and they certainly did not believe that they had a single political destiny. However, their political history has largely been written by outsiders: first, the Arabs and subsequently the French, who did view them in this light and thus measured their political achievements by an external yardstick predicated on the desirability of national unity.

In particular, French colonial historiography, which has been highly influential in determining both indigenous and postcolonial understandings of the Berbers, posits a North African religiopolitical trajectory, according to which the Berbers repeatedly attempted to create a "national" state by means of the Fatimids, Almoravids, and Almohads, only to succumb to their inherent factional tendencies. These tendencies divided the Maghrib into three political units, roughly coterminous with modern Morocco, Algeria, and Tunisia in the 13th century. At the same time, the Berbers lost control of significant portions of the countryside to Arab tribes migrating west who initiated rural linguistic Arabization. In the 15th century, "outsiders"—Arabs of sharifi descent (descent from the Prophet) in Morocco and Ottomans of various ethnic origins in Algeria and Tunisia—seized control of these political entities but failed to incorporate their restive Berber populations, many of whom had retreated to the mountain ranges and deserts as Arabic-speaking tribes came to dominate the lowlands. Berbers were finally integrated into the state only under the aegis of French colonialism.

From the imperial French perspective, this success reflected not only France's military and cultural superiority but also their ability to appeal to the true Berber spirit, liberate it from the bonds of Arab Islam, and return it to its supposed Christian European essence (a reference to the importance of Christianity in North Africa in the days of St. Augustine). The significance of this view may be seen in the factually accurate but implicitly negative historical sections of the article on the Berbers in the second edition of the Encyclopaedia of Islam. Conversely, the chimera of unity has inspired Berbers in the modern states of the Maghrib to reimagine their history as that of the Imazighen (sing. Amazigh), a term meaning free men comparable to the Arabic aḥrār, both of which originally encapsulated the pride of tribal peoples who were beholden to no political master due to their ability to evade taxation or co-optation except on their own terms.

Contemporary Maghribi political discourse incorporates the colonial concept of the Berbers as one people, albeit with the more positive aim of forcing the contemporary governments of Algeria and Morocco to accept the indigenous Berber component of national identity rather than continuing to impose a hegemonic Arabo-Islamic identity. Many Berbers were happy to subscribe to an Arabo-Islamic identity during the height of Pan-Arab nationalism and the struggle for independence in North Africa. But now many Berbers wish to see their own languages and cultures recognized within the national framework in the Maghrib and beyond it to diaspora Amazigh communities in France and the United States, who consider themselves Imazighen as much as Moroccans or Algerians.

Much of this would have made little sense to the premodern inhabitants of the Maghrib, whose main political objective seems to have been to negotiate a religiopolitical identity within Islam as distinct tribes or ethnolinguistic communities. It is apparent that from an early stage, the tribes of North Africa found the Islamic paradigm of a prophet and a book compelling but sought to disconnect it from Arab overlordship while also using it as a mode of differentiation within the supposed Berber world. Most famously, the Barghawata tribes of the Atlantic plains of Morocco identified Salih, one of their own ancestors, as their prophet and produced their own book apparently in the Barghawata dialect. Other groups showed sympathy for the oppositional discourses of mainstream Islam such as Kharijism and various 'Alid and Shi'i belief systems, which served to assert not a Berber identity writ large but rather more local ethnolinguistic identities. For example, Kharijism, an early Islamic sect, in its Ibadi form underpinned the development of the state of Tahart, which united sections of the Lawata, Nafusa, Nafzawa, and Hawwara, among others, while rival Sufri Kharijism was adopted by the Maknasa, who founded the city state of Sijilmasa. Farther north, the Awraba settled for 'Alid leadership in the form of the Idrisids, who established Fez.

The most famous Berber political endeavors are, however, the empire-building experiments of the 10th to 13th centuries, described in great detail in Ibn Khaldun's seminal Kitab al-'Ibar (The book on important events). Although this historical work is best known for its introduction, the Muqaddima, it is also one of the most complete compilations of information on the rise and fall of various Maghribi states led by an assortment of different Berber peoples. Ibn Khaldun superficially gives the Berbers a unitary identity but then deconstructs it by dividing them into two main groups descended from the eponymous ancestors Butr and Baranis, respectively. He then subdivides them further into large ethnolinguistic communities such as the Awraba and Masmuda, reckoned to be Baranis, and the Lawata, Nafusa, Nafzawa, and Zanata of the Butr, to name but a few. Additionally, Ibn Khaldun removes some groups from this genealogical schema completely, such as the Sanhaja, who claimed to be descendants of the Arabs of Himyar in Yemen and therefore not Berber at all.

Given the huge geographical expanse of the Maghrib, this diversity is not surprising. Ibn Khaldun's accounts of the Fatimid, Almoravid, and Almohad movements testify to Islam's powerful role in enabling larger political formations to coalesce. In the case of the Fatimid mission among the Kutama tribe of Ifriqiya (roughly, modern Tunisia) and the Almoravid appeal to the Lamtuna, Lamta, and Guddala peoples of the Sanhaja tribe in Saharan Africa, the initial supremacy of one Berber group was quickly elided by the Arabo-Islamic character of the message itself. Almohadism was, however, slightly different. Although the movement's founder, Muhammad b. Tumart, was inspired by various eastern Islamic religious trends, he reportedly taught his Masmuda followers in their own tongue and perhaps even prepared didactic materials in their language.

That said, Arabic quickly came to dominate at the level of government due to its already well-entrenched predominance in religious, governmental, and urban settings. This may have had something to do with the assumption of leadership by the lineage of 'Abd al-Mu'min, a member of the Kumiyya tribe, which was part of the Zanata who shared the Sanhaja's pretensions to Arab rather than indigenous lineage. While the Almohad successor states in the Maghrib—Marinid Fes, Zayyanid Tlemsen, and Hafsid Tunis—were ruled by lineages of Zanata or Masmuda Berber origin, their political self-conceptualization was similarly Arabo-Islamic. This tendency reached its apogee in Morocco with the rise of two successive sharifi dynasties, the Sa'dis (1525–1603) and the 'Alawis (1669–present), who claimed descent from the Prophet via the Hasani-Idrisi line but undoubtedly possessed Berber as well as Arab ancestors.

In the political discourse of the early modern Moroccan sultanate created by these dynasties, Arab and Berber identities were understood in linguistic and political terms and accordingly had considerable fluidity. The 19th-century Moroccan historian Ahmad b. Khalid al-Nasiri speaks of tribes as being variously "Arab," "Arabized," "Berber," or "Berberized" in terms of their language and sometimes appears to use "Arab" as shorthand for progovernment and "Berber" for rebel, which meant that tribes could be "Arab" and then "Berber" depending on their changing political affiliations. This more complex, multilayered discourse seems to best reflect the political experience of the Berber peoples in the Islamic era rather than the notion of either a Berber or Imazighen nation.

See also ethnicity; North Africa

Further Reading

Michael Brett and Elizabeth Fentress, The Berbers, 1996; Ibn Khaldun, Histoire des Berbères et des dynasties musulmanes de l'Afrique septentrionale, translated by William MacGuckin Baron de Slane, 1956; Ch. Pellat, G. Yver, and R. Basset, "Berbers." Encyclopaedia of Islam, 2nd ed., edited by P. Bearman, Th. Bianquis, C. E. Bosworth, E. van Donzel, and W. P. Heinrichs, 2010; Michael Willis, "The Politics of Berber (Amazigh) Identity," in North Africa: Politics, Region and the Limits of Transformation, edited by Yahia H. Zoubir and Haizam Amirah-Fernandez, 2007.

AMIRA K. BENNISON

Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011)

Osama bin Laden (born March 10, 1957, in Riyadh, Saudi Arabia; died May 2, 2011, in Abbottabad, Pakistan) became the preeminent symbol of global terrorism in the wake of the attacks of September 11, 2001. Driven by a desire to avenge the many wrongs committed against the umma (worldwide community of believers) in what he viewed as a war on Islam, he supported the killing of innocents in the name of fair reciprocity (al-mu'āmala bi-l-mithl)—in other words, appropriate retribution for the loss of Muslim lives. Frustrated at what he saw as the failure of the modern nation-state to represent Islam and counter the forces that threaten it, he built up a nonstate organization, al-Qaeda (al-Qā'ida), to defend the honor of Islam worldwide. In so doing, he turned politics into a wholly religious affair: a battle not for international harmony or even the triumph of justice but for the victory of piety over idolatry.

Hailing from a wealthy family with close ties to the Saudi dynasty, Bin Laden proved an effective organizer of jihadist activity against the Soviets in Afghanistan in the 1980s and, subsequently, of terrorist activity around the globe, including the 1998 attacks against the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania and, most famously, the events of 9/11. In Afghanistan, he came under the tutelage of 'Abdallah 'Azzam (d. 1989), a Palestinian militant, with whom he broke ties in 1988 in order to consolidate his own jihadist stature under the banner of al-Qaeda. Following the 1989 Iraqi invasion of Kuwait, he unsuccessfully tried to convince the Saudi dynasty to entrust its security to his resources rather than the U.S. military. In his view, the presence of infidel soldiers in Arabia, the land of Islam's two holiest shrines in Mecca and Medina, was the ultimate humiliation for Islam. He relocated from Afghanistan to the Sudan in 1991, at the same time sponsoring the London-based Committee for Advice and Reform, through which he sought to undermine the religious legitimacy of the Saudi dynasty for its complicity in the U.S. "occupation" of Islam's holy land. He was stripped of his Saudi citizenship in 1994 and not long thereafter returned from the Sudan to Afghanistan. From there, he issued his 1996 declaration of war against the United States, targeting "the far enemy" as the ultimate cause of the umma's corrupted and humiliated state.

Bin Laden cultivated close ties with the Taliban under Mulla 'Umar, whom he recognized as the "Commander of the Faithful" (a title by which Mulla 'Umar had been recognized within his own Taliban ranks). His willingness to join forces with the Taliban points to the parasitical nature of the relation. With a global vision, Bin Laden showed no interest in becoming master of national affairs in Afghanistan, the goal of the Taliban, but only to use it as a base from which to launch attacks against his enemies across the globe. His alliance with Ayman al-Zawahiri, leader of the Egyptian Islamic Jihad (Tanzim al-Jihad), led to the 1998 announcement of "The Global Islamic Front for Jihad against Jews and Crusaders." During the 2001 U.S. invasion of Afghanistan, Bin Laden allegedly went into hiding in the mountainous region along the northwestern border of Pakistan, but he turned out to have been residing for the last several years of his life in Abbottabad, Pakistan, a military center outside Islamabad. Al-Qaeda would mushroom into a worldwide network. Bin Laden continued to direct its activity while also serving as a figurehead of world jihadism. As such, he was able to inspire Muslim youths, even those with no formal connection to his organization, to engage in terrorist activity at both the local and global level.

Bin Laden saw the ultimate test of religious commitment as a willingness to kill and be killed—or to inspire others to do so—in the path of God (fī sabīl Allāh). His terrorism thus flowed from a religious vision wherein virtuous action on God's behalf is possible only in battle against infidel enemies. Thus, militancy becomes the sole option for believers wherever God's divine speech (i.e., the Qur'an) is not politically supreme. In this sense, his politics was decidedly utopian, ignoring a heritage of political thought in Islam that always balanced religious ideals against worldly realities. He opposed democracy and any form of governance that includes human decision-making in the legislative process. His conception of "the Islamic state," however, gave no details other than the sovereignty of God, as ensbrined in the first part of the Muslim declaration of faith: lā ilāha illā Allāh (i.e., "there is no god but God"). In this view, all that is needed to govern human affairs is perfect monotheism, in which society responds completely to God's sovereign voice as articulated by the recited Qur'an: injustice in this view results from human attempts to usurp the unique sovereignty of God by ruling without adequate recognition of the oneness of God.

Implicit in Bin Laden's outlook is a rejection of the nation-state, the emblem of secular (i.e., worldly) power, as intrinsically evil. The jihad he called for may speak of defending the umma but ends as a battle of eschatological proportions, destined to climax in a divinely promised victory over all forces that fail to conform to the way of God. The task of Muslims is therefore to separate themselves from and fight all that is not unequivocally subordinate to divine authority. The real risk for Muslims, according to this view, is to jeopardize their standing in the next world by compromising themselves through submitting to worldly interests in this one. In Islam, the concern for keeping one's religious integrity (piety) relatively untarnished is not normally accompanied by such a universal condemnation of the ways of the world. As a result, in Bin Laden's view, to display one's piety in a world where all that falls short of perfect religion is idolatrous; one must battle the forces of idolatry (jāghūt), whether those forces are infidel powers or apostate leaders who collaborate with them. In this sense, one is a Muslim (i.e., submissive to God) insofar as one risks one's life (al-mukhāṭara bi-l-nafs) in battle against God's enemies. Politics, as a result, is read through the lens of a religious narrative of conflict. God invites Muslims to sacrifice themselves to preserve His interests (one's life in exchange for paradise), fighting against the world even to the point of self-destruction. In this view, the true believer avoids being implicated in the ways of the world, which would compromise God's ways and contribute to the humiliation of His religion. Suicide attacks are thus meant to serve as a powerful witness (martyrdom) to the glory of Islam. Ultimately, then, Bin Laden's goal was to witness the power of Islam, a perverse sort of missionary who hopes to draw the world's attention to God through acts of violence. There are no clear political objectives, only the desire to demonstrate the might of God over the world and its tyrannical rulers who mistakenly believe that they have power over who lives and who dies.

The idea that the Muslim "abandonment" of religion has caused a state of "weakness" in relation to other nations is hardly new, but Bin Laden gave it a further spin, placing the blame on non-Muslims. Jews especially were singled out as scapegoats, somehow responsible for Muslim "sinfulness" before God. In this odd twist of logic, it was the Jews who seduced Muslims from religion, causing them to sell their religion for paltry recompense in this world. This, in turn, left the umma in a weakened state, unable to achieve the political success that serves as evidence of divine favor.

Bin Laden saw the umma to be in peril. Jews and Christians have taken control of the abode of Islam, either directly or through the agency of Muslim apostates who willingly compromise the supremacy of God's interests for worldly gain. The result is the humiliation of the umma at the hands of what he called Zionists and Crusaders who possess Muslim lands, plunder Muslim resources, and make light of Muslim lives; thus the action of the West today vis-à-vis the abode of Islam is no different from—but simply the ongoing extension of—the Crusades and colonial conquests of the past. Bin Laden believed the most heinous actions committed by these infidel forces is the pollution of Islam's holiest sites: the Aqsa mosque in Jerusalem (under Israeli control) and the two shrines of Arabia, Mecca and Medina (under the control of the apostate Saudi regime in alliance with the Crusader West). This wretched state prevails throughout the abode of Islam—Chechnya, Somalia, Kashmir—literally everywhere Muslims are ruled by worldly calculations rather than otherworldly governance.

As Bin Laden saw it, the only way to restore the integrity of the umma has been to fight for the cause of God rather than live in ignominious shame, subjugated to the forces of idolatry. Indeed, the divine punishment currently inflicted on the umma is the result of its neglect of jihad as a paramount religious duty. Only a renewed willingness to fight and die against the enemies of religion will liberate the umma from the forces of idolatry and restore its standing before God. Fortunately for Bin Laden, righteous Muslim youths who prefer death over life have responded to the call, sacrificing themselves in total war against infidels and apostates until Judgment Day. Fighting the agents of idolatry is cast as emulation of the first Muslims. Violence thus becomes ritualized—in other words, a way by which Muslims can please God by reenacting what the first Muslims did to please God. It is for this reason that religious education, especially the study of the Qur'an, is central to al-Qaeda military training, serving as a way to "purify" operatives of any stain of worldliness and making them worthy soldiers (and sacrificial victims through martyrdom) for God, just like the first Muslims before them.

Bin Laden was by no means the architect of jihadism, nor did his voice command uncontested scholarly respect within jihadist circles. 'Abd al-Qadir b. 'Abd al-'Aziz (better known as Sayyid Imam al-Sharif, the Egyptian doctor who helped found the Egyptian Islamic Jihad and went on to become a key ideological architect of al-Qaeda, imprisoned in Egypt) and 'Abd al-Mun'im Mustafa Halima (better known as Abu Basir al-Tartusi, a London-based Syrian scholar of a jihadist bent) have disagreed with Bin Laden on key issues, such as suicide attacks and the targeting of innocents. In contrast, Abu Jandal al-Azdi, Saudi jihadist scholar in prison since 2004, declared Bin Laden to be "the renewer of the age" (mujaddid al-zamān), an extraordinary title used to designate those understood to be Islam's saviors for ensuring the continued existence of the religion in pristine form. Indeed, jihadism itself is only a small segment of a larger development, the so-called Islamic awakening (al-ṣaḥwa al-islāmiyya), a contemporary trend in which social and political activism—but not necessarily violence—is understood as essential to the valorization of Islam. The goal is not to wait for the judgment of God in the world to come but to execute it in this world, by force if necessary, in order to redeem the umma from its "disgraced" political state.

With no scholarly status of his own, Bin Laden nevertheless was able to manipulate key elements within this broader "Islamist" discourse to excite Muslim youths to partake in terrorist activity.

The religious prestige that Bin Laden sought to garner would not have been possible without the prior development of Salafism and its dismissal of traditional religious authority in favor of intense individual engagement with the Qur'an and sunna, apart from mediation of their meaning by traditional experts, as a way to inspire an activist response in believers rather than servile emulation of their religious elders. This religiosity was articulated in radical form by the likes of Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), key figure in the Muslim Brotherhood after Egyptian independence, and 'Abd al-Salam Faraj (d. 1982), author of the text The Neglected Duty that inspired the assassins of President Anwar Sadat in 1981. Religion in this case is guaranteed not by the ability of scholarly masters to derive correct rulings from revealed texts but by the willingness to fight—hence the title Bin Laden bore (along with many others): al-shaykh al-mujāhid (the fighting shaykh). It is the jihadist, not the scholar, who ensures the integrity of religion; war against the enemies of religion becomes the key element of religious devotion, turning Islam in the view of such advocates into a singularly militaristic affair.

Bin Laden's quest for divine justice may have resonated not only with those who tie the validity of Islam to political success but also with those who have experienced marginalization in the world in one way or another. In the end, however, he was a terrorist with limited religious understanding. His enthusiasm for his own glory following the jihadist victory against the Soviets in Afghanistan (made possible by U.S., Saudi, and Pakistani support) gave him an exaggerated sense of invincibility. As a result, he underestimated the resolve of the international community in the face of the threat he posed. More tragically, his deficient religious knowledge left him ignorant of the well-established reasoning processes of shari'a that Muslim scholars carefully crafted over the centuries to limit, or even eliminate, violence in the name of religion. As a result, his jihad was motivated more by sentiments of tribal honor and revenge rather than by religious truth, bringing the umma not glory but intra-Muslim strife (fitna) and engendering a perplexing image of Islam for Muslims and non-Muslims alike. In the final analysis, Bin Laden is the true heir of early Kharijism, calling the umma to rise up (khurūj) against any force that would keep it from living in the shadow of the Qur'an alone. In an age in which injustices are immediately broadcast to international audiences, his defiance of the global powers that claim to be defenders of justice garnered him popularity in some circles, both Muslim and non-Muslim. Some have likened him to Che Guevara (d. 1967). His actions, however, brought no benefit to the umma or the world. His manner of struggling against tyranny deployed violence indiscriminately, targeting innocents (including fellow Muslims) while inflaming sectarian strife within the umma itself. It is for this reason that his brand of piety has been rejected by the vast majority of Muslims. Bin Laden was killed on May 2, 2011, by U.S. Navy Seals in a covert operation. After identification, his body was buried at sea according to Islamic ritual.

See also fundamentalism; Mulla 'Umar (b. 1959); al-Qaeda; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); suicide; Taliban; terrorism; al-Zawahiri, Ayman (b. 1951)

Further Reading

'Abd al-Rahim 'Ali, Tanzim al-Qa'ida, 'Ashrun 'Amman . . . wa-l-Ghazu Mustamirr, Markaz al-Mahrusa li-l-Nashr wa-l-Khadamat al-Suhufiyya wa-l-Ma'lumat, 2007; Raymond Ibrahim, ed. and trans., The Al Qaeda Reader, 2007; Bruce Lawrence, ed., Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden, translated by James Howarth, 2005.

PAUL L. HECK

blasphemy

Blasphemy is speech that insults or shows a lack of reverence for God, holy persons, or sacred things. In the Qur'an, one may identify several types of blasphemy. Blasphemy by denial (takdhīb, or "giving the lie") involves the willful rejection of essential religious truths, such as the existence and unity of God or the messages of His prophets. Blasphemy by invention (al-iftirā' 'alā Allāh, or "contrivance against God") involves the concoction of false doctrines regarding God and His prerogatives. Another Qur'anic term for blasphemy is kalimat al-kufr or "statement of unbelief," a direct statement that indicates the speaker is an unbeliever, used in reference to the disbelievers and hypocrites in Qur'an 9:74. A Qur'anic example of such a direct blasphemy is 79:24, where the pharaoh declares, "I am your Lord the Highest!" (anā rabbukum al-a'lā).

This last term is taken up in later legal and theological literature. Despite a common misunderstanding that Islam is defined by practice and not by doctrine, so that acts and not creeds matter, it is widely understood in both Sunni and Shi'i theology that it is one's thoughts and opinions more than one's acts that render one an unbeliever. When one sins or violates the law, one may do so as a consequence of weakness, addiction, or other afflictions, but what makes one a heretic is the belief that a legal obligation is actually unnecessary or that a legal prohibition is actually invalid.

Evidence of one's heresy or unbelief may be provided by deed, such as the desecration of the Ka'ba—the shrine or temple of God in Mecca that is the focus of the annual pilgrimage (hajj)—or adoration of idols, or by word, which is blasphemy. A genre of Islamic legal literature developed, termed kalimāt al-kufr or alfāẓ al-kufr (statements of unbelief), that attempts to define and catalogue blasphemies. The legal effect of uttering these words intentionally is to cause the apostasy of the speaker, and apostates merit capital punishment. One of the best known of these treatises, authored by Badr al-Rashid al-Hanafi (d. 1366–67), makes the point that blasphemies are based on one of three principles of infraction: "mockery" or "derision" (istihzā'), "making light of" or "considering trivial or unimportant" (istikhfāf), or "considering licit that which is forbidden" (istihlāl). Uttering blasphemy under duress, however, does not make one an apostate and has no legal consequences. These and other legal discussions of blasphemy define what are essentially six categories of blasphemy: vilification of God; vilification of the Prophet; vilification of other prophets or holy personages; vilification of sacred texts, monuments, and so forth; denial of fundamental religious doctrines such as the existence of the Day of Judgment, paradise, hell, and so on; and vilification of the Prophet's Companions.

Vilification of the Prophet Muhammad acquired its own literature, and the infraction was held to require capital punishment not only for Muslims, on the ground that it made them apostates, but also for Jews, Christians, and others living under Muslim rule on the grounds that it detracted from the veneration due to Islam and the obligation to maintain public recognition of the dignity and superiority of Islam. This made it somewhat dangerous for Jews and Christians in Islamic societies to enter into religious polemics with Muslims, for in attempting to refute Islamic doctrines they might adopt a stance interpreted as a direct insult of the Prophet. The ruling, however, was more often ignored than enforced, and most of the cases brought before judges occurred in the course of angry altercations in the streets and markets rather than in elite, scholarly debates. Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) argued for a stricter application of the punishment in his treatise al-Sarim al-Maslul 'ala Shatim al-Rasul (The sword drawn against the insulter of the messenger). Some have argued against the enforcement of this law on non-Muslims on the grounds of the Qur'anic verse "Revile not those unto whom they pray beside God lest they wrongfully revile God through ignorance" (Q. 6:108), which suggests a circumspect approach to blasphemy by non-Muslims since it is assumed to result from ignorance.

Blasphemy against the Companions, often termed sabb al-sahāba (vilification of the Companions) or sabb al-shaykhayn (vilification of the two old men) referring to the first two caliphs, Abu Bakr (r. 632–34) and 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), was a standard subcategory of blasphemy and a frequent topic of Sunni-Shi'i polemics. The term rafd, or "rejection, refusal," was also used to denote blasphemy against the Companions specifically, and from this derives the most common term of opprobrium applied to Shi'is in the Islamic world: rāfida, rawāfid, or rafada, which mean "rejecters." The most frequent charge of heresy brought against Shi'is in both premodern and modern times, insulting or cursing the Companions, has been the main reason behind the execution of Shi'is as heretics throughout Islamic history, though lesser punishments such as banishment, imprisonment, or flogging were often substituted. The historical polemic over the position of imam or caliph led the Shi'is to reject the legitimacy of the first three caliphs—Abu Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Uthman b. 'Affan—and also to reject the moral probity of many additional, prominent Companions, including the Prophet's wives 'A'isha and Hafsa. Comparison with 'Ali and arguments over the historic details of the Prophet's mission and the role played by his Companions in those events led to the development of a wide array of negative anecdotes, accounts, and descriptions of these figures. The Shi'is justified the insult and cursing of these figures, despite their closeness to the Prophet, on the grounds that they wronged Fatima or 'Ali and waged war against him, and the Shi'is consequently adopted the view that these figures were actually unbelieving hypocrites.

Disparagement of the Companions became a feature of various Shi'i societies so that, for example, saying that someone is "'Umar" in contemporary Iran means that he is irritable and irascible, and "going to 'Umar's house" means a visit to the bathroom. By the 16th century, a Shi'i holiday was developed to celebrate the assassination of 'Umar. Called 'Omar-Koshān, or "'Umar-Killing," this carnavalesque inversion of veneration for the Prophet or the imams involves the singing of disparaging ditties about the second caliph and the burning or stabbing of his effigy. Where Shi'is are a minority, these views of the Companions are suppressed, and the Iranian leaders Ayatollah Khomeini and Ayatollah Khamene'i both issued fatwas forbidding Shi'is to abuse the Companions for the sake of unity and solidarity in the Islamic world. The Kuwaiti Shi'i activist Yasir al-Habib (b. 1979) has taken the opposite view, arguing that it is necessary to voice Shi'i views openly, including the cursing of the Companions. He was arrested and imprisoned for blasphemy against the Prophet's Companions in 2003 but was subsequently released in a general amnesty in February 2004. After fleeing Kuwait, he now has an active following in England, where he continues to criticize Sunni doctrines, and has held celebrations on the occasion of 'A'isha's death. He had his Kuwaiti citizenship revoked in 2010 for calling 'A'isha "the enemy of God." He also has denounced accommodationist clerics such as Hasan al-Saffar (b. 1958), the leading Shi'i authority in Saudi Arabia, for publicly expressing approval of Abu Bakr, 'Umar, and 'Uthman, calling Saffar "the Samaritan of this Community," a reference to the character responsible for convincing the Hebrews to worship the golden calf in Moses' absence in the Qur'anic version of Exodus.

In 16th-century Spain, blasphemy became an issue for the Moriscos, Muslims who were forcibly converted to Christianity between 1501 and 1526. A well-known fatwa was issued in Fez in 1504 for the Moriscos in which the North African jurist Ahmad b. Abi Jum'a al-Maghrawi al-Wahrani (d. 1511) ruled that Muslims were allowed to utter Christian creeds under duress without committing apostasy as long as they kept the correct intention in their hearts. If possible, though, it was preferable to use a double entendre and other verbal ambiguities in uttering such creeds so that they would not in fact state the offensive creed explicitly while at the same time convincing the hostile audience that they had.

Blasphemy laws are part of the legal code in many contemporary Muslim-majority countries, though such laws also exist in Britain, Germany, Brazil, Denmark, Finland, and other countries. In five Muslim-majority nations, however, the penalty for blasphemy is capital punishment, and this has made the laws an issue of some controversy between Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the West, as the laws that focus mainly on the denigration of the Prophet Muhammad have been used primarily against Christians or Muslim converts to Christianity. In Pakistan, the blasphemy law was instituted as part of a legal Islamization reform by President Zia-ul-Haq in the 1970s and 1980s, among other measures such as the imposition of mandatory zakat (alms tax) deduction from bank accounts.

From then until the present, 1,000 people have been convicted, and while none have been executed, many have served long or life sentences in prison, and a number of defendants have been killed by public lynching. The law has been used to target Christian converts and also in attempts to win property and other disputes. On January 4, 2011, Salman Taseer, the governor of Punjab and a secularist member of the Pakistan People's Party, was assassinated by one of his own security guards in the capital Islamabad as punishment for his outspoken opposition to the blasphemy law and for his support of Aasia Bibi, a Pakistani Christian woman sentenced to death for allegedly insulting the Prophet Muhammad. Other recent cases in Afghanistan, Nigeria, Sudan, and elsewhere have drawn international concern.

Since 1999, the Organization of the Islamic Conference, now comprising 57 nations, has supported annual resolutions denouncing defamation of Islam or religions in general in the United Nations to support their own blasphemy laws in the international arena and to counter perceived defamation and ideological attacks on Islamic cultures. Opponents charge that such resolutions merely curtail the freedom to express one's views and opinions openly and risk not only stifling debate but also promoting violence. On February 14, 1989, Ayatollah Khomeini issued a fatwa proclaiming that Salman Rushdie was an apostate on the grounds that his book The Satanic Verses was blasphemous, and the Iranian government put a bounty on his head. The Danish newspaper Jyllands-Posten's publication of cartoons that portrayed the Prophet Muhammad on September 30, 2005, resulted in widespread protests by Muslims in Europe and the Islamic world and death threats against the editors as well as the cartoonists. Concerns over violence related to accusations of blasphemy remain strong.

See also apostasy; Companions of the Prophet; faith; God; prophecy

Further Reading

David F. Forte, "Apostasy and Blasphemy in Pakistan," Connecticut Journal of International Law 27 (1994–95); Bernard Haykel, Revival and Reform in Islam: The Legacy of Muhammad al-Shawkānī, 2003; Devin J. Stewart, Islamic Legal Orthodoxy, 1998; Lutz Wiederhold, "Blasphemy against the Prophet Muhammad and His Companions (Sabb al-Rasūl, Sabb al-Ṣaḥābah): The Introduction of the Topic into Shāfi'ī Legal Literature and Its Relevance for Legal Practice under Mamluk Rule," Journal of Semitic Studies 42, no. 1 (1997).

DEVIN J. STEWART

Brethren of Purity

The Brethren of Purity (or "Pure Brethren") is the pen name adopted by the otherwise anonymous authors of a compendium of 52 treatises on a wide variety of disciplines titled Rasa'il Ikhwan al-Safa' wa-Khillan al-Wafa' (The epistles of the pure brethren and the loyal companions). The date and authorship of the Epistles are not known with certainty. Attributions vary from a group of intellectuals in Basra in the mid-tenth century, whom Abu Hayyan al-Tawhidi names in his Kitab al-Imta' wa-l-Mu'anasa, to the ninth-century leaders of the Isma'ili movement in Syria, who organized the uprising that culminated in the establishment of the Fatimid caliphate.

The Epistles are divided into four parts, covering mathematical and logical sciences, the natural sciences, the sciences of the intellect and the soul, and lastly what one could call theological sciences. The work is presented as an instructional curriculum based on an eternal wisdom assumed to have been found in all cultures at all times. One of the main aims of the Epistles was to present an epistemological basis on which revealed scripture and prophetic teachings on the one hand and philosophical exertion and rational enquiry on the other could be accepted as true paths to knowledge of the human being, the universe, and divinity. Although no single epistle is devoted to political theory, the work repeatedly touches on the subject along four main lines.

Social and political reform. The Epistles regard the contemporary world as corrupt on all levels of society, from the marketplace to the court. They advocate moral reform according to a concept of humans based on prophetic lore and philosophical teachings, but they never explicitly propose social or political measures, let alone the overthrow of the Abbasid dynasty. They do give occasional hints that the contemporary regime is an evil that must be replaced by "the government of the good" (dawlat ahl al-khayr), if necessary by means of revolution and uprising. Given the climate of the time, it is possible, but by no means certain, that this should be understood as support for the Isma'ili underground movements. The Epistles see the succession of empires, dynasties, rulers, and even religions as a natural process regulated by astrological cycles. This view, which was widespread at the time, may play a role in formation of Ibn Khaldun's concept of the rise and fall of dynasties.

A multilayered concept of governance (siyāsa). The Epistles treat governance as an activity conducted at all levels of the world, from God's management of the universe by means of angels to the ruler's management of countries by means of soldiers and administrators to the family's management of the household and the individual's management of his own moral character by means of education, intellectual exertion, and purification of the soul.

The perfect society. Possibly building on ideas expounded by their older contemporary Abu Nasr al-Farabi in his work The Virtuous City, with which they seem to be intimately acquainted, the authors conceive the ideal society as a hierarchy in which people are ranked according to their knowledge and intellectual capacities and evaluated in terms of four faculties: the rational faculty, acquired at the age of 15; the intellectual or "wisdom" faculty, acquired at the age of 30; the nomic (related to the Law) faculty, acquired at the age of 40; and the angelic faculty, acquired at the age of 50. Their ideal society is not necessarily envisaged as a politically organized society or state, as opposed to a perfect society or brotherhood within whatever state existed: it was a "spiritual virtuous city" (madīna fāḍila rūḥāniyya). This interpretation makes it difficult to see them as revolutionaries.

Leadership and community. Though the Epistles resonate with tenth-century Isma'ilism, their views differ from those of either the Fatimid caliphate in North Africa and Egypt or the Abu Sa'idis (usually called Qarmatians) in Bahrain and southern Iraq, the two main strains of Isma'ilism at the time. The Epistles seem to be more in line with the Neoplatonizing Isma'ilism pursued by some leaders inside the Isma'ili da'wa (mission) who had not accepted the leadership of the Fatimids and who continued working on their own.

The authors' views on the imamate and its relationship with the community remain unclear. At times, they intimate that the imams from the ahl al-bayt (the people of the house, i.e., the descendants from Muhammad and 'Ali) should be the leaders of the umma (the Muslim community), since they are the repositories of all virtues and the sources for the interpretation (ta'wīl) of revelation that must be applied to current times. At other times, it is clear that in the absence of the imam, all the qualities of leadership are subsumed in the community, especially in the brotherhood espoused by its members. The community organizes itself as an intellectual brotherhood knit together by two main characteristics—mutual cooperation (ta'āwun) and friendship (ṣadāqa)—and in this community, the use of the intellect could take the place of a ruling imam.

See also al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); Isma'ilis; philosophy

Further Reading

Butrus al-Bustani, ed., Rasa'il Ikhwan al-Safa' wa-Khillan al-Wafa'., 1957; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Godefroy de Callataÿ, A Brotherhood of Idealists on the Fringe of Orthodox Islam, 2005; Ian R. Netton, Muslim Neoplatonists: An Introduction to the Thought of the Brethren of Purity, 1982.

OMAR ALÍ-DE-UNZAGA

brotherhoods

The Sufi brotherhoods (ṭuruq, sing. ṭarīqa; lit. "path") are the social and institutional face of Sufism (al-taṣawwuf), broadly construed as those doctrines and practices that seek to remove the mundane veils separating humanity from the divine and thereby render the transcendent immanent. The brotherhoods are often likened to Christian monastic orders, but this is misleading, for ṭarīqa refers to both the social organization of a particular group and the spiritual path that the Sufi traverses in his or her quest for the divine. In terms of social organization, Sufism can be divided into three major historical phases corresponding to three types of social organizations.

The eighth through tenth centuries mark the appearance of a group specifically identified as Sufis. This period is characterized by the predominance of individual Sufi masters and small circles of traveling disciples. Some of the most prominent teachers of this early period include Rabi'a (d. 801), Muhasibi (d. 857), Dhu al-Nun al-Misri (d. 860), Bistami (d. 874), Sahl al-Tustari (d. 896), and Junayd (d. 910). The Sufism of this period is further distinguished by the idiosyncratic nature of its literary production. At this point, there was not a highly systematized doctrine of Sufism that had been thoroughly reconciled with particularly Sunni modes of thought and piety, as would develop during the second phase.

The period from the 11th to the 13th centuries might be called the period of systemization and is marked by two developments. First, Sufis began congregating regularly in specifically Sufi sites, known variously as zāwiya, ribāṭ, khānaqāh, or tekke. The usage of these terms to refer to physical structures in which Sufis meet to practice their devotions was not systematic in the medieval literature, and they were often used interchangeably. The second development was the analyzing and reworking of Sufi doctrine into a Sunni (and particularly Ash'ari) discourse. Qushayri's (d. 1074) Risala (Principles of Sufism) and Ghazali's (d. 1111) Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din (The revival of the religious sciences) are prime examples of this genre. It was during this period that the first manuals of Sufi life were written, which provided a systematic basis for communal living. The most important of these manuals for the development of organized Sufism were Sulami's (d. 1021) Adab al-Suhba (The rules of companionship), Abu al-Najib al-Suhrawardi's (d. 1168) Adab al-Muridin (The rules for Sufi novices), and Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi's (d. 1234) 'Awarif al-Ma'arif (The attainment of true understanding). The Adab al-Muridin is of particular importance because it was the first systematic exposition meant to detail the life and daily habits of the Sufi. The combination of written manuals of discipline and a specific location where like-minded Sufis could gather and spread the doctrines of a particular teacher provided fertile ground for the growth of organized Sufism.

The 14th century to the present marks the period of brotherhoods organized around the personality and doctrines of an eponymous "founder." Although scholars formerly assumed that each of the brotherhoods was founded deliberately by the eponymous shaykh, recent scholarship has shown that it was the second and third generation of the eponym's disciples who performed most of the work of institutionalizing the shaykh's doctrines and practices. Thus while most organized brotherhoods emerged in the 14th century, the eponyms of these brotherhoods were actually active during the 13th century. The most important are 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jilani (d. 1166), Ahmad b. Ibrahim al-Yasa (d. 1166), Ahmad b. 'Ali al-Rifa'i (d. 1182), Najm al-Din Kubra (d. 1221), Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi (d. 1234), Mu'in al-Din Chishti (d. 1236), Abu al-Hasan al-Shadhili (d. 1258), Jalal al-Din Rumi (d. 1273), and Baha' al-Din al-Naqshbandi (d. 1389). These represent the major ṭarīqa lines, or primary brotherhoods, which, according to Spencer Trimingham's The Sufi Orders in Islam, are to be distinguished from the later ṭā'ifa lines. The latter are smaller Sufi sublineages that often trace their authority to one of those in the ṭarīqa lines. In the two or three generations after these teachers' deaths, and once the basic structures of the orders were in place, Sufism began to attract widespread adherents and gain popularity among the masses as well as the religious elites.

It is not entirely clear why the brotherhoods became so appealing in the 13th and 14th centuries. Most scholars have attributed this increase in popularity to the major social upheavals of the time—the Mongol invasions in the East, Crusader activities in Egypt and the Levant, and the Black Death of the 14th century—and a corresponding desire for social stability. Another factor contributing to Sufism's increasing social profile was undoubtedly royal patronage. The growing popularity of Sufi movements attracted notice from political powers beginning in the 11th century. The Seljuqs (1055–1194) instituted a policy of establishing and endowing khānaqāhs similar to the ways they patronized the madrasas (Muslim schools). The Abbasid caliph Nasir li-Din Allah (1180–1225) patronized Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi in what seems to have been an attempt to gain control of the burgeoning social movement. The Ayyubid sultan Saladin (r. 1171–93) endowed the first khānaqāh in Egypt in 1173, which began a policy that the Mamluks (1250–1517) would continue in Egypt and Syria. Whether this royal attention spurred the public's interest in Sufism or whether these were attempts to establish some state control over an already burgeoning movement is less important than the clear implication that by the 13th century the Sufi brotherhoods were beginning to be a political force in their own right. Sufism had taken political turns before—the early masters criticized the prevailing politics and culture of the Abbasid state—but this later development marks the beginning of a relationship between the state and Sufis that would last, in many cases, to the present day; for example, Rumi was an advisor to Seljuq rulers, Ahmad Sirhindi (d. 1624) advised the Mughal court, and the Naqshbandi-initiated Recep Tayyip Erdoğan became the prime minister of Turkey in March 2003.

The brotherhoods are, by their very nature, potentially influential political actors, as the average adherents look to a single master (shaykh) for guidance. The shaykh (pīr in Persian and Urdu) could effectively mobilize large numbers of the populace if needed, although this possibility was attenuated as it has become more acceptable after the 16th century to be affiliated with more than one ṭarīqa or ṭā'ifa, as was the case with the famous Egyptian 'Abd al-Wahhab al-Sha'rani (d. 1565), who belonged to every brotherhood in 16th-century Egypt. In any case, the relationship between Sufi brotherhoods and the political sphere has taken different forms over time and cannot be generalized in any way. No single ṭarīqa has a definitive teaching on political activity. The Chishtis, for example, were quite politically disengaged during the early years of the Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526) but became more politically active during the Lodi period (1451–1526). One can, however, outline a few broad trends in the ways Sufi brotherhoods have approached political leaders or organizations. The following, while not exhaustive, is a representative description of the ways Sufi brotherhoods have engaged with the political sphere with a few examples from the Muslim world.

Nonengagement

Rarely do Sufi groups choose to completely disengage from the political sphere. By refusing to engage with political rulers, these groups are making implicit statements about, in an extreme case, the illegitimacy of a political group or actor or, in a minimalist case, the incommensurate nature of the spiritual and political spheres. The Delhi Sultanate offers an instructive case here. Both the Chishti and Suhrawardi orders appeared very early in South Asia (13th century), but their relationships to the political rulers were quite different. The Suhrawardi order cultivated close relationships with rulers in Delhi and often held governmental positions, carried official titles, and participated in the land-grant system (jāgīr). The Chishti order, by contrast, was generally opposed to political involvement. They refused governmental positions, would not accept the titles offered them, did not participate in the jāgīr system, and even refused to allow the sultans to visit their khānaqāhs. The Suhrawardi Sufis seem to have been following the model of their founder, who had advised and represented the Abbasid caliph Nasir li-Din Allah. Likewise, the Chishti Sufis were following the advice of their founder, who was quite explicit about the proper relationship between the spiritual and political spheres.

The early Bektashi order of Anatolia is another example of political quietism, although in this case their political involvement was a consequence of their numbers. In the early stages of their development, they were politically quietist while they gained in numbers. But in the years following the rise of the Ottoman Empire, their increasing number became a valuable asset to Ottoman rule, and the Bektashi order worked closely with the Ottoman rulers. The Bektashis were associated with the Jannisaries (professional soldiers) of the Ottoman realm, and when the Jannisaries were officially abolished in 1826, the Bektashis suffered a decline as well.

In the Caucasus, the Qadiri order has been traditionally quietist for many years. During the Russian invasions of the 18th and 19th centuries, they did not participate with their Naqshbandi compatriots in the struggle for independence. Likewise, the Qadiri Sufis did not take an oppositional stance to the Bolshevik revolution and were allowed to retain their clerical positions, whereas the Naqshbandi order, having opposed the Bolsheviks, was generally outlawed.

Cooperation

In some cases, Sufi brotherhoods and political leaders have overlapping interests and participate in a mutually beneficial exchange. This seems to happen most often in situations when powerful rulers make strong claims to religious legitimacy: the Ayyubids, the Seljuqs, and the Ottomans, to name a few. Typically, influential Sufi leaders will lend their support—both human support in the form of followers and spiritual support in the form of legitimating the ruler—in exchange for royal or state patronage. This patronage is usually in the form of endowments, gifts, prestige, or a voice in governance. Sufi cooperation with the ruling powers was perhaps the most common form of political activity of the premodern brotherhoods. As mentioned earlier, the Bektashi order supported the Ottoman state in exchange for royal patronage, and the Mevlevi Sufis were likewise quite close to the power structures; not only was Rumi an advisor to the Seljuq sultans but the Ottoman sultan Selim III (r. 1789–1807) was himself an initiated Mevlevi.

Sufis appeared in the Balkans in the 14th century, and it was primarily dervishes of Qalandari and Bektashi affiliation who took up residence in this area and were integral in Islamicizing the population. By the 16th century, the brotherhoods were a fixture of the urban landscape and critical members of Muslim military efforts to continue to convert the population. The Khalwati shaykh Bali Efendi (d. 1553) and his successor, Muslih al-Din Nur al-Din Zada (d. 1571), both worked closely with Ottoman officials and wrote extensive reports detailing the political and religious situation in the region. Nur al-Din Zada explicitly argued that Sufis, as the clients of God, have a duty to council politicians about their decisions in order to make governance more religiously correct. In Africa, the Tijanis worked closely with the French colonialist enterprise in Senegal. This situation has led to a strong backlash against the Sufis on the part of Islamic reformers in that country today. In Pakistan, Jama'at 'Ali Shah (d. 1951), a Naqshbandi shaykh from the Punjab who is said to have had over one million disciples, was briefly appointed as the amīr-i-millat (head of the Muslim community) in an early attempt to unite South Asian Muslims. He was a strong supporter of the "father of Pakistan," Muhammad 'Ali Jinnah (d. 1948), and was instrumental in gathering popular support for an independent Pakistan.

Co-optation

While the reasoning is different from case to case, some governments have found it advantageous to co-opt the brotherhoods under their jurisdiction in an attempt to control what they see as potentially antigovernmental social groups. In the case of post-1952 Egypt, the orders were co-opted by the government to some degree for their potential to offer an alternative to the Muslim Brotherhood. In order to do so, the government created the office of the shaykh mashāyikh al-turuq al-ṣūfiyya—"the shaykh of shaykhs of the Sufi brotherhoods." This has allowed the Egyptian government to exert some control over how the various brotherhoods are overseen, the nature of their celebrations, and appropriate behavior at religious festivals. The office even publishes a journal. Similarly, the Syrian state has taken over responsibility for organized forms of Sufism. Here, however, the state did not create an office for the direct coordination of the brotherhoods but rather set up a ministry of endowments that oversees all the land used for Sufi activities.

Sudan offers an especially interesting case of the government attempting to co-opt Sufi groups. In an effort to bring Sufis into the political fold, the Sudanese government sponsored a large conference for Sufis in 1993 that included hundreds of participants from other African and North African countries. In 1995, the Sudanese government established an agency to supervise the brotherhoods and provide funding for the education, welfare, and pilgrimage of Sufis. The effect (probably intended) has been to polarize the brotherhoods in the Sudan between those who support the Islamist project and those who oppose it. This is most clearly seen in the splintering of the Sudanese branch of the Tijani brotherhood since the mid-1990s into a number of subgroups divided along political lines.

Resistance

In the modern era of colonial enterprises in the Islamic world, political Sufism has most often taken the form of resistance. Because they are not state actors but localized groups with overlapping interests, the Sufi brotherhoods have been in a unique position to resist colonialism. Sufi shaykhs are often able to mobilize their disciples in large numbers by portraying the struggle against colonial powers as a struggle between Islam and unbelievers.

The Portuguese incursions into Morocco in the 15th and 16th centuries led to their control of most of the Mediterranean ports of the region. It was the Jazulis (named for the rural saint Muhammad b. Sulayman al-Jazuli [d. 1465]) who were instrumental in driving them out. Muhammad Jazuli advocated a socially conscious form of Sufi activism that lent itself particularly well to resistance, and the Jazulis were instrumental in fighting the Portuguese encampments. By the mid-16th century, the jihad was successful and the Portuguese were driven out. Similarly, in Algeria, resistance against the French was led by the Sufi 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jaza'iri (d. 1883) and his followers. The Sanusi brotherhood consistently resisted colonial rule in Africa and was a major force of opposition in Chad, Libya, and the Sudan.

In the Caucasus, most of the Muslim population were Sufis by the 18th century. In the wake of Russian incursions in the 18th and 19th centuries, it was the Naqshbandi order that led the resistance. Between 1824 and 1859, Imam ('Ali) Shamil (d. 1871)—a Daghestani Naqshbandi—commanded an Islamic state in the area that was the center of anti-Russian struggle. While Shamil was not the Naqshbandi shaykh, his followers saw him as their temporal guide and would chant the dhikr (remembrance of God's name) in their marches into battle. The cumulative effect of this political involvement and agitation when the Russians eventually gained control of the area was the deportation of thousands of Naqshbandis to Siberia. Thousands more fled to Ottoman-controlled territories, and many of those remaining joined the Qadiri order, which had been politically quiet during the Caucasian War. Some Naqshbandis, however, by virtue of having gone underground, were able to infiltrate and occupy offices in the Soviet government and ensure the continuation of Islamic life in the North Caucasus. In the Russian invasions of the 18th and 19th centuries and the subsequent Bolshevik revolution, the Naqshbandis were visible antagonists, while the Qadiris, as mentioned, remained quietist.

Revolution

It is not often that Sufi resistance calls for the outright upheaval of the political realm and the installation of a new political order. The most salient example of a politicized Sufism with imperial designs is the Safavid order of Central Asia. Named for the shaykh

Safi al-Din Ardabili (d. 1334), the Safavids began as a Sufi (Sunni) brotherhood in Gilan (in the northwest of present-day Iran) and quickly expanded their interests to proselytizing in Azerbaijan and Anatolia. By the time of the fourth shaykh of the order, Isma'il Abu al-Muzaffar Safawi (d. 1524), they had become quite powerful. Isma'il declared that the Safavids were Ithna 'Ashari (Twelver) Shi'is, and in 1501 he was crowned king in Tabriz and declared Twelver Shi'ism the religion of the state. In a fascinating twist, fearing the power of other Sufi brotherhoods, Isma'il ordered the disbanding of all the brotherhoods under his geographical control. The only brotherhood spared was the Ni'matullahi, who had declared themselves Shi'i and aligned themselves with the Safavids. Such governmental suspicion of organized Sufi brotherhoods persists to the present day in Iran.

The Sammani order played a similar role in the founding of the Mahdist state in Sudan led by Muhammad Ahmad b. 'Abdallah (d. 1885). He was given authority in 1861 to initiate others into the Sammani brotherhood and began attracting followers. He declared himself the Mahdi (savior) in 1881 and launched a successful offensive against the Egyptian occupation of Sudan. The Khatmi brotherhood, by contrast, disavowed the claims of the Mahdi and his political aspirations, and their shaykh was forced into exile in Egypt.

It is clear that the relationship between Sufism and the political sphere is heterogeneous and unstable, even within the same brotherhood. These political relationships are determined less by the particular teachings of any certain brotherhood than by historical circumstances and charismatic individuals. It would be more accurate to describe the Sufi brotherhoods as a latent political force—complete with a hierarchical social organization—that can be deployed in certain circumstances by powerful personalities. Political rulers have often been aware of this latent potential and attempted to use the brotherhoods to their own advantage in a number of ways.

See also shaykh, pīr; Sufism

Further Reading

Jamil Abun-Nasr, Muslim Communities of Grace: The Sufi Brotherhoods in Islamic Religious Life, 2007; Paul L. Heck, Sufism and Politics: The Power of Spirituality, 2007; Annemarie Schimmel, Mystical Dimensions of Islam, 1978; Spencer Trimingham, The Sufi Orders in Islam, 1971.

NATHAN HOFER

bureaucracy

The term "bureaucracy" refers to a system of administrative departments known as bureaus (dawāwīn, sing. dīwān) that function as an extension of the ruler's political authority for managing the affairs of the realm. The bureaucratic concept is not elaborated in the Qur'an or sunna but was adopted by early Muslim rulers from Byzantine and Persian practices. A complex bureaucratic structure developed under the Umayyads (661–750) and Abbasids (750–1258) and became the administrative model for subsequent dynasties: a system of administrative norms, embodied in bureaucratic departments, for managing soldiers' salaries and rations, tax revenues, official correspondence, court attendants and provisions, subjects' complaints, lands possessed by the ruling dynasty and those parceled out as grants to military commanders, monies confiscated from disgraced officials, and a whole host of other governmental interests. Bureaucratic structures existed at the caliphal (or sultanic) center, and in the provinces, and in the borderlands (thughūr); at the summit of the bureaucratic hierarchy stood such offices as that of vizier and chief comptroller (zimām al-azimma), two posts created in the early Abbasid period.

Bureaucracy, at its heart, is the craft of writing (kitāba) in the service of governance (siyāsa), and the bureaucratic corps was known simply as "writers" or "scribes" (kuttāb, sing. kātib) or "people of the pen" (ahl al-qalam; qalamiyya in the Ottoman context) in contrast to the military corps, known as "people of the sword" (ahl al-sayf; 'askariyya in the Ottoman context), which formed the second pillar of rule. Letters, registries, documents, and records—written material—constituted the professional substance and occupation of the bureaucratic corps of the various dynasties ruling in the name of Islam, whether Sunni or Shi'i. Writing, in this bureaucratic form, was understood to exist for the sake of political coherency. Bureaucratic manuals commonly warned against the political breakdown that would occur as a result of deficiencies in written communication, and bureaucratic circles saw administrative order as a product of written order, known as the art of writing (sinā'at al-kitāba). This association of writing with bureaucracy left its mark on Muslim intellectual life. For example, a tenth-century work on different methods of communication, al-Burhan fi Wujuh al-Bayan (Proof of the means of communication) by Abu al-Husayn b. Wahb, secretary in the employ of 'Ali b. 'Isa, celebrated vizier during the reign of the Abbasid caliph Muqtadir, identifies written communication wholly with the bureaucratic profession. Also, Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406) recognized the political significance of bureaucracy, suggesting that a dynasty that had lost its clan solidarity ('asabiyya), once it had become accustomed to the luxuries of settled life, could still hope to preserve its rule—and thus the political coherency of the realm—by maintaining a strong and well-run bureaucracy.

The dīwān—that is, the administrative bureau—was conceived as the written repository of information of import to the state. This information, recorded in official documents, embodied rules and regulations that, along with the ruler's edicts, set expectations of governance. In this sense, the dīwān represented an authority in its own right to which recourse could be had for managing public affairs. In the Ottoman context, the dīwān also referred to the cabinet of administrators who constituted the highest authorities of the realm both at the imperial center and in the provincial governorates. In this sense, the existence of a bureaucratic system as a recognized feature of Islamic rule, as articulated in such works as al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government) by Mawardi (d. 1058; an influential scholar in the employ of the Abbasid caliphs of his day), lent itself to a notion of "rational rule" in Islam—that is, governance by intelligible and predictable norms and not simply by personal decisions made in potentially whimsical fashion by a dynastic ruler or a coterie of figures close to him. The ruler's judgment (ra'y) was, to be sure, the origin of political authority, and dynasties—as well as leading bureaucratic departments and ministries—were not above nepotism. Still, the expansion of bureaucratic institutions set the expectation of regular administrative order against which the conduct of dynastic officials, such as tax collectors, could be measured.

Muslim appreciation for bureaucracy arose in the wake of the first conquests, when figures such as 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), the second Rightly Guided Caliph in succession to Muhammad, recognized the necessity of bureaucratic organization for administering conquered lands and peoples. There was need for a repository (dīwān) of administrative information—a written record to preserve, for example, the fiscal terms of treaties made with the various towns and cities that fell to the Muslim conquerors, including the nature of capitulation (with or without fighting), which was a key criterion for determining the amount of money and goods to be extracted by the political center as a land tax (kharāj). Adjustments could be and were made in fiscal policies, but important precedents were set for the bureaucratic practice by the dynamic of conquest, as seen, for example, in the work of the historian Ahmad b. Yahya al-Baladhuri (d. ca. 892) on the first conquests (Futuh al-Buldan) and also in Ottoman taxation policies, which were ultimately grounded in the imperial edict (qanun-nama) issued at the time of conquest.

At the same time, bureaucratic structures and norms used by Muslims, even if legitimized by conquest, were generally based on customs used by previous rule. The Qur'an and sunna offered little guidance when it came to the constitution and details of bureaucratic administration, and dynastic servitors were quite aware that they were building on a past heritage. Not only did they tend to see the Islamic dispensation in light of the conquests and decisions of earlier Muslims, but they also idealized the Persian past, especially as a model of competent administration, as seen in a tenth-century work on bureaucratic history, Kitab al-Wuzara' wa-l-Kuttab (The book of ministers and secretaries) by Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad al-Jahshiyari (d. 942), servitor to a number of viziers in the Abbasid dynasty of his day. Features unique to Muslim administration gradually disappeared, such as the Umayyad practice of registering soldiers by tribe, which, in the early Abbasid period, was changed to registration by village. Greek, Persian, and Coptic continued as bureaucratic languages until the fifth Umayyad caliph, 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwan (r. 685–705), made Arabic the language of Islamic rule, as it was already the language of Islamic religion. This too did not last, and other languages, notably Persian and then Turkish (under the Ottomans), were used for bureaucratic purposes by later dynasties. However, 'Abd al-Malik's cultural policy did play a role in encouraging the rise of Arabic prose, a development in which leading members of the bureaucratic establishment—namely, 'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib and Ibn al-Muqaffa'—had a hand.

The bureaucratic corps embodied a distinct culture within Muslim society, identifiable not only in terms of standards of language and writing but also in dress, etiquette, and a sense of hierarchy and authority, symbolized in the governing seal (khatam; tughra in the Ottoman context) by which bureaucratic writing was imprinted (quite literally) with political authority. To this end, a genre of administrative literature arose, beginning in the early Abbasid period: manuals defining bureaucratic writing and procedures as well as the general ethos of bureaucratic culture. This literature, composed in Arabic at first, invariably drew on the language of the religious heritage for standards of communication, working to integrate rule and religion together in a singe cultural framework. Indeed, in some works, bureaucracy—that is, written communication—was classified as a branch of shari'a. Bureaucracy would thus become something of an ideological battleground between those who would align it with the language and standards of eloquence of the first Muslims and those who would recognize its "linguistic autonomy"—that is, its own set of terms and nomenclature. However, it is best to see shari'a and bureaucratic administration as symbiotic realms, mutually reinforcing each other in shaping the public order of Muslim society—a synthesis noticeable in many administrative works, such as the bureaucratic "encyclopedia" Subh al-A'sha fi Sina'at al-Insha' (Morning for the night-blind in the art of composition) of Abu l-'Abbas Ahmad al-Qalqashandi (d. 1418), an Egyptian scholar and administrative servitor during the reign of the Mamluks, and also in the Ottoman policy of integrating circles of the religiously learned ('ilmiyya) into the bureaucratic ranks of the empire.

See also 'Abd al-Hamid al-Katib b. Yahya al-'Amiri (d. 750); government; Ibn al-Muqaffa' (ca. 720–56)

Further Reading

Cornell Fleischer, Bureaucrat and Intellectual in the Ottoman Empire: The Historian Mustafa Âli (1541–1600), 1986; Paul L. Heck, The Construction of Knowledge in Islamic Civilization: Qudama b. Ja'far and His Kitāb al-kharāj wa-sinā'at al-kitāba, 2002.

PAUL L. HECK

Buyids (945–1062)

The Buyids, named after their ancestor 'Ali b. Buyah, came from Daylam, the highlands south of the Caspian Sea. With the help of armed forces composed of Daylami footsoldiers and Turkish horsemen, from 935 onward they controlled an area that at the zenith of their power included modern-day Iraq, Oman, and Iran and reached as far as the borders of Baluchistan and Khurasan. The distribution of the territory among the members of the Buyid family, with their leader holding the position of amīr al-umarā' (supreme commander) in Baghdad, brought about problems of unity and succession, which in the long run turned out to be unsolvable. Succumbing to the onslaught of the Seljuqs, Buyid rule came to an end in Baghdad in 1055 and in Fars in 1062.

According to the Sunni theory of state as formulated Mawardi, a leading contemporary authority, the caliph was supposed to be from among the Quraysh, the Prophet Muhammad's clan. In contrast, Shi'is of various denominations held the caliphate to be the prerogative of the 'Alids, the progeny of 'Ali's marriage with Fatima, the Prophet's daughter. The Buyids were Shi'is of the Zaydi branch, which prevailed in their homeland of Daylam. Mu'izz al-Dawla, the first Buyid to assume the office of supreme commander in Baghdad in 945, fearing a Zaydi imam might threaten his authority and considering the fact that the Samanids in the East were staunch supporters of the Abbasids, did not interfere with the caliphate in principle. His successors continued this policy. However, this did not prevent them from sympathizing with the Twelver (Imami) Shi'is, promoting Shi'i festivals, and choosing Shi'i sanctuaries for their burial. As for the leadership of the Islamic community, the Twelver Shi'is assumed an attitude of quietism, waiting for the return of the Twelfth Imam who had gone into hiding (ghayba) in 874. Eventually, Buyid amirs even had an eye for the Isma'ilism of the Fatimids, which propagated activism in going ahead with the 'Alid pretension to the caliphate.

The Buyids gave the supreme emirate, which had been established a decade before their takeover in Baghdad, a degree of stability after a period of unrest. The names of the leading amirs were mentioned together with that of the caliph in the Friday sermon (khuṭba) and put on coins according to their ranks. The Abbasids eventually transferred full powers to the Buyid leaders, confining their own rule to the administration of personal possessions, the enthronization of the supreme amir and the provincial rulers, and the settling of religious matters. In exchange, the Buyids assumed titles that expressed support of the Abbasid caliph (dawla), to which were later added titles that were meant to demonstrate protection of the community (milla, umma) and promotion of Islam (dīn). When the Buyids claimed descent from the Sasanids (224–642), the Zoroastrian rulers of Iran before the Arab conquest, the caliph found himself compelled to allow the Iranian title shāhānshāh (great king, malik al-mulūk), a title detestable to pious Muslims, to be mentioned in the khuṭba and put on the coins. Buyid power attained its apex under 'Adud al-Dawla, and subsequent to his death in 983, Buyid power was beginning to wane and the authority of the caliphs increased once again, earning them the place of arbiters in internal Buyid disputes.

Throughout the Buyid century, Iraq, the center of Shi'i activities since the early Islamic period, was stricken by unrest and riots, sometimes taking the shape of civil war, particularly in Baghdad. The Buyid army, composed of Shi'i Daylamis and Sunni Turks, experienced the same problem within their ranks. In addition, there were the difficulties of financing the soldiers. They were paid in cash or kind, which is the assigning of land (iqtā') in exchange for services rendered. Mismanagement, decay of the irrigation system in Mesopotamia, and the shift of the trade route from the Persian Gulf to the Red Sea contributed to the downfall of the Buyid commonwealth.

As for their cultural achievements, the Buyids did not promote New Persian literature but gave the Iranian fine arts a lasting impetus. Scholars, writers, and high officials excelled in Arabic literature, philosophy, and natural sciences. Theologians like Ibn Babuya laid the foundations of Imami theology. Whereas the Buyids were a foreign occupying power in the eyes of modern Iraqi historians, Iranian authors view them as the first power possessing the dynasty of the Shi'a. To define the place they deserve in history, one must take into account their achievements in various fields of culture. Depriving the caliph of his power without encroaching on his authority testifies to their sense of proportion in politics—a pattern that persisted under the subsequent and uncompromisingly Sunni Seljuqs.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Baghdad; caliph, caliphate; coinage; Friday prayer; Ghaznavids (977–1086); holy places; Iraq; Mawardi (974–1058); Seljuqs (1055–1194); Shi'ism; Sunnism

Further Reading

Clifford Edmund Bosworth, "Military Organisation under the Būyids of Persia and Iraq," Oriens 18–19 (1967); Heribert Busse, Chalif und Großkönig. Die Buyiden im Iraq (945–1055), 1969; John J. Donohue, The Buwayhid Dynasty in Iraq 334/945 to 403/1012: Shaping Institutions for the Future, 2003; Wilferd Madelung, "The Assumption of the Title Shāhānshāh by the Būyids and 'The Reign of the Daylam (Dawlat al-Daylam)'," JNES 28, no. 2 (1969); Luke Treadwell, Buyid coinage. a die corpus (322–445 AH), 2001.

HERIBERT BUSSE

C

Cairo

Cairo (al-Qāhira, "the Victorious"), the capital of Egypt, is a major cultural center in the Islamic world. The city developed from the camp established in 969 by General Jawhar al-Siqilli ("the Sicilian," d. 992) in the service of the Fatimid caliph Mu'izz (r. 953–75), on the east bank of the Nile several miles south of where the river divides into channels to form the Delta. An escarpment of cliffs known as the Muqattam approaches the river at this locale, assuring its strategic significance. Successive governments have constructed fortifications there since Pharaonic times, and following the Arab conquest in 641, a permanent settlement called al-Fusṭāṭ (Gr. Phossatun, or "tent") was established near a Byzantine garrison tower. Over the following three centuries, Fustat grew into a large port town, and successive ruling regimes built their residences and ceremonial mosques to the north. Jawhar plotted the parameters of Cairo partially on sightings of the planet Mars (al-Qāhir, hence the title Miṣr al-Qāhira, "Egypt the Victorious"). He designed a rectangle roughly one mile square and designated it as the seat of governance for the Fatimid caliphate and Isma'ili Shi'i missions (da'wa). Two large palaces, divided by a central avenue running south to north (Bayn al-Qaṣrayn, "between the two palaces"), and a cathedral mosque, al-Azhar, occupied most of this rectangle.

Habitation in al-Qahira was initially limited to the Fatimid elite. But after the Ayyubid termination of the Fatimid caliphate (1169) and restoration of Sunnism, Sultan Saladin (d. 1193) ordered the construction of a vast citadel (al-Qal'a) on a western spur of the Muqattam. Subsequently, the zones between the southern gate of al-Qahira (Bāb Zuwayla) and the citadel were urbanized. The town of Fustat, already diminished in population under the late Fatimids, was effectively abandoned after fires were ordered by the vizier Shawar (d. 1169) to empty the site during the Crusader period preceding the Ayyubid coup. From its foundation, the citadel replaced the former Fatimid palaces as the primary seat of governance and military power in Egypt and remained so until the onset of modernization following the reign of Muhammad 'Ali (1805–48). The Ayyubid sultans surrounded the urbanized zone with defensive walls extending from Fustat to the citadel and then north to al-Qahira. Aqueducts leading from the Nile to the citadel supplied water to the government center, and the population began to expand across the canal (al-Khalīj) to the Nile shore some miles west of the citadel and Fatimid al-Qahira.

After Mamluk soldiers who had served the last Ayyubid sultan, al-Malik al-Salih (d. 1250), seized control, the entire urban area became known as al-Qahira and underwent massive development. During the 267 years of independent Mamluk rule, Cairo attained its medieval apogee with a population of several hundred thousand. Following the fall of Baghdad to the Ilkhanids in 1258, Cairo became the leading center of literary and scholastic activity in the central Islamic lands, which it has subsequently remained. Under the Mamluks, Egypt experienced its final phase as a great power, and Cairo witnessed the construction of numerous mosques, colleges (madrasas), and Sufi hospices (khānaqāhs). Even in the aftermath of successive plague epidemics during the 14th and 15th centuries, Cairo persisted as the largest city in the Arabic-speaking world.

Following the Ottomans' defeat of the Mamluks in 1517, Cairo continued as the seat of government in Egypt, their most prominent Arab province. Direct Ottoman rule persisted for approximately 100 years and was followed by semiautonomous control at the hands of local military officers who belonged to an elite descended from indigenous Mamluks and Ottoman Janissaries (Muslim infantry soldiers of European Christian origin). Cairo maintained its significance as one of the primary cities of the Ottoman Empire and as a center of trade between northeast Africa, Southwest Asia, and Mediterranean Europe. This period of autonomy was abruptly terminated in 1798 by the invasion of Egypt by the French under Napoleon Bonaparte. Although the French occupation lasted only three years, the resultant interregnum was ultimately resolved by Muhammad 'Ali, an officer of Albanian descent sent by the Ottomans to restore their authority. Muhammad 'Ali entrenched himself as the effective autocrat in Egypt, founded a dynasty that lasted until 1952, and proceeded to launch programs for the modernization of Cairo and its integration into the emerging European-dominated global economy. From Muhammad 'Ali's reign, Cairo has been gradually transformed into a modern megalopolis with a population eventually exceeding 15 million. Yet Cairo has retained its character as the leading center of culture and intellectual vitality in the Arabic-speaking world, and much of its medieval architecture has been restored.

See also Ayyubids (1169–1250); Egypt; Fatimids (909–1171); Mamluks (1250–1517)

Further Reading

Janet L. Abu-Lughod, Cairo: 1,001 Years of the City Victorious, 1971; Marcel Clerget, Le Caire, Étude de géographie urbaine et d'histoire économique, 2 vols., 1934; K.A.C. Creswell, The Muslim Architecture of Egypt, vol. 1: Ikhshids and Fatimids, A.D. 939–1171, 1952; Idem, The Muslim Architecture of Egypt, vol. 2: Ayyubids and Early Bahrite Mamluks, A.D. 1171–1326, 1959; Edward William Lane, The Manners and Customs of the Modern Egyptians, 1908; Nasser O. Rabbat, The Citadel of Cairo, A New Interpretation of Royal Mamluk Architecture, 1995.

CARL F. PETRY

caliph, caliphate

The caliphate (al-khilāfa) is the term denoting the form of government that came into existence in Islamic lands after the death of the Prophet Muhammad and is considered to have survived until the first decades of the 20th century. It derives from the title caliph (khalīfa, pl. khulafā' or khalā'if), referring to Muslim sovereigns who claimed authority over all Muslims. The caliphate refers not only to the office of the caliph but also to the period of his reign and to his dominion—in other words, the territory and peoples over whom he ruled. The office itself soon developed into a form of hereditary monarchy, although it lacked fixed rules on the order of succession and based its legitimacy on claims of political succession to Muhammad. The caliphate was constrained by neither any fixed geographical location or boundaries nor particular institutions; rather, it was coterminous with the reign of a monarch or a dynasty.

This entry discusses the political, historical, and institutional aspects of the caliphate but not the theological or judicial. Despite frequent overlap between the terms caliph/imam and caliphate/imamate, this article also does not deal with topics that are only relevant to imam/imamate, as in Shi'ism, for example.

The term "caliphate" is most commonly restricted to five periods or dynasties: the Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61), the Umayyad caliphate (661–750), the Abbasid caliphate (750–1258 and 1261–1517), the Fatimid caliphate (909–1171), and the Umayyad caliphate of Córdoba (928–1031). Throughout the centuries, however, various other rulers have made claims to the caliphate or adopted the caliphal titulature—that is, one or more titles usually associated with caliphs. The first four successors of the Prophet Muhammad are usually called the Rightly Guided Caliphs (al-khulafā' al-rāshidūn). But those Muslims who do not accept the legitimacy of some of these rulers refrain from applying this expression to them.

Despite the ubiquitous use of the terms "caliphate" and "caliph" in modern scholarship, they were not the principal or exclusive terms used in official documents or in the writings of Muslim authors, nor were they adopted immediately following Muhammad's death. Many Muslim writers eschewed these two terms in favor of alternatives, especially imam and imāma, or (religious) leader and leadership. The two terms, "caliph" and "caliphate," were almost always employed in conjunction with other terms and expressions. They also hardly appear in official or unofficial documentary sources (papyri, coins, rock inscriptions, textiles, weights, and seals), and non-Muslim sources do not use them when referring to Muslim sovereigns or to Islamic political institutions, especially for the first Islamic centuries. The institution of the caliphate developed gradually with time and crystallized only at the beginning of the Abbasid period in the second half of the eighth century. Also, despite their claims to universal rule over all Muslims, few Muslim sovereigns actually did so; many provinces and regions controlled by Muslims did not acknowledge the suzerainty of any caliph. Furthermore, the caliphs possessed actual power for a relatively short period, as they became mostly puppets in the hands of military commanders and high-ranking officials.

The history of the development of the institution of the caliphate can be divided as follows:

632–945. This timespan covers three periods. The foundational period, beginning with the election of Abu Bakr as leader of the Muslim community after the Prophet's death in 632, continued until the end of the second fitna (civil war) in the second half of the seventh century. It was followed by the formative period and period of strength, from the reign of 'Abd al-Malik (r. 685–705) to about the middle of the ninth century. The subsequent period saw the decline of central caliphal authority and growth of independent and autonomous regions in the ninth and tenth centuries, when an increasing number of provinces were ruled by semiautonomous or autonomous dynasties. The gradual loss of power by the Abbasid caliphs culminated with the Buyids gaining control of Baghdad in 945.

945–1517. Two periods are included in this time frame. A period of multiple caliphates, which extended from the 10th to the 12th centuries, began with the establishment of the Fatimid caliphate in 909 in Ifriqiya, followed by that of the Umayyads in Córdoba in 928. The latter, a Sunni caliphate, lasted a century, while the former, a Shi'i Isma'ili one, extended its rule to Egypt and Syria and lasted until 1171. The period of the shadow caliphate ensued as the Muslim world became independent of any caliphal control between the 12th century and 1517. This period saw the demise of the Abbasid caliphate after the Mongols' sack of Baghdad in 1258 and the transfer to Cairo, then under Mamluk rule, of a scion of the dynasty in 1261. This caliphate, which had neither power nor symbols thereof, ended in 1517 with the Ottoman conquest of Egypt. Other dynasties, like the Hafsids (1229–1574) and the Marinids (1269–1465), appropriated the caliphal titulature, although they lacked the universalist ambitions of the original caliphates.

1517–1924. With the fall of the Abbasid caliphate, there arrived a period of multiple pretenders and competition for supremacy in the Muslim world. A greater number of Muslim rulers added the title khalīfa to their titulature, although for most rulers that did not correspond to any higher claims of authority over all Muslim lands, as was the case of the Mughal rulers from Akbar (r. 1556–1605) to Shah 'Alam II (r. 1759–1806). The title caliph was also given to Ottoman sultans, first unofficially from the end of the 14th century, and then officially in the 18th and 19th centuries. The end of the caliphate came about in February 1924, when the Grand National Assembly of Ankara deposed the Ottoman sultan 'Abd al-Majid II and abolished the caliphate. Some Muslim rulers attempted but failed to restore the institution, notably the Sharif of Mecca, al-Husayn b. 'Ali, in 1924, and King Farouk of Egypt in 1939.

Not all Muslims considered their rulers primarily as caliphs, nor did all Muslims interpret the title of khalīfa in the same way. Not only did the institution of the caliphate itself develop over time, but so did the terminology associated with it and the way that Muslims throughout the world viewed it.

Titulature of Pre-Islamic Arabian Monarchs

For centuries prior to the rise of Islam, sovereigns in the Arabian Peninsula adopted a titulature based on the title m.l.k (king, monarch). This is attested in documents written in the various North and South Arabian languages that were in use in the Arabian Peninsula and dating from approximately the seventh century BCE to the mid-sixth century CE. The title was also employed by Arabian dynasties at the northern limits of the Arabian Peninsula (like the Nabataeans and the Palmyrenes) that used non-Arabian languages (Aramaic and Greek) in their documents. The use of the title m.l.k occurs in rare pre-Islamic inscriptions in Arabic as well.

That malik was the title in Arabic given to the holder of the highest political office is further verified in subsequent literature in Arabic. In the Qur'an, the title appears 13 times in the singular and twice in the plural (mulūk) to denote a sovereign, with 5 of the 13 occurrences in the singular actually referring to God, who is described as the ultimate possessor of all sovereignty. In pre-Islamic Arabic poetry, an independent monarch's title is also malik. This is also the title given to sovereigns, both Arabian (from the pre-Islamic period) and non-Arabian (of all periods), in Islamic Arabic literary sources from the eighth century onward (e.g., mulūk Kinda, or kings of Kinda, and mulūk al-Rūm, or kings of the Romans).

The predominance of the title malik in the Arabian Peninsula over a 1,000-year period was broken when Muslim sovereigns did not adopt a titulature based on it. The reason for that may be the Qur'anic notion that God is the one and only king of all (creation). Indeed, kingship came to be considered synonymous with worldly rule from early Abbasid times, when a hadith (a Prophetic tradition) was circulated attributing to the Prophet Muhammad the statement, "Khilāfa after me will be thirty years; after that it will be kingship." Since the Rightly Guided Caliphs ruled for 30 years, they were given an especially elevated position by Sunni religious scholars, who called their rule the "vicarage of prophecy" (khilāfat al-nubuwwa), mostly considering the caliphs' order in succession as their order in merit.

Titulature of Early Muslim Sovereigns up to 750

According to Islamic literary sources, Abu Bakr, the first leader of the Muslim community after Muhammad's death, adopted the title of khalīfat rasūl Allāh, "the successor of the messenger of God." It is, however, unlikely that Abu Bakr held any official title, since the literary sources make this assertion for polemical reasons, to argue that the title khalīfa, which came into official use much later, is in reality short for khalīfat rasūl Allāh, not khalīfat Allāh. This debate over the meaning of the term khalīfa probably emerged during the early Abbasid period.

The literary sources also assert that 'Umar b. al-Khattab, Abu Bakr's successor, coined for himself the title of amīr al-mu'minīn, "Commander of the Faithful," in part because the conquests gave him a military standing. Some reports state that this title was held before him by 'Abdallah b. Jahsh during the Prophet's lifetime. Nonetheless, there is reason to accept that 'Umar was the first sovereign to adopt the title of amīr al-mu'minīn, since there is evidence that his successor, 'Uthman b. 'Affan, used it in diplomatic exchanges with foreign rulers. The first documentary attestations of this title to date come from the reign of Mu'awiya (r. 661–80). His full title in Arabic documents reads, "'abd Allāh Mu'āwiya amīr al-mu'minīn," or "God's servant, Mu'awiya, Commander of the Faithful"; in Greek documents, it is fully transliterated, and on a silver coin (dirham) the titulature is partially transliterated and partially translated into Pahlavi.

In fact, the official full titulature of the earliest Muslim sovereigns up to the end of the Umayyad period was the formula 'abd Allāh (name of sovereign) amīr al-mu'minīn, which means "God's servant (name), Commander of the Faithful." This is found on a variety of official and unofficial documents (most commonly inscriptions, papyri, coins, seals, and weights) and in several languages. The sovereign is normally identified by his first name only, although sometimes the father's name is also included.

The only deviation from this titulature was the addition, on some coins from the reign of 'Abd al-Malik, of the title khalīfat Allāh, although the first word of the title had a peculiar orthography (kh.l.f.t) that has been read differently by various scholars. The title khalīfat Allāh was, however, removed from coins during the reign of 'Abd al-Malik himself, and it does not reappear in the surviving documents until the Abbasid period. Could this have been in response to early objections to the use of this title by the Muslim sovereign? The Umayyad caliphs, including 'Abd al-Malik, did not object to being addressed by such a title by poets in panegyrics.

The term khilāfa—not khalīfa—appears even later in documentary sources, the earliest being an unofficial inscription dated 737–38 from the reign of Hisham (r. 724–43). It then appears officially near the end of the Umayyad dynasty in a lead seal and two lead bullae of Marwan b. Muhammad (r. 744–50). Such attestations indicate that the office or institution of the caliphate was indeed officially identified by a term derived from khalīfa by the end of Umayyad times, although the predominant title of Umayyad sovereigns until the end of their dynasty in 750 remained amīr al-mu'minīn.

Although the titulature of Muslim sovereigns in documentary sources presents a clear break with the titulature of pre-Islamic monarchs, the break was not as pronounced in Arabic poetry, where the vocabulary used to refer to politics and political institutions evolved gradually with time. In the poetry allegedly contemporaneous with the Prophet and his first successors, rulers are still mostly referred to with pre-Islamic terms and concepts interspersed with some new Islamic terms. The latter grow steadily in importance and become more prevalent so that by the end of the Umayyad period, they dominate the political vocabulary of the poetry. Beginning with poetry from 'Umar's reign, the titles imam and amīr al-mu'minīn are applied to Muslim sovereigns, while khalīfat Allāh is first attested from the reign of Mu'awiya. Some scholars have mistakenly assumed that the latter title was already in use during the reign of 'Uthman because it is applied to him in several verses. However, all these verses come from elegies, which means that they were posthumous to 'Uthman's reign. In addition, Mu'awiya and the later Umayyads built their legitimacy partly on their association with 'Uthman, and, therefore, a poet lamenting 'Uthman's death was not only expressing his sorrow for the slain sovereign but also presenting his allegiance to the Umayyads. This in turn means that such verses could have been composed any time during the Umayyad period. Poets with different political allegiances opted for different political vocabulary. Those who favored 'Ali b. Abi Talib and his descendants avoided using the title khalīfa for their political leaders, preferring to use imam or amīr al-mu'minīn. The latter term eventually became the sole prerogative of 'Ali in Shi'i literature.

In the Islamic literary sources, the titulature applied to Muslim sovereigns varies from source to source. Most sovereigns are referred to just by their first names or by their full names when it is necessary to avoid ambiguity. If a titulature is given to the sovereign, then the choice of titles usually depends on the author himself, although there are trends depending on the religious affiliation of the author and/or the type of literature that is being composed. An author could favor the title amīr al-mu'minīn, or imam, or khalīfa, or might use all three interchangeably. However, in works of hadith or fiqh, the title of imam takes precedence over the others. Imam is also the title preferred by non-Sunni authors, such as the Zaydis, the Ibadis, and the Imami Shi'is. On the other hand, Christian authors writing in Arabic apply the title malik to all sovereigns, whether Muslim or non-Muslim.

Non-Muslim authors writing in a language other than Arabic chose one of three ways to refer to Muslim sovereigns in their literary compositions: (1) through their given names only; (2) through a title in their native language that was commonly used to refer to other sovereigns; and (3) by applying the title amīr al-mu'minīn to them, in either a transliterated or translated form.

The Meaning of the Title Khalīfat Allāh

Most modern scholars have understood the title khalīfat Allāh to mean "vicegerent of God" or "deputy of God." However, this was not the original meaning of the expression.

The title itself appears rarely in pre-Abbasid documentary sources and never in papyri. But the term khalīfa itself does appear several times in papyri dated from the eighth to the tenth century, beginning with a bilingual, Arabic-Greek receipt dated 643. In most of these examples, the individuals referred to as khalīfas are involved in some financial transaction, usually the collection of, or receipt for, a payment, without any associated political connotation.

For a better understanding of the meaning of the title, we must study pre-Islamic documents from Arabia. In South Arabian languages, words from the root kh.l.f have several meanings (e.g., "gate of a town" and "violating an oath"). But one meaning has a political/administrative connotation and occurs in two inscriptions by Abraha, the sixth-century South Arabian monarch of Abyssinian origin. The usage of the verb s.t.kh.l.f in these two texts is similar to the Arabic istakhlafa, which is a Qur'anic word and is often found in Sīra literature to describe the Prophet's appointment of individuals as overseers of Medina with limited authority during his absence from the town. The spelling of the term kh.l.f.t, which appears twice in one of these texts, is also identical with that of khalīfa as found on the coins of 'Abd al-Malik. The exact meaning of these words remains unclear. Scholars have translated kh.l.f.t as "governor" and as "viceroy," but they have been influenced in this interpretation by later Arabic usage.

The most common occurrence of words from the root kh.l.f in pre-Islamic documents is in personal names found in North and South Arabian; in Nabataean and Palmyrene, the names are based on the root h.l.p. Transliterated forms of these names are found in Greek documents as well. Scholars agree that the names based on the root kh.l.f are originally compound names, part of which is the name of a deity, although the latter is often omitted. In all instances where the name of the deity appears in full, the name is l.h or '.l.h. These compound names have equivalents in Arabic based on the root kh.l.f added to the name Allah. Understanding the meaning of these names can provide us with an insight on the meaning of the title khalīfat Allāh.

In bilingual inscriptions, names from the Semitic root kh.l.f/h.l.p are equated with the Greek Antipatros and less frequently Antigonos. These names were given to newborns considered as replacements for a relative, most commonly the father, who had died. A number of scholars have argued that the belief was that a god had replaced the deceased person with the newborn baby. Equivalent names in Arabic from the root kh.l.f carry the same meaning and are attested from the earliest surviving documents in Arabic to the present day.

Scholars thus agree that the meaning of the names based on the root kh.l.f is "replacement or substitute (of a deceased person) by a god." It is the god that makes (ja'ala)—selects, assigns, designates, creates, places—the khalīfa. This is exactly the meaning and usage that we find in the Qur'an. It is also the same meaning that late Umayyad ideology used in order to legitimate Umayyad rule, making prophethood and the caliphate parallel institutions, both initiated and implemented by God.

Words derived from the root kh.l.f have various meanings in Arabic. But if we focus on the meaning "to substitute" or "to replace," we notice that in the Qur'an, these actions are always associated with God: it is God that is replacing or bringing forth substitutes for individuals or peoples. In other words, the making—selecting, assigning, designating, creating, placing—of khalīfas in the Qur'an is the exclusive prerogative of God. The word khalīfa appears in the Qur'an twice (2:30 and 38:26), where God is explicitly said to make or have made a khalīfa. The two plural forms khalā'if and khulafā' occur in similar situations seven times. In all these instances, the verb used is ja'ala. However, none of these Qur'anic terms possesses a specifically political connotation, nor did early Muslim scholars in the Umayyad period equate the Qur'anic khalīfa with the head of the Islamic community; this had to wait until the tenth century, well into Abbasid rule.

This clearly indicates that the original meaning of the expression khalīfat Allāh was "replacement or successor placed by (the agency of) God," and not "vicegerent or deputy of God." The title indicated God's approval of the sovereign and God's support of his legitimacy.

Succession to Rule after Muhammad

Soon after the Prophet Muhammad's death in 632, leading Medinan Muslims met to discuss the leadership of the community. Some Meccan Muslims rushed to the meeting and ended any attempts to divide rule over the Muslims. In the spur of the moment, Abu Bakr was given a pledge of allegiance (bay'a) as the leader of the Muslim community. His election was formalized at the mosque of Medina, where he received the general allegiance of all present Muslims.

Before his death in 634, Abu Bakr designated 'Umar b. al-Khattab as his successor. The Muslim community did not in this case select their ruler but only endorsed the choice of Abu Bakr by making a pledge of allegiance to 'Umar. After he was critically stabbed in 644, 'Umar appointed a consultative council (shūrā) of six members that was to select one of its own as his successor. They chose 'Uthman b. 'Affan. After 12 years of rule, 'Uthman was killed in 656 by a group of Muslims after he refused their demands to abdicate or to accept deposition.

Medinan Muslims subsequently selected 'Ali as 'Uthman's successor. 'Ali was immediately cast in an impossible situation, between arresting or protecting some of his supporters who were implicated in the killing of 'Uthman. He moved his base from Medina to Kufa in Iraq and faced continuous civil strife. 'Ali was victorious at the Battle of the Camel; however, the Battle of Siffin against the governor of Syria, Mu'awiya, ended with an arbitration that led to a stalemate. As a result, a group splintered from 'Ali's camp, the Kharijis, whom 'Ali was forced to fight. He was eventually killed by one of them in 661.

The Kufans immediately elected 'Ali's son, Hasan, to succeed his father. This was the first time that a son succeeded a father as head of the Muslim community. But the Syrians had already elected Mu'awiya as sovereign, and Hasan relinquished his position to Mu'awiya in 661. Then, for the first time in the history of the Muslim community, a sovereign, Mu'awiya, designated a successor, his son Yazid, as his heir apparent during his lifetime. This designation was controversial, but its limited success, followed by Yazid's accession to the caliphate in 680, laid the foundation for hereditary rule. A few years later, Marwan b. al-Hakam (r. 683–85) was able to set up his family as the first Islamic dynasty.

Overall, there were two main methods of succession in the caliphates: by designation, which was the most common method, or by election, when a successor had not been designated. Designation was normally done by a testament ('ahd), when the heir apparent, normally of the age of majority, was called walī al-'ahd ("one in charge of safeguarding the testament," equivalent to crown prince); his appointment was binding on him and on the community and could not, in principle, be repealed. In the case of the Marwanids, all their rulers were nominated by their predecessors, with the exception of Marwan, the founder, Yazid b. al-Walid (r. 744), and Marwan b. Muhammad. On some occasions during the Abbasid period, the caliph was elected by a group of dignitaries when the previous monarch died without having designated a successor. But in the case of the Fatimids, succession was accepted solely through an explicit designation (naṣṣ) from the previous caliph/imam.

Several times during the Marwanid and Abbasid periods, the ruling monarch designated two successors simultaneously. This usually caused tensions within the ruling family that occasionally escalated into full warfare. Succession in the various caliphates was agnatic (i.e., restricted to males in the male line) and did not follow rules of primogeniture. In fact, there were no fixed regulations for the succession as any member of the ruling family had a theoretical claim to the throne. Although sons were favored, succession could pass on to a brother, a cousin, an uncle, or a nephew.

Once selected, the new caliph was procedurally given the bay'a, or oath of allegiance of the community. This was done through a handshake by the dignitaries of the town or province in which the caliph resided. Those in distant lands gave their allegiance through the governors of their respective districts.

The caliph was considered the leader of the Muslim community, just like the Prophet without the function of prophecy. As such, he was the judge and temporal authority in the realm, who appointed the members of his government, maintained order in society, defended the community against its enemies, and collected and distributed its wealth. But above all, he was the Muslims' religious leader who ensured the obedience of the community to the divine law. Thus he led the Friday communal prayer, the Friday sermon was held in his name, he led the Muslim armies in jihad, and he led the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. Under the Abbasids, he protected religion from innovations that departed from established practice; wore in public the Prophet's insignia, his cloak (burda) and scepter (qaḍīb); took up titles that emphasized his relation to God, like al-manṣūr ("one made victorious by God"); and identified himself as "God's power (sulṭān) on His Earth." Whatever religious duty he could not fulfill, he delegated to others to fulfill in his name. Whether he was an interpreter of the law is a more complicated question. Certainly the early caliphs, including the Rightly Guided Caliphs and the early Umayyads, played an active role in shaping and adding to the corpus of Islamic law. In early Abbasid times, the intellectual Ibn al-Muqaffa' proposed to the caliph Mansur (r. 754–75) that the caliph start, supervise, and play an active part in the construction of a unified code of Islamic law. Mansur, however, did not implement his proposal, and the development of the law remained the domain of religious scholars. This situation was confirmed further after Ma'mun's (r. 813–33) and his two successors' failure to impose their theological ideas on those scholars in the famous miḥna, or inquisition. The interpretation of the law since then remained outside the functions of the caliph.

Once a caliph acceded to power, there were no regulations in place that specified how he could be deposed. The issue is old, raised by the opponents of 'Uthman, as we have seen; both the Umayyads (except Yazid b. al-Walid) and the Abbasid caliphs implicitly believed that only God could remove them from power since it was He who placed them in power. But by the tenth century, it was legally stipulated that if the monarch lost his mental health or certain aspects of his physical fitness after his accession to power, then he should be deposed and replaced. Blindness in particular made one ineligible to accede to the throne. This rule existed already in the Roman and Sasanian empires as well as in the Latin-speaking kingdoms, and it led some political rivals to blind their opponents in order to make them ineligible to rule. Among Muslim caliphs, the first instances of this practice occurred in the tenth century, when several Abbasid monarchs were blinded by high-ranking officials in order to have them replaced: Qahir in 934, Muttaqi in 944, and Mustakfi in 946.

Theoretical Works on the Caliphate

Prior to the decline of the caliphal system in the tenth century, theoretical works on the caliphate were scarce, short, and almost accidental. During late Umayyad times, for example, the distinguished secretary 'Abd al-Hamid (d. 750), in defense of the Umayyads, expressed his vision of the caliphate as an institution parallel to, and succeeding, prophethood, with both institutions created by God and with the obligation of all Muslims to obey "God's caliphs" as they obey God and the Prophet. Under the Abbasids, the Hanafi jurist Abu Yusuf (d. 798) believed God to be the source of power but the imam is His vicegerent on Earth who must have sufficient resources to rule. And the Mu'tazili litterateur Jahiz (d. 869) believed the imamate was necessary due to the predatory nature of humans, but an impious ruler may be removed from power if the circumstances permitted that.

From the 11th century onward, theoretical works intensified among Sunnis with the resurgence of Sunnism under the Seljuqs and their successors. The most influential and authoritative of those works is Mawardi's (d. 1058) al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government). There the author considers the caliphate necessary on the basis of divine law, not of reason, giving the caliph alone the mandate to rule from God; it is his prerogative to delegate authority and lend legitimacy to the other members of his government (the vizier, the judge, etc.). The author discusses the requirements for being caliph, vizier, or judge and considers, due to the de facto deterioration of caliphal power, allowing more than one caliph under specific circumstances, validating the rule of usurpers, limiting caliphal power, and even—albeit unclearly—removing him from office. Ghazali (d. 1111) goes further. Although he asserts that the caliph was the supreme symbol of the divine law, he considers the rule of whoever holds actual political power as valid provided he received nominal recognition by the caliph. Writing after the Mongol invasion and the de facto end of the classical caliphal system, Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1348) reaffirmed the legitimacy of those who have actual power and did not even believe that they required legitimation from the caliph.

In the modern era, debates about the political and social meanings of the term "caliph" turned into a platform for Muslim intellectuals to debate the ideas of reform, constitutionalism, and the need to rethink Islamic political theory according to the needs of the modern age. Shah Waliullah (1703–62) separated the social from the political and believed in the existence of two types of caliphate: an outward caliphate (khilāfat al-ẓāhir), the political authority in charge of the superficial order, and an inward caliphate (khilāfat al-bāṭin), guarded by religious scholars and responsible for the social order. Usman dan Fodio (1754–1817), championing a program for political and social change, declared a jihad that led to the establishment of the Sokoto caliphate (in modern Nigeria) in 1806. The reformist Rashid Rida, in his al-Khilafa aw al-Imama al-'Uzma (The caliphate or the supreme leadership, 1922) called for a renewed Arab caliphate, in which the caliph needed to adapt Islamic law to the needs of modern life. In 1925, 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq, in his al-Islam wa-Usul al-Hukm (Islam and the principles of governance), caused great commotion with his call for the separation between temporal and religious power and his characterizing the Prophet's rule in Medina as being independent of his prophetic mission. The interest in the caliphate became a matter of urgent debate with its abolition under the secular regime established by Atatürk in Turkey in 1924, which resulted in the famous Caliphate Conference in Cairo in 1926 that attempted unsuccessfully to revive the caliphate.

In more recent times, some Muslim rulers took up the title amīr al-mu'minīn, not khalīfa, particularly the kings of Morocco and even the leader of the Taliban in Afghanistan. The use of the term khalīfa is nowadays rare, even among groups seeking the reunification of the Islamic community.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); imamate; Khilafat movement (1919–24); Mawardi (974–1058); Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935)

Further Reading

Khalil 'Athamina, "The Tribal Kings in Pre-Islamic Arabia: A Study of the Epithet Malik or Dhu al-Taj in Early Arabic Traditions," al-Qantara 19 (1998): 19–37; Aziz al-Azmeh, Muslim Kingship: Power and the Sacred in Muslim, Christian, and Pagan Polities, 1997; Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph: Religious Authority in the First Centuries of Islam, 1986; Fred M. Donner, "The Formation of the Islamic State," Journal of the American Oriental Society 106, no. 2 (1986): 283–96; Hamilton A. R. Gibb, "The Evolution of Government in Early Islam," Studia Islamica 4 (1955): 5–17; Ignaz Goldziher, "Du sens propre des expressions Ombre de Dieu, Khalife de Dieu pour désigner les chefs dans l'Islam," Revue de l'histoire des religions 35 (1897): 331–38; Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam, 1981; Bernard Lewis, Political Words and Ideas in Islam, 2008; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad: A Study of the Early Caliphate, 1997; Carlo Alfonso Nallino, Appunti sulla natura del "califfato" in genere e sul presunto "califfato ottomano," 1917; Rudi Paret, "Signification coranique de halīfa et d'autres dérivés de la racine halafa," Studia Islamica 31 (1970): 211–17; Wadād al-Qādī, "The Term 'Khalīfa' in Early Exegetical Literature," Die Welt des Islams 28 (1988): 392–411; Émile Tyan, Institutions du droit public musulman, 1957; W. Montgomery Watt, Islamic Political Thought: The Basic Concepts, 1968.

WADAD KADI AND ARAM A. SHAHIN

capitalism

Capitalism has been a particular preoccupation for Muslim intellectuals concerned about the place of Islamic values in the modern world. They have focused both on the transformative economic power of capitalism and on the radical political changes associated with it. This is scarcely surprising: throughout Asia and Africa, Muslims first experienced capitalism under European imperialism and the unequal global power that it brought into being.

The response to these developments was visible initially among Muslims who admired the productive power of capitalist enterprise but tried to tie it more closely to Islamic values. Thus Talaat Harb (d. 1941) founded Banque Misr, the only bank in Egypt at the time that was owned and run by Egyptians, as well as other major financial and industrial companies, such as Misr Insurance and Misr Textiles. Harb believed that capitalism could be put to the service of Egypt and Islam if Egyptian Muslims, rather than Europeans, were to control its main enterprises. Similarly, in Java the "virtuous capitalists" of the Sarekat Islam—an organization that began as a grouping of batik traders but became a campaigning political force with wider ambitions in the first quarter of the 20th century—called for a capitalist system owned by and serving the local, mainly Muslim, population of the region. Increasingly prominent in the debate, however, were those intellectuals who feared the effects of capitalism on Islamic values, regardless of where the ownership lay. This concern centered chiefly on the principles it embodied and thus on the impact that such a powerful system of wealth creation had on social life and specifically on Islamic society and sociability. The approaches were various but can be grouped into three distinct, although sometimes overlapping, trends.

There were those who drew chiefly on the classical rulings of fiqh (Islamic jurisprudence) relating to financial and commercial transactions. For them, it was the charging of interest, equated with ribā, that lay at the heart of capitalist enterprise and that directly violated explicit Qur'anic prohibitions. The Syrian religious intellectual Rashid Rida (d. 1935) and others like him throughout the 20th and 21st centuries drew on a long chain of jurisprudential authority to argue that ribā, as a direct contravention of God's command, made capitalism fundamentally at odds with an Islamic ethos. Nevertheless, there were those like Rashid Rida's own mentor, Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) in Egypt, who argued that ribā should be understood in the context in which it was being used—that is, the morally repugnant and socially harmful practice of pre-Islamic Arabia whereby interest on a loan was charged at such high rates that it could end in the enslavement of the debtor. It was the context, he asserted, that should determine whether it was a practice to be condemned. This opened up a debate about the term and its moral significance that continues to generate controversy, although the clerical consensus still leans heavily toward Rashid Rida's interpretation.

By the middle of the 20th century, distinctively Islamic critiques of capitalism had shifted their focus to embrace social criticism and political opposition. Writers like Mustafa al-Siba'i (d. 1964), Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966) in Egypt, Mawdudi (d. 1979) in Pakistan, Ayatollah Baqir al-Sadr (d. 1980) in Iraq, and Shaykh Muhammad al-Ghazali (d. 1996) not only criticized capitalism as a morally flawed economic system but also attacked it for the politics of inequality with which it was associated and the ideology of possessive individualism, which it promoted. By contrast, they championed a system that would encourage a return to Islamic values, represented not only by strict Islamic observance in all social and economic transactions but also by the primacy of public welfare and the values of "mutual social responsibility."

Thinkers like these helped to lay the groundwork for later debates as Muslims developed appropriate ways of responding not only to the doctrinal and moral repulsion of capitalism but also to its attractive material power. Thus a radical Islamist critique of capitalism developed, attacking those Muslims who had accepted the dominant global economy and the power it represented. Many of these writers and activists drew on the works of earlier thinkers such as Qutb, the Palestinian Taqi al-Din al-Nabhani (d. 1977), or 'Ali Shari'ati (d. 1977) in Iran, but they also developed their own vehement criticism of the inequality, injustice, and imbalance of world power that they saw in the capitalist system. This was taken up by those thinkers and activists linked to al-Qaeda, notably the Palestinian 'Abdallah 'Azzam (d. 1989), and the Egyptian Ayman al-Zawahiri, as well as by the radical Islamists Abu Bakar Ba'asyir in Indonesia and Maulana Abdul Aziz in Pakistan. Their condemnation of the United States has been combined with a vehement denunciation of all aspects of Western power, including the "world-devouring" power of capitalism. As the attack on the New York World Trade Center in 2001 demonstrated, if that power could not be defeated, it could be symbolically and violently challenged.

The latter part of the 20th century also witnessed efforts to create alternatives to capitalism intended eventually to generate equal power but grounded in Islamic principles. These took the form of the development of a field of "Islamic economics," which attempts to create models of economic growth and efficiency that draw heavily on the established field of positive economics but tries to infuse it with values and preferences compatible with Islamic principles. As an alternative system, it suffers from a lack of practical application. Even those states that stress their Islamic identities run their national economies in conformity with the rules of the global market.

More visible and more successful has been the emergence of Islamic banking as a distinct financial sector in the global economy, tentatively at first and then, after about 1990, with increasing confidence and a growing market share. The Islamic banks define themselves with reference to a strict but imaginative application of Islamic principles to financial practices. These involve not simply the avoidance of all interest-bearing transactions but also measures such as mushāraka (joint capital ventures) and muḍāraba (joint ventures between capital and enterprise), which had long been sanctioned by Islamic jurisprudence as legitimate ways of using capital productively. Although scarcely a challenge to capitalism as a system, the Islamic banks seek to put into practice, within the confines of successful financial institutions, principles that demonstrate that Islamic values are wholly compatible with the pursuit of profit.

See also economic theory

Further Reading

Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Maxime Rodinson, Islam and Capitalism, 1977; Charles Tripp, Islam and the Moral Economy: The Challenge of Capitalism, 2006; Ibrahim Warde, Islamic Finance in the Global Economy, 2009.

CHARLES TRIPP

censorship

Most broadly conceived, censorship is any action that seeks to control human expression through the application of power. Typically, censorship is enacted by a state, and nearly every government in the contemporary world practices some form of censorship. While censorship is frequently thought of as erasing information or stopping certain kinds of expression, such a deletion is more the result of censorship; the purpose of censorship is to control, not only to erase, information and expression.

Generally, in premodern Islamic history, the state was far too weak to police the speech and literary production of its many subjects. However, publicly insulting the Prophet (sabb al-rasūl) seems to have been considered a crime early on. We also occasionally hear of book burnings (e.g., the Almoravids' burning of Ghazali's [d. 1111] works), but these were all seemingly ad hoc and directed at specific, usually famous, targets. The best-known episode of inquisitorial activity, the miḥna (inquisition) inaugurated by the caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33), lasted for less than 30 years, revolved around a single issue, and targeted only men of religious learning or station.

This situation began to change with the advent of both stronger and more centralized state structures in the so-called gunpowder empires but especially in the Ottoman Empire and with the introduction of the printing press into the Muslim world. Presses for printing Hebrew, Armenian, and Greek books were active in the Ottoman Empire centuries before printing was permitted for books in Arabic or Turkish, which began fitfully in the mid-1700s. Newspapers began to appear in Turkish and Arabic in the early 1800s, and state censorship laws followed shortly thereafter. The first such act, the Printing Houses and Publications Act, was decreed in 1857 and established penalties for speech deemed seditious to the Ottoman state, morally contemptible, or slanderous. Censorship of printers went hand in hand with government subsidization, licensing of the presses, and the creation of official government censors. In Qajar Iran, a ministry of the press was formed in 1871 to oversee the censorship of the burgeoning Persian press. It was the 19th century that saw the beginning of censorship in the Muslim world as state surveillance and the control of all published speech.

This brief historical sketch contrasts markedly with the development of censorship in Europe. The printing press was adopted in the Muslim world much later than in Europe, and Islam never possessed a centralized, religious authority like the medieval office of the inquisitor in the Roman Catholic Church, which was charged with investigating and extirpating heretical writings. This is not to say that the premodern Muslim world enjoyed a unique freedom of expression but rather that the state was not the regulator of literary production. The limits of speech in the premodern Muslim world were determined more locally and informally by the reactions of an author's peer group and audience. In many cases, we might imagine that the punishment for transgressing social limits on speech was not exile or imprisonment but obscurity.

A case in point, the poems of Husayn b. al-Hajjaj (d. 1001) are not widely known today. Ibn al-Hajjaj's specialty was sukhf, poetry of the most obscene kind. A market inspector (muḥtasib) by day, he sometimes composed his scurrilous verses with some notable contemporary in mind and then proceeded to blackmail his victim, who would rather pay to keep the poem private than be made a laughingstock. Ibn al-Hajjaj reportedly made a fine living and never feared retaliation. In the modern period, however, the poetry of Ibn al-Hajjaj has never appeared in a published edition in the Muslim world due to censorship restrictions.

See also blasphemy; inquisition; media

Further Reading

Sinan Antoon, The Poetics of the Obscene: Ibn al-Ḥajjāj and Sukhf (PhD diss., Harvard University, 2006); Donald J. Cioeta, "Ottoman Censorship in Lebanon and Syria, 1876–1908," International Journal of Middle East Studies 10, no. 2 (1979); M. Şükrü Hanioğlu, A Brief History of the Late Ottoman Empire, 2008; Mona A. Nsouli, Censorship in the Arab World: An Annotated Bibliography, 2006; Amnon Raz-Krakotzkin, The Censor, the Editor, and the Text, 2007.

NICHOLAS G. HARRIS

Central Asia

Adjoining China, South Asia, the Middle East, and Russia, the region of Central Asia has throughout its history maintained extensive ties with its neighbors, and its political thought has developed in dialogue with them. The Mongol conquests of the 13th century integrated Central Asia into the neighboring world regions and left an enduring political legacy. For many centuries after Chingiz Khan (ca. 1160s–1227), descent from the Mongol ruler was the key to political legitimacy. Apart from showing military prowess and political acumen, leaders who aspired to head the khanate were expected also to observe Chingizid customs and legal norms (known as the Yasa) in addition to Islamic law. The Yasa validated the rights of ruling clans, rather than individuals, and gave greater weight to those claiming seniority. This mode of distributing authority contributed, in turn, to the consolidation of regional polities, a phenomenon reinforced by a physical geography that favored human settlement in a few oasis settings separated by stretches of desert. In the early 17th century, these centered on the towns of Balkh and Bukhara. Chingizid sources of legitimacy faltered during political crises in the early 18th century, and the rulers of small states based in Bukhara, Khiva, and Khoqand employed a variety of strategies to legitimize their autocracies. Celebrating their roles as conquerors, scholars, and Sufis, some did continue to highlight their descent from Chingiz Khan, but others presented themselves as pious defenders of Sunnism and the shari'a.

Russian conquest of the region between the 1860s and 1880s provoked a variety of political responses. Although some notables initially resisted or emigrated to China or Afghanistan (or were exiled by the tsarist military), most regional scholars, who were adherents of the Hanafi school of law, concluded that the tsarist regime's latitude toward Islamic rites, personnel, and institutions allowed Muslims to regard the territory of the governor-generalship of Turkestan as dār al-islām (the abode of Islam). Thus a great number of scholars arrived at various kinds of accommodation with the regime. Calls for jihad, for example, by a Sufi leader in 1898 in Andijan were short-lived and widely criticized by the majority of scholars. Focused on educational and cultural reforms, the modernist Jadid movement was an irritant to tsarist authorities, but it was only during World War I and the introduction of a plan to conscript Central Asian Muslims for labor battalions that communities began to abandon their quietist approach to politics and oppose state power on a broad scale.

The revolutions of 1917 in the Russian Empire and the civil war that ensued inaugurated new waves of migration and political fragmentation as locally based militias battled the Bolsheviks and the nascent Soviet state. Not all Muslim elites were hostile to the new regime, however, and a number of modernists saw in socialism and the state's commitment to national liberation aspirations that were compatible with their interpretations of Islam. For their part, the Bolsheviks sought out local partners to join the Communist Party and state apparatus. Central Asian elites participated in the delineation of the region into national republics (the Soviet socialist republics of Uzbekistan, Turkmenistan, Kyrgyzstan, Kazakhstan, and Tajikistan, which in turn belonged to the Union of Soviet Social Republics) and sought to shape policies aimed at consolidating national groups in the region. In the late 1920s and early 1930s, however, collectivization and antireligious campaigns, including an antiveiling campaign, mosque closures, censorship, and the arrest and assassination of clerics, spurred resistance and more emigration. Policies shifted again during World War II, opening up space for some kinds of Islamic practice. In 1943, the Soviets created the Central Asian Muslim Ecclesiastical Administration (Srednеaziatskoe dukhovnoe upravlenie musul'man). Staffed by clerics of the region and supported by voluntary donations, it encouraged obedience to Soviet authorities while calling for the reform of local ritual practices. Echoing the appeals of many modernist reformers, its fatwas (religious opinions) of the 1950s and 1960s condemned the veneration of local saints and shrines and the celebration of holidays such as the Prophet's birthday, insisting that these were contrary to the shari'a. They also targeted the payment of excessive bride-prices and dowries and criticized affiliation with Sufi groups or involvement in Sufi devotions.

In the late 1970s, some of these views overlapped with those of a group of young scholars known collectively as the Mujaddidi. Also hostile to many Sufi rituals, they criticized a number of influential but quietist Hanafi scholars who had taught clandestinely. Inspired in part by the Iranian Revolution (1978–79) and the Afghan jihad, they argued instead for the re-Islamization of society and the construction of an Islamic state. Some of these figures became politically active after Mikhail Gorbachev came to power in 1985 and supported an Islamic political party founded in 1989 in Russia: the Islamic Renaissance Party. Amid the chaotic collapse of the Soviet Union in 1991, young militants in the Ferghana Valley formed vigilante groups committed to administering Islamic justice, and in 1992 one of their leaders, Tohir Yo'ldoshev (1967–2009), openly challenged the authoritarian president of Uzbekistan, Islam Karimov (b. 1938), during a meeting in Namangan. When Tajikistan descended into civil war in 1992, a bloody conflict in which regional solidarity groups fought for control of the state and resources, a number of these activists, including Yo'ldoshev and Juma Namangoniy (1969–2001), escaped repression in Uzbekistan and joined the conflict in Tajikistan. In 1999, they founded the Islamic Movement of Uzbekistan (IMU) and issued publications from Taliban-ruled Afghanistan in which they lamented the oppression of the world's Muslims and faulted the United States and a global Jewish conspiracy for preventing the faithful from living in accord with Islamic law. The focus of IMU agitation was nonetheless on the government of Uzbekistan, which it accused of imprisoning and torturing the faithful. In rejecting the Karimov government as a despotic and infidel regime, Yo'ldoshev called for armed struggle under his close direction to overthrow the government and replace it with one based on Islamic law. Although the movement's leaders sought refuge in Afghanistan, they publically distanced themselves from Taliban rule and its association with Osama bin Laden (1957–2011). After American forces targeted IMU camps following September 11, 2001, however, IMU propaganda shifted. Despite the apparent death of the head of the group's militant wing, Namangoniy, in 2001, IMU militants led by Yo'ldoshev continued to be active in Afghanistan and in the Federally Administered Tribal Areas of Pakistan. IMU videos and other communications claimed that they had pledged loyalty to the head of the Taliban, Mulla Muhammad 'Umar. The United States claimed to have killed Yo'ldoshev in an air strike in Pakistan in 2009. Nonetheless, other Uzbek militant groups, including the Islamic Jihad Union, which broke off from the IMU in 2002, continued to operate in the Afghanistan-Pakistan borderlands.

In addition to these jihadist groups, a transnational organization, Hizb ut-Tahrir, became active in Central Asia from the early to mid-1990s. Probably first established in Uzbekistan, the movement spread to neighboring states, recruiting young men and women, including students, though it largely operated underground. Though anti-Semitic and critical of existing states, its campaign for a single state to unify all Muslims did not use violence. Hostile state policies and propaganda apparently broadened its appeal, and prisons seemed to play a key role in the expansion of its membership. Despite severe repression in Uzbekistan as well as Tajikistan, Hizb ut-Tahrir attracted between 20 and 100,000 members in the region. Since 2001 authoritarianism throughout Central Asia has intensified, and there remain few legal venues for independent political activity.

See also Afghanistan; Shamil (1797–1871)

Further Reading

Nicola Di Cosmo, Allen J. Frank, and Peter B. Golden, eds., The Cambridge History of Inner Asia: The Chinggisid Age, 2009; Adrienne Lynn Edgar, Tribal Nation: The Making of Soviet Turkmenistan, 2004; Allen J. Frank and Jahangir Mamatov, Uzbek Islamic Debates: Texts, Translations, and Commentary, 2006; Emmanuel Karagiannis, Political Islam in Central Asia: The Challenge of Hizb ut-Tahrir, 2010; Adeeb Khalid, Islam after Communism: Religion and Politics in Central Asia, 2007; R. D. McChesney, Central Asia: Foundations of Change, 1996.

ROBERT D. CREWS

charity

Charity has been an integral part of Islam's doctrinal and social fabric from the inception of the religion. In fact, almsgiving, or zakat, constitutes one of the Five Pillars of Islam. As many scholars have pointed out, even a cursory examination of the Qur'an suggests that the social context of early Islam strongly resembles an "economy of poverty." Qur'an 93:10 instructs the Prophet never to turn away a beggar, and a hadith report attributed to the Prophet instructs believers not to turn away a beggar even if he shows up riding a horse. Concern for the poor dominated economic thought and behavior during Islam's formative years.

Traditionally, there are two main categories of charity in Islam: zakat and ṣadaqa. Zakat is an obligatory form of giving that is due annually provided one meets certain benchmarks of accumulated wealth, including cash, property, livestock, or crops. Ṣadaqa is a voluntary charitable offering, the rendering of which signifies a Muslim's moral excellence and is a highly valued demonstration of his or her faith and practice in Islam. The waqf, or religious endowment, represents another major type of charity in Islam. Throughout Islamic history, rulers, high officials, and other individuals have used charitable endowments to build and support a variety of social and religious institutions such as public fountains, elementary schools, colleges of Islamic law, hospitals, and Sufi lodges.

Zakat is a tax on accumulated wealth that is owned for a year, usually of 1/40th or 2.5 percent of the total. One pays only if one's property has reached the minimum amount, termed niṣāb, and one's home and items of personal use are exempted. For cash, property, or livestock, the standard rate is 2.5 percent, so an owner of 40 camels or cows, for example, should give one as zakat. The rules for crops differ: 10 percent is to be paid for crops that do not require irrigation and 5 percent is to be paid for those that do. Zakat must be paid to deserving recipients or causes. Recipients must be devout Muslims of good moral conduct (at least not openly committing major sins), and most Shi'i authorities require that the recipients be Shi'is as well. Descendants of the Prophet may not receive zakat, apparently on the logic that it would not be in keeping with their honor and dignity to do so and would be a shame for the Muslim community. Recipients cannot be relatives of the donor whom the donor would be otherwise required to help or support. Recipients must be destitute or in need, which is defined as having funds insufficient to meet their basic needs for the year. Debtors, slaves who are trying to buy their freedom, and stranded travelers are also legitimate recipients of zakat. Zakat may also be used for public welfare, such as repairing roads or bridges, building mosques, or facilitating the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. It may also be used for jihad or the support of border warriors. Most jurists allow an agent who collects zakat to take his fee from the property collected.

A second type of zakat, termed zakāt al-fiṭr, or "the zakat of breaking the fast," is paid at the end of the month of Ramadan. The head of each household pays the equivalent of a substantial meal to the poor for each member of the household. The purpose is to allow the poor to celebrate the end of fasting. A similar form of charity occurs on the most important holy day of the Islamic calendar, 'Id al-Adha, or the Feast of Sacrifice. On the 10th day of the 12th month of the Islamic calendar (Dhu al-Hijja), synchronized with the rituals of the pilgrimage to Mecca, Muslims sacrifice an animal—most frequently a sheep throughout the Islamic world—and give away all or part of the meat to poor Muslims.

Twelver Shi'i charity is funded not only by zakat but also by khums, or "the fifth," which according to Shi'i authorities is a 20 percent tax on all legitimate income, after deductions for expenses of the individual and dependents, that should be paid to one of the leading Shi'i jurists. The funds gathered in this manner are spent on religious education, especially the centers of learning in Najaf and Qum; support of the needy among the descendants of the Prophet, who are not allowed to receive zakat; and other public welfare projects, such as building hospitals, paying disaster relief, and so on.

Charity has always been a prominent means for rulers in the Islamic world to gain the good will of their subjects and to establish and bolster political legitimacy. The construction and repair of religious monuments in the major cities of their realms or in holy places such Mecca, Medina, and Jerusalem have served as highly visible and effective propaganda. Support of the pilgrimage caravans, providing the ornate covering (kiswa) for the Ka'ba, and outfitting and supporting border warriors were regular means for rulers to advertise their piety and devotion. Some efforts, often through the establishment of endowments, involved more direct provision of facilities to the local populace, such as the construction of mosques, water fountains (sabīl), elementary schools (kuttāb) for teaching the basics of reading and writing as well as memorization of the Qur'an, and soup kitchens, or the refurbishment of houses of worship or provision of other additions or amenities for worshippers, such as oil lamps, rugs, and facilities for washing. Examples abound, but in contemporary times the huge Hassan II Mosque in Casablanca, completed in 1993 and funded primarily by public conscription, stands as a massive tribute to the late Moroccan monarch's dedication to Islam. Other endowed institutions, such as colleges of Islamic law (madrasas) and Sufi lodges (khānaqāhs), catered to a smaller group of the population but nevertheless were viewed as important acts of generosity because of the esteem accorded to those adept in the Islamic religious sciences, and premodern rulers often provided banquets and largesse for the religious scholars or for the public during Ramadan or on other holy days.

Zakat was the most venerated and widespread source of charity in Islam in premodern and remains so in contemporary times. Annually, Muslims in different parts of the world donate millions of dollars to charitable causes by way of zakat, in addition to income tax owed to governments. In countries such as Pakistan, for example, the zakat of Sunni bank account holders is deducted from the accounts at the banks, while Shi'i account holders are exempted, since the Shi'is believe that zakat must be given to a spiritual leader, an imam or his representative, or in the contemporary period one of the leading Twelver Shi'i jurists in Najaf or Qum. These charities and acts of philanthropy are in many places an informal process. Monies are rendered to local mosques, schools, soup kitchens, nurseries, hospitals, and other socially beneficial causes.

As in many other domains of ethical importance in Islam, the onset of modernity and its accompanying technologies of organization have presented both daunting challenges and exciting opportunities for Islamic charity. The major challenge confronting Islamic charity in the contemporary world is that of reconfiguring premodern categories and taxonomies of giving in relation to contemporary technologies and practices of philanthropy in the global economy. There is no shortage of enthusiasm for religiously motivated charity among Muslims around the world. However, much remains to be done to establish a robust system for the collection, monitoring, and distribution of funds generated through charity in a formally structured, cost-efficient, and socially productive fashion. A major part of the problem has to do with the informal mechanisms of giving that continue to dominate the landscape of Muslim charity. While informal networks of collecting and distributing philanthropic funds, such as within families or through local mosques, are highly effective means of cultivating community ties and solidarity, they are less effective in consolidating a centralized, institutionally grounded culture of charity that might propel more macro-level projects of social justice such as poverty alleviation and sustainable development. In order to channel the outstanding potential for philanthropic activity into the work of sustaining long-term projects of social justice, practices of Islamic charity must be ensconced in and supported by modern institutions, organizational structures, and technologies of philanthropy.

See also economic theory; endowment; Pillars of Islam; taxation

Further Reading

Michael Bonner, Mine Ener, and Amy Singer, eds., Poverty and Charity in Medieval Contexts, 2003; Yaacov Lev, Charity, Endowments, and Charitable Institutions in Medieval Islam, 2005; Adam Sabra, Poverty and Charity in Medieval Islam: Mamluk Egypt, 1250–1517, 2000; Amy Singer, Charity in Islamic Societies, 2008.

SHERALI TAREEN

China

According to the 2000 national census of China, Muslims total 20.3 million, or 2 percent, of the population. Since the census registers people by nationality, not religious affiliation, their precise number is still unknown, and other estimates can be as high as 100 million. A 2009 Pew survey and the CIA Factbook, however, both agree with the lower estimate in conformity with the census data.

Spanning the border between Eurasia and Central Asia, the Muslims of China have strong ties to both the East and Middle East, which were resumed, after half a century of self-imposed isolation, with the death of Mao in 1976 and Deng Xiaoping's "open door" policy in the 1980s. Non-Uighur Muslims travel fairly freely on the hajj to Mecca and engage in cross-border trade with coreligionists in Central Asia, the Middle East, and increasingly, Southeast Asia. There are few Han converts to Islam in China, yet Muslim population numbers have continued to increase, and there are more mosques now than before 1949. Many of the challenges the Muslims of China confront remain the same as they have been for the last 1,200 years of interaction with Chinese society, but others are new and reflect China's transformed and increasingly politicized society, especially the watershed events of the 9/11 terrorist attacks and the subsequent "war on terror."

Historically, most Muslims in China have been the people now known as "Hui." "Hui teaching" (Hui jiao) was the term once used in Chinese to indicate "Islam" in general and probably derives from an early Chinese rendering of the term for the modern Uighur people (Hui he). In 2000, their total number was given as 9.8 million. The other Muslim nationalities are Uighur (8.4 million); Kazakh (1.25 million); Dongxiang (513,805); Kyrgyz (160,823); Salar (104,503); Tajik (41,028); Uzbek (14,502); Bonan (16,505); and Tatar (4,890). The Hui speak mainly Sino-Tibetan languages. The Uighur, Kazakh, Kyrgyz, Uzbek, Salar, and Tatar are Turkic speakers, while combined Turkic-Mongolian speakers include the Dongxiang and Bonan, concentrated in Gansu's mountainous Hexi corridor. The Tajik speak a variety of Indo-Persian dialects.

With the exception of the Tajik minority, who follow Isma'ili Shi'ism, all Muslim nationalities in China are Sunnis, but they are divided by regional, linguistic, and ethnic differences. The Hui are generally the closest to the Han Chinese in terms of physical location and cultural accommodation, adapting many of their Islamic practices to Han ways of life, which often invited criticism from Muslim reformers. Because they speak a variety of Chinese dialects and have no common place of residence or ethnic history, the Hui are the only nationality in China for whom religion (Islam) is the primary marker of identity, but many secularized, or even Marxist, members of the Hui nationality may not actually practice Islam. Islamic factional struggles have begun to reemerge among China's Hui Muslims, however, dividing them internally, especially as increased travel to the Middle East prompts criticism of Muslim practices at home and exposes China's Muslims to new, often politically radical Islamic ideals.

The northwestern Muslim communities, especially the Uighur, were incorporated into Chinese society more recently as a result of Mongolian and Manchu expansion into Central Asia and were forced to reach social and political accommodations that have challenged their identities. The Uighur are perhaps the least integrated into Chinese society. Since 1980, the Chinese state has reported over 160 incidents of Uighur-related violence, mostly in the Xinjiang Uighur Autonomous Region. In July 2009, the largest and bloodiest civil riots in modern Chinese history took place in Urumqi, pitting Uighur Muslims against Han Chinese citizens.

It was not until 1760 that the Manchu Qing dynasty exerted full and formal control over the northwestern region, establishing it as their "new dominion" (Xinjiang), only to lose it barely 100 years later thanks to the Yakub Beg rebellion (1864–77) and growing Russian influence. The end of the Qing dynasty and the rise of Great Game rivalries between China, Russia, and Britain saw the region torn by competing loyalties and marked by two brief and drastically different attempts at independence: the short-lived proclamations of an "East Turkestan Republic" in Kashgar in 1933 and another in Yining (Ghulje) in 1944. Uighur sovereignty organizations are now based in many international cities, including Istanbul, Ankara, Almaty, Munich, Amsterdam, Melbourne, Toronto, London, and Washington, D.C. The independence of the former Soviet Central Asian Republics in 1991 has done much to encourage their hopes for an independent "East Turkestan," though the new, mainly Muslim Central Asian governments all signed protocols with China in the spring of 1996 that they would not harbor or support separatist groups. Despite their resistance to Chinese rule, the Uighur continue to be divided internally by religious conflicts (between Sufi and non-Sufi factions), territorial loyalties, linguistic discrepancies, commoner-elite alienation, and competing political loyalties. Islam is only one of several markers of Uighur identity, suggesting that Islamic fundamentalist groups such as the Taliban in Afghanistan (often glossed as "Wahhabiyya" in the region) will have only limited appeal among the Uighur. Few Hui support an independent Xinjiang, and the one million Kazakh in Xinjiang would have very little say in an independent "Uighuristan." Local support for separatist activities, particularly in Xinjiang and other border regions, is ambivalent at best given the economic disparity between these regions and their foreign neighbors, including Tadjikistan, Kygyzstan, Pakistan, and especially Afghanistan. Memories are still strong in the region of mass starvation and widespread destruction during the Sino-Japanese and civil war in the first half of the 20th century, including intra-Muslim and Muslim-Chinese bloody conflicts, not to mention the chaotic horrors of the Cultural Revolution. It is clear, however, that Uighur separatism and Muslim complaints regarding Chinese policy will have important consequences for China's economic development of the region.

See also Uighurs

Further Reading

Z. B. Benite, The Dao of Muhammad: A Cultural History of Muslims in Late Imperial China, Harvard East Asian Monographs, no. 248 (2005); J. Fletcher, Studies on Chinese and Islamic Inner Asia, edited by Beatrice Forbes Manz, 1995; D. C. Gladney, Dislocating China: Muslims, Minorities, and Other Subaltern Subjects, 2004; J. A. Millward, Eurasian Crossroads: A History of Xinjiang, 2007; S. Murata, Chinese Gleams of Sufi Light, 2000; F. S. Starr, ed., Xinjiang: China's Muslim Borderland, 2004.

DRU C. GLADNEY

chivalry

Chivalry is a medieval European phenomenon concerning the behavior of the chevaliers or knights that developed in feudal society. The ideal knight was not simply a mounted warrior but a warrior who had become a vassal to a monarch or lord. Through a ceremony of dubbing, the knight received equipment such as swords and weapon-girdles, gained title to property, and paid homage and owed fealty for the same. A contract regulated the ties between lord and vassal. On the moral plane, the values expected from the knight included the virtues of courage, honor, gentleness, courtesy, and, by and large, chastity.

Sporadic and disjointed vestiges of the practices, customs, and sentiments of chivalry have been found in Islamic lands in various periods. While some scholars have claimed to find the Islamic equivalent of European chivalry in knighthood (furūsiyya), a somewhat closer analogue exists in the institution of futuwwa (manliness). It is true that medieval Muslim authors referred to the Frankish knight as a fāris, or "mounted warrior," and used the same term to apply to his Muslim counterpart, but while the term fāris could refer to the valiant, the champion, the intrepid warrior, or one ideally endowed with the noble features of chivalry, it was a personal chivalry, without any precise code, initiation ceremonies, investiture, or accolade. These missing aspects were found in the institution of futuwwa. Already in the 19th century, Joseph von Hammer-Purgstall termed futuwwa, as practiced by the Abbasid caliph Nasir, "chevalerie arabe" (Arab chivalry) and excitedly announced that he had found the source of all European knighthood.

Islamic chivalry, like its European counterpart, did not emerge in the world by fiat or official decree but came into being during Nasir's reign as caliph (r. 1180–1225), the longest in the history of the Abbasid dynasty, through an organic process. His success in spreading his influence far beyond Baghdad and in winning back some of the lost respect and glamor of the caliph's office have been attributed in part to his clever approach toward independent futuwwa associations, which he managed to unite, reform, and bring under his control.

Futuwwa, a noun derived from fatā (young man), in all likelihood translated the older Persian jawānmardī (young-manliness) and denoted a complex of moral virtues comprising courage, generosity, liberality, hospitality, unselfishness, and the spirit of sacrifice, generally attached to an elaborate ceremony observed in certain organizations. It emerged gradually in the Abbasid period as a canon of social and moral principles. Heterogeneous social organizations throughout the central Islamic lands at different epochs have claimed adherence to futuwwa and cultivated its tenets and the ceremonial connected with it. Futuwwa came to embody the corporate ideal and standard rules of conduct of aristocratic clubs of pleasure-seeking youths, urban militias ('ayyārān, aḥdāth), Sufi brotherhoods, dervish orders, craft guilds, Persian gymnastic clubs, warriors for the faith (ghāzīs, mujāhids, murābiṭs), and certain brigands.

The divergent terms used in modern studies to designate the members of these organizations—vagabonds, drifters, stragglers, knights-errant, brigands, adventurers, bandits, scoundrels—show above all a failure to understand their true nature. 'Ayyār, shāṭir, fatā, and zarīf, all terms for brave and troublesome youth, are often used as synonyms, both as positive appellations and as abusive epithets, with no apparent distinction among them. At times of disturbance, the 'ayyārs are always ready to serve as auxiliary troops. They show group solidarity, are well organized, and enter the scene as an active arm of the popular masses in the city's quarters. When they act on the side of the central government, the official chronologists praise them as heroes and men of high morals, self-sacrifice, and valor; when they fight for opposing factions or defend local interests, they are disparaged as despicable and lawless bandits who show no respect for people's rights, honor, or property.

The presentation of the 'ayyārs varies according to time, place, and historical source. Classical Persian literature celebrates the 'ayyārs as national heroes who, in the mid-ninth century, brought the Saffarids to power, the first independent Iranian dynasty of the Islamic period, in a movement against social injustice. Arab and later Turkish governors in Iran, often foreign to their fiscal territories, only occasionally succeeded in manipulating and controlling the popular movements headed by the 'ayyārs. They did not have a defined long-term program for the management of towns and villages given to them as iqṭā', or fiefs, and left civic administration in the hands of the old civil servants. Their continual removal from office did not allow them to develop strong ties with the local residents. Tribal chiefs at the center of the empire often used their influence to determine the choice of governors and policies, and factionalism led to neglect of outlying cities and villages. The central government's weakness and lack of structure led organized bands of 'ayyārs to take the affairs of their communities into their own hands and act as governors and militia commanders. During the siege of Baghdad in the civil war fought between the two brothers Amin and Ma'mun in 809 to 813, the 'ayyārs defending the besieged city led a genuinely popular uprising. Because of their precarious situation as disorderly, antiestablishment militants who did not balk at plundering the property of the wealthy, the 'ayyārs had to secure support among the populace by backing local sentiments, avoiding damage to the property of the weak and needy, supporting the deprived, and respecting local women. The enterprises of these social bandits provided the impetus for a rich folkloric literature in Persian that elaborated and idealized the 'ayyārs' lifestyle and chivalrous values, including the 12th-century works Samak-i 'Ayyar (The exploits of Samak the bandit) of Faramarz b. Khudadad b. 'Abdallah Arrajani and Darab-nama or Qissa-yi Firuz Shah (The book of Darab, or the romance of Firuz Shah) of Muhammad b. Ahmad b. 'Ali Bighami. Here the 'ayyār is a clever and resourceful fighter with an elaborate code of honor who accompanies the prince in his quest for the love of his life and whose main activity is to rescue repeatedly the more or less inept prince from numerous pitfalls. This literature sponsors and glorifies the deeds of rebel 'ayyārs, keeping their gangs financially fit at the expense of the wealthy and terrorizing unpopular authorities at the same time.

A medieval Islamic type that overlaps both with the 'ayyār or fatā and with the European knight is the border warrior for the faith, termed mujāhid, murābiṭ, or ghāzī. In the early Islamic centuries, jihad became associated primarily with the constant border warfare conducted against the Christian Byzantines in eastern Anatolia, northern Syria, and northern Iraq, but it was also used to describe border warfare in the Andalus, the Caucasus, Transoxiana, and elsewhere. While the Abbasid caliphs had a duty to protect Muslim territories and to defend the frontiers from the assaults of non-Muslim invaders, in reality, their political and military power declined to such an extent that they left the pursuit of the jihad in the hands of local warlords. The *ghāzī*s—volunteer, freelance, and later organized warriors for whom the futuwwa code formed the ethical organizing principle—played a decisive role in the political expansion of Islam, conquering territories and establishing a number of small princely houses in Central Asia, Iran, and Anatolia prior to the foundation of the most successful of ghāzī states, the Ottoman Empire. Charged with religious zeal and the prospect of booty, numerous landless *ghāzī*s gathered together in massive military undertakings against the Byzantines. While the resemblance of the *ghāzī*s to Frankish knights is disputed, the existence of an organization and code of behavior among the *ghāzī*s led the historian Wilhelm Barthold to call them collectively "warrior guilds." Saladin, the Ayyubid sultan famed for his personal courage, resolution, generosity, and gallantry, is one ghāzī whose activity is of direct relevance to Muslim chivalry. According to European sources, Saladin actually entered the order of European knighthood, and his way of life was that of a true chevalier. He is often praised as a man of dignity and integrity whose oath was his bond and who followed a firm moral framework, and he is still considered a paragon of chivalry. Nevertheless, though he was a warrior for the faith par excellence, nowhere he is referred to as a fatā or in possession of futuwwa.

From the early ninth century onward, the futuwwa ideal is documented as a dominant form of ideological and ceremonial orientation in Sufi organizations as well. The affiliation of the two was probably most prevalent in border garrison towns, where *ghāzī*s and Sufis seeking salvation in holy war mixed. A theoretical distinction was made between al-jihād al-aṣghar (the lesser holy war, or war against the infidels and the enemies of the faith) and al-jihād al-akbar (the greater holy war, or the struggle against passion and worldly desires, considered to be the more difficult of the two). This marked the division between the mystic Sufi and the warrior ghāzī. Sufi authors began to formulate what they understood as "spiritual chivalry" in treatises titled Kitab al-Futuwwa (The book of chivalry), Risala fi al-Futuwwa (The epistle on chivalry), and so forth.

The conservative Hanbali jurist Ibn al-Jawzi (d. 1200), while decrying the widespread influence of the *'ayyār*s in Baghdad of his day, described them in some detail. Belonging to futuwwa organizations, they would steal people's property while hypocritically intoning that a true fatā does not lie, fornicate, or violate the privacy of women but rather strives to preserve their honor and reputation. They swore an oath to uphold the futuwwa code, abstained from excessive food and drink, and donned special trousers (sarāwīl), parallel to the patched garment (muraqqa'a) of the Sufis. If a rumor spread about the misconduct of a sister or wife of a fatā, they would kill her without verifying the truth of the matter. In August 1137, the terrorism of the *'ayyār*s under the leadership of Ibn Bukran and Ibn al-Bazzaz, who planned to issue coinage in their own name, assumed such proportions that the prefect of Baghdad, the sharif Abu al-Karam, had his nephew Abu al-Qasim infiltrate their association, being girded and granted futuwwa trousers by Ibn Bukran. Only the intervention of the vizier brought the disturbances to a halt, and Ibn Bukran and Ibn al-Bazzaz were killed.

Nasir's reform program sought to bring as many of these assorted fraternities as possible under his direct control and ended up unifying them, causing them to flourish and giving them a legitimacy that would live on for several centuries. Nasir was initiated into the futuwwa in 1182, three years after he had acceded to the caliphate, donning the futuwwa trousers in a ceremony conducted by the Hanbali 'Abd al-Jabbar b. Yusuf, the head of the futuwwa organization. 'Abd al-Jabbar drafted the official futuwwa code, and Abu 'Ali b. al-Dawami, the naqīb, or syndic, of the futuwwa, expounded the code further in terms of noble virtues and civil manners (makārim al-akhlāq) so that everybody could understand and follow them. 'Abd al-Jabbar also gave public lectures on the subject, promoting gallantry and courtesy. He preached that futuwwa was an ancient tradition limited neither to a particular time or place nor to a particular national, religious, or social group. Non-Muslims could enter the futuwwa organization, though they could not become full members without conversion to Islam. In 1207, Nasir abrogated the older futuwwa and placed himself as its qibla (the source of orientation and guidance), centralizing the organization and concentrating authority in himself. By adopting explicit regulations and an elaborate ceremony of initiation comparable with those of knighthood, recruiting the wealthy and powerful as well as the urban middle class, and encouraging Muslim princes far and near to make similar efforts under his aegis, Nasir transformed the futuwwa into an instrument of social cohesion. Some 15 princes from Egypt, Syria, Anatolia, Iran, and elsewhere, including Saladin's brother al-Malik al-'Adil and his son al-Malik al-Zahir Ghazi, responded to his call. The Rum Seljuq rulers of Anatolia remained members of the futuwwa order for generations after Kay Ka'us II (r. 1246–60) was initiated in Konya by Nasir's personal advisor, Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi, which led to the rapid spread of the Akhi brotherhoods in Anatolia. Nasir's reorganization of the futuwwa thus proved to be of enduring importance for the history of Islam.

The futuwwa continued to play a pivotal role in the internal politics of the central Islamic lands until the early 20th century. They were involved in countless social and political upheavals, incidents of factional or sectarian strife, and fighting between different city quarters. When the Mongols invaded Iran under Hulagu, the *'ayyār*s were the only unified armed bands that showed effective resistance and succeeded in influencing Mongol policies toward the conquered territories. They played a considerable role in the history of Syrian towns, in particular Damascus and Aleppo. They were the military spearheads of the urban artisan corporations, and their chief, termed naqīb, shaykh, or ra'īs, was often one of the most influential personages in the community, though the notables of the towns generally lacked the opportunity to take political initiative against the central government. The ʿayyārs and fatās of Iran and Baghdad and the Akhis of Anatolia played analogous roles in the politics of their communities.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); brotherhoods; ghāzī; Sufism

Further Reading

Gerard Salinger, "Was the Futūwa an Oriental Form of Chivalry?" Proceedings of the American Philosophical Society 94 (1950); Franz Taeschner, Zünfte und Bruderschaften im Islam: Texte zur Geschichte der Futuwwa, 1979; Mohsen Zakeri, Sāsānid Soldiers in Early Muslim Society: The Origins of ʿAyyārān and Futuwwa, 1995.

MOHSEN ZAKERI

Christian-Muslim relations

Narratives on both sides of Christian-Muslim relations traditionally emphasize distrust, fear, polemics, and military expansionism. Yet as historian Richard Bulliet has shown, this discourse of confrontation (popularized in the 1990s as "the clash of civilizations") obscures the reality of long periods of trade and cultural exchange. In fact, Bulliet coins the term "Islamo-Christian civilization," arguing that these "fraternal twins" expanded into new territories at about the same time, with Christians facing the more daunting challenge of evangelizing mostly polytheists in northern and eastern Europe and Muslim caliphs seizing lands previously Christian, Jewish, or Zoroastrian. Other parallels abound: they both experienced the emergence of a distinctively religious leadership in the ninth and tenth centuries; Sufi brotherhoods and the great Catholic orders like the Franciscans and the Dominicans began to expand in the 13th century; the great Christian theologians like Thomas Aquinas and the leading scientists of Europe were propelled forward in their work through the translations of countless Arabic manuscripts brought from Spain, Sicily, and elsewhere.

However, these observations by no means overlook the wounds in the Muslim psyche—namely, the Crusades and Western colonialism. Although the Crusades had limited military and geopolitical impact at the time, they remain etched in the Islamic imagination to the point that the word "crusade," used by U.S. president George W. Bush in connection with the 2001 military campaign in Afghanistan, instantly stirred up anger throughout the Muslim world. To many Muslims then and now, the brutal massacre of Muslims, Jews, and local Christians in the taking of Jerusalem in 1099 came to epitomize the Crusades as a whole. Then came the shock of the three great premodern empires of Islamdom in the 18th century—the Ottomans, Safavids, and Mughals—slowly run over by an aggressive Western military, technological, and cultural powerhouse. And finally, Muslims generally perceived that the flood of missionaries into their lands were part and parcel of the overall colonial strategy.

The postcolonial period has been marked by unprecedented efforts at dialogue in three phases. A monumental shift occurred in the Catholic Church in 1962 with the Vatican II document Nostra Aetate, which recognizes that Muslims share in the Abrahamic worship of the one God and mentions their rituals with great respect. In 1970, the World Council of Churches set up a vigorous program of Muslim-Christian dialogue. Finally, with the attacks of September 11, 2001, on U.S. soil and those that followed elsewhere, the initiative shifted to the Muslim side. Momentum for Islamic unity began to build with the Amman Message issued by King Abdullah II of Jordan and the following international conferences, resulting in 2006 in a far-reaching consensus on the issue of who is a Muslim, a condemnation of takfīr (declaring another Muslim an apostate), and clear guidelines as to who is authorized to issue fatwas (legal opinions). This movement then issued a document in October 2007 ("A Common Word," based on Q. 3:64) addressed to the Pope and all Christian leaders that stated that the core beliefs of Christians and Muslims are love for God and love for neighbor. World peace, it said, is predicated on Muslims and Christians committing to fraternal dialogue and bold cooperation. A climate of mistrust on both sides, however, fanned by regional conflicts and political considerations, has continued to challenge religious leaders' attempts to transmit this spirit of dialogue to the masses.

See also Crusades; minorities

Further Reading

Richard Bulliet, The Case for Islamo-Christian Dialogue, 2004; Hugh Goddard, A History of Muslim-Christian Relations, 2000; David L. Johnston, Earth, Empire, and Sacred Text: Muslims and Christians as Trustees of Creation, 2010; David A. Kerr and Stephen R. Goodwin, World Christianity in Muslim Encounter: Essays in Memory of David A. Kerr, 2009; Frederick Quinn, The Sum of All Heresies: The Image of Islam in Western Thought, 2008; Ataullah Siddiqi, Christian-Muslim Dialogue in the Twentieth Century, 1997; Miroslav Volf, Ghazi bin Muhammad, and Melissa Yerington, eds., A Common Word: Muslims and Christians on Loving God and Neighbor, 2010.

DAVID L. JOHNSTON

citizenship

Citizenship is a modern Western notion that does not fully fit into political interpretations of Islam. The modern perception of citizenship as a relationship between the state and the individual ignores the importance of group identity in both classical and modern notions of citizenship in Islam. In classical Islam, one's rights and duties in relation to the state were defined by one's religious affiliation. A similar situation exists in many contemporary Muslim states that claim an Islamic government, such as Iran, Pakistan, and Saudi Arabia. Individuals relate to the state based on whether they are Muslim or non-Muslim. This emphasis on a corporate identity derives from the classical emphasis on the umma, or the Muslim community, and the notion of the ahl al-kitāb (People of the Book), or religious minorities recognized by Islam and often referred to as *dhimmī*s. The rights and duties of each of these groups were different, and usually only Muslims were allowed full participation in the state.

The role of nationalism in Islamic perceptions has been an important factor since the development of nationalism in Europe in the 18th century. However, for both classical Islam and many modern Muslim thinkers, such as Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) and Mawdudi (1903–79), the notion of citizenship does not necessarily depend on one's relationship to the state but rather to Islam itself. The focus on the umma allows for a transnational emphasis on Muslim citizenship. Mawdudi tried to emphasize this approach by claiming that in areas that are considered dār al-islām (abode of Islam), a Muslim is a citizen by virtue of the fact that he or she is part of the Muslim umma and not by birth in that country.

The notion of citizenship based on one's identity as a Muslim has an important impact on non-Muslims living in Muslim lands. Traditionally, the relationship of *dhimmī*s to the government is contractual; they are given rights and freedoms as citizens of the state based on their political submission to the Islamic state. While there is much debate over the status of *dhimmī*s in Islam, it is clear that their position as citizens is different from, and inferior to, that of Muslims. At times, this has led to a state of what might be called partial citizenship for non-Muslims. In Muslim countries that define themselves as Islamic states, the political rights of non-Muslims are shaped by their religious identity.

This view of citizenship as based on membership in the Muslim community also affects Muslims living in non-Muslim lands. In debates over how Muslims should relate to their country of residence and its government, some groups advocate complete separation from their non-Muslim host society, since the government is not based on shari'a (Islamic law). Others, such as the Swiss Muslim intellectual Tariq Ramadan (1962), have argued for full civic and political participation by Muslim citizens of Western countries.

See also civil society; democracy; individualism

Further Reading

Sayyid Abul A'la Mawdudi, The Islamic Way of Life, http://www.al-islamforall.org/books_Detail.aspx?book_Id=000073; Tariq Ramadan, Western Muslims and the Future of Islam, 2004; Nawaf A. Salam, "The Emergence of Citizenship in Islamdom," Arab Law Quarterly 12, no. 2 (1997); Eliz Sanasarian, Religious Minorities in Iran, 2000.

JENNIFER MITCHELL

city

The original model for the Islamic city is Medina, Madīnat al-Nabī (the City of the Prophet) or simply al-madīnah (the city), the name by which the city of Yathrib became known after the Prophet Muhammad and his followers settled there in 622, having fled Mecca, their hometown, in the hijra (emigration). At that point, the movement based on the Prophet's mission also acquired a political character. The term madīna implies a change in the sociopolitical structure of tribal society and the establishment of a multireligious and multiethnic society (umma) defined through a written legal document that has been called the Constitution of Medina. This document, drafted as a result of negotiations between the involved parties, was binding on all affected groups, thus ensuring political unity and social stability. Moreover, it defined the borderlines for the city, which it termed a haram (inviolate precinct), ensuring the territorial integrity of the sociopolitical union. Thus the hijra and establishment of the umma marked a new phase in the sociopolitical life of Muslims and initiated a social project based on religious, cultural, and legal autonomy.

As the Islamic state expanded into an empire, it came to incorporate many major preexisting cities, but at the same time the garrison towns (amṣār), established in the wake of conquests, including Kufa and Basra in Iraq and Fustat in Egypt, provided another model for Islamic cities, which were developed after the urban model of the Arabian Peninsula. In general, these settlements were founded on the outskirts of major cities or settled areas and at the edge of the desert, where Arab armies had a decided advantage. They were organized on a grid, with specific quarters or neighborhoods assigned to military units based on tribe or clan. However, the amṣār rapidly transformed into principal cities of the main empire, which shows that establishing urban foundations was a state policy in the earliest phases of the conquests. Analytical studies of Islamic cities show that there are three Islamic factors that motivate processes that yield an "Islamic" city. First is a distinction between members of the umma and outsiders. Second, this distinction is reflected through the spatial organization of distinctive neighborhoods. The third factor, a result of the first two, is a legal system that does not enforce common regulations on the different neighborhoods. Rather, it is a flexible system in which legal decrees are a product of negotiations about the mutual rights of the involved parties. These characteristics actually reflect the organization of Medina, described earlier.

Perhaps the most salient distinctive feature of Islamic cities was the close connection between the commercial bourgeoisie (merchants, craftsmen, and landowners) and the 'ulama' (religious scholars), which in turn affected the relationship between the central government and settled urban society. The bourgeoisie and the 'ulama' provided an urban leadership that shared an interest in a peaceful, stable, and prosperous urban life. Their relationship to the central government or ruler is not clearly defined because of the absence of formal political institutions; the city was not a legal entity, as it often was in medieval Europe. However, urban leaders could exercise independent power by mobilizing urban forces to put pressure on the ruler. Sometimes, a strong government would rule in close affiliation with the urban leadership, while other times, urban leaders and notables would protest or even rebel against a government that did not share their interests. In terms of spatial organization, a typical Islamic city was divided into roughly four parts. First was the citadel, often located on some natural defense work, such as the city of Aleppo, which has a natural tell, or archeological mound, dominating the countryside around it. Second was the royal city or quarter, usually in the form of a compound including the royal palace, administrative offices, and barracks for guard personnel. The royal quarter was established either by being implanted in an already existing urban gathering or by being founded on new soil around which an urban conglomeration later grows. In times of political instability, the compound was sometimes placed in the citadel itself for the sake of defense. Third was a "central urban complex," which included mosques; the central markets, the organization of which reflected strict professional specialization; and caravansaries, combinations of inns and warehouses that played a central role in international trade in the Islamic world. Another important feature of the urban complex was the educational institutions that started to flourish in the ninth century by the establishment of the House of Wisdom (Bayt al-Hikma) in Baghdad. The center was originally established by the caliph al-Ma'mun to translate awā'il sciences (pre-Islamic sciences such as Greek, Indian, and Persian sciences) into Arabic. With the flourishing of Islamic civilization, the center turned into a scientific academy that housed scholars and scientists from different parts of the globe. Later, other scientific academies were established in other cities such as Dar al-'Ilm in Cairo. The institutions of higher learning developed most in the second half of the 11th century with the establishment of a chain of colleges (madrasas), which integrated the study of natural, philosophic, and religious sciences, in Baghdad, Naishapur, and other cities. Rulers established and supported educational institutions as well as hospitals, which spread throughout different cities. Both education and hospitalization were funded by Muslim waqf (pious endowment) and thus they offered free services for the public, which transformed Islamic cities into a cosmopolitan haven. Islamic institutions acquired prestige and strength, which endowed urban life with a stable framework. Rulers' acts could be legitimated by the 'ulama', and communal action would take place through religious institutions. The royal foundation and patronage of such prominent urban institutions through the legal instrument of pious endowment thus played a central role in political propaganda and the establishment of legitimate rule. The proximity between religious and commercial buildings reflected the alliance between the 'ulama' and bourgeoisie and directly affected the urban life of the Islamic city. The last and fourth part of the Islamic city was a center of residential quarters, which comprised autonomous quarters of different ethnic and religious groups. Quarters were represented by local chiefs who acted as leaders when the government was weak and as subordinates under strong governments.

Muslim philosophers, inspired by Greek political philosophy and Islamic ethics, addressed the city in theoretical terms. Drawing on Plato's Republic, the tenth-century thinker Farabi (d. 950) described the city as a union of different communities whose various functions are integrated to fulfill the purpose of their union. The concept of the city is predominant in Farabi's political theory, for he considered it to represent the smallest form of a complete association and the basic unit of a perfect society. By "complete" association, Farabi meant one that was self-contained, unlike a household or a village, which is too small to fulfill that purpose. The perfect city is one whose people cooperate for the things by which true felicity can be attained. The structure of the perfect city is like that of the sound, healthy body whose different limbs and organs cooperate to make its life perfect and preserve it in that state. Through this analogy, Farabi implies that a single person cannot reach perfection and attain happiness without mutual cooperation within an organized community. Similar to the moral life of individuals, the fashioning of the city-state is not involuntary but dependent on whether will and choice are directed toward the true good.

In the modern period, the fates of traditional Islamic cities have varied. The French colonial practice of building their administrative center, termed ville nouvelle, outside the major cities and physically separated from them has led to the preservation of the old city, termed madīna, on the one hand and to a sharp social and economic division between the two on the other. In Fez, Morocco, for example, the walls surrounding the old city remain intact, along with the original gates, streets, and alleyways, and it is a car-free urban area within the city walls. This may be contrasted with Cairo, where in the late 19th century the old walls were torn down in many places, broad thoroughfares were run through entire old quarters, and little separation was maintained between the old and the new, after the fashion of Baron Haussmann's renovation of Paris. Especially in the 20th century, the Islamic world witnessed tremendous urban growth; immigration from rural areas rose sharply, while birth rates remained very high in most areas of the Islamic world and have only begun to decline in recent decades. The result has been sprawling, overcrowded metropolises such as Cairo and Tehran, in which both the infrastructure and the local economy have been severely strained. In many of the oil-producing nations such as Saudi Arabia and Kuwait, the tremendous returns on oil from World War II until the present have financed the construction of modern cities, either entirely dwarfing earlier settlements or building where nothing existed before, with limited roots in Islamic tradition. Capital cities remain primary sites of political propaganda in the Islamic world, often expressed in the construction of both secular monuments, such as Gamal Abdel Nasser's Cairo Tower, and religious monuments, such as the Hassan II Mosque in Casablanca. In the year 2011, the capital cities were transformed into major sites of people's protests against oppressive regimes.

See also bureaucracy; city (philosophical)

Further Reading

Janet Abu-Lughod, "The Islamic City—Historic Myth, Islamic Essence, and Contemporary Relevance," International Journal of Middle East Studies 19, no. 2 (1987); C. E. Bosworth, Historic Cities of the Islamic World, 2008; A. H. Hourani and S. M. Stern, eds., The Islamic City: Colloquium, 1970; Seyyed Hossein Nasr, Science and Civilization in Islam, 1968.

KATRIN JOMAA

city (philosophical)

In the tenth century, Muslim philosophers introduced the concept of the excellent city (al-madīna al-fāḍila), a utopian perfect polity created for the purpose of guiding its inhabitants toward perfection and felicity (typically understood as a conjunction [ittiṣāl] with the Active Intellect [the active principle of understanding that is an emanation of God] and separation from matter) and ruled by a single philosopher (also known as a sage) or by a group of them. All descriptions of the excellent city found in Islamic thought are based on Plato's Republic (in particular, books V and VII–IX). The best known philosophers who discuss this issue are Farabi, the Brethren of Purity, and Ibn Rushd (Averroes). The description of the perfect city given by Farabi in his Principles of the Opinions of the Inhabitants of the Excellent City (Mabadi' Ara' Ahl al-Madina al-Fadila) is by far the most important. According to Farabi, the inhabitants of the excellent city assist each other to obtain true (i.e., intellectual) felicity. The city resembles a body whose parts assist each other in perfecting and protecting the life of the animal. The ruler of the city relates to the inhabitants as the heart relates to other bodily parts. The inhabitants of the city are ranked in accordance with the distance between them and the ruler. Those closest to the ruler possess qualities that allow them to pursue his objectives directly, while the lower ranks pursue the objectives of those above them and thus indirectly those of the ruler. While the inhabitants of the city differ from one another in their innate natures (fiṭra), which is why different kinds of people perform tasks that are suitable for them, they become perfected (within the limits of their own natures) through acquired voluntary habits (al-malakāt al-irādiyya) such as crafts and arts.

The ruler of the city must possess the acquired intellect (al-'aql al-mustafād) by means of which he communicates with the Active Intellect, and his imaginative faculty must also be perfect. When the Active Intellect infuses his passive intellect with the knowledge of universals, such a ruler becomes a philosopher and, owing to the infusion of his imaginative faculty with the knowledge of particulars, also a prophet and warner (mundhir; of the punishment in the hereafter). A ruler who possesses all the aforementioned qualities is called "the true king" (al-malik fī al-ḥaqīqa). If, however, at a certain time no one is qualified to be a true king, the city must be ruled by the traditional king (al-malik bi-l-sunna)—one who does not issue new laws but preserves those issued by the previous leader or leaders. Although all inhabitants of the city share the same beliefs, seeking happiness, only a tiny minority—the philosophers—can establish the veracity of these beliefs by demonstrative proofs (proofs that consist of a chain of syllogisms). The majority—the common believers—know them only through their likenesses (muthul)—namely, imitations (muḥākāt) of their intelligible forms. These likenesses that exist in their imagination differ from one another in their degree of perfection and particular characteristics, which leads to differences of opinions among the inhabitants of different excellent cities.

There are also nonexcellent cities. Philosophers discuss a variety of them, but there are two main types: the ignorant city (al-madīna al-jāhila) and the sinful city (al-madīna al-fāsiqa). The inhabitants of the ignorant city have incorrect conceptions of happiness and adhere to corrupt practices. The inhabitants of the sinful city share the sound beliefs of the inhabitants of the excellent city but engage in the corrupt actions of the inhabitants of the ignorant city.

The Brethren of Purity (Ikhwān al Ṣafā', who wrote their treatises somewhere in the tenth century) discuss the issue of the philosophical city in the 48th epistle of their encyclopedia, titled "On the manner of mission on behalf of God" (Fī Kayfiyyati Da'wat ila Allah). As they address their epistles not to fellow philosophers (as Farabi did) but instead to a wider and less sophisticated audience, their account is simplified and more popular. They urge their followers to assist each other and to unite their bodily and spiritual powers in order to build an excellent and virtuous spiritual city (madīna fāḍila rūḥānīyya), "the refuge of spirits" (ma'wāt al-arwāḥ), in the country of the "Greatest Trusted One" (al-nāmūs al-akbar), in other words, the angel Gabriel. The inhabitants of this city must be a tribe of pious, wise, and virtuous men, discerning the affairs of the souls and their states. The city must rest on the foundations of sincerity (ṣidq) and the fear of God (taqwā) and must be supported by the pillars of fidelity (wafā') and trust (amāna), the ultimate goal of its existence being eternal bliss (which consists of the separation from the world of generation and corruption).

The inhabitants of the city are divided into four ranks: craftsmen, chiefs (managers and administrators), rulers (those who command and forbid), and divines (the possessors of volition [mashī'a] and will [irāda]). The craftsmen must possess a purified soul, excellent receptivity, and a quick wit. These qualities are provided by the intellective faculty, which discerns the meanings of sensible affairs and typically develops by the age of 15. The possessors of this rank are referred to as "the merciful [and the] righteous" (al-abrār al-ruḥamā'). The chiefs, in turn, must possess a generous soul and take care of the brethren with compassion and mercy, employing the philosophical faculty, which develops by the age of 30. The possessors of this rank are called "the virtuous [and] pious" (al-akhyār al-fuḍalā'). The rulers must possess authority of command and prohibition and be able to eliminate obstinacy and resistance in a subtle and friendly way. This ability is provided by the legislative faculty (al-quwwa al-nāmūsiyya), which develops by age 40. The possessors of this rank are called "the noble [and the] virtuous" (al-fuḍalā' al-karrām). Finally, the divines must embody a complete submission to God, receiving in return His support and the ability to witness Him. This ability is given by the angelic faculty, which develops by age 50. This division is based on the seventh book (537c–540c) of Plato's Republic.

Ibn Rushd deals with the issue of the philosophical city in his commentary on Plato's Republic (which survives only in Hebrew translation). He identifies the philosophical city with the perfect Islamic state based on the shari'a. The city is ruled by the philosopher, because happiness can be achieved only through theoretical knowledge (however, no mention of his conjunction with the Active Intellect is made). The ruler-philosopher, who is also king, legislator, and imam, presents the elite with demonstrative arguments but addresses the common people with persuasive and poetical ones. His duty is to create and maintain an administrative hierarchy that would perfectly reproduce the natural hierarchy among the moral virtues and practical arts, all of which exist for the sake of perfecting theoretical virtues.

See also Brethren of Purity; al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); Ibn Rushd (1126–98), Isma'ilis; philosopher-king; philosophy; utopia

Further Reading

Averroes, Averroes on Plato's Republic, edited and translated by Ralph Lerner, 1974; Charles E. Butterworth, The Political Aspects of Islamic Philosophy, 1992; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought (God's Rule), 2004; Abu Nasr al-Farabi, Mabadi' Ara' Ahl al-Madina al-Fadila, 1989; Ralph Lerner and Muhsin S. Mahdi, eds., Medieval Political Philosophy: A Source Book, 1963; Richard Walzer, ed. and trans., Al-Farabi on the Perfect State, 1985.

YANIS ESHOTS

civil society

During the 1990s, civil society became a popular conceptual tool for studying democratic transformations within the Muslim world. Civil society was portrayed as the icon of democracy, where not only associations, unions, and parties but also clubs and less formal groups were formed and mediated the relations between citizens and state authorities. In the post–cold war era, civil society provided social scientists with an ecumenical paradigm of political development that could satisfy both the residual supporters of modernization theory and its opponents. A more sobering view of the concept requires exploring the extent to which the idea of civil society is the outcome not only of the specific modern history of the West but also of its relations with "the rest," first and foremost the Muslim world.

The perhaps too-optimistic use of the notion of civil society in the 1990s was shared by the social movements that brought about the collapse of the authoritarian regimes in Eastern Europe. This mood spilled over to the Muslim world and furthered hopes for democratization in face of the perpetuation of various types of autocratic and sometimes pseudodemocratic regimes variably associated with ongoing neoliberal globalization. In the process, Muslim responses to oppressive state systems took a more nuanced view of the relationship between the ideas and practices of civil society and democratic transformations. The original European model of civil society, as elaborated by the Scottish Enlightenment, laid a primary stress on the individual agent who knows his own interest and possesses a capacity to act autonomously while sharing a sense of affection and sympathy toward other individuals. Against this streamlined model, a more inclusive notion highlights the value-setting power of human beings' capacity to transcend the satisfaction of material necessities through dynamics of passionate interaction and interested cooperation.

In light of these developments, which occurred within continental social theory, civil society appears overstretched as a concept if it is mainly intended to cover the civil power of autonomous social ties. It also risks oversimplifying the dimensions of collective action, which are not rooted in trust and cooperation among self-interested individuals but are based on specifically collective mechanisms of protest and empowerment. This problem was highlighted by the early 19th-century French thinker Alexis de Tocqueville, who looked at the emerging non-European societies of the United States and Russia and stressed the importance of a "political society" as a necessary match to civil society. The idea of a political society extends the original notion of civil society to include the realm where individuals fight over notions of common good and implement collective welfare programs within smaller or bigger communities and municipalities, notably with the help of voluntary associations, including political parties.

Such collective endeavors can be considered the manifestation of a profound metamorphosis—but not the erasure—of traditions in the wake of modern transformations. Colonialism itself did not completely disrupt the way social groups and movements within non-European societies proved able to build distinctive versions of civil (or of civil-cum-political) society. As shown by leading social theorist Hannah Arendt, the impersonal and potentially totalitarian quality of the "social" as a marker of impersonal modernization cannot be entirely balanced out by the civil ties of trust and reciprocity. A collective dynamics not captured by the liberal notion of civil society reenacts key factors of the koinonia politike of Aristotle (in Latin, societas civilis—since the Greek polis corresponds to the Latin civitas—that is, semantically, the antecedent to "civil society"). Politics within human society requires the articulation of practices supported by a deeper symbolic bond. Boundaries are continuously created and challenged, and the ongoing mediations and contestations can be accommodated only within a larger concept of civil society that incorporates key elements of more classic notions. To pinpoint this deeper dimension of the social bond, the consideration of the common good (e.g., as incorporated in religious traditions) contributes to rendering the idea of civil society more inclusive by creating a strong nexus between common sense–oriented praxis in human relationships and a disciplined "passion" for justice, which can be mediated and expressed through modern forms of collective mobilization.

The tension between a liberal, European, and largely colonial notion of civil society and a more inclusive idea of the social bond has provided the main framework for debates in various parts of the Muslim world since the 1990s. In Egypt and in other parts of the Arab world, the discussion focused on the distinction and competition between al-mujtama' al-madanī, an Arabic translation of "civil society," and al-mujtama' al-ahlī, which literally means "indigenous" or "communal society" and so captures the communal nature of the social bond. Comparable contentions between polar models occurred in other parts of the Muslim world, such as Southeast Asia, where the idea of a masyarakat madani, though meaning "civil society," reenacted the Medina paradigm of Muhammad's virtuous community while also attempting to reconcile the two rival understandings of civil versus "communal" society. While stressing the religious foundations of social solidarity, masyarakat madani evidences the more secular idea of a "moral sense," central to the original formulations of civil society, as the human engine facilitating the autonomy of action and the self-sufficiency of the civil bond.

Both the conceptual bifurcation and the attempts to restore a unitary meaning of civil society are a product not only of Western experiences and approaches but also of the German sociologist Ferdinand Tönnies's self-critical reflections on Western modernity. One major example is the distinction between Gemeinschaft and Gesellschaft (literally "community" and "[civil] society"), designating not a traditional versus a modern form of the social bond but two different types of will, agency, and voluntary action. Tönnies's arguments might be read as antecedents of the reasoning of many contemporary Islamic thinkers. He saw Gemeinschaft as expressing the agency that is oriented to a collective telos. Such social bonds, characteristic of smaller communities that are not necessarily archaic but live on trade and depend on some specialized division of labor, are quite different from the division of labor within Gesellschaft, which is premised on exploitation. Tönnies also stressed the richness of Roman law, which encompassed both a dimension of communio and one of societas—in other words, of collective and individual property versus the one-sided use of the principles of Roman law within modern codes, subjected as they are to the logic of capitalism and requiring the erasure of customary law. Such theorization helps us better situate the Islamic postcolonial critique of simplified and exclusive notions of civil society as not unique.

The diffuse concept of social agency incorporated in the liberal notion of civil society happened to be too dependent on legal underpinnings (civil law and more specifically the laws demarcating and often restricting associational rights) and so remained a partly unfulfilled "Western dream." This is most visible in the entrenched top-down bureaucratic steering necessary to the maintenance of modern polities that are based on ordered labor relationships. The leading anthropologist and social theorist Ernest Gellner provocatively described the "Western dream" of civil society as a "failed umma" in order to highlight that excessive expectations of mutual trust as the glue of civil society, supposedly replacing a communal bond of faith, fall back inevitably on some nonliberal and premodern idea of social harmony. A civil society eschewing any form of wasta (authoritative mediation, or even intercession) is unthinkable even in Western historic models. This aspect was also recognized by Hegel, who argued that the condition for a bürgerliche Gesellschaft was a cluster of traditionally rooted intermediary institutions.

In conclusion, the hegemony of liberal notions of civil society has been seriously contested within the West itself for more than two centuries. In this sense, the Islamic critiques and reconstructions are not instances of an Islamic exceptionalism but rather reflections of the postcolonial predicament of contemporary Muslim-majority societies.

See also globalization; individualism; modernity; rights

Further Reading

Jonathan Benthall, "Civil Society's Need for De-deconstruction," Anthropology Today 16, no. 2 (2002); Simone Chambers and Will Kymlicka, eds., Alternative Conceptions of Civil Society, 2001; Ernst Gellner, "The Importance of Being Modular," in Civil Society: Theory, History, Comparison, edited by John A. Hall, 1995; Chris Hann and Elizabeth Dunn, eds., Civil Society: Challenging Western Models, 1996; Serif Mardin, "Power, Civil Society and Culture in the Ottoman Empire," Comparative Studies in Society and History 11, no. 3 (1969); Augustus R. Norton, ed., Civil Society in the Middle East, 2 vols., 1995, 1996; Adam B. Seligman, The Idea of Civil Society, 1992.

ARMANDO SALVATORE

civil war

The term "civil war" describes severe intrastate violence, as distinguished from lower-intensity violence, be it chronic or sporadic, in premodern societies, and interstate violence, such as invasion or conquest. What is at stake is the possession of ultimate political power, and the parties involved in the conflict are rival claimants (in dynastic polities, frequently brothers or cousins) supported by political, religious, and military factions.

The classical Arabic term that is frequently translated as civil war, fitna, has the root meaning of trial or affliction, and in historical and political prose, the term includes not only civil war among Muslims but also the related phenomena of social and economic disorder or strife that ruptures the community's unity and pits Muslim against fellow Muslim. In premodern usage, the same word is also used to describe the apocalyptic circumstances and battles at the end of history. To distinguish itself from the cultural and religious associations of the premodern tradition, modern Arabic has produced a neologism, harb ahlī, which translates more precisely the conventional use of "civil war" in the European tradition.

The political history of Islam can be said to date from 622, when the Prophet Muhammad emigrated from his hometown of Mecca to Yathrib (Medina), where he established a political community and waged war against those who refused to acknowledge his claim to temporal and religious authority. After Muhammad, caliphs (God's deputies) ruled the Islamic polity in more-or-less unbroken succession until the middle of the ninth century. Throughout this period, civil wars were not uncommon, but the ruling dynasty itself proved robust by Byzantine standards: caliphs were invariably drawn from Muhammad's tribe of the Quraysh, sons or brothers typically acceding to the throne.

The early Islamic state was unitary in both conception and execution. Organized political violence was far more centripetal than centrifugal—in other words, civil war was far more common than was secession. The tribal warfare that broke out upon Muhammad's death was counted as the "Wars of Apostasy" (the tribes having renounced their loyalty to the religious movement that survived Muhammad's death) rather than as a fitna. What the tradition unequivocally regards as the greatest fitna of all took place in 656–61, in events that would come to be understood as the source and origin of Islamic sectarianism. In the eyes of Muslims and non-Muslims alike, the events marked the end of political unity and, with it, an orthodoxy ascribed to the first community.

In the explicit political discourse of the later Islamic tradition, at issue was the succession of the second caliph, 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), and the claims of his successor, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56), as compared to those of 'Ali b. Abi Talib, the son-in-law and cousin of the Prophet himself. The fitna involved the murder of 'Uthman; 'Ali's claim to the caliphate (including accusations that his supporters were complicit in 'Uthman's murder); the Battle of the Camel, which pitted two of the Prophet's most revered Companions, along with one of his wives ('A'isha), against 'Ali; the Battle of Siffin between 'Ali and Mu'awiya (including the secession of some of 'Ali's supporters, the Kharijis); and, finally, the killing of 'Ali himself. This was the greatest of all fitnas because it was the earliest and marked the end of what the tradition viewed as original unity and because it planted the seeds of Shi'i sectarianism.

What have come to be called the second (683–92) and third (744–49) fitnas produced less sectarian identity than sustained violence. The second fitna ushered out one ruling branch of the Umayyads, the Sufyanids, in favor of another, the Marwanids. Regions fell under the authority of a variety of claimants, most notably Ibn al-Zubayr, who was defeated only by systematic campaigning, including a violent siege of Mecca carried out on behalf of the eventual victor, 'Abd al-Malik (r. 685–705). 'Abd al-Malik was followed in the caliphate by no fewer than four sons and two grandsons, but eventually the Marwanid dynasty imploded during the third fitna, which opened the door for eastern armies to rout what remained of the Umayyad support. It appears that the third fitna so fractured the Umayyad political and military elite that the century-old idea of Umayyad and Syrian rule was quickly discredited, and the new metropolitan capital of Baghdad was soon founded (in 762–63) in what had been a restive province, with all the resulting cultural reorientation to the east that this implied. The caliphs would still be drawn from Muhammad's tribe, but now they came from the Abbasid branch; civil war had led to political revolution.

The civil war of 809–13, which pitted one son of Harun al-Rashid (Amin) against another (Ma'mun), provides the most spectacular early Islamic case of a complicated succession arrangement gone horribly wrong: Harun stipulated that Ma'mun would follow Amin to the caliphate, but neither brother thought it workable. This civil war is sometimes said to mark the transition between the early and mid-Abbasid period, not least because Ma'mun's siege of Amin's Baghdad fatally undermined the military establishment that had brought the Abbasids to power and engineered early Abbasid success. In time, Harun's sons and grandsons effected a decisive change in military recruitment, which by the 860s placed de facto military and political power in the hands of Central Asian commanders. A protracted civil war that broke out in 866 between two rival claimants to the caliphate, Musta'in and Mu'tazz, reflected the militarized and factional Turkish politics of the period.

The Umayyad and Abbasid pattern—succession crisis triggers civil war, which leads, in turn, to structural changes in the state—is hardly unique to Islamic history. It might be said that the more unitary the state, the greater the potential for structural change. For example, when the Seljuq sultan Malikshah died in 1092, a civil war erupted among three sons; the unitary Seljuq state ended with that civil war, replaced by separate polities ruling Syria, Iraq, Iran, and Asia Minor. A better example is the civil war that broke out in Fatimid Egypt in the 1060s: it took the end of civilian rule and a fundamental reengineering of the state to squelch the violence the war had engendered. On the other hand, the effects of the civil war of the late 1020s and 1030s on the federated Buyid states of Iraq and Iran were relatively slight.

In Islamic states of the post-Abbasid period, sectarianism could emerge from civil war and secession, the best examples coming in the highly centripetal Fatimid state in Egypt (969–1171). The infusion of Turco-Mongol traditions into Islamic politics during the 13th and 14th centuries, especially an appanage system that institutionalized competition for succession among multiple contenders, marks a break in patterns of rulership, at least as inasmuch as it could lead to chronic and violent civil war, such as in the Mughal Empire in India. Another example is the civil war of 1600–1605, which pitted a father (Akbar) against a son named Salim (the future Jahangir).

To avoid succession disputes, formal and informal procedures intended to secure elite and military loyalty were put in place in the late seventh century; thus came the solemn and ceremonial giving of oaths of allegiance (bay'as) to acceding caliphs and their appointed heirs-apparent, along with other wills and testaments. As much as court practices attempted to regularize succession so as to preclude civil war, theory tended to legitimate the authority of Qurashi caliphs who possessed power, even if their rule was imperfect, and to prescribe political quietism. Muslim political thinkers throughout much of the pre-Mongol period were concerned with elaborating, updating, and otherwise exploring the view that government was to be ordered by a divinely favored leader who, occupying a sacral office (the caliphate) and providing the leadership necessary for salvation, was to be obeyed. Disobeying God's representatives meant breaking the oath of loyalty binding subject to sovereign, which was made before God Himself and therefore meant disobeying God Himself.

Rather than warring with each other, Muslims were to live in peace with each other; when they could not, they were accountable to God. The Qur'an stipulates that peace should be made between warring factions of believers (49:9), and according to one hadith, "When two Muslims encounter each other with swords, both the killer and the killed are in Hell." For virtually all Muslims of the early period, believing and belonging were one and the same, and communities were either errant or rightly guided. Although their legal discourse made some allowance for rebellion, for Sunnis especially, belonging meant remaining within the bounds of the community, even if under unjust or underqualified rulers.

Criticisms can be made of imprecise terms such as "activist" and "quietist," but the general tendency over the first five centuries of Islam is clear enough: revolutionary political activism for the sake of constructing just political communities, a tendency exemplified by many Shi'i movements especially, lost its appeal, eclipsed by the emergence of more individualistic and local pieties and loyalties. Cleaving to community, as opposed to rending it, is the defining feature of classical orthodoxy, be it Sunni or Shi'i.

See also 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); Ma'mun (786–833)

Further Reading

K. Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; H. Djait, La grande discorde: Religion et politique dans l'Islam des origines, 1989; W. Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad, 1997.

CHASE F. ROBINSON

clients

"Clients" (mawali) is a term used in early Islamic history, and in Islamic law thereafter, for a legal status originally bestowed on every non-Arab member of the Arab society established by conquest in the Middle East outside Arabia. The Arab conquerors were tribally organized, but their non-Arab subjects had "forgotten their genealogies," as the Arabs put it. Partly for this reason and partly because most converts in the first century were slaves (originally captives) who had been uprooted from their own families, non-Arab newcomers to Muslim society had to be attached to a kin group willing to pay blood money for any damage to life or property they might inflict. The group in question was that of the newcomer's patron (also called a mawla). Freed slaves in principle always became clients of their manumitter, but a free person could choose his own patron by converting "at the hands of" a Muslim with whom he had reached an agreement. The reward for the patron, apart from a loyal follower, lay in his entitlement to a share in his client's estate. The tie survived the death of both parties, continuing among their descendants in perpetuity, but its relevance decreased as time passed. Clients rapidly acquired clients of their own. Whether the patron was an Arab or an assimilated client, the institution served to regulate the reception of newcomers and ensure both their subordination and their assimilation to the Arabs. The tie did not affect the newcomer's status in public law, however: the convert became a full "citizen," endowed with the same rights and duties as other Muslims. At some point, perhaps in the mid-eighth century, the jurists began to reject the institution of clientage for converts, but all jurists retained the institution for freedmen, and some retained it for free partners as long as conversion was not involved. The obligation to pay blood money on behalf of a kinless newcomer was shifted to other institutions, such as the treasury.

The term "clients" eventually came to be used in the loose sense of "non-Arab Muslims" (as in the expression al-'arab wa-l-mawali), and it is in that sense that it tends to be used in the secondary literature, too. The sources never use the word in the sense of protegés and beneficiaries of patronage in general, and though the institution was of considerable social and political importance in the first centuries, its significance lies primarily in cultural history. The Arabs formed a privileged ruling elite imposed on the non-Arabian Middle East by conquest, and like most elites of this kind, they were both jealous of their privileges and contemptuous of the defeated natives. Non-Arab Muslims were derided as "slaves," paid less than their Arab peers in the army, deemed unfit for positions of authority or marriage with Arab women, and worth less than Arabs in terms of blood money. But even so, they rose with extreme rapidity in Muslim society, and they appear to have outnumbered Arab Muslims within two generations of the conquests, for the Arab conquest society had one characteristic unparalleled in other imperial expansions: the bar to membership was set extremely low. The Arabs had expanded in the name of a universalist religion, with the result that the community of believers happened also to be an imperial elite. The only requirement for membership of this elite was recitation of the confession of faith to a Muslim willing to act as one's patron. In practice, many migrated to the Muslim centers without even having patrons. Fearing the loss not only of their revenues but also of their very identity, the Arab authorities tried to stem the tide by imposing tests on converts, refusing to register them on the military roll, or deporting them outright as illegal immigrants. But however much they pushed away converts with one hand, they continued to accept them in the form of freedmen with the other, so the privileged conquest elite disappeared with great speed. It was in that context that the jurists, often non-Arabs themselves, began to reject the institution of clientage for converts.

The fact that newcomers were granted what we would now call full citizenship meant that non-Arab Muslims accepted the legitimacy of the Muslim polity that had replaced their native states instead of clamoring for independence: what they sought to change was the dynasty that they saw as responsible for the prejudice against them. The Abbasid revolution, conducted from eastern Iran a mere century after the conquest of this region, would under other circumstances have been a war of independence. Instead it replaced the Umayyad dynasty with that of the Abbasids and put an end to what remained of the political hegemony of the Arabs. This did not of course put an end to the tense relationship between the original bearers of Islam and its new representatives. The century after the revolution was dominated by often acrimonious debates about the relative merits of Arabs and mawālī in the sense of non-Arabs, best known in the form of polemics for and against the so-called Shu'ubis. But the debates were about the terms of coexistence within the same political house, the desirability of which was taken for granted. A prominent item of debate was the relative value and prestige of the cultural traditions represented by the parties involved. This debate accompanied the formation of a synthesis of the beliefs and values brought by the conquerors and the legacy of the imperial civilizations they had defeated. In short, this was when classical Islamic civilization emerged.

See also conversion; patronage; Shu'ubis; tribalism; Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

M. Bernards and John Nawas, eds., Patronate and Patronage in Early and Classical Islam, 2005; P. Crone, "Post-Colonialism in Tenth-Century Islam," Der Islam 83, no. 1 (2006); Eadem, "Were the Qays and Yemen of the Umayyad Period Political Parties?" Der Islam 71 (1994).

PATRICIA CRONE

coinage

Before the spread of machine-struck coinage in the Islamic world in the 19th century, the coins of Muslim states were prepared by hand, as individual bits of metal were struck between two dies, resulting in the transfer of the design of those dies to the two faces of the coin. These coins, which varied tremendously in size and shape over the chronological span and geographical scope of the Muslim world, were usually prepared from gold, silver, or copper. While the main purpose of coins is economic, they are also intimately linked to matters of politics. The common words in Arabic for gold coin (dīnār) and silver coin (dirham) appear in the Qur'an, and Muslim jurists subsequently wrote treatises establishing Islamic principles of money and the need for those in authority to provide proper coinage. The two faces of coins, moreover, proved to be excellent vehicles for political messages.

It is thus not surprising that the right to mint coins (sikka) emerged as one of two major prerogatives of rulership in the premodern Islamic world. The other was the right to have one's name mentioned as ruler in the Friday sermon (khuṭba).

There was no tradition of coin minting in the early Islamic community of the Hijaz. Thus as the first Muslims expanded outside of the Arabian Peninsula, they simply adopted the coinage in use by the states they conquered. It was not until the year 696 that what may be called the first Islamic coinage was produced during the reign of the Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik (r. 685–705). These were gold coins that bore only writing, in this case legends derived from Qur'anic verses and other pious phrases. Two years later, silver dirhams were struck bearing similar legends. Beginning in the reign of the Abbasid caliph Mu'tasim (r. 833–42), the names of the caliphs were added to the coin legends. While the subsequent breakup of the Abbasid state resulted in the emergence of several other styles and types of coins, from this point in the ninth century onward, coins became a major source of political history for the Muslim world. As local autonomy developed in the farther reaches of the Abbasid Empire, provincial governors began to add their names to the coins minted in the regions under their control. Changes in these names reflect either a change in the ruler or a change in the dynasty. With the rise of the competing caliphates of the Fatimids and the Spanish Umayyads, coins were struck in the names of those respective leaders as well. The Fatimids not only changed the layout and design of their coinage but also used Shi'i phrases in their coin legends. Changes in legends and titles often reflected immediate political circumstances. The Mamluk sultan Malik al-Zahir Baybars (r. 1260–77), for example, added the title "supporter of the Commander of the Faithful" (qasīm amīr al-mu'minīn) to some of his gold coins to reflect his establishment of a new Abbasid caliphate in Cairo after the Mongols had destroyed Baghdad in 1258.

While never as common as the purely scriptural coin designs, figural imagery and symbols appear on some coins minted by Muslim states, although the reason is not always clear. Baybars had a feline figure engraved on his gold and silver coins, possibly a reference to the fact that his name meant "panther" in his native tongue. In states as diverse as the Turkoman dynasties of northern Mesopotamia in the 12th century and Mughal India in the 17th century, images linked to astrological concepts were used on coins, although in the former case that astrological link is fiercely debated. Finally, while coins with images become slightly more prevalent with the spread of modern machine-struck coinage, some modern Muslim states such as Saudi Arabia continue in the long established pattern of epigraphic coinage established long ago by 'Abd al-Malik.

See also trade and commerce

Further Reading

Jere L. Bacharach, Islamic History through Coins: An Analysis and Catalogue of Tenth-Century Ikhshidid Coinage, 2006; Michael L. Bates, Islamic Coins, 1982; Andrew S. Ehrenkreutz and Gene W. Heck, "Additional Evidence of the Fatimid Use of Dinars for Propaganda Purposes," in Studies in Islamic History and Civilization in Honor of David Ayalon, edited by M. Sharon, 1986; Tayeb El-Hibri, "Coinage Reform under the 'Abbasid Caliph al-Mu'mun," Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 36, no. 1 (1993); William F. Spengler and Wayne G. Sayles, Turkoman Figural Bronze Coins and Their Iconography, vol. 1, The Artuqids, 1992.

WARREN C. SCHULTZ

collective obligations

Collective obligation (farḍ kifāya), in contrast to individual obligation (farḍ 'ayn), is one of the two categories of moral obligation known to Islamic jurisprudence. The distinction between the two categories is at least as old as Shafi'i's Risala (the first work in theoretical jurisprudence, or uṣūl al-fiqh, in Islamic history), and it is accepted in both Sunni and Twelver Shi'i jurisprudence.

The basic distinction between a collective obligation and an individual one is that in the former, one may fail to perform the obligation but still escape moral blame if someone else fulfills the obligation, whereas in an individual obligation, only the individual performance of the command is sufficient to avoid moral censure. Collective obligations can generally be thought of as issues requiring collective action, but no one specific person is legally obliged to perform them. Accordingly, unless a person is the only one capable of discharging the legal requirement, such as when only one man in town is qualified to serve as a judge, a collective obligation translates into a supererogatory command (nadb) with respect to individual Muslims. Because collective duties are only supererogatory with respect to individuals and not absolutely obligatory, their performance entails a large degree of altruism, since the discharge of the obligation benefits third parties who were not responsible for discharging the duty.

Collective obligations are found in both Islamic ritual law and the Islamic law of civil obligations (mu'āmalāt). Examples of ritual law representing collective obligations would be such duties as performing the funeral prayer; washing, shrouding, and burying the dead; and memorizing the entirety of the Qur'an. Individual obligations, by contrast, include the familiar Five Pillars of Islam and also, for example, knowledge of al-Fatiha (the first chapter of the Qur'an) and one other short chapter of the Qur'an so that one could fulfill one's individual obligation to perform the ritual prayer. Examples of collective obligations in the realm of civil responsibility include the duty to take possession of lost property and protect it from loss, as well as teaching and practicing agriculture, medicine, trades, and crafts.

For Sunnis, engaging in politics is a collective obligation, including the obligation to appoint a caliph, organize a judicial system, and train specialists in the law. Commanding right and forbidding wrong (al-amr bi-l-ma'rūf wa-l-nahy 'an al-munkar) is also a collective obligation, as is the general obligation to preserve expertise in the religious sciences. Taking part in offensive military operations or manning the frontiers of the Islamic state, both considered part of the obligation of jihad, are also examples of collective duties. Jihad becomes an individual duty only in the circumstance of an enemy attack on Islamic territory.

Collective obligations of a secular character, such as engaging in agriculture or industry, can take on a religious character, but only if the individual subjectively intends to serve God through discharging the obligation.

See also jurisprudence; al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820)

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Abu Ishaq Ibrahim al-Shatibi, al-Muwafaqat fi Usul al-Shari'ah, 1991.

MOHAMMAD FADEL

colonialism

The expansion of Europe into the heartlands of the Muslim world in the 19th and early 20th centuries not only posed a sustained political and military threat to native populations but also prompted an internal debate over how best to renew Muslim societies that were apparently in decline. Under colonial rule, Islamic reformism and, increasingly, nationalism were the main vehicles for this debate, which continued over subsequent decades once it became evident that the end of European occupation did not necessarily lead to political independence. To figures as diverse as Gamal Abdel Nasser, Ayatollah Khomeini, and Osama bin Laden, the insidious workings of neocolonialism still restrained the development of the Arab and Islamic worlds.

European colonialism typically encountered sporadic armed resistance as it spread across first North Africa and then the Near East. Anticolonial revolts often legitimized themselves by appealing to the concept of jihad, though in some cases the mythic paradigm of the Mahdi, or redeemer, was invoked to galvanize the local community's millenarian zeal. Such resistance was largely rural, rooted in Sufi networks and united by the extraordinary charisma of one individual leader. Traditional urban elites, in contrast, were more accustomed to the need for political agility and typically acquiesced to the new European rule. The rebellion of 'Abd al-Qadir al-Jaza'iri against the French in Algeria (1830–47) provides one of the earliest examples of this form of resistance. Taking advantage of the speed and mobility of his irregular troops, 'Abd al-Qadir used guerrilla tactics to good effect against the slow, cumbersome, and heavily armored columns of France's Armée d'Afrique. His revolt ended only when General Bugeaud made the transition to lighter columns and the collective punishment of Algerian villagers the keystone of his military strategy. Just as the Qadiri Sufi order played an important role in this revolt, so too did the Sanusi brotherhood seek to counter Italy's invasion of Libya (1911) from their stronghold in Cyrenaica. The Sanusi also fought against the British in Egypt (1915) and the French in sub-Saharan Africa; their battle against the Italians in Libya did not end until 1931. In Sudan, Muhammad Ahmad (1844–85) was declared a Mahdi and led a revolt against Egyptian rule in 1881, resulting in the creation of an independent state until Britain's Lord Kitchener reconquered the region in 1898.

While this early resistance largely drew on religious attachments and rural networks, after World War I, local populations increasingly turned to nationalism to provide their desire for independence with a coherent ideological framework. This development paralleled the construction of modern state forms in the Middle East (most evident in the mandated territories of Iraq, Transjordan, Palestine, Syria, and Lebanon) and the reorientation of political life toward urban centers, which soon became the most important arena for politics. Rural revolts continued to erupt in reaction to the imposition of British and French rule, most notably in Iraq (1920) and Syria (1925–27), but in many countries, outright insurgencies were superseded by new forms of urban resistance, such as student demonstrations, strikes, and public protests. Elites who formerly had not been inclined to contest European rule while it supported their interests found their positions as compradors increasingly untenable. Admittedly, these elites were handed the reins of power by the colonial authorities upon their departure, but more often than not these "bourgeois nationalist" regimes were overthrown by a younger, more radical generation that sought to purge the traces of colonial complicity from their newly independent states.

The Muslim world's inability to withstand European penetration preoccupied social and religious thinkers in the 19th century who asked, first, how Muslims could modernize their societies without mimicking the West and, second, how they could secure independence from Europe. The two questions were intimately related. Afghani (1838–97) thought that Islam's essential vitality could be seen in the successful episodes of armed resistance against the Europeans; he advocated a deep sociocultural revival to wake the Muslim people from their slumber. This line of argument can be traced from Afghani to the writings of Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) and his followers, who were also proponents of Islamic reformism. But it also carried through to the postindependence period, when political ideologues couched their appeals to the dormant nationalism of their people in remarkably similar terms. Mystified by the failure of the Egyptian masses to come out in support of the Free Officers coup of 1952, Nasser concluded that his nation's sleeping political will could be revived only through a profound social and political transformation. Bin Laden also expressed the belief that a moral awakening was the sole necessary condition for reasserting Muslim civilization against the West's ongoing occupation of Islamic lands. This focus on Muslim moral regeneration as a tool to cast off colonial domination was prevalent in popular Arab political discourse, and structural questions regarding the global system (such as economic dependency) were featured mostly as second-order issues.

Suspicion of Western domination remained alive in many developing countries, and the mere existence of the State of Israel rendered such concerns especially acute in the Middle East. To nationalists and Islamists alike, Israel represented the enduring success of colonialism in the region. For many Arabs and Muslims, the 2003 occupation of Iraq confirmed that colonialism could not yet be consigned to the history books.

See also al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011); Europe; modernity; nationalism; revival and reform; Westernization

Further Reading

Nikki R. Keddie, "The Revolt of Islam, 1700 to 1993: Comparative Considerations and Relations to Imperialism," Comparative Studies in Society and History 36, no. 3 (1994); Ruhallah Khomeini, Islam and Revolution: Writings and Declarations of Imam Khomeini, translated by Hamid Algar, 1985; Bruce B. Lawrence, Messages to the World: The Statements of Osama bin Laden, 2005; Robert J. C. Young, Postcolonialism: An Historical Introduction, 2001.

DANIEL NEEP

commanding right and forbidding wrong

"Commanding right and forbidding wrong" (al-amr bi-l-ma'rūf wa-l-nahy 'an al-munkar) is a pervasive Islamic doctrine with textual roots in the Qur'an and hadith, the recorded sayings and actions of Muhammad, that articulates a general moral duty incumbent upon all Muslims. Its interpretations and applications have varied significantly throughout the history of the Islamic tradition, depending on sectarian affiliation, scholastic tradition, and political context. For convenience, the doctrine is referred to here as "forbidding wrong." The most thorough treatment of the principle can be seen in Michael Cook's magisterial Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, which serves as the primary reference for the following summary.

While there are many Qur'anic sources for the obligation to forbid wrong, 3:104 resolutely describes the tenet as a principle constituting the Muslim community and Islamic identity writ large: "Let there be one community of you, calling to good, commanding right and forbidding wrong." As is often true in Qur'anic style, the details of the tenet are obscure, leaving only a broad ethical injunction, and as is common in Islamic tradition more generally, such interpretive gaps are readily filled in by the hadith literature. The most common hadith report relevant to the doctrine appears in a number of both Sunni and Shi'i collections, canonical and otherwise. It relates that Muhammad said, "Whoever sees a wrong, and is able to put it right with his hand, let him do so; if he can't, then with his tongue; if he can't, then in his heart, and that is the bare minimum of faith." In Cook's words, this hadith "provided later generations with a fundamental building-block for their scholastic doctrines of forbidding wrong," because in its contradistinction to the opacity of the Qur'anic articulations, it "spells out a hierarchy of modes of response to wrong: deed, word, and thought." It is within this broad spectrum that the political possibilities of the tenet can range from activism to quietism.

Exemplifying the quietist approach to the practice, Ahmad b. Hanbal (d. 855), the famed scholar of hadith, was modest in describing the parameters of the duty to forbid wrong. He did not advocate the use of violence in the performance of the duty, though the destruction of forbidden objects (e.g., smashing musical instruments, overturning chessboards) was permissible. Verbal extortion and scolding were also considered appropriate measures. If an offender's repeated refusal to change his or her behavior might lead to an escalation or confrontation, it was deemed better to cease. Privacy of one's home was also considered an insurmountable barrier to implementation of the duty. Also, according to Ibn Hanbal and other quietists, one should refrain from the duty when one's safety is in question. Therefore, like other formative quietest Sunni thinkers, he discouraged its performance against the state and shunned political activism.

The activist manifestation of the doctrine, which does not necessarily imply political rebellion, would nonetheless find expression in the movement founded by Ibn Hanbal in later generations, most specifically in the activities of the infamous Baghdadi activist Hasan b. 'Ali al-Barbahari (d. 941) and other tenth-century populists who engaged in acts of public disturbance in targeting various figures who strayed from "proper" Islamic behavior. The duty was also regularly articulated in doctrinal terms and thus supported public attacks against competing theological and sectarian visions of Islam.

Activist interpretations also came from Mu'tazili theologians such as Sayyid Mankdim (d. 1034) and al-Hakim al-Jishumi (d. 1101), who, though grounded in the school of 'Abd al-Jabbar (d. 1025), may have varied on the place of arms in the performance of the duty but rejected the idea of restricting the duty to performance in the heart solely. The Zaydi Shi'is likewise were activist oriented, though expectedly more so in terms of rebellion against unjust rulers. Hadi ila al-Haqq (d. 911), founder of the Zaydi imamate of Yemen, considered it foundational to his religious leadership and political mission, making it a formal component of his followers' pledge of allegiance to him. Imami Shi'i positions on the quietist-activist spectrum centered on the need for the imam's permission to perform the duty. The majority of scholars endorsed a view restricting the responsibility of the duty to the imam or his deputy, while 'Allama Hilli (d. 1325) argued that a qualified jurist could enact it—a juridical theme later expounded on by Ayatollah Khomeini in his adaptation of the guardianship of the jurist (wilāyat-i faqih), the religious doctrine that justifies clerical Islamic rule in Iran.

Given the ambiguity of the term "Sufi," it may not be fruitful to search for the Sufi theory of forbidding wrong. Nonetheless, the influential mystical thinker Harith al-Muhasibi (d. 857) declared that the best method includes the sincere cultivation of the obligation to forbid wrong. A regular refrain in Sufi articulations of the duty is the need to sublimate the ego's passions and to turn to God for help in correcting the wrongdoer's actions.

Forbidding wrong has had an ambivalent place in the development of modern state institutions in Muslim majority countries. In the wake of colonialism, many nations adopted secular codes of civil law, thus rendering many of the provisions of the shari'a irrelevant, much less subject to enforcement. It was not uncommon for reform intellectuals in the early 20th century to read into the Qur'an (3:104), the political injunction of representative assembly or other liberal modes of governance. However, in polities seeking a reconstitution of Islamic law, forbidding wrong became a cornerstone principle of public order. Shortly after the consolidation of Ibn Saud's conquests across the Arabian Peninsula in the late 1920s, committees for commanding right and forbidding wrong were established in Mecca to regulate pilgrims during their visits to the holy sanctuaries. The function quickly spread to the regulation of moral behavior in society at large, and it has since been a prominent feature of the modern Saudi state. Ayatollah Khomeini and like-minded Shi'i activists took up the doctrine of forbidding wrong as a central justification for their revivalist aspirations. In line with their general political views, they sharply criticized religious scholars who subscribed to the traditional quietest approach of Twelver Shi'ism, which held that in the absence of the direct instructions of the imam, many such political obligations were suspended indefinitely. Instead, they argued that with the permission and guidance of a jurist, forbidding wrong could again be a duty incumbent upon Muslims. The tenet was adopted as the basis for an article of the constitution of the Islamic Republic, and as in Saudi Arabia, the doctrine has been entrusted to substate local committees and councils for implementation.

In conclusion, forbidding wrong in Islamic tradition is as all encompassing as it is ambivalent. Its manifestations can range from the attacks of the violent activist to the inner thoughts and passive resistance of the quietest; likewise, its interpretation can lead to either conservative or liberal political conclusions.

See also Iran; quietism and activism; Saudi Arabia; shari'a; Zaydis

Further Reading

Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Idem, Forbidding Wrong in Islam, 2003.

ABBAS BARZEGAR

communism

The contemporary Arabic word for communism—shuyū'iyya—is a neologism from the root sh-i-', meaning to spread, to circulate, to diffuse, and by extension, to have in common. This usage has been accepted since the early 1920s. Before that time, with the Paris Commune of 1871, cognate words such as kūmūnizm were used. Other renditions were ibāhiyyūn, which denoted licentiousness and atheism, and dahriyyūn, meaning materialists or freethinkers.

Communism as social theory and practice historically has been relegated to minorities in the Middle East, if not the larger Islamic world, and has never entered into the political mainstream. Among such minorities have been Copts in Egypt, Kurds in the Fertile Crescent, Christians in the Levant, and Jews. The majority of the people classified as minorities have not been drawn to communism, yet appeals to communism in the Muslim world historically have come from minorities.

Although communism has been a marginal factor in the Muslim world, Marxist-Leninist regimes were established in South Yemen (1969–90) and Afghanistan (1978–89), as were relatively coherent and well-organized communist parties in Syria, Iraq, Sudan, and Iran. In Indonesia (with the largest Muslim population in the world), during the nationalist struggle against the Dutch and again in the late 1950s and early 1960s, communism was able to find a niche that it had not been able to establish in Middle Eastern Muslim societies. Altogether, however, the majority of Muslim societies have continuously expressed antipathy toward communism both as thought and practice because of its relegation of religion to a secondary plane, if not to total irrelevance, in the lives of the people.

With the creation of the Communist International (also known as the Comintern, or Third International) in 1919, headquartered in Moscow, Vladimir Lenin and his associates sought both to influence and to attract the people of the Third World by emphasizing the solidarity of communism with anticolonial nationalism. At the second congress of the Comintern in 1920, theoretical justifications were given for Marxists to appeal to the "bourgeois" nationalism of the populations of the colonial territories. At the Baku Conference of the Peoples of the East (July–August 1920), Soviet representatives revealed the contents of the secretly drafted Treaty of London, April 1915, and the secretly drafted Sykes Picot Treaty, May 1916, according to which Britain and France betrayed the Arabs by reversing promises they had made to them in exchange for their support against the Ottoman Empire in World War I. Meanwhile, the Soviets materially assisted the Turkish nationalist movement led by Mustafa Kemal to stymie British and French efforts to carve up Anatolia into spheres of influence.

Soviet attempts to promote provincial separatist movements in areas such as the Gilan province in Iran in 1919 and 1920 did not succeed, but local communist parties or factions did emerge between 1921 and 1925 in Tunisia and Algeria (where, until 1936, they were basically extensions of the French Communist Party), Egypt, Lebanon, and Palestine, and later in Syria (1933) and Iran (1941).

One of the difficulties in the diffusion of communism to the Muslim world was its association with the international Zionist movement and specifically its goals in Palestine. The Jewish bund (federation of Jewish workers) was active both in the development of Bolshevism, the Leninist variant of Communism, and mainstream and radical Zionism, and this was bound to conflict with Muslim sensibilities over the issue of Palestine. Later on, when Soviet leader Joseph Stalin supported the creation of the State of Israel (mainly as a means of ensuring the departure of the British from the Middle East), many Muslims felt that the identification of communism with Zionism was indubitably established.

It is routinely stated that communism's atheism is the key impediment to its spread in the Muslim world. This may be true, but also significant is the stress on proletarian internationalism—no matter that this emphasis might be tactically modified at historical junctures when it served the purpose of communist policy makers to relegate that principle to a secondary plane. For example, if Lenin and his successors perceived that anticolonialist nationalism could be a valuable asset at a specific historical point to communism's larger goals of defeating global capitalism, they would de-emphasize proletarian internationalism. However, Muslim thinkers were keen to maintain the solidarity of the umma (community of believers), which would be difficult to uphold in the face of arguments about class solidarity. Among the standard accusations made against communism by Muslim spokespersons was that it preached class warfare, and its adherence to this position was so uncompromising that it spawned social hatred and invited coercion and brutality.

In the 1950s and 1960s, when the postindependence leaders of Algeria, Egypt, Syria, Iraq, and Indonesia began to adopt socialist economic policies, communism in the Muslim world appeared poised to make widespread gains. Ironically, however, it was precisely at this time that these rulers suppressed the communist parties and jailed, tortured, and executed the leaders of these organizations. Even when Nikita Khrushchev (r. 1953–64), then first secretary of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union, came to Egypt in 1964 to participate in the inauguration of the first stage of the Aswan Dam, bitter recriminations—which had already surfaced around 1959 to 1960—intensified between him and Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser (r. 1956–70). Similar developments transpired in Iraq. In Indonesia, around 1964 to 1965, a ferocious campaign was launched against the Communist Party of Indonesia, leading to the deaths of hundreds of thousands of actual and supposed cadres of that party.

Later, friendlier relations prevailed between Moscow and Cairo, and eventually thousands of Soviet military advisors were sent to Egypt. Despite the presence of these advisors, however, Egyptian leaders used the media to insulate their populations from communist ideas and doctrines. President Anwar Sadat's expulsion of these advisors in 1972 suggested how weak Moscow's strategic position in the Middle East really was.

The Organization of the Islamic Conference, established in 1969 to promote solidarity among Muslim majority states, condemned the Soviet invasion of Afghanistan in 1979, and individual Muslim leaders, such as Ayatollah Khomeini (r. 1979–89) of Iran, joined in this action. Muslim commentators saw the collapse of communism in eastern Europe in the late 1980s and of the Soviet Union in December 1991 as the fully justified end of totalitarian systems, although some expressed concern that the United States remained as the world's only superpower.

See also Afghanistan; Algeria; capitalism; Egypt; ideology; Indonesia; masses; public interest; socialism; Tunisia

Further Reading

Ervand Abrahamian, Iran between Two Revolutions, 1982; Joel Beinen and Zachary Lockman, Workers on the Nile: Nationalism, Communism, Islam and the Egyptian Working Class, 1882–1954, 1987; Selma Botman, The Rise of Egyptian Communism, 1939–1970, 1988; Walter Laqueur, Communism and Nationalism in the Middle East, 3rd ed., 1961; Maxime Rodinson, Marxism and the Muslim World, 1979; Gabriel Warburg, Islam, Nationalism and Communism in a Traditional Society: The Case of the Sudan, 1978.

SHAHROUGH AKHAVI

community

A term capable of accommodating a number of different social collectives and identities, "community" is useful in describing a vast array of overlapping yet sufficiently distinct groups that nevertheless might belong to and participate in a larger collective identity or "community." It is important to note, however, that communities are neither radically independent nor wholly discrete; rather, they form, overlap, intersect, and coalesce in ways that generate still more ways of conceptualizing community both as an abstract analytical category and as observable phenomena of social organization and identity construction. Different orders of criteria particularize, contextualize, and add greater complexity to the concept of community and its application. Thus age, gender, race, nationality, language, class, social status, and historical era—to name only a few—easily frustrate any notion of community as a single, simple, or static entity immune to change and lacking internal differentiation.

With regard to the concept of community as it pertains to Islam and Muslim identity, two Arabic terms are of particular importance: umma and jamā'a. Both are typically translated as "community," and although they share a number of semantic features, their respective usages have grown and differed in important ways.

The term umma is found in the Qur'an, where it signifies a number of different yet interconnected meanings. At its most basic, the term retains the sense of a community or a social collective of men and women. It is, however, a fairly elastic term and is also used in the Qur'an more specifically to connote a religiously defined community, with each umma being distinguished from the others by the degree and content of its collective beliefs or disbeliefs. The social and religious significance of the term umma is also found in the Constitution of Medina, documents that were drafted to define the nascent polity established by Muhammad and to detail the communal obligations shared by the various constituent kinship groups and religious communities of Yathrib (Medina). Its position at the nexus of the sociopolitical and religious spheres of the burgeoning Islamic empire helps to explain the strong religiopolitical value the concept of umma quickly came to assume. Indeed, already in the early centuries of Islamic social and political development, the term umma was used to describe a mutually affiliated community of believers populating numerous lands but unified as a group under the banner of the caliphate.

Two key features of the early conception of umma that distinguish it from the seemingly synonymous term jamā'a are its encompassing (or "global") range of inclusion and its ideological function. The umma was a vital concept in the expansion and maintenance of Muslim dominance. A prescriptive concept, the notion of the umma as a vast "global" Muslim community was formed through a confluence of political, social, and religious concerns. It emerged from scholarly elaborations of the social contract between leader and community and served to unite religious identity with political leadership. The insistence on the importance of the umma was not merely an assertion of the importance of social unity; it was also an endorsement of the very structures of social, political, and religious power and control that ostensibly served to construct and sustain social unity. Indeed, many political texts, no doubt written in part to justify caliphal power and forestall radical activism, prescribed acquiescence and quietism, arguing that the unity of an increasingly expansive and internally diverse Muslim community, which, ideally, should transcend factional and cultural differences, had to be preserved at all costs. Political and social agitation, it was argued, would only result in chaos, violence, and the disintegration of the idealized umma. When the Abbasid caliphate collapsed beneath the pressures of Mongol invasion in the 13th century, the symbolic value of the caliphate as the center and defining feature of the umma remained. However, with the conceptual status of the umma renegotiated in direct proportion to the shifting locus of caliphal power, the umma was reimagined and re-presented as a predominantly religious community with minimal political valence.

In the 19th and 20th centuries, among the reformist circles of the Islamic world, the term umma and its connotations of global community resonated once again with a political tone. Before the Ottoman caliphate was finally abolished in 1924, conceptions of a unified Muslim community had come to the foreground of 19th- and 20th-century anticolonial discourse. To this end, the concept of umma was appropriated and redeployed in Pan-Islamic rhetoric. Typically presented as an ideal yet realizable political entity, the umma was envisioned as a unified community that would transcend geographical, historical, sectarian, and political differences and unite Muslims of the world into a network of mutual association. For Afghani (1838–97), one of the earliest reform-minded political activists of the modern period, this meant a newly constituted caliphate, and, indeed, his attempts at realizing this were subsidized and propagated by the Ottoman Empire, with the sultan Abdülhamid II styling himself as the caliph of the new, emerging umma. The caliphate failed, however, and following World War I, the Ottoman Empire was dismembered. Subsequently, Pan-Islamic ideologues found themselves contending with the fragmentary outlook and rather divisive rhetoric of nationalist discourse. As Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) noted, the term umma did not properly belong to the Islamist perspective, which focused largely on national identity, much to the exclusion of a larger, global Muslim polity. Indeed, as its use in nationalist and Islamist politics revealed, the term jamā'a served as a much better descriptor of the kinds of imagined community that proliferated in the latter half of the 20th century.

Jamā'a, unlike umma, is not found in the Qur'an; however, like umma, it is described in the hadith. While umma soon came to signify a broad social and political formation founded on religious and legal justifications and characterized by its authoritative center, the originally synonymous term jamā'a referred to a communal formation largely free of political entanglements and situated beyond the authoritative scope of human and terrestrial centers of power. In its simplest form, a jamā'a is a community defined by its members, who are joined to one another in and by a common set of beliefs. Whereas umma signifies a vast community whose unity is determined by a symbolic center—a caliph who speaks for and unites the believers into a cohesive, though variegated, global community—jamā'a is distinguished from umma by its connotation of localized forms of communal ties and identity.

As a descriptor of much smaller groupings of Muslims who form around a spiritual or religious leader, the term jamā'a has been used simply to refer to any group of Muslims that congregates at a mosque or follows a particular imam. Nevertheless, the term assumes much greater political import where it is used to describe and name the collective leadership for a community of Muslims. For example, in Timbuktu, at least up until the 19th century, the term jamā'a referred to an authoritative body of imams, scholars, and wealthy townsmen who acted as an unofficial representative body. From the 17th to the early 20th century in Morocco, two neighboring pastoral tribes, both the Dawi Mani' and the Ait Atta, employed the term jamā'a in a similar fashion, using the term to describe their council of tribal leaders. And yet, despite the close proximity of these two tribal groups, their respective conceptions of jamā'a remained specific to the particular needs and social formations of the two tribes. For the Dawi Mani', the jamā'a was an informal regulative and judicial body of important male members who implemented a combination of shari'a and tribal customary law. The jamā'a of the sedentary Ait Atta, however, was a formal, officially elected assembly charged with judicial and administrative responsibilities. In each example, jamā'a not only serves to describe a higher, more regulatory, and more socially involved form of organization than the simple notion of a religious congregation but also points to the formation of a particular body of collective leadership that responds to the social and political concerns most relevant to the localized communities that they represent and regulate. In a similar way, the term jamā'a was used to refer to the larger and more radical Islamist movements that emerged in the latter half of the 20th century in the Islamic world. In late 20th century Egypt, for example, the term jamā'a referred to political organizations motivated by Islamist sociopolitical aspirations. Radically politicized organizations such as the al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya and Jama'at al-Muslimin were, however, elitist and ultimately divisive, for, in articulating a specific vision of Muslim society and conceiving of themselves as models for its realization, these organizations produced communal organizations within shared national and local spaces, culminating in exclusive and contesting visions for an Islamic state.

Instantiations of jamā'a are diverse, entirely context-specific, and historically contingent. Whether the term connotes a congregational model or a model of leadership and increased sociopolitical involvement, it clearly pertains to local groupings of communal identity. In an increasingly globalized and globalizing world, however, the distinction between umma and jamā'a is blurred by diasporic activity, telecommunications, and international travel. The increasing globalization of the world has resulted in a vast and interconnected dispersal of diverse cultural identities and patterns resulting in "distanciated communities," translocal collectives of individuals for whom physical location is neither static nor prohibitively constraining. The vast and complex networks of international and translocal affiliation among seemingly disparate and distanced groups of Muslims calls into question the notion of local Muslim communities that are somehow not influenced and imbedded in a larger, more global context at the same time as it calls into question a global umma that is somehow not determined, at least in part, by the virtual presence and influence of more local communities. Technological progress alongside the increased frequency of intercommunal encounters, however, does not collapse the distinction between umma and jamā'a; rather, it highlights the perennial complexity, heterogeneity, and interpenetrating nature of community and communal identity.

See also brotherhoods; caliph, caliphate; fundamentalism; globalization; government; nationalism; nation-state; Pan-Islamism

Further Reading

Mohammed Ayoob, The Many Faces of Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Muslim World, 2008; Nazih N. Ayubi, Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Arab World, 1991; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Ross E. Dunn, Resistance in the Desert: Moroccan Responses to French Imperialism 1881–1912, 1977; Ahmet Karamustafa, "Community," in Key Themes for the Study of Islam, edited by Jamal J. Elias, 2010; Peter Mandaville, Global Political Islam, 2007; Idem, Transnational Muslim Politics: Reimagining the Umma, 2003; W. Montgomery Watt, Muhammad at Medina, 1981.

J. C. ARSENAULT

Companions of the Prophet

The Companions of the Prophet Muhammad have been a source of religious inspiration and divisive controversy in the Islamic community since its origins. The Arabic terms aṣḥāb rasūl Allāh and ṣaḥāba, meaning "companions," signify the collectivity of men and women who met the Prophet Muhammad during his mission (ca. 610–32), embraced Islam, and remained Muslim until they died. While there is widespread agreement among nearly all Muslims over the political activities of the Companions, Sunnis and Shi'is remain deeply split over the religious authority of these individuals.

The political activities of the Companions can be classified into four historical phases. The first phase lasted for the time of Muhammad's mission, when the Companions served as the Prophet's supporters, soldiers, and commanders of raids in which he was not present. The two great categories of Companions are the emigrants (muhājirūn), who converted to Islam in Mecca prior to the hijra (emigration) of 622, and the helpers (anṣār) of Yathrib (Medina), whose invitation to Muhammad and conversion to Islam led to the foundation of the Muslim political community (umma). Muslim historians have preserved the names and tribal affiliations of most of the emigrants and helpers, whereas information about the thousands of Companions who joined Islam in the later years of Muhammad's mission is far more circumscribed.

The second phase of the Companions' political activities dates from the death of Muhammad until the assassination of the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (d. 656). This age witnessed the Muslim conquests of Syria, Palestine, Egypt, Iraq, and Persia. The caliphs Abu Bakr (r. 632–34), 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), and 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56) all hailed from the prestigious class of emigrant Companions, as did some of their military commanders, such as Abu 'Ubayda b. al-Jarrah (d. 639) in Syria, Sa'd b. Abi Waqqas (d. 675) in central Iraq, and Abu Musa al-Ash'ari (d. 672) in southern Iraq. 'Umar and Abu 'Ubayda played a crucial role in securing Abu Bakr's political dominance over the helpers, a contingent of whom initially sought to elect a leader from among themselves to govern their affairs. Abu Bakr's firm insistence on there being only one supreme leader of the Muslim community from the tribe of Quraysh long remained a central principle of Sunni political theory. 'Umar's deathbed appointment of six emigrants to a consultative council (shūrā) to elect his successor has been seen by many Muslim reformers in the modern period as an early example of "democracy."

The third phase of the Companions' political activities dates from the assassination of 'Uthman in 656 until the assassination of 'Ali b. Abi Talib in 661. The first Muslim civil war (fitna) erupted in the wake of 'Uthman's death. Some Companions, such as Sa'd b. Abi Waqqas and 'Umar's son 'Abdallah (d. 693), remained neutral during this conflict, but most of the Companions who were living at this time supported either the caliph 'Ali (who was also an emigrant) or his adversaries. These adversaries included one of the Prophet's wives, 'A'isha (d. 678), who, along with the emigrants Talha b. 'Ubaydallah (d. 656) and Zubayr b. 'Awwam (d. 656), set out for Basra with an army and were vanquished by 'Ali and his allies at the Battle of the Camel. 'Ali's camp included his sons Hasan (d. 669) and Husayn (d. 680), his cousin 'Abdallah b. 'Abbas (d. ca. 686), and the venerable emigrant 'Ammar b. Yasir (d. 657). His primary rivals after the Battle of the Camel were Mu'awiya b. Abi Sufyan (d. 680), governor of Syria, and the latter's advisor, 'Amr b. al-'As (d. 671). Both men were Companions who had converted to Islam late in the Prophet's career, and Mu'awiya's father, Abu Sufyan (d. ca. 653), had actually led the Meccan opposition to Muhammad until he surrendered his city to the Muslim army in 630. According to the contemporary scholar Fu'ad Jabali, 'Ali had the allegiance of at least 120 Companions, Mu'awiya was supported by at least 31 Companions, and 7 Companions remained neutral during the conflict that lasted from the battle of Siffin (657) until 'Ali was killed by a Muslim rebel (661).

The final phase of the Companions' political activity lasted from the triumph of Mu'awiya until the end of the Second Civil War. Mu'awiya made peace with 'Ali's son (and the Prophet's grandson) Hasan shortly after 'Ali's assassination, and most Companions appear to have devoted their twilight years to teaching Islamic practices during Mu'awiya's largely peaceful reign (661–80). However, two Companions who were children during Muhammad's mission, Muhammad's grandson Husayn b. 'Ali and Zubayr's son, 'Abdallah, raised revolts as soon as Mu'awiya died and his son Yazid (r. 680–84) became caliph. Husayn's revolt was crushed in Karbala, Iraq, in 680, but 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr managed, with the help of his brother Mus'ab in Iraq, to establish a caliphate from his base in Mecca that administered a significant portion of the Islamic empire. Ibn al-Zubayr's caliphate was terminated by the Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwan (r. 685–705) in 692. With the death of Abu al-Tufayl 'Amir b. Wathila, a strong supporter of the political claims of 'Ali and his descendants, around 718 in Mecca, the Companions as a class of Muslims ceased to exist.

From their inceptions, the two largest sects of Islam, Sunnis and Imami (or Twelver) Shi'is, have differed sharply over the religious authority of the Companions. Since the ninth century, Sunnis have insisted that all the Companions were authoritative and that none of the individuals involved in the civil wars was guilty of sin. They also professed that the historical order of the first four caliphs, to whom they affixed the honorific "Rightly Guided," reflects their respective merits. Thus Abu Bakr was the greatest Companion, followed by 'Umar, then 'Uthman, and in fourth place, 'Ali. According to one popular report attributed to the Prophet, ten Companions were promised paradise: the first four caliphs, Talha, Zubayr, Sa'd b. Abi Waqqas, Abu 'Ubayda, 'Abd al-Rahman b. 'Awf (d. 652), and Sa'id b. Zayd (d. ca. 670).

The Imami Shi'is believe that the Prophet Muhammad clearly designated 'Ali as his political successor after the "Farewell Pilgrimage" in the final year of his life at a location called Ghadir Khumm, a pool or marsh located midway between Mecca and Medina. Since the overwhelming majority of the Companions immediately gave their oath of allegiance (bay'a) to Abu Bakr, the Imami Shi'is consider them to have disobeyed the messenger of God and, according to some books, to have become non-Muslims. Thus a tiny number of Companions—Salman al-Farisi (d. ca. 656), Abu Dharr al-Ghifari (d. ca. 652), al-Miqdad b. al-Aswad (d. 654), and 'Ali's sons Hasan and Husayn—were recognized by Imami Shi'is as pious Muslims, while all the remaining Companions, especially Abu Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uthman, Mu'awiya, and 'Amr b. al-'As, were subjected to derision and, occasionally, cursing. These contrasting views of the Companions' religious authority were the primary religious sources of friction between Sunnis and Shi'is in Pakistan, Iraq, Lebanon, Bahrain, and Saudi Arabia.

See also Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634); 'A'isha (ca. 614–78); 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); caliph, caliphate; consultation; Hasan b. 'Ali (ca. 624–70); Husayn b. 'Ali (626–80); Karbala; Mu'awiya I (602–80); oath of allegiance; Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); Sunnism; 'Umar b. al-Khattab (ca. 580–644); 'Uthman b. 'Affan (ca. 579–656)

Further Reading

Fred McGraw Donner, The Early Islamic Conquests, 1981; Fu'ad Jabali, The Companions of the Prophet: A Study of Geographical Distribution and Political Alignments, 2003; Etan Kohlberg, "Some Imami Shi'i Views of the Sahaba," Jerusalem Studies in Arabic and Islam 5 (1984); Idem, "Some Zaydi Views on the Companions of the Prophet," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 39, no. 1 (1976); Martin Lings, Muhammad: His Life Based on the Earliest Sources, 1983; Scott C. Lucas, Constructive Critics, Hadith Literature, and the Articulation of Sunni Islam, 2004.

SCOTT C. LUCAS

consensus

Consensus (ijmā'), a technical term of Islamic jurisprudence, refers to the unanimous agreement of qualified jurists on a particular legal issue, the third of the four principal "sources" of Islamic law after the Qur'an and the sunna and preceding either qiyās (legal analogy) or ijtihād (exhaustive investigation of the bases of a legal ruling), according to most Sunni authorities. Twelver and Zaydi Shi'is also accept the principle. Unlike the Qur'an and sunna, consensus is not a text from which law derives but a sanctioning device that guarantees the infallibility of the ruling subject to agreement, rendering it binding and theoretically removing it from the purview of subsequent challenge and review. Already by the early ninth century, legal theorists recognized consensus as a fundamental principle of legal hermeneutics: both Shafi'i (d. 820) and Abu 'Ubayd al-Qasim b. Sallam (d. 838–39) discussed it. The Mu'tazili theologian Nazzam (d. 835–45) defined consensus as any opinion of which the truth has been incontrovertibly established, a view that suggests a reaction to the argument that consensus is a binding proof (hujja). Ja'far b. Harb (d. 850), another Mu'tazili, wrote a monograph on consensus. Consensus became a standard chapter in manuals of jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh) by the late ninth century, as is evident from the extant references to the manuals of Dawud b. 'Ali b. Khalaf al-Isfahani (d. 884), his son Muhammad b. Dawud (d. 910), and Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923).

According to the classical theorists, the principle of consensus cannot be founded on reason because Jews, Christians, and other groups, despite their large numbers, agree on errors; mere agreement of a particular religious community, even other monotheists, does not guarantee truth. The probative nature of consensus is a special quality of the Muslim community conferred by divine grace, and proof of it must be provided by revelation. Among the most common texts cited as proof of the principle is the famous hadith report, "My community will never agree on an error." In theory, consensus must be based on evidence, and even if the evidence is not known, it is assumed to have existed in the past. Objections in the classical sources question the ability to know that a consensus exists, suggesting that some scholars might remain silent, withholding their opinions out of fear or intimidation, yet the majority of Sunni jurists do not admit that this invalidates the authority (ḥujjiyya) of consensus.

Consensus is an important locus for defining the limits of acceptable religious interpretation and the boundaries of the interpretive community. According to some theorists, including Shafi'i, consensus is of two main types: general consensus on matters such as the number of daily prayers or the obligation to perform the pilgrimage, in which the entire community participates, and scholarly consensus, or the agreement of jurists on more arcane legal issues. The latter is the type discussed in manuals of Islamic jurisprudence; this consensus is not the vox populi of Islamic societies but is more akin to scholarly consensus in a particular field of inquiry, such as astronomy or medicine.

Consensus, along with the institution of the legal madhhab (school of law), worked to control religious discourse and restrict religious authority to scholars who had been trained as jurists. Adherents of the Maliki legal madhhab held that ijmā' ahl al-madīna, the consensus of the scholars of Medina, was a binding authority, apparently on the grounds that the Medinan authorities preserved the traditions of the Prophet better than jurists elsewhere, but adherents of other Islamic legal traditions regularly rejected this position. The opinions of laymen were excluded from consideration, but so too were the opinions of authorities who were not trained jurists, including theologians, hadith experts, caliphs, and other rulers. The vehicle by which this act of exclusion was carried out was the institution of the legal madhhabs, which were established in the course of the ninth and tenth centuries. After that period, no scholar could voice opinions on Islamic law with authority unless he belonged to one of the accepted legal madhhabs. Tabari famously excluded Ahmad b. Hanbal (d. 855) from his historical survey of Islamic legal opinions, Ikhtilaf al-Fuqaha' (The differing legal opinions of the jurists), on the grounds that he was merely a hadith scholar and not a jurist. The caliphs, who in an earlier period had been able to set precedent and change Islamic law of their own accord, were no longer granted the authority to do so. In addition, the theologians were denied consideration on the grounds that they lacked proper legal training. This effectively turned the table on the Mu'tazilis, who had, in concert with the Abbasid caliphs, conducted an inquisition in the early ninth century to impose their views, including the doctrine that the Qur'an is created instead of eternal, on all prominent scholars. The Sunni jurists also rejected participation of the Shi'is and Kharijis, arguing that their legal traditions were not historically valid. To work outside the legal madhhabs and to espouse opinions that were not represented within those traditions was to violate consensus (mukhālafat al-ijmā') or to deviate therefrom (al-khurūj 'an al-ijmā'), and whoever did so willfully was denounced as an unbeliever. By the mid-tenth century, groups threatened with exclusion from the consensus of the jurists reacted to the pressure to conform by affiliating with a particular legal madhhab. Ash'ari theologians most often affiliated with the Shafi'is and Mu'tazili theologians with the Hanafis. Similarly, Shi'is and Kharijis sometimes chose affiliation with a Sunni legal madhhab in order to participate in authoritative religious discourse. The Twelver Shi'is affiliated first with the Zahiri madhhab, then with the Shafi'is, while the Zaydi Shi'is associated primarily with the Hanafis. Both the Twelvers and the Zaydis, however, would go on to claim that, since their legal traditions were as historically valid as those of the Sunnis and since the Sunnis' definitions of consensus and their proof texts logically referred to them, their opinions should be considered in consensus as well.

The question of whose opinions counted for consensus defined the structure of the interpretive community. Debate on legal issues is based on the content of fatwas, or legal responsa, rather than the verdicts of judges. Though jurists were theoretically independent and equal and consensus was described as the end result of free battle of fatwas, in many Islamic societies there was a recognized hierarchy of authority among the jurists. Sayf al-Din al-Amidi (d. 1233), for example, refers to the senior jurists, whose opinions carry authority and thus are able to establish consensus, as ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd (the people of binding and loosing), borrowing a term that originally referred to those who chose a new caliph. Kamal al-Din Muhammad b. Humam (d. 1457) refers to "greater jurists" (akābir), who voice opinions on pressing issues, part of the process of reaching consensus, and "lesser jurists" (aṣāghir), who do not speak out on such issues but follow the greater jurists instead. The debate between these prominent jurists effectively settled new questions such as the legal status of opium, hashish, coffee, and tobacco or the legality of in vitro fertilization or cloning. Some theorists held that it was necessary for the entire generation of jurists who had formed a consensus to die out in order for the consensus to be recognized because one of them might change his mind before he died.

The establishment of a consensus on a particular point of law was usually negative and retroactive: consensus existed when there was an absence of conflicting opinion (khilāf), and many jurists would say that they knew of no dissenting opinion on an issue rather than claiming direct knowledge of a consensus. In addition, works on the disputed points of law were quite common, and the study of these issues formed the higher of two stages in advanced legal study, the first of which was devoted to the study of the standard legal positions (madhhab) of the tradition of legal study to which one adhered. Nevertheless, important works on the points of consensus included al-Ijma' (Consensus) by Abu Bakr Muhammad b. Ibrahim b. al-Naysaburi (d. 921), Maratib al-Ijma' (The degrees of consensus) by Ibn Hazm (d. 1064), and Naqd Maratib al-Ijma' (Refutation of the degrees of consensus) by Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328). In a sense, ijmā' and khilāf are two sides of the same coin: the dissenting opinions of jurists whose opinions are taken into account in consensus are also considered valid contributions to legal debate. Ijmā' and khilāf together represent precedent: the historical record of opinions that must be taken into account by later jurists in arriving at an independent ruling. A description of the levels of consensus by Fakhr al-Islam al-Bazdawi (d. 1089) emphasizes this historical aspect. He distinguishes the consensus of the Prophet's Companions, claiming that it is as strong as the Qur'an or a report attested by multiple chains of transmission (khabar mutawātir); the consensus of those after the Companions, which is of the same level of reliability as a well-known hadith report (ḥadith mashhūr); and a consensus that comes into being after dispute, the validity of which is comparable to a hadith report attested through a solitary chain of transmission. For this reason, knowledge of the points of consensus and dissent is often cited in lists of the requirements for ijtihād, or the ability to derive legal rulings through independent effort.

Consensus has binding authority, and a ruling sanctioned by consensus is understood to be an infallible representation of the divine law. In addition, many theorists hold that, if historical debate reveals two authoritative conflicting opinions on an issue, it is not permissible to adopt a third opinion. This appears to limit inquiry severely and dictate strict adherence to a traditional corpus of legal rulings. In practice, however, it was possible for jurists to propose new rulings by distinguishing the issue at hand from that which had been debated earlier or by showing that the earlier claims of consensus were not actually valid. The claim of consensus has often been used as a rhetorical device in legal debate, sometimes by authorities on both sides of a question and even when the ruling championed is arguably an innovation outside the traditional array of possible opinions. In the modern period, reformers found consensus a hindrance, since classical jurisprudence seems to prevent the origination of new rulings for old questions. Reformers such as Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) argued that consensus should be based on rational inquiry and therefore should be subject to revision and change with the changing circumstances of Islamic societies. Modern theorists have also argued that the circle of interpreters whose opinions should be taken into consideration should be widened to include experts in many fields, weakening the jurists' claimed monopoly on authoritative religious discourse.

See also ijtihād and taqlīd; jurisprudence; shari'a

Further Reading

Wael B. Hallaq, Islamic Legal Theory: An Introduction to Sunni Uṣūl al-Fiqh, 1998; George Makdisi, The Rise of Colleges, 1981; Devin J. Stewart, Islamic Legal Orthodoxy, 1998; Bernard Weiss, The Spirit of Islamic Law, 1998.

DEVIN J. STEWART

constitutionalism

In the most general sense, constitutionalism is the legal regulation of political power, which includes the delimitation of the rightful acquisition, use, and distribution of legitimate political authority and the regulation of relationships among holders of political power and authority and their subjects. Thus while in contemporary parlance to speak of "constitutionalism," Islamic or otherwise, may signify substantive commitments to limited political authority, the regular rotation of power, and the rights of citizens, in this entry the term refers more generally to all thought on public law.

In the pre-Ottoman tradition, constitutional ideas were expressed in debates over the (1) rightful claims to the caliphate; (2) classical rules on the status and qualifications of rulers, succession, rebellion, and political unity; and (3) the functions of government. These debates revealed classical Islamic views on the core issues of constitutionalism: rightful authority, the rightful use of authority, divisions of authority, and limitations on authority.

Doctrines of Rightful Claims to the Caliphate

The early consensus held the caliph (or imam) himself as crucial to salvation because he gave the community legal status and guided it. The Muslim community was thus regarded as a vehicle of salvation. The assassination of the third caliph (ʿUthman b. ʿAffan) in 656 raised for the first time the question of whether ʿUthman had been an imam of guidance or of error. If he had been an imam of guidance, then his successor, ʿAli b. Abi Talib (r. 656–61), would be a usurper, and the community following him would be considered unbelievers. If he was an imam of error, then he had forfeited the caliphate, rendering ʿAli a legitimate imam. These questions were never resolved to the satisfaction of all Muslims.

In the long run, the basic divide was between those who held doctrines of inheritance (legitimism) and those who held doctrines of merit. Hybrid doctrines involved restricting the election of the most meritorious to a particular family or tribe, whether the Prophet's tribe (the Quraysh) at large or his own descendants (ahl al-bayt).

The Umayyads (661–750) grounded their right to rule in the legitimacy of ʿUthman and their right to avenge their kin's death. Their rule represented a restoration of the practice of selection through tribal council (shūrā) of the best man among the Quraysh. They gave two justifications for their return to dynastic succession: (1) each ruler was asserted to be in fact a man of unsurpassed merit, indeed, the best man of his age, and (2) their successful acquisition and retention of power was said to suggest both this merit and God's will. Thus they were "God's vicegerents" (khalīfat Allāh), a politicization of the prevailing deterministic theology.

The Shiʿis ('Alids) grounded right government in right lineage, specifically the house of the Prophet through ʿAli and his wife Fatima. That the ʿAlids were to become the Shiʿis and the party of opposition and protest emerged only after the Abbasids established themselves as a dynasty from a different branch of the Prophet's Hashimi clan. Under the Umayyads, "Hashimi Shiʿism" was the term for the general opposition based on the popularity of the Prophet's wider clan. After the Abbasid revolution (749–50), the opposition was known as ʿAlid Shiʿism, which asserted that ʿAli was designated caliph already by the Prophet. This doctrine is called rafḍ, or "rejection" (i.e., of the first three caliphs as usurpers of ʿAli's right). Their line ended at 12 imams after the Abbasids successfully excluded them politically.

The Abbasids (750–1258) grounded right government in right lineage, specifically the house of the Prophet through his uncle ʿAbbas. Early on in their reign they circulated stories of a designation from ʿAli to the Abbasids or, alternatively, of the bequeathal of the imamate from the Prophet to ʿAbbas. This, incidentally, also implied a doctrine of rafḍ (rejection of the first three caliphs). They gradually reformulated a doctrine that recognized Abu Bakr and ʿUmar al-Khattab and then even ʿUthman and ʿAli, resulting in the commonly known four Rightly Guided Caliphs thesis. The only stable position from beginning to end was that they were members of the Prophet's family (ahl al-bayt) who had rendered themselves deserving of the imamate over all other kinsmen of the Prophet by deposing the Umayyads.

The Kharijis were a group of ʿAli's supporters in the war against ʿUthman's kin who assassinated ʿAli for his willingness to subject the quarrel to arbitration. Their doctrine of legitimate rule was a radically meritocratic one. Anyone (famously, "even an Ethiopian [freed] slave") could be the imam, with no descent criterion whatsoever. They imposed strict election conditions, and some even held that the imam must be elected unanimously by all Muslims. However, the caliph was required to rule Islamically; otherwise he could be deposed and killed by the community. Some (the same group that insisted on unanimous election) claimed not only that the caliphate was not necessary but also that it had never existed.

From the beginning of the civil wars, there were those who stuck to communal unity and refused to form separatist communities under present or future imams even though they might regard the present caliph as sinful. Around the ninth and tenth centuries, they became "Sunnis." They declared the caliphate elective within the Quraysh to legitimate both the Umayyads and the Abbasids while distinguishing themselves from Shiʿi hereditary succession. Communal unity, however, was more important to them than right government, and the community was formed by the guidance left by the Prophet (through the hadith), not by any imam of the day. Sinful imams were to be endured and passively resisted, not openly rebelled against.

The Classical Sunni Rules

Once the caliph was "the deputy of the Prophet" (not of God) and came to symbolize religious and political unity, not religious doctrinal authority, and the scholars appointed themselves as the guardians of religious truth, it was important to specify a set of rules (ahkām) for legitimate political rule. This is the true "constitutional" heritage of classical Islam: that the Islamic polity was a community of law and that the determination of the law was in the hands of the scholars, not the rulers.

The caliph was supposed to be from the Quraysh, but this was flexible. He had to be free of physical and mental handicaps and had to be a man of probity ('adāla), piety (wara'), and significant religious legal knowledge (ijtihād), with a talent for governance and warfare. Ideally, he was supposed to be the most meritorious man of his time.

The Sunni scholars spoke of "election," but by this they meant simply that the caliph was selected by "the community" in some way, as opposed to the imamate having an inherent, transcendent personal quality, as the Shi'is believed. In the Sunni view, no one was born an imam; one had to be chosen by someone else (an existing caliph, a group of select notables ["the people who loosen and bind"], or later, from the tenth century on, even a "warlord" [dhū al-shawka]) and be recognized through the oath of allegiance (bay'a).

How imperfect could a caliph be and still be the caliph? He certainly could not leave Islam or suffer serious physical or mental disabilities. The real question related to when the caliph lost his "probity," both personally and as a ruler. The basic answer was that while immorality (fisq) disqualified a candidate for election, it did not automatically make him subject to removal. Removing him could be done only through civil war, which was a much worse source of disruption, disorder, bloodshed, and corruption for the "people of (the Prophet's) authoritative practice and communal unity" (ahl al-sunna wa-l-jamā'a). This, perhaps, was the single great lacuna in the basic Sunni "constitutionalism" described earlier and what prevented Sunnism from developing constitutionalism proper.

Of course, the diminished role and status of the caliph allowed this pragmatic view: he simply didn't matter enough to risk civil war. The idea that the community (in the form of religious scholars, perhaps) should take an active role in deposing an unjust ruler was hardly rare. Thus the following positions could all be found: (1) the ruler must be obeyed and tolerated; (2) rebels are to be fought but pardoned; (3) rulers can be deposed, but we do not have precise rules on how it is to be done and on what cost. On the other hand, there was a certain sympathy for rebels (bughāt) who revolted (khurūj) in great enough numbers (shawka) and with a religious "interpretation" (ta'wīl). They were to be treated leniently afterward and not held responsible for destroyed lives and property. "Bear the ruler but spare the rebel" encapsulates the position. The Sunni position was not Hobbesian (might makes right) or absolutist. In fact, though the Sunni scholars valued stability and legal order above all else, the state per se was not the highest object of loyalty, and the state had no monopoly on religious or moral interpretation. Both of these, loyalty and religious interpretation, belonged to the community. The community and the practice of Islamic interpretation was the essential, transcendent, necessary reality. Thus rebels could be pardoned both because the pardon contributed to reconciliation and unity and because the scholars might be able to understand the reasons for the rebellion. And, of course, rebels who won would then be accepted and obeyed. (The concept of "moral luck" is also at work here: rebels who won and imposed a more pious order could in fact be lionized.) This is evidence of tensions—but not outright contradictions—in Sunni thought between obedience, order, and stability on the one hand and piety, justice, and "commanding right and forbidding wrong" on the other.

Mawardi (d. 1058) began the trend of recognizing those who usurped power in the provinces (imārat al-istīlā'). The idea in doing so was to keep both the fictional unity of the umma or jamā'a and the continuity of legal order intact. These ideas were developed by Mawardi's contemporary Juwayni (d. 1085) who argued that the caliphate or imamate existed to keep the people together on a shared basis of Islamic law, which itself required not only legitimacy but also power and competence. Everything else, such as Qurashi descent, was dispensable. Juwayni's solution to the Sunni scholars' dilemma of prohibiting rebellion but also wanting actual coercive power to be in the hands of the caliph was to say that a warlord could not only usurp power but also take the next step of seizing the caliphate. In effect, he wanted to make the real power lie in the hands of the caliph, whether that was the "sultan" of the time or even the "minister" (wazīr; e.g., a figure like Nizam al-Mulk). This was a proposal to secularize the caliphate. If actual power was already in the hands of warlords, why keep a spare figure who has neither power nor religious authority? Juwayni thought it better to induce the actual power to assume religious and symbolic legitimacy. Juwayni's student, Ghazali (d. 1111), advocated the opposite solution. Whereas Juwayni seemed to want an effective ruler, Ghazali wanted a legitimate imam. For Ghazali, the legitimacy of the legal order and public sphere (judges, marriages, deputies) all depended on their being appointed by a legitimate imam. Perhaps in response to the Isma'ilis' claims to live under a true imam of guidance, Ghazali seems to have felt that the Sunnis needed a "real imam" who represented genuine Islamic learning or to argue that ijtihād was not a requirement of the imam, who existed solely to validate communal Islamic life. He thus seemed to believe that without somehow showing the present imam to be legitimate the community would lose its public sphere. What this involved is not finding the man who would be a legitimate imam, or giving the imamate to the sultan of the day, but to keep redefining the role and qualifications of the imam so that the existing one would be legitimate. Thus Ghazali preferred to recognize the secular power of the Turkish sultans to the extent that their power was what identified the caliph (by formally acknowledging him and symbolically offering him their allegiance), while his reciprocal recognition legitimated them. If the secular ruler supplied the power, the caliph supplied the moral purpose for which power was to be used. One needed a ruler (power) to acquire a ruler (authority). The idea was thus to be realistic about the emergence of actual military power but also to not lose hope about the possibility of taming this power, of convincing it that it served a higher moral purpose.

The Functions of Government

The jurists expressed their views of the limits on the use of power largely through discussions of the ruler's obligations. Those obligations were divided into Shar'ī duties (those prescribed by the religious law) and non-Shar'ī duties (those tasks that were recommended or beneficial but not mandatory).

Shar'ī Duties

Validation of the community. Flexibility on this issue became the hallmark of Sunnism. Activist groups like the Zaydis and Kharijis did not flourish, while the Imami Shi'is became quietist.

Validation of public worship. The Muslim holy day of Friday was to be marked by a communal prayer that a just imam was supposed to validate. Thus groups that believe the present ruler was unjust would hold that there could be no Friday communal prayer. The Sunnis, however, held that Friday prayers (as well as the payment of the zakat and ṣadaqa religious alms taxes) could continue despite an immoral imam or later in the absence of any imam whatsoever. These matters were subject to sectarian disagreements.

Execution of the law. This was the essence of the imam's functions and the one from which all others derived. It consisted of establishing courts and appointing judges and local governors. With the weakening and then occasional absence of such an imam, the jurists debated whether the scholars themselves could establish and validate legal authority. It was Ghazali's position that the entire edifice of Muslim society required legitimate appointment by an imam, but this position did not withstand the events of history. The essence of Sunni constitutionalism was that the law that the imam or ruler was meant to implement was not his to determine. At most, the legal political order could tolerate the ruler's discretionary authority granted and circumscribed by the law.

Execution of the ḥudūd punishments. The ḥudūd were a set of limited punishments for the worst moral offenses, such as murder, adultery, false accusation, highway robbery, theft, wine-drinking, and (sometimes) apostasy and blasphemy. The corporal nature of the punishments involved lashing, amputation, or death. Originally, the application of these punishments was the monopoly of the imam, since they addressed violations of the "rights of God," not private or civil offenses. Some scholars (across various sects) argued that only jurists and judges could order the punishments; others argued that certain punishments, including those for adultery, could be administered in private. Such debates addressed various aims and imperatives: not only obeying God, upholding morality, and creating an Islamic order but also preserving social peace and stability, avoiding anarchism, and respecting the privacy and presumptive innocence of Muslims.

Jihad. There were two kinds of jihad: defensive and missionary. The protection of Islamic lands against an outside invasion did not require the presence or permission of an imam. The use of force to bring Islamic law to unbelievers, however, could be done only with the leadership of a rightful imam. Thus Shi'is who held the imam to be absent also held that the duty of jihad had been suspended. Among the Sunnis, missionary jihad was a collective duty (farḍ kifāya) that the community had to discharge. Thus Sunni scholars willing to see the legal life of the community continue in the absence of a just ruler had the resources to see jihad as something the community could validate; it could not be suspended merely by the lack of a just ruler.

Commanding right and forbidding wrong. There was a general duty in Islam to "command the right and forbid the wrong"—that is, to promote morality as revealed in the law. The institution of the ḥisba was the expression of this. The imam was supposed to appoint a person to supervise the market and public morals (office holder: muḥtasib). Like jihad, this was a collective duty, although, also like jihad, there could be individual duties in connection with it. The ability of individual Muslims to take the enforcement of morality into their own hands is a matter of debate. Some scholars, seeing the capacity for anarchy and the violation of privacy, insisted that only public officials could enforce morality. Others held that self-help was permissible in the enforcement of morality; all Muslims were their brother's keepers, so to speak. (Ghazali wrote famously on this, and the Hanbali school, the descendants of the hadith scholars, were known for this view.) Wine bottles could be smashed, house parties could be crashed, and people could be flogged for illicit activities. This is the "pious zealotry" strain in Islamic political thought, which is in perpetual conflict with the "stability and social order" strain. The latter strain, in which rulers were to be endured without rebellion and the state enforced law and morality, was not in principle more tolerant of moral vice: morality could be enforced in principle, including by physical means, but there was merely a caution about who could do so and when.

Preservation of religion. This included promoting both orthodoxy and orthopraxy and is thus part of "commanding right and forbidding wrong." The ruler was supposed to take both positive steps to make sure right religion was represented and taught in his area of rule and also negative steps to deal with heterodoxy. The muḥtasib could check on beliefs propagated in public, test religious teachers, and correct false interpretations of doctrine. When people failed to correct their views, he could turn them over to the ruler for punishment. Here, private action (self-help) also surfaced: people could report on others and scholars were known to single out people for heterodoxy and even to organize mobs. Targets included Mu'tazilis, dualists (Manicheans), materialists, philosophers, Sufis, Shi'is, false prophets, deviant Qur'an reciters, and blasphemers.

Fiscal services and taxation. The imam was supposed to collect only three taxes: the poll tax on non-Muslim residents (the jizya), the land tax (kharāj, 'ushr), and the tithe (zakat, ṣadaqa). Muslim conquerors used the poll tax and land tax to deal with immovable war spoils (fay'): they left the land in the hands of the conquered subjects but extracted taxes for it, which were then distributed to the conquerors in the form of stipends. Eventually the taxes would be regarded as the collective property of all Muslims to be spent in the public interest. The imam was also entitled to a fifth (khums) of movable war spoils (ghanīma), which he was to use for the public interest, including poverty relief.

Non-Shar'ī Duties

The imam or other rulers were also expected or entitled to use public power to protect internal security, improve infrastructure (roads, bridges, inns, walls, and mosques), promote charity and social welfare, provide public medical services, and sponsor religious education. Many of these were provided by nonruling notables and others in addition to the state. Their provision varied greatly according to time and place.

See also authority; caliph, caliphate; governance; government; imamate; nation-state; Quraysh; republicanism

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, "Political Crime in Islamic Jurisprudence and Western Legal History," UC Davis Journal of International Law and Policy 4, no. 1 (1998); Asma Afsaruddin, "The 'Islamic State': Genealogy, Facts, Myths," Journal of Church and State 48, no. 1 (2006); Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam: Six Centuries of Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2005; Wael Hallaq, The Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, 2005; Sherman A. Jackson, Islamic Law and the State: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Shihab al-Din al-Qarafi, 1996; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession to Muhammad: A Study of the Early Caliphate, 1998; Abu al-Hasan al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government: A Translation of al-Ahkām al-Sultāniyya w'al-Wilāyāt al-Dīniyya, translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 1996; Bernard Weiss, The Spirit of Islamic Law, 1998; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, "The Caliphs, the 'Ulama', and the Law: Defining the Role and Function of the Caliph in the Early 'Abbasid Period," Islamic Law and Society 4, no. 1 (1997).

ANDREW F. MARCH

Constitution of Medina

The so-called Constitution of Medina is the most significant surviving document from the time of the Prophet Muhammad; it is Muhammad's first legal document. Its two main versions are found in Muhammad's biography and in several other sources. In Muhammad's biography, it is placed among the events of the first year after the hijra, or emigration, of 622. The emigration brought Muhammad from his hometown of Mecca to Medina, a cluster of towns that, in the document, was still called Yathrib, after a town at the northwestern edge of the cluster. The term "constitution" is a misnomer, since the document deals with tribal matters such as warfare, blood money, the ransoming of captives, and war expenditures. Some clauses are enigmatic, presumably because their terminology reflects the little-known legal vocabulary of Medina.

Close scrutiny of the document reveals that it is not made up of several distinct documents, as some have argued, but is rather one document divided into two clearly defined sections. The first section includes the rights and duties of the mu'minūn (literally, "believers"). The singular form mu'min and the plural form mu'minūn appear almost 30 times in this section, hence it can be called the Treaty of the Mu'minūn. Nine groups participated in this section: the muhājirūn, or emigrants who came with Muhammad from Mecca, and eight groups belonging to the two main tribes of Medina: the Aws and Khazraj. Five of the eight groups belonged to the Khazraj and three to the Aws.

The second section includes the rights and duties of the yahūd, or the Jews, and their clients and can hence be called the Treaty of the Jews; it is a treaty of nonbelligerency and cooperation. The shift from the first section to the second one is clearly discernible: the latter begins with a clause addressed to the Jews that stipulates, "The Jews share expenditure with the mu'minūn as long as they are at war." The treaty of the Jews includes almost 40 clauses, some of which relate to "the people of this document"—namely, all of those listed in both sections.

In addition to mu'minūn and yahūd, the document refers to an obscure group, the muslimūn. They appear in the opening clause as a main party to the document that was concluded "between the mu'minūn and muslimūn from Quraysh and Yathrib." But unlike the mu'minūn, who are mentioned frequently, the muslimūn appear in only two clauses, both in the Treaty of the Jews. The first clause is at the beginning of a list of Jewish participants and relates to the Yahud Bani 'Awf (the Jews of Banu 'Awf). It stipulates that the yahūd have their dīn, or religion, while the muslimūn have theirs. The muslimūn in question either were part of the Yahud Bani 'Awf or were associated with them in one way or another. Both yahūd and muslimūn probably were found among the other Jewish groups listed later in the document, which would account for the appearance of the muslimūn in the opening clause as a main party. The second clause that includes the muslimūn stipulates that the yahūd and the muslimūn bear their (war) expenses separately.

Six out of the nine groups listed in the treaty of the Jews had counterparts among the groups listed in the treaty of the mu'minūn—for example, Banu 'Awf and Yahud Bani 'Awf. This leaves three groups out of the nine that had no such counterparts. One of the three, Tha'laba, was Jewish and should be identified with a Jewish tribe of the same name. The other two, Jafna and Shutayba, were non-Jewish. The Jafna and Shutabya belonged to the Ghassan (an alliance of tribal groups from the tribe of Azd), and the same is probably true of the Jewish Tha'laba. The tribal alliance of Ghassan was for decades allied with Byzantium, but the political implications of the Ghassani descent of these groups are as yet unknown. As for the three main Jewish tribes of Medina—Nadir, Qurayza, and Qaynuqa'—they do not appear in the document simply because they were not part of it. Muhammad's nonbelligerency treaties with them were far more basic than this document.

At the beginning of the document, the mu'minūn and muslimūn from the Quraysh and Yathrib are declared an umma, or a community: a group of mutual solidarity. This was not an empty declaration and had clear legal implications. For example, a mu'min must not kill another mu'min in retaliation for a kafir, or a nonbeliever. In other words, a mu'min could not exact vengeance for, say, his brother who was a nonbeliever and had been killed by another mu'min. The new umma superseded the old tribal solidarity and severed the links between those who had followed Muhammad and those who had not.

The term umma also occurs at the beginning of the treaty of the Jews: the earlier-mentioned Yahud Bani 'Awf—probably the leading Jewish group in this document—are declared an umma alongside the umma of the mu'minūn, or perhaps even part of that umma. Both possibilities seem to be unlikely—after all, the Treaty of the Jews was fundamentally different from the Treaty of the Mu'minūn. Hence an admittedly rare variant reading of the word umma has to be adopted, namely a.m.n (with the added character nūn; there are several possible vocalizations of a.m.n, but they do not affect the meaning). The previously mentioned Jewish group—and all the other groups in the Treaty of the Jews that were entitled to the same rights—received a guarantee of security from the mu'minūn.

The document severely destabilized the internal tribal system of Medina, as well as the intertribal alliances on which Medinan politics were founded. This allowed Muhammad to introduce a new political order that separated the mu'minūn, who had followed him, from the families and tribes that had not. When hostilities with the Jews broke out, they could no longer rely on their old alliances, since the tribes that were allied with them were split between tribe members that became mu'minūn and were loyal to Muhammad and other tribe members that were not yet mu'minūn.

In the premodern period, the Constitution of Medina became one of the bases—along with other episodes in the life of the Prophet and early Islamic history portrayed in hadith reports, biographical sources, and historical accounts—for the elaboration of siyar (the Islamic law governing war and relations with non-Muslim powers). Some modern Muslim thinkers have considered the document a precursor of modern state constitutions and have presented it as the ideal model for an Islamic state. In addition, it is often referred to as a historical landmark in modern discussions of international law and international treaties from an Islamic perspective. Nineteenth-century reformers such as Muhammad 'Abduh saw in the document an authentic precedent for modifying and removing some of the traditional Islamic legal restrictions placed on Jews and Christians living under Muslim rule, and it continues to be cited frequently in contemporary debates on tolerance, religious pluralism, and relations among Muslims, Christians, and Jews, both within the Muslim world and outside it.

See also alliances; Mecca and Medina; Muhammad (570–632)

Further Reading

Moshe Gil, "The Constitution of Medina: A Reconsideration," Israel Oriental Studies 4 (1974); Michael Lecker, The Constitution of Medina: Muhammad's First Legal Document, 2004; R. B. Serjeant, "The Sunnah Jāmi'ah, Pacts with the Yathrib Jews, and the Taḥrīm of Yathrib: Analysis and Translation of the Documents Comprised in the So-Called 'Constitution of Medina,'" Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 41 (1978); Arent Jan Wensinck, Muhammad and the Jews of Medina [Mohammed en de Joden te Medina], 1908, with an excursus by Julius Wellhausen, translated and edited by W. H. Behn, 1975.

MICHAEL LECKER

consultation

The idea of mutual consultation, or shūrā (also mushāwara, mashwara, tashāwur, or istishāra in Arabic, i.e., conferring with other individuals or a group), which is referred to in the Qur'an (42:38; cf. 2:233, 3:159) and the sunna as an aid to decision making in both private and public affairs, has become the core value of a newly propagated Islamic system with the rise of Islamic fundamentalism. In Islamic history, the term shūrā is especially connected with the small council of prominent early Muslims, which selected 'Uthman b. 'Affan as the third caliph. In the following centuries, the notion of consultation remained attractive for dissidents (e.g., Kharijis), who used it to question the legitimacy of the reigning dynasty of the day. Likewise, the motif of advice appears in several obviously nonauthentic reports on the Rightly Guided Caliphs, who supposedly held councils frequently concerning important matters of the state. In Arabic-Islamic literature, particularly in books on etiquette, the merits of consultation were praised and arbitrary personal rule condemned. Nevertheless, shūrā neither played a central role in premodern Muslim reasoning on the Islamic state nor was ever institutionalized prior to the 19th century. Occasionally, judges or rulers applied shūrā in order to distribute responsibility in sensitive cases. As in pre-Islamic tribal society, however, the consultation circles in the premodern era remained ad hoc assemblies and exclusive bodies.

In the 19th century, reformers began to seize upon the ideal of consultative government as a way of arguing for the basic compatibility between Islam and constitutionalism. Intensive research on shūrā since the 1970s did not result in an innovative approach to deliberative democracy. Generally, the debate remained confined to a retrospective discourse of Islamic jurisprudence, focusing on the same questions as centuries before: What is the meaning of shūrā and its derivatives? What is the scope and necessity of its application? Is consultation obligatory or only recommended? Are the results of the consultative process binding or nonbinding? Who are the councilors, and who should select or elect them? On which issues is consultation allowed? When a concrete political system had to be identified with shūrā, both religious and secular authors either adopted a conventional Western model or defined Islamic systems only in the negative (in other words, in contrast to autocracy or theocracy). As a result, theories of an Islamic democracy have offered reformulations of Western perceptions in an Islamic idiom rather than a real alternative.

Notwithstanding the great spectrum of theories, four tendencies can be distinguished in the contemporary debate on shūrā and democracy. Representatives of the first tendency, radical Islamists such as Sayyid Qutb and his adherents, see the superiority of an Islamic system based on shari'a and shūrā; democracy as well as political parties and the sovereign electorate are condemned as alien ideas, rooted in evil and unbelief. The opposite view, held by 'Allal al-Fasi and Khalid Muhammad Khalid, among others, equates shūrā with a kind of original or authentic Arabic-Islamic democracy. A third view is held by the majority of pragmatic or moderate Islamists. They have embraced the rhetoric and politics of democratization and have adopted several aspects of the reformist discourse. Apart from consultation, consensus and ijtihād (individual reasoning with particular reference to the so-called public benefit) are crucial concepts in their articulation of an Islamic democracy. Shūrā is often considered a comprehensive principle not limited to the political sphere but equally desirable in other realms, including familial matters. The specific political order should accord with the requirements of the times, provided it remains within a framework of Islamic principles. Critical issues in conceptions, such as those of the major ideologists of the Muslim Brotherhood, are the implications of this particular view for the legal status of both women and religious minorities and the degree to which tolerance and pluralism are accepted. Insisting on the centrality of a fixed shari'a without defining its exact meaning, maintaining a traditionalist gender discourse, restricting religious freedom to monotheist religions, and expressing disdain toward "alien" values such as individualism, secularism, materialism, and atheism call into question their adherence to the concept of liberal democracy. All in all, proponents of this tendency seem to envisage the Islamization and moralization of democracy.

The fourth tendency is represented by various secular scholars and intellectuals, among them Mohamed Talbi (b. 1921) or Mohammed 'Abed al-Jabri (1935–2010). Having realized the necessity of a culturally embedded democracy, they perceive shūrā as an essential principle derived from the Qur'an and sunna and consider it one of the universal principles that all humans know through their innate sense. The secular modernists discern in shūrā not an early democracy awaiting contemporary resurrection but rather some general human truth or, as Talbi puts it, an antityrannical ethos. Since human institutions and organizational forms are always time-bound and limited, the actual task is to work out a concept of government in the Islamic territory that would realize the higher ideal, whether one calls it democracy or shūrā.

Because of the Imami Shi'i doctrine of the imamate, shūrā has never played a key role in Shi'i political thought, not even in modern times.

In practice, the idea of consultation has proven to be compatible with various political systems, whether monarchical or republican, with nominated or selected members, and with assemblies of different kinds.

See also advice; caliph, caliphate; constitutionalism; democracy; human rights; pluralism and tolerance; representation; Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); succession

Further Reading

Roswitha Badry, "Marja'iyya and Shūrā," in The Twelver Shia in Modern Times: Religious Culture & Political History, edited by Rainer Brunner and Werner Ende, 2001; Eadem, "'Democracy' versus 'Shura-cracy': Failures and Chances of a Discourse and Its Counter-Discourse," in 30 Years of Arabic and Islamic Studies in Bulgaria, edited by Tzvetan Theophanov, Penka Samsareva, Yordan Peev, and Pavel Pavlovitch, 2008; John Cooper, Ronald L. Nettler, and Mohamed Mahmoud, eds., Islam and Modernity: Muslim Intellectuals Respond, 1998; Larbi Sadiki, The Search for Arab Democracy: Discourses and Counter-Discourses, 2004.

ROSWITHA BADRY

contracts

'Aqd, conventionally understood as "contract," may be more precisely understood as the confirmation of an obligation or undertaking (Lisān al-'Arab, Ibn Manzur). The Qur'an refers to 'aqd in numerous verses (e.g., see 5:1, al-Ma'ida), as well as the closely related term, 'ahd (e.g., see 23:8, al-Mu'minun). The Qur'an describes faithfulness to such undertakings as a fundamental attribute of believers. Although it is generically used in Islamic jurisprudence to refer to all sorts of contracts, here we are specifically concerned with its usage in Islamic political thought. Not only is the concept of a contract foundational to the idea of the caliphate, but it is equally constitutive of other political offices within Islamic constitutional law. It also represents the basic framework by which Muslim jurists understand international law.

The contract of the imamate (unlike other generic contracts in Islamic law such as that of a sale or marriage, for example) is obligatory according to the vast majority of premodern Sunni authorities. Muslim theologians have disputed whether the obligatory character of the imamate is a rational obligation or one derived from revelation. Mawardi (d. 1058), a prominent Shafi'i jurist and author of al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government), reports both positions, and the prominent jurist, theologian, and mystic, Ghazali (d. 1111), even as he claims a revelatory source—consensus—as the origin of the obligation, nevertheless grounds that consensus in practical reason: human life, including religion, cannot flourish in the absence of a state (al-Iqtisad fi al-I'tiqad). Accordingly, despite the religious connotations of the imamate, the institution in the writings of the jurists takes on a largely functional character intended to further the secular welfare of the community. This functional character is reflected clearly (1) in the statement of the jurists that the caliphate, as an institution, involves the claims of man as well as the claims of God and (2) by the representational character of the caliphate.

Like any other contract, the contract of the caliphate involves two parties. On one side is the community of Muslims (al-muslimūn or 'āmmat al-muslimīn), represented by a group of electors ("those who loosen and bind," ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd), and on the other is the candidate(s). The electors are to select the fittest candidate as imam or caliph, considering both the legal requirements for the office and the wishes of the community. They then offer the office to the successful candidate who only becomes caliph upon his acceptance of the offer. Alternatively, the sitting caliph can designate a successor via the device of 'ahd. This power is consistent with the representative character of the contract insofar as Islamic law treats the caliph, when appointing a successor, as one acting on behalf of the community, not for himself. Accordingly, although the caliph has the power to appoint a successor, he lacks the power to dismiss him without cause. Offices of the caliphate can be divided into those that are deemed to be mere delegates of the ruler, such as viziers—in which case their jurisdiction terminates upon the death or dismissal of the ruler—or offices whose incumbents enjoin tenure independent of the will of the ruler and can only be dismissed for legal cause, such as local rulers (umarā'), if they had been appointed by the caliph.

Just as the relationship between the Muslim community and its ruler is specified by the terms of a ruler's contract, so too is the relationship between the ruler and the other offices of the caliphate determined by a contract of appointment ('aqd al-tawliya, 'aqd al-taqlīd). The contract of appointment would specify the extent of the office holder's powers and the jurisdiction over which the office holder could exercise that power.

The Islamic state's relationship with non-Muslims was also structured contractually. A non-Muslim could reside temporarily in an Islamic state pursuant to a temporary grant of security (amān or 'ahd), or permanently pursuant to a grant of permanent protection (dhimma). The chief difference between the two was in the depth of solidarity created between the non-Muslim and the Islamic state as a result of the particular relationship. Because of the temporary nature of the residence of a non-Muslim in Islamic territory pursuant to an amān or an 'ahd, he was not under an obligation to pay the jizya tax, a per capita levy payable by a non-Muslim permanently residing in Islamic territory. Conversely, the non-Muslim who was a permanent resident in an Islamic state was obliged to pay this tax as part of the relationship of permanent protection. In exchange, however, the Islamic state was obliged to afford him military protection against all aggressors, whereas it was obliged with respect to those non-Muslims only temporarily living in Islamic territory to protect them against aggression from Muslims. Likewise, a non-Muslim permanent resident of an Islamic state had a greater obligation to obey the substantive rules of Islamic law than did a non-Muslim only temporarily residing in the territory of an Islamic state. Although the contractual relationship between Muslims and non-Muslims permanently residing in an Islamic state is not described as involving claims of God, nevertheless the contract of dhimma must include certain mandatory provisions. Accordingly, a contract of dhimma, from the perspective of Islamic law, includes mandatory provisions as well as permissive provisions that are subject to negotiation between the Islamic state and the non-Muslim. A breach of one or more of the mandatory provisions of the contract of dhimma by a dhimmī constitutes a repudiation of the contract of protection. Mandatory provisions of the contract of dhimma include, for example, prohibitions against cursing the Prophet Muhammad, disparaging Islam, or fornicating with a Muslim woman. An example of a permissive provision would be the rule requiring non-Muslims to wear distinctive dress. Because such a term is not mandatory, as a matter of legal theory not all contracts of dhimma need include it.

Finally, the relationship of Muslims to non-Islamic states was also deemed to be contractual via the device of the amān. The question of the permissibility for a Muslim to take up permanent residence in a non-Islamic state was often considered in light of the terms of the amān that were being offered to the Muslim. If, for example, he would be permitted to manifest his religion freely, there would be a greater chance that Muslim jurists would deem such residence to be permissible.

Despite the ambiguities inherent in the notion of the manifestation of religion, the general rule was that Muslims are bound by their obligations and that if a Muslim wished to renounce protection granted to him by a non-Muslim power or its agent, he had to renounce it openly. Likewise, if a non-Muslim, whether temporarily or permanently in an Islamic state, repudiated his contract, he was not to be killed or fought merely for that repudiation; rather, he was to be deported safely to the frontier. Non-Muslims resident in the Islamic state could be killed or fought on the territory of the Islamic state only if they aided non-Muslim invaders in making war on the Muslims.

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; caliph, caliphate; government; imamate; minorities; taxation

Further Reading

Malcolm Kerr, Islamic Reform: The Political and Legal Theories of Muhammad 'Abduh and Rashid Rida, 1966; Andrew March, Islam and Liberal Citizenship: The Search for an Overlapping Consensus, 2009.

MOHAMMAD FADEL

conversion

"Conversion" is a word fraught with imprecision. The psychologist William James described the conversion experiences of Christian enthusiasts listening to evangelical preachers at camp meetings. Arthur Darby Nock recounted the conversion experiences of figures like the Christian St. Augustine and the Isis-worshipping protagonist of Apuleius's novel The Golden Ass. General histories of Europe attribute early conversion to Christianity to the underground activities of Roman slaves, persecution or forced conversion by rulers, the semilegendary activities of apostles and missionaries, and the outcomes of military campaigns.

The conceptual tools derived from these approaches do not greatly help the historian of Islamic conversion. Though revivalist preaching, which can inspire zealous commitments to the faith in certain individuals who are already Muslim, is currently common in some Muslim communities, this is not usually termed "conversion." The Arabic word da'wa, or "call," covers both revivalism and proselytization, but it is more strongly associated with the former activity. Nor does premodern Muslim literature contain much in the way of personal testimony about individual paths to Islam à la St. Augustine. Semilegendary missionaries do receive some attention after the 13th-century rise of Sufi brotherhoods, but rarely before. And evidence of conversions achieved by conquest or a ruler's fiat is similarly rare.

Within the Muslim tradition, the earliest history of the community yields conflicting paradigms: 'Umar b. al-Khattab, overcome with anger toward Muhammad, was instantly won over when he heard the recitation of verses from the Qur'an's Surat Taha. Conversion here is ecstatic. The Aws and Khazraj tribes of Medina proclaimed themselves Muslims in a treaty concluded before most of them had ever seen or heard the Prophet. Conversion here is collective without significant individual preparation. Tribes that had fallen away from allegiance to the Muslim leadership in Medina reentered the community, albeit under a cloud, after being defeated in war by a Muslim army after the Wars of Apostasy (hurub al-ridda). Conversion here reflects coercion, though only from a state of apostasy. Outside of Arabia, individual conversion narratives are rare, and the verb aslama in histories of the early conquests is sometimes ambiguous since it can mean both "surrender" and "become Muslim."

Over time, conversion conventions of both a substantive and procedural nature arose. In the first two centuries, individuals are often described as converting "at the hands of" (fi yaday) another Muslim. But this usage wanes in the early Abbasid period. The shahada, or the profession that there is no god but God and that Muhammad is the messenger of God, emerges in many written works as a verbal marker of conversion, though often with the untestable proviso that it be enunciated in the heart and not just with the lips. New Muslims often have religiously distinctive names conferred on them, and by the Mamluk period, they are commonly designated as "son of 'Abdallah." Occasional reports from the Abbasid period well into Ottoman times depict the convert being given religiously appropriate clothing or money for acquiring such clothing. Finally, a male convert may be required to undergo circumcision, though this is rarely mentioned in accounts of collective conversion.

However, none of these concomitants of conversion, including circumcision, has a strong evidentiary base dating back to the pre-Abbasid era. There is no regularly attested equivalent to Christian baptism as an indicator of conversion to Islam. Consequently, historians have speculated widely about the rate and causes of the spread of Islam. The main schools of thought on conversion have been the following: forced conversion following defeat in battle, or "conversion by the sword"; conversion to avoid paying the jizya tax imposed by Muslim rulers on "peoples of the book," the scripture-based faith communities also known as *dhimmi*s; conversion caused by information-based logarithmic growth following the pattern attested in many cases of technological diffusion; group or tribal conversion symbolized by the words or actions of a group or tribal leader; conversion for clear-cut economic advantage; conversion to escape from slavery; and conversion as a result of gradual growth in response to the preaching or pious example of Sufis, merchants, or both.

Central to all of these approaches has been the assumption that being a Muslim is clearly distinguishable from belonging to some other faith community. This has constrained discussion of middle positions between Islam and other faiths. Yet many groups generally classified, or self-classified, as Muslim have syncretic characteristics that link them closely to other religious traditions. In the early centuries, sects based in part on Muslim practices or scriptural example (e.g., the Barghawata and the followers of Ha-Mim in North Africa or the followers of Muqanna' in northeastern Iran) were clearly identified as threats to the true Muslim faith and forcefully suppressed. In later times, however, groups of questionable Muslim identity (e.g., the Druze in greater Syria, the Alevis and Bektashis in Anatolia, the Baha'is in Iran, the Ahmadis in Pakistan, the Nation of Islam in the United States) established themselves successfully. Sufism also became a way station between "normative" Islam and local spiritual traditions in many parts of the Muslim world to such a degree that the Dutch colonial administration in the Dutch East Indies (today Indonesia) designated most of the country's inhabitants as "nominal Muslims."

Substantive intellectual or behavioral reasons for individuals or groups converting to Islam are often advanced. These include the simplicity of Islamic monotheism, as opposed to Trinitarian Christianity; the practice of polygamy, which is alleged to appeal to societies that already indulge in plural marriages; an intrinsic superiority of monotheism over polytheism; a supposed fraternal Muslim blindness to distinctions of race and color; and a presumed Muslim opposition to global domination by modern Western political and cultural powers. These allegations are only rarely backed up with empirical evidence. Thus conversion to Islam, both generally and locally, remains hard to define, hard to measure, and hard to explain.

See also apostasy; ijtihād and taqlīd; minorities; patronage; People of the Book

Further Reading

W. Thomas Arnold, The Preaching of Islam: A History of the Propagation of the Muslim Faith, 1913; Monique Bernards and John Nawas, eds., Patronate and Patronage in Early Classical Islam, 2005; Richard W. Bulliet, Conversion to Islam in the Medieval Period: An Essay in Quantitative History, 1979; Idem, Cotton, Climate, and Camels in Early Islamic Iran: A Moment in World History, 2009; Daniel C. Dennett Jr., Conversion and the Poll Tax in Early Islam, 1950; Devin Deweese, Islamization and Native Religion in the Golden Horde: Baba Tükles and Conversion to Islam in Historical and Epic Tradition, 1994; Richard M. Eaton, The Rise of Islam and the Bengal Frontier, 1204–1760, 1993; Michael Gervers and Ramzi Jibran Bikhazi, eds., Conversion and Continuity: Indigenous Christian Communities in Islamic Lands, Eighth to Eighteenth Centuries, 1990; Nehemia Levtzion, ed., Conversion to Islam, 1979; Anton Minkov, Conversion to Islam in the Balkans: Kisve Bahasi Petitions and Ottoman Social Life, 1670–1730, 2004.

RICHARD W. BULLIET

coup d'état

During the 1950s and 1960s, numerous Muslim countries saw secret cliques of officers successfully conspire to overthrow the incumbent civilian government. In Egypt, for example, the Free Officers abrogated the monarchy after their 1952 coup. Gamal Abdel Nasser (1918–70) then advanced to the leadership position, replacing the original figurehead of the coup, General Muhammad Naguib. Nasser did not rely on the army simply to seize power; he inserted loyal military personnel at all levels of the state apparatus to consolidate his control. In contrast, military rule in Syria proved more difficult to institutionalize, with three successive coups in 1949 alone; civilian government was reestablished in 1954 when a military faction overthrew the authoritarian military ruler. Syrian officers opposed to Nasser later forced an end to Syria's political union with Egypt in 1961, while the Arab Socialist Ba'th Party installed itself as Syria's new ruler in the coup of March 8, 1963; factional struggles resulted in additional coups in 1966 and 1970. Iraq witnessed its first coup in 1936, but the monarchy was not permanently overthrown until July 14, 1958. A 1963 coup by the Iraqi Ba'th Party was reversed the same year; the Ba'th Party seized power more decisively in July 1968. In Iran, royalist forces supported by the United States overthrew nationalist prime minister Mohammad Mossadegh (1882–1967) in the coup of 1953. Coups also occurred in Libya (1969), Yemen (1955, 1962), Turkey (1960, 1971, and 1980), and Pakistan (1956, 1977, and 1999).

In the Arab Middle East, this wave of military coups is perhaps best understood as the reassertion of local political forces following a period of more or less direct European rule. Upon independence, political life was typically dominated by traditional elites whose positions were bound up in the distorted patterns of socioeconomic order inherited from colonialism. Unwilling to accommodate increasingly vocal demands from below and unable to respond effectively to the creation of the State of Israel in 1948, the old elites lost all credibility and were unable to contain the mounting pressure for change. As military service had long been disdained by these elites, the army provided a unique channel for the mobilization of political actors from traditionally marginalized social strata.

Western scholarship has passed through several stages in its efforts to explain what appears to be a recurrent tendency of Muslim countries to produce military rule. Early work highlights the long tradition of military government in Islam, as exemplified by the Mamluk dynasties. However, deterministic claims regarding political culture have difficulty explaining cases where civilian regimes remain in power. Other social scientists note the institutional fragility of postcolonial Muslim states and conclude that the army's political strength was positive. Military regimes generally advocated radical socioeconomic reform, leading some scholars to identify them as prime agents of modernization. The decline in military interventionism since the 1960s has been explained by the notion of "coup proofing," which proposes that the expanding size and complexity of the military apparatus has made it virtually impossible for conspirators to turn the whole organization against the chain of command.

While much academic attention has been devoted to military rule, far less has been given to the question of whether it is appropriate to call military seizures of power in the Arab-Muslim world "coups." The conceptual distinction between "coup" and "revolution" may be evident in English, but it is less clear-cut in Arabic. Since the radicalization of politics in the 1960s under the influence of Nasser, thawra has been used to imply the depth of social and political change associated with "revolution." (Prior to this, its meaning was closer to "revolt.") In contrast, the change of personnel involved in a coup is dismissed as a "mere" inqilāb. Yet in the 1940s and 1950s, the meaning of the words was almost the reverse. Officers who carried out Iraq's first military coup in 1936 called it an inqilāb; thawra still had a strong negative connotation in contemporary writings. Early Ba'thist texts describe the party as "revolutionary"—inqilābī, not thawrī. Not until 1963 did Ba'thists adopt the Nasserist tradition of calling their coups thawra.

The evolving lexicon of military politics highlights the extent to which social phenomena are constructed by linguistic convention. The distinction between coup and revolution hinges on the presence or absence of mass participation when the new regime comes to power but says little about the policies, programs, or practices of those regimes. Drawing a line between coup and revolution on these grounds arguably expresses a normative preference for popular participation in politics more than it determines a difference of sociological kind.

See also Ba'th Party; colonialism; dissent, opposition, resistance; military; quietism and activism; rebellion; revolutions

Further Reading

Ami Ayalon, "From Fitna to Thawra," Studia Islamica 66 (1987); Ofra Bengio, Saddam's Word: Political Discourse in Iraq, 1998; Manfred Halpern, The Politics of Social Change in the Middle East and North Africa, 1963; J. C. Hurewitz, Middle East Politics: The Military Dimension, 1969; James T. Quinlivan, "Coup-Proofing: Its Practice and Consequences in the Middle East," International Security 24, no. 2 (1999).

DANIEL NEEP

Crusades

The Crusades, as viewed by the West, were a series of at least eight military campaigns against the Muslims of Syria, Palestine, and Egypt. Their initial impetus was to protect the holy places of the Christian Near East, but especially Jerusalem. The Crusader presence in the Middle East lasted from 1098 to 1291.

In the 20th century, the Arab world "rediscovered" the Crusades, viewing them as symbols for current political problems. Some saw the medieval Crusading states as "protocolonies," the precursors of Napoleon in Egypt, the British Mandate for Palestine, and the state of Israel. The Crusades marked the initial phase of Western imperialism in the region (isti'mār mubakkar, or premature colonialism). Arab nationalist leaders reminded their people of the glorious Muslim victories over the Crusaders (the Franks), and although the most famous Muslim generals—Saladin (a Kurd) and Baybars (a Turk)—were not ethnically Arab, the rhetoric used in political speeches by Middle Eastern leaders allowed modern Arabs to claim these medieval military triumphs as their own. Several Arab leaders, such as Gamal Abdel Nasser, Hafez al-Assad, and Saddam Hussein, aspired to become "the second Saladin," the charismatic figure who would one day reunite the Middle East. Saladin's conquest of Jerusalem in 1187 has clear resonance for modern Palestinians.

For other Muslim spokesmen, the Crusades have been seen not in national but in religious terms, as part of a continuing conflict between Christianity and Islam. The leading figure of the Muslim Brotherhood, Sayyid Qutb (executed by Nasser in 1966), referred in his Fi Zilal al-Qur'an (In the shade of the Qur'an) to the perennial struggle between Muslims and "polytheists" and spoke of "international Crusaderism," arguing that the blood of the Crusaders flowed through the veins of all Westerners.

The core meaning of the word "crusade" is the Latin word "crux" (cross), and the modern Arabic phrase for crusade—al-hurūb al-salībiyya (the cross wars)—reflects this inherent religious focus. Indeed, in contemporary times hostility toward American hegemony is often expressed in religious terms. As Osama bin Laden put it in an interview with Aljazeera, "This battle is not between al-Qaeda and the U.S. This is a battle of Muslims against global Crusaders"; his fatwa (religious opinion) of February 23, 1998, "Jihad against Jews and Crusaders," mentions a Crusader-Zionist alliance. He likened American military bases in Saudi Arabia, the birthplace of Islam, to Crusader armies spreading like locusts, and he said that their banner was the cross. The involvement of Jews in his anti-Crusader rhetoric is thus contradictory.

Thousands of miles from the geographical sites of the medieval Crusades, the concept of Perang Salib (The War of the Cross) is now used in Islamist circles in Indonesia, the world's most populous Islamic country, to denote what is perceived as wicked Christian aggression against Muslims, especially after 9/11. As in the speeches of Bin Laden found on the Internet, Indonesian Islamist discourse links the concept of "crusade" with the words "Zionists" and "Jews" and presents a global conspiracy of Christian Crusaders and Zionist Jews bent on destroying Islam. After President George W. Bush's visit to Indonesia in 2006, he was labeled "the Supreme Commander of the War of the Cross" by one of the leaders of the Islamist organization Ahl al-Sunna wa-l-Jama'a (The People of Tradition and the Community).

See also Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); Jerusalem; Mamluks (1250–1517); Mongols; Saladin (1138–1193)

Further Reading

Osama bin Laden, "Jihad against Jews and Crusaders," http://www.fas.org/irp/world/para/docs/980223-fatwa.htm; FBIS Report, Compilation of Usama Bin Ladin Statements 1994–January 2004, 2004, http://www.fas.org/irp/world/para/ubl-fbis.pdf; Carole Hillenbrand, The Crusades: Islamic Perspectives, 1999; Sayyid Qutb, "Crusaderism" in Fi zilal al-Qur'an, 1992; Mark Woodward, "Tropes of the Crusades in Indonesian Muslim Discourse," Contemporary Islam 4, no. 3 (2010).

CAROLE HILLENBRAND

culture

A term used in everyday speech as well as an ambiguous category of academic inquiry, "culture" has a history of contested meanings and usages. The term has been and continues to be used, in a humanistic sense, to refer to any complex of intellectual or aesthetic expression and learned behavior emerging from elite social circles as products of leisure and expressions of identity. Culture, in this sense, refers to a body of refined knowledge and cultivated education based largely on a sense of tradition and canon. Thus one can speak of the culture of the Abbasid court, for example, and intend by this phrase the generation, acquisition, cultivation, inheritance, and perpetuation of a system of learned behaviors (i.e., etiquette, ceremonies, hunting, protocol, patronage, etc.) as well as the products that participate in providing material expression for the very identities constructed through these processes of behavioral cultivation (i.e., patronizing the arts—music, calligraphy, painting, poetry, prose, dance, architecture, fashion, etc.). Often implicit in this conception of culture is the assumption of refinement and progress or increasing excellence; culture, so understood, is an ascendant vector of elite intellectual and aesthetic improvement.

Expanding this rather narrow conception of culture to include a vertical or horizontally concentric spectrum, however, lends breadth and availability to the category. Instead of privileging the culture of the elite as the only "true" culture, a dichotomous model of culture—one that constructs and contrasts a spectrum of "high" and "low" cultures, elite and popular cultures, or cultures of the center and those of the periphery as analytical categories—permits a more socially inclusive and economically diverse model of that which constitutes culture and cultural activity. As a more inclusive approach, sensitive to the differences in the various sectors of a given society or social body, a dichotomous model provides a broader vantage point from which to observe the various expressions of cultural activity at the same time as it gives consideration to the way in which various communities and individuals interact within a larger social framework. Thus one can speak of cultural "contact" or "confluences" occurring between, among, and by means of the members of different social classes, people from unrelated language communities, or practitioners of contesting religious traditions, for example. The internal social divisions that separate high from low and elite from popular are typically intended, however, as value-free heuristic categories—helpful ways of providing a conceptual apparatus or framework for comparing what are actually porous, abstract categories.

More expansive, pluralistic, and relativistic models of culture(s) have emerged from the field of anthropology. Although the history of the culture concept in anthropology (and sociology) is long and complex, in general, anthropological models (i.e., those of Franz Boas, Leslie White, and Clifford Geertz) have tended to posit a holistic conception of culture. The practice in cultural anthropology is to observe distinct human societies and provide detailed descriptions of social phenomena. This is done in order to articulate the ways in which various social systems and networks of human communication and interaction form (and are reciprocally informed by) individual and communal identities. This holistic, pluralistic, and descriptive approach to human activity, while admitting the existence of multiple cultures and subcultures, employs the term "culture" to signify a total system of human action, interaction, and meaning. Thus the anthropological model acknowledges the wide array of different and diverse cultures in the world at the same time as it posits the total and holistic nature of each one. Conceptual categories such as tradition, custom, behavior, action, value, and symbol are important components in such anthropological approaches and have been employed differently in describing and defining cultures as complex, patterned wholes.

Due in part to the fact that the various social processes of human activity in the anthropological conception of culture can be articulated and objectified only in a descriptive and narrative language, the anthropological practice of carefully describing and interpreting each culture as a total system of human interaction necessarily reproduces that complex, patterned whole as a text. Moreover, in the work of White and Geertz, the entire anthropological enterprise is defined by a semiotic conception of culture. Culture is understood as a deeply symbolic and meaning-producing model of and for reality. As a corollary, culture is imagined and presented as a complete object possessing meaning. Consequently, culture, to be comprehensible, becomes that which is always in need of scholarly engagement and interpretation. The critical question then becomes, who has the authority to speak for and about a culture? Because the characteristics attributed to a cohesively identified and contoured culture are always presented by someone, to someone, and for someone, and always from a specific perspective not lacking in agenda or context, the authoritative position from which one can define and describe "culture" has come under scrutiny in postmodern and postcolonial studies of the culture concept.

Given the anthropological acknowledgment of global cultural diversity, the various cultures of the world can be thought of as complex wholes distinguished from one another by the differences observed from any positioned perspective. Deeply entrenched in, and defined by, the observation of differences, the category of culture has become an immediately available and instrumental category of identity construction. As such, it has been consciously employed to establish criteria of cultural inclusion and "purity" and to determine the boundaries of communal and nationalist affiliation. As a tool of identity politics and nationalist discourse, the culture concept has also been deployed as both a defensive and an offensive strategy in an effort to either justify the status quo or call it into question. These general observations describe just some of the political implications of the concept of culture in today's increasingly globalized world.

Finally, if culture is taken in an anthropological sense to mean a total complex of human activity and interaction, then recognizing religion as an integral element in the development of that total complex becomes a necessity. The historicist tendencies in some anthropological models of culture provide relevant insight into the study of Islam, especially as it relates to the concept of culture. Geertz's Islam Observed, for example, describes the differences and similarities between the Muslim cultures of Indonesia and Morocco and in so doing demonstrates how Islam, in a sense, is "mediated" differently in different locations and at different times. This serves to demonstrate how the radical diversity of the many particular local histories, customs, languages, cuisines, and family structures of nations or communities that are commonly identified as "Islamic" complicates any notion of a simple association or identification between religion and culture. Such a study calls into question the notion of a pristine or pure Islam that is somehow outside of temporal and terrestrial concerns and agency. At the same time, it places in relief the question of whether "Islam" is a useful organizing principle in the discussion of culture, especially where other more local or historically contingent and less abstract principles of organizing observed phenomena might prove to be useful in the analysis of a culture.

See also Arab nationalism; community; custom; education; family; Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406); ideology; Mirrors for Princes; nationalism; Pan-Islamism; secularism; solidarity; tribalism; 'ulama'; Westernization

Further Reading

Robert Borofsky et al., "When: A Conversation about Culture," American Anthropologist 103, no. 2 (2001); Michael Cooperson, "Culture," in Key Themes for the Study of Islam, edited by Jamal J. Elias, 2010; Clifford Geertz, The Interpretation of Culture, 1973; Idem, Islam Observed, 1971; Tomoko Masuzawa, "Culture," in Critical Terms for Religious Studies, edited by Mark C. Taylor, 1998; Marshall Sahlins, "Two or Three Things I Know about Culture," The Journal of the Royal Anthropological Institute 5, no. 3 (1999); Boaz Shoshan, "High Culture and Popular Culture in Medieval Islam," Studia Islamica 73 (1991); Bassam Tibi, Islam between Culture and Politics, 2nd ed., 2005; Raymond Williams, Keywords: A Vocabulary of Culture and Society, 1976.

J. C. ARSENAULT

custom

Custom served an important role as a social norm in pre-Islamic Arab society and thereafter in Muslim society, as it did in many ancient societies. Its application encompassed a wide variety of areas: economics, family, and ritual. In Islamic legal theory, formulated during the course of the eighth and ninth centuries, custom was recognized as a formal, valid source of law, as is the case in other legal systems, including Jewish and Roman law. Prominent questions concerning custom in the context of Islamic legal theory are the extent to which it conformed to the formal sources of Muslim law, the sources' proximity to a divine origin, and the means used to prove its existence.

In the Islamic legal tradition, sources of law are graded according to their degree of certainty and the weight given to the proofs of their divine origin. On the highest level stand the Qur'an and the sunna (oral reports concerning the words and deeds of the Prophet), officially recognized sources for scriptural proof texts (nass) with the status of divine revelation. On the next level are ijmā' (consensus) and qiyās (legal analogy), which do not have the same status as the written sources, being of a more technical nature and connected as they are with the exegesis of the jurists, yet they are still held to reflect divine will in determining human behavior. According to this theoretical model, custom lies outside the realm of divine revelation; recognition of custom ('urf) as an integral part of the legal system appears to contradict one of the mainstays of Islamic legal theory: the idea that law is of direct divine origin. Indeed, classical Islamic juridical theory does not recognize custom as a legal source, since it depended to a great extent on human social interaction, even though it was always ubiquitous in practice and deeply entrenched in all levels of society. Custom thus belongs to a number of supplemental sources of law or bases for legal interpretation that have been disputed and irregularly incorporated into Islamic jurisprudence, such as istiḥsān (juristic preference), istiṣlāḥ (consideration of a human interest), shar' man qablanā (the law of previous monotheistic religions), or istiṣḥāb al-ḥāl (presumed continuance of status quo ante). The decidedly textualist approach of Islamic jurisprudence militated against the uniform or easy acceptance of custom.

The jurists' exclusion of custom from the theoretical hermeneutics of Islamic law nevertheless did not affect its power in actuality. Custom was held to include both general custom ('urf 'āmm) and local custom ('urf khāṣṣ), as well as customary definitions of words ('urf qawlī) and customary practices ('urf fi'lī). Classical theoretical objections notwithstanding, custom was recognized by many jurists as important for the interpretation of specific terms, verbal agreements, and types and stipulations of transactions in particular local or social contexts. Customary rulings became extremely widespread, striking roots in various areas of the law and thereby threatening the integrity of theory. This development was not lost on legal thinkers who attempted to bridge the gap between theory and reality, where custom was widespread. These attempts, particularly those of the Hanafi legal scholars, are reflected in the juristic literature reflecting the efforts, at least from the early Middle Ages, to grant custom some sort of official status in the scale of legal sources. Striking testimony to this appears in the criticism regarding the definition of the sunna directed at the famous early figure Abu Yusuf (d. 798–99), a disciple of Abu Hanifa, by Sarakhsi (d. 1097) in his work al-Mabsut (The extensive treatise on law). With regard to the disputed permissibility of using weights and measures in commercial transactions, Abu Yusuf thought that in every case custom must be taken into consideration on its own merits. In other words, in a statement attributed to Abu Yusuf, "One should take custom into consideration in all things. For if it was [sold] by measure at a particular time or by weight at another time, [each particular situation] was in consideration of custom and not in consideration of a scriptural proof text from the Prophet." He thus holds that custom remains valid even when it contradicts a scriptural proof text—a position likewise affirmed by the Hanafi jurist Marghinani (d. 1192) in his work al-Hidaya (The guidance). Another testimony to the hermeneutical autonomy of custom is that of the judge Husayn al-Marwazi (d. 1070), who considered custom to be a fifth source of law along with the other four recognized legal sources. He wrote, "Resort to custom is one of the five foundations on which the law (fiqh) is built."

In accordance with modern legal theories, two elements underlie the rejection of custom, though they are not explicitly stated anywhere in Islamic legal literature. From the legal historical perspective, scholars recognize that the existence of custom per se is not sufficient reason for its integration into and enforcement as a legal norm. From the analytical perspective, the jurists and institutions such as courts lack the authority to grant certain customs the status of validity. In classical Islamic legal theory, these two components exist alongside each other. The negation of the jurists' authority to recognize custom is indeed consistent with Islamic legal theory, which greatly restricts juristic involvement in the development of the law, limiting their authority to the role of interpreting or implementing the written sources—particularly of those laws incorporated in the Qur'an and the sunna.

The rejection of custom on the theoretical level, notwithstanding its acceptance in reality, was dealt with in four ways. First, during the formative period of Islamic law, the possibility still existed of incorporating custom into the sunna, which was in the process of crystallization into standard collections in the ninth and tenth centuries. At times, these incorporated legal norms, including customs, reflected current developments. Second, the widespread identification of custom with consensus (ijmā'), especially but not exclusively in Hanafi literature, at times obscured the boundary between these overlapping categories to such an extent that there was often no major difference between them. Third, custom was often seen as a dispositive condition whose legal validity was based on its acceptance by agreement of the parties involved. This view is found primarily in the literature of the Hanafi school and finds expression in the following formula and similar statements made in other contexts: "That which is known by custom is like that which is known by stipulation." Fourth, custom was often accepted in a substantive manner but by means of principles such as maṣluḥa (public welfare) or ḍarūra (necessity or dire need), allowing rulings to be made in accordance with custom without recognizing it as an autonomous source. The latter three types belong to a later stage in legal history; they were adopted when the method of accepting custom by means of hadith reports had effectively closed with the canonization of the sunna and its organization into standard collections.

The absorption of custom by these means, which fit harmoniously into Islamic legal theory, worked as long as they existed as real options. Once these means were closed, however—particularly once the collections of the sunna had taken shape and when, later, it was no longer possible to identify custom with ijmā'—outstanding Hanafi legal theorists effected a dramatic hermeneutic turn with regard to custom. During the postclassical period, from the 16th century on, they came to present custom as an autonomous, formal legal source incorporated into the theoretical framework of Islamic jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh). Thus, for example, Ibn Nujaym (d. 1563) admits the ubiquity of custom and its power to determine legal rules, writing, "Know that the consideration of custom and usage reappears frequently in law in many cases, so much so that the jurists have transformed it into a legal source, and they say in works devoted to jurisprudence, in the chapter on the abandonment of literal meaning: 'The literal meaning is abandoned on the basis of an indicator found through inferential methods of inquiry and in custom.'" Here, he was in effect following Abu Yusuf, the first jurist who attempted to view custom as an autonomous source. The same view was later taken up by Ibn 'Abidin (d. 1836), author of a brief work titled Nashr al-'Arf fi Bina' Ba'd al-Ahkam 'ala al-'Urf (The wafting of perfume, on some legal rulings based on custom), in which he states that custom has the power to overrule a scriptural text, thus establishing custom as a formal legal source.

At the end of this process, custom assumed a place even in the 19th-century Ottoman Mecelle, which recognized it in practice as a formal source. Even though the Mecelle was not a legal source, it reflected the change that had taken place in the status of custom in Islamic law, effectively putting an end to the explicit and implicit debates that had taken place among legal scholars regarding the status of custom as a source in Islamic legal hermeneutics.

See also consensus; ijtihād and taqlīd; jurisprudence; Ottomans (1299–1924); shari'a

Further Reading

Wael Hallaq, Authority, Continuity and Change in Islamic Law, 2001; G. Libson, "On the Development of Custom as a Source of Islamic Law," ILS 4 (1997); H. Toledano, Judicial Practice and Family Law in Morocco, 1981; A. L. Udovitch, "Islamic Law and the Social Context of Exchange in the Medieval Middle East," History and Anthropology 1 (1985).

GIDEON LIBSON

Dan Fodio, Usman (1754–1817)

'Uthman b. Muhammad b. 'Uthman b. Salih b. Fudi, known as Ibn Fudi, Usman dan Fodio, or the shehu (the Hausa term for shaykh), was a religious scholar and social reformer who led a jihad in Hausaland (northern Nigeria). His struggle led to the founding of the largest Islamic caliphate in 19th-century Africa, known as the Sokoto Caliphate or the Fulani Empire.

Born in Maratta in the Hausa city-state of Gobir in what is now northwestern Nigeria on December 15, 1754, dan Fodio belonged to a clan of Muslim Fulani scholars known as the Torodbe, who migrated in the 15th century from Futa Toro in the north to the town of Birni-N'Konni (on the border between Niger and Nigeria). The Fulani were an ethnic minority in Hausaland. Through their intellectual positions as teachers and scribes, Fulani scholars contributed to the spread of Islam in Hausaland. Although the authorities of Gobir officially accepted Islam, they remained uncommitted to strict Islamic rules, such as applying shari'a or condemning polytheism and pagan practices. Growing frustration among the Muslim community ultimately led to the emergence of an Islamic reform movement in the 18th century, which carried the support of revered Muslim scholars of the time.

When dan Fodio was a child, his family settled in Degel, where he would eventually start his activities. His early education included Arabic, memorization (hifẓ) of the Qur'an, Maliki jurisprudence, and Muslim traditions. His life was marked by the influence of his teacher, Jibril b. 'Umar, a prominent Sufi scholar who initiated dan Fodio into the Qadiri Sufi order. Sufism played a considerable role in dan Fodio's life and career. Mystic visions, such as the one dan Fodio experienced in 1794, convinced him of the mission he had been assigned and his duty to raise the sword against the enemies of Islam.

Dan Fodio started his activities in 1774 and 1775 as a wandering teacher and preacher, along with his son Muhammad Bello (d. 1837) and his brother 'Abdullahi dan Fodio (1766–1828). For a decade, dan Fodio's career would involve peaceful teachings about Islam and religious practices and the writing of poems calling people to Islam. At the time, his relationship with the Hausa authorities was amicable, and education was seen as the key instrument for a progressive and profound reform of society. His project had a distinctively practical dimension, which was not as prominent in previous local movements. A distinguishing feature of his approach was tolerance and nonconfrontation. Dan Fodio refused to declare apostates (pronounce takfir against) people who failed to follow Islamic rulings out of ignorance. He denounced earlier reformers who condemned society, like his mentor, Jibril b. 'Umar, and strongly criticized the reformer 'Abd al-Mahalli, who took hasty recourse to armed confrontation with the Moroccan state.

Dan Fodio's writings dealt mostly with education until 1803, when the first mention of jihad was made in his work Masa'il Muhimma (Important matters). From 1803 to 1804, the resistance of the Hausa rulers to Muslim demands and their attacks on dan Fodio's community led to a change in method. Forced to emigrate, dan Fodio and his followers declared a jihad against the Hausa rulers in 1803.

In order to remain consistent with his earlier ideas, dan Fodio conceived of an original theory of takfir by distinguishing between religious and political unbelief; political takfir could be pronounced against rulers who did not follow the shari'a and against whom waging jihad was legitimate. These rulers were not accused of personal takfir and remained within the realm of the Muslim community. After the fall of Gobir in 1808, conflict spread to the neighboring Hausa states. By 1808, all the Hausa states had been conquered, resulting in the establishment of a centralized Islamic state, the Sokoto Caliphate. Ruled by religious scholars and governed by shari'a, it took the Abbasid caliphate as a model. Dan Fodio was recognized as its first leader, with the title of Commander of the Faithful. In 1812, he divided the caliphate into two states to be ruled by his son Muhammad Bello and his brother 'Abdullahi. Dan Fodio retired from his political career in 1812 and devoted the rest of his life to writing and teaching Islam and Sufism. He died in Sokoto on April 20, 1817.

Dan Fodio wrote more than 100 scholarly works, which continue to be read and quoted today. He remains a respected figure in the history of West Africa. His successful jihad had a long-term impact on West African society and inspired a number of subsequent uprisings, including the jihad of Seku Amadu (1773–1845) and El-Hajj 'Umar ibn Sa'id Tall (1797–1864), who founded the Massina and Tukulor empires, respectively.

See also colonialism; Nigeria; revival and reform; shari'a; Sufism; West Africa

Further Reading

A.D.H. Bivar, "The Wathiqat Ahl Al-Sūdān: A Manifesto of the Fulani Jihād," Journal of African History 2, no. 2 (1961); Usman dan Fodio, Bayān wujūb al-hijrah 'alā al-'ibād, edited and translated by F. H. El-Masri, 1978; Idem, Masā'il muhimma. 180; Mervyn Hiskett, The Sword of Truth: The Life and Times of the Shehu Usuman

Dan Fodio, 1967, repr. 1973; H.A.S. Johnston, The Fulani Empire of Sokoto, 1967; Murray Last, The Sokoto Caliphate, 1967; Ibraheem Sulaiman, A Revolution in History: The Jihad of Usman Dan Fodio, 1986; Idem, The Islamic State and the Challenge of History: Ideals, Policies, and Operation of the Sokoto Caliphate, 1987.

NASSIMA NEGGAZ

Dawani, Jalal al-Din (1427–1502)

A major philosopher of the Timurid period, Jalal al-Din Dawani wrote a number of works on ethics and politics for his patrons, following the model of the akhlāq (ethics and statecraft) literature established by Nasir al-Din al-Tusi. Dawani studied with important philosophers in Shiraz, and early in his career he became a courtier to the Turkmen Qara Quyunlu rulers. Later he sought the patronage of various rulers in the turbulence of 15th-century Persia, writing books for the Aq Quyunlu ruler Uzun Hasan (d. 1478), the Timurid sultan Abu Sa'id (d. 1469), the Ottoman sultan Bayazid II (d. 1512), and Sultan Mahmud I of Gujarat (d. 1511). He served in major roles as the head of the religious establishment (sadr) under the Qara Quyunlu and as chief qadi (judge) of Fars under the Timurid sultan Ya'qub (d. 1490). Dawani engaged in polemics and scholarly debates with his major rivals in Shiraz, such as the philosophers Mir Sadr al-Din (d. 1497) and his son Mir Ghiyath al-Din Dashtaki (d. 1542); they were also rivals for patronage. The Dashtaki family later rose to prominence under the new Shi'i Safavid rulers, and the stigmatization and marginalization of Dawani might be due to their condemnation of him as a Sunni thinker. Dawani's views on the Safavids were ambiguous, and his death in 1502 before they conquered Shiraz prevented any disambiguation.

Dawani's political views are found primarily in the Lawami' al-Ishraq fi Makarim al-Akhlaq (Flashes of illumination on the excellence of conduct), popularly known as Akhlaq-i Jalali (The Jalalian ethics), written for Uzun Hasan, whom he describes in terms of the Sunni and Iranian consensus in medieval Islamic political thought as the "shadow of God on Earth" and as the caliph and successor to the Prophet. His Sunni political views are clear in the short work 'Arznama (Testament), written for Uzun Hasan's son, Khalil, in 1478, and in his commentary on the creed of Muhammad b. Ahmad al-Nasafi and its supercommentary by 'Adud al-Din al-Iji written in 1499. However, before his death, and perhaps to prevent repercussions from the impending Safavid conquest of Shiraz, he wrote a short work, Nur al-Hidaya (The light of guidance), on a Shi'i conception of political authority while setting aside the more messianic claims of the Safavid shahs.

The Akhlaq-i Jalali was popular in the Safavid and Mughal periods and was the conduit for the dissemination of the ideas of Tusi in the Akhlaq-i Nasiri (Nasirean Ethics). The text differs little from Tusi's text: the section on moral psychology was omitted and more aphorisms were added in the final section from the Persian tradition as well as from Aristotle (including pseudo-Aristotelian sayings from works such as the Liber de Pomo, the alleged testament to Alexander). The main difference between his and Tusi's work (and this probably accounts for its greater dissemination and fame) is stylistic: Dawani's work became a model for Persian composition and was even used for training in epistolary writing in India and subsequently in Persia. Dawani also arguably practiced the role of the philosopher-ethicist-vizier in a more effective manner with a wider range of patrons than Tusi had done before him.

See also Timurids (1370–1506)

Further Reading

Muzaffar Alam, The Languages of Political Islam in India, 2004; Linda Darling, "Do Justice, Do Justice for That Is Paradise: Middle Eastern Advice for Indian Muslim Princes," Comparative Studies of South Asia, Africa and the Middle East 21, nos. 1–2 (2002); Jalal al-Din Dawani, Akhlaq-i Jalali [The Practical Philosophy of the Muhammadan People], 1839; Murtaza Yusufirad, Andisha-yi Siyasi-yi Jalal al-Din Davani, 2008.

SAJJAD H. RIZVI

Delhi

Also known in the past as Dihli or Dilli and, in some medieval records, as Yoginipura, Delhi is the capital and third largest city of the Republic of India. It occupies a triangular area bounded on the west and south by a low-lying spur of the Aravalli mountains and on the east by the river Yamuna. The triangular riverine plain contains several settlements stretching from the prehistoric into the modern age.

Although the ancient history of Delhi is always linked with Indraprastha, the capital of the Pandavas in the Mahabharata epic (ca. 1500–1000 BCE), no archaeological trace of the city has been discovered. Instead a variety of smaller settlements attest to the occupation of the area from the fifth century BCE without leading to full scale urbanization until, at the earliest, the 11th and 12th centuries CE, when the Tomara and Chawhan chieftains established their relatively humble headquarters in the southern reaches of the Delhi plain.

It was not until the 1220s that Delhi emerged as the capital of a realm comprising much of North India. Its rise to political prominence coincided with Chingiz Khan's invasions of Transoxiana, eastern Iran, and Afghanistan and a vast influx of refugees into the subcontinent and Delhi. This conjuncture of events contributed to the reputation of the city as a sanctuary with a sacred aura, known by such names as Qubbat al-Islam (or Quwwat al-Islam, The stronghold of Islam) and Hazrat-i Dehli (Her Highness Delhi). It was not just the center of a political realm extending from Bengal in the east to Sindh in the west but also a refuge for aristocrats, literary luminaries, and the pious from the Persian-speaking world.

Delhi remained the paramount political power in North India during the 13th and 14th centuries with somewhat reduced fortune in the 15th. The Delhi Sultans constructed their cities in its riverine plain or on the foothills of the Aravalli spur, and by the 15th century "Delhi" contained several settlements of different sizes and population densities. In the 16th century the Lodi sultans (r. 1451–1526) shifted their capital to Agra. The Mughal emperors Zahir al-Din Babur (r. 1526–30), Jalal al-Din Akbar (r. 1556–1605), and Nur al-Din Jahangir (r. 1605–27) visited Delhi but did not choose it as their capital. Nasir al-Din Humayun (r. 1530–40 and 1555–56) briefly resided there, but it was not until 1648 and the construction of the new city in the northern part of the riverine plain by Shihab al-Din Shah Jahan that the imperial capital returned to Delhi. The new capital was named Shahjahanabad after its eponymous founder and was the largest, most complex and expensive city to be constructed in the Delhi region.

Although its morphology, architectural style, and decorations have been celebrated as the apogee of Mughal creative accomplishment, the life of its bazaars, its quarters, and a diffused cultural patronage developed slowly and only as the heavy hand of Mughal administration weakened. The city was looted twice in the 18th century but recovered quickly. It came under British administrative supervision in the early 19th century and the following half-century of peace provided for a great literary efflorescence. This ended abruptly with the 1857 uprising against the British under the nominal leadership of the Mughal emperor. The uprising was ruthlessly suppressed. The British exiled the Mughal emperor, mercilessly punished the "rebellious" residents of the city, denuded the city of its gardens, and carried out wide-scale demolitions and expulsion of residents, eventually shifting their capital to Calcutta.

The demise of Shahjahanabad as a center of culture, social life, and political authority was confirmed when the British started constructing New Delhi as their capital. The new colonial capital was modeled on architectural paradigms first tested in South Africa and Australia and, other than in its decorative aspects, retained little of the urban traditions of the Delhi Sultanate or Shahjahanabad. Independent India inherited this city as its capital in 1947, a transition that was disrupted by partition and communal clashes when large numbers of the city's Muslim population fled and were replaced by displaced Punjabi refugees from West Pakistan. The demographic change in the population brought new residents to the city who were far removed from its history and culture. Hazrat-i Dehli meant little to the new residents of the capital of independent India, a past of the city that resides uneasily with its present.

See also Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526); India; Mughals (1526–1857)

Further Reading

Stephen Blake, Shahjahanabad: The Sovereign City in Mughal India, 1639–1739, 1991; R. E. Frykenberg, Delhi through the Ages: Essays in Urban History, Culture and Society, 1986; Narayani Gupta, Delhi between the Empires: 1803–1931, 1999; Ebba Koch, Mughal Art and Imperial Ideology, 2001; Sunil Kumar, The Present in Delhi's Pasts, 2010; Upinder Singh, Ancient Delhi, 1999; Emma Tarlo, V. Dupont, and D. Vidal, eds., Delhi: Urban Space and Human Destinies, 2000.

SUNIL KUMAR

Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526)

The Delhi Sultanate consisted of five successive regimes that controlled large sections of North India and occasionally the South between the end of the 12th and the middle of the 16th centuries (ca. 1190–1556). With some brief exceptions, all the rulers of these regimes made Delhi their capital—hence their collective name, the Delhi Sultans, for the period of their rule. A chronological list of the successive dynasties includes the Mamluk (1206–96), Khalji (1296–1320), Tughluq (1320–1414), Sayyid (1414–51), and Lodi (1451–1526).

The Mamluk regime differed from the others in that its three lineages were each founded by a ruler of servile origin (Qutb al-Din Aybak, r. 1206–10; Shams al-Din Iltutmish, r. 1210–36; and Ghiyas al-Din Balban, r. 1266–87). The other regimes were established by freeborn men who had been commanders on the northwest marches of the Indus plain bordering modern-day Afghanistan. With the exception of the Lodis, who were chiefs of an Afghan tribe, all were of Turkish or Turkicized origin, and all were regarded as outsiders at the beginning of their reign.

All the regimes shared the feature of recruiting military slaves and groups of low social status, such as mahouts (elephant drivers), as well as Afghans, Mongols, and new converts to Islam, all of them sometimes described in the Persian chronicles as the "lowest and basest." Promoting social menials to high office allowed the rulers to centralize authority at the expense of existing elites while at the same time creating roots in local society by establishing influential households.

At its inception (ca. 1190s), the Delhi Sultanate was a collection of garrison towns commanded by the senior military commanders and former slaves (bandagān) of Mu'izz al-Din Ghuri (r. 1173–1206). It was not until 1228–29 and the reign of Iltutmish that Delhi's military supremacy was established. In the early 13th century, the Delhi Sultans had firm control of lands only around their cantonments, and in economic terms their regime was sustained largely by revenues from trade and plunder/tribute. In the years after Iltutmish's death, his military commanders marginalized the late monarch's successors and battled among themselves. They consolidated their respective governorships (iqtā'), often with accommodative relationships with neighboring local chieftains, and resisted the intrusive efforts of Delhi to reassert its authority. For brief periods, especially during the reigns of Ghiyas al-Din Balban, 'Ala' al-Din Khalaji (r. 1296–1316), and Muhammad Tughluq (r. 1324–51), the Delhi Sultans energetically altered the balance of power in their own favor, but even then their ambit of influence rarely extended beyond northern India into the Deccan. Provinces like Bengal, large parts of Gujarat, western Punjab, Sindh, and Rajasthan passed in and out of their control, and by Firuz Tughluq's reign (r. 1351–88), these provinces were well on their way to possessing independent sultanates. Accordingly, historians have tended to interpret the period from 1350 to 1550 as a period of decline. Although the territorial control (and thus revenues) of the sultanate diminished considerably, the period is notable for the increasing prominence of new political groups. Already from the 13th century onward, considerable migration and settlement had taken place—Persian scholars, jurists, Sufi teachers, and military adventurers from varied backgrounds were now a prominent part of the subcontinental landscape. These were years of great opportunity and a huge expansion of what Dirk Kolff called the "military labor market," where the courts of kings and princelings competed with each other to attract clients. A rough approximation of their geographical location in the subcontinent would include the Ganges plain, Gujarat, Rajasthan, Deccan, and Bengal.

Although military slaves, social menials, and frontiersmen (particularly Afghans) were important in the political and military organization of sultanates through its entire history, after 1351 a new idea of "service" (nawkari) gained currency. This new idea of service carried the implication of free choice in the search for patrons, a politics of mutually supportive accommodative alliances with local chieftains, and recruitment of peasant warriors. War, service, and valorous conduct offered opportunities through which groups seized political initiative and reinvented their identities. It was during the 14th and 15th centuries, for example, that "Rajput" as a caste identity gained ground. Originally a title borne by a prince in an earlier period, the term "Rajput" now came to refer to a warrior caste, a status claimed by a variety of soldiers and commanders in Indian history.

All the sultanates, both before and after 1350, had complicated relationships with the Persian literati: scribes and chroniclers, jurists and Sufi masters. Some of them, notably the scribes and the chroniclers, had little compunction about receiving patronage from the state. For others, notably the jurists and the mystics, it was more problematic. By virtue of their learning and pietistic inclinations, they were deeply involved in the social and political affairs of the Muslim community. Some mystics were fairly direct about their close relationship with the regnant sultan and his courtiers, while others kept aloof from politics.

Two other developments were distinctive to the period. The first was the use of vernaculars (especially Hindawi) for the production of Sufi literature; the second was the emergence of Sufi gravesites as pilgrimage centers. The Malwa Sultanate in the 15th century developed the famous shrine of Mu'in al-Din Chishti in Ajmer and the Gujarat Sultanate built that of Shaikh Ahmad Khattu in Ahmadabad. By 1556, when the last of the Delhi Sultans was defeated by the adolescent Mughal emperor Jalal al-Din Akbar (r. 1556–1605), the sultanates of Jaunpur, Malwa, and Gujarat provided some of the templates that would be used to construct the Mughal Empire.

See also Delhi; India; Mughals (1526–1857)

Further Reading

Peter Hardy, Historians of Medieval India: Studies in Indo-Muslim Historical Writing, 1966; Peter Jackson, The Delhi Sultanate: A Political and Military History, 1999; Dirk A. Kolff, Naukar, Rajput, and Sepoy, 2002; Sunil Kumar, The Emergence of the Delhi Sultanate, 2007; Tapan Raychaudhuri and Irfan Habib, eds., The Cambridge Economic History of India, vol. 1, c. 1200–1750, 1982.

SUNIL KUMAR

democracy

Conceptions of Democracy

Conceptions of democracy generally accepted in the discipline of political science vary from the procedural to the substantive. While procedural conceptions are limited to electoral processes, substantive conceptions include civil liberties and individual rights, separation of powers with checks and balances, and the rule of law. Maximalist conceptions also consider the provision of social justice a requirement for democratic politics. Most conceptions of democracy by 20th-century Islamic thinkers concur with the electoral aspect of democracy but diverge on the question of civil liberties.

While minimalist/procedural definitions view democracy as little more than a competitive struggle for the people's vote, their proponents concede that such a struggle requires a certain amount of freedom of expression (in particular, freedom of the media). The requirement of civil liberties is formalized in Robert Dahl's more substantive conception of democracy, which consists of six institutional guarantees: free, fair, and frequent elections (political rights); elected representatives; the freedom to form and join organizations; the freedom of expression (civil liberties); alternative sources of information; and inclusive citizenship. Juan Linz and Alfred Stepan expand Dahl's notion by insisting on the existence of the state as a democratic precondition (the Palestinian territories therefore could not democratize until they form a state), as well as the existence of a vibrant civil society (consisting of guilds, trade unions, and professional and other associations), political society (mainly political parties), and economic society (a market-based economy with protected property rights). Established indexes of whether a country can be deemed democratic include Polity IV, the Bertelsmann Transformation Index, the World Bank Government Indicators, the Goteborg Quality of Government Index, and for civil liberties and political rights, indexes by Freedom House.

The Output of Democracy

Economist Amartya Sen has pointed to the intrinsic, instrumental, and constructive value of democracy. Democracy has intrinsic value insofar as political and social participation contribute to a person's quality of life. Further, democracy has instrumental value in enhancing political attention to people's claims and (economic) needs. Finally, democracy has constructive importance in helping societies form their values and priorities.

Empirically, the notion of democratic citizenship, of those who enjoy the political rights and civil liberties to be safeguarded by the democratic state, has expanded over time as limits based on property (first in 1824–28 in the United States), race (in 1866 and 1965 in the United States), and gender (first in 1893 in New Zealand) have gradually been eliminated. Like other political regimes, democracies may break down. Similarly, the quality of democratic citizenship may decrease over time, for instance, due to rising economic inequality or the failure of the state to "monopolize the legitimate use of force."

The Place of Religion in Democracy

Democracy does not require a strictly secular order in institutional terms. Indeed, most long-standing democracies entertain relations of cooperation rather than strict separation between organized religion and the democratic state. Democracy in Muslim-majority societies can, and in the five Muslim-majority democracies mentioned later often does, involve religious instruction in public schools, state funding of private religious schools, state support for mosque construction, and tax breaks for religious organizations. Neutrality toward religious views, however, is a democratic precondition. A democratic state needs to guarantee both positive and negative religious freedom—that is, the freedom for its citizens to practice any religion as well as the choice not to practice any religion. Religious freedom also includes the freedom to change one's religious affiliation, to enter interreligious marriages, and to freely discuss religious views in public without needing to fear state sanction.

Democracy in the Muslim World

In 2007, about half of the world's Muslim population lived in democratic states and about a third enjoyed democratic citizenship. About 150 million lived as Muslim minorities in democratic societies, with the largest numbers in India, the United States, and Western Europe. Further, about 300 million lived in democratic Muslim-majority societies, in Indonesia, Turkey, Mali, Senegal, and Albania. None of the Arab states could be classified in 2007 as a democracy. Political scientists therefore speak of an "Arab-democracy gap." Identified causes for the Arab-democracy gap range from the prevalence of rentier economies among the gulf states to the Arab-Israeli conflict that allows authoritarian incumbents to suppress internal dissent in the name of security concerns. Other explanations highlight international support for authoritarian rulers (particularly by the United States and European Union) through commercial ties and military cooperation and few international incentives to democratize. Cultural and religious reasons to explain the Arab-democracy gap tend to be dismissed. In the words of Sen, "A country does not have to be deemed fit for democracy; rather, it has to become fit through democracy."

Islamic Law and Democracy

From the viewpoint of Islamic legal history, most of the core criteria of democracy delineated previously are acceptable: electoral politics are often juxtaposed to the Islamic principle of consultation and deliberation (shūrā). They are per se easily compatible with various traditions and interpretations of Islamic law (shari'a). The core conflict between 20th-century proponents of procedural notions of democracy and those of a substantive notion lies in the question about the scope of divine law. On the one end of the spectrum stand thinkers such as Mawdudi, with a maximalist view of divine law, in whose model a democratically elected parliament is commissioned only with "identifying God's law," not with making the law. Even to thinkers like Yusuf al-Qaradawi, who sees democracy as an effective antidote to despotism, a core element of democracy remains limited by the parallel basis of the polity on both God's and popular sovereignty. "There can only be voting on matters of human judgment," Qaradawi writes, without specifying who will determine what precisely lies beyond human judgment. At the other end of the spectrum are thinkers like Iranian philosopher Abdolkarim Soroush, who fully subscribe to the idea of popular sovereignty and view the place of religion in the polity as subject to public deliberation.

Three aspects of Islamic legal traditions in particular are often conceptualized as being irreconcilable with civil liberties: the legal inequality of men and women, the legal inequality of non-Muslims in relation to Muslims, and corporal (hudūd) punishments.

Attempts to engage with this normative conflict over the role of religious law in a modern polity chiefly involve one of three approaches. One focuses on international human rights standards and international covenants to which most Muslim-majority states are parties. Most Muslim-majority states have signed and ratified without reservation the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Many have also signed and ratified the Convention against Torture as well as the Convention on Elimination of Discrimination against Women, the latter notably often with reservations that allow these states to abide only partially by the covenant's legal standards. Human rights lawyers and activists often try to press states to fully harmonize their legal systems with the standards of the covenants they have ratified and thereby eliminate inegalitarian legal provisions.

Other approaches concentrate on renewed engagements with religious sources and legal traditions, one to privilege established egalitarian over inegalitarian interpretations, the other to generate new legal maxims. Various jurists, theologians, and philosophers of the 20th century have reexamined the legal traditions, the Qur'an, and the hadith in order to derive interpretations that mitigate the legal inequality between men and women, as well as Muslims and non-Muslims, and limit the applicability of hudūd punishments. Some, like Pakistani philosopher Riffat Hassan and Iranian jurist Seyyed Mohsen Sa'idzadeh, argue for a methodological reorientation to emphasize the primacy of Qur'anic injunctions over more inegalitarian views in the hadith literature. Others focus on developing more contextual readings to "make Islam democratic"

(Bayat). For instance, Indonesian Islamic thinkers like Ahmad Siddiq, Nurcholish Madjid, and Abdurrahman Wahid have generated interpretations that necessitate religious tolerance from an Islamic perspective and, by extrapolation, the legal equality of Muslims and non-Muslims. Moroccan scholar Fatima Mernissi places Qur'anic verses of gender-inegalitarian content into their historical context and calls for the adjustment of such verses to today's socioeconomic conditions.

Those who do not subscribe to the view that legislation in the modern state needs to proceed within the framework of Islamic legal traditions do see religion as an important source of a political culture. They emphasize that democracies rely on the existence of a certain ethos for citizens to obey laws and for rulers to prioritize the public good over individual pursuits. In the words of Soroush, "Democracy cannot prosper without commitment to moral precepts. It is here that the great debt of democracy to religion is revealed: Religions, as bulwarks of morality, can serve as the best guarantors of democracy." While democracies need to be neutral toward worldviews, including religious views, they do rely on morality, of which religion may be a source, as well as constitutional and republican values.

See also civil society; constitutionalism; consultation; elections; government; human rights; minorities; public opinion; representation; republicanism

Further Reading

Asef Bayat, Making Islam Democratic: Social Movements and the Post-Islamist Turn, 2007; Robert Dahl, On Democracy, 1998; Yusuf al-Qaradawi, Min fiqh al-dawlah fi al-Islam, 1997; Amartya Sen, "Democracy as a Universal Value," Journal of Democracy 10, no. 3 (1999); Abdolkarim Soroush, Reason, Freedom, and Democracy in Islam: Essential Writings of Abdolkarim Soroush, 2000; Alfred Stepan and Graeme B. Robertson, "An 'Arab' More Than a 'Muslim' Democracy Gap," Journal of Democracy 14, no. 3 (2003); Max Weber, Economy and Society: An Outline of Interpretive Sociology, 1978.

MIRJAM KÜNKLER

demographics

According to a 2009 Pew survey, the worldwide population of Muslims is 1.57 billion, representing 23 percent of the estimated global population. The largest cultural block of Muslims is in South Asia (mainly Bangladesh, Pakistan, and India). Although India has a minority of Muslims, it has the third largest Muslim population of any nation, following Indonesia and then Pakistan. Over 85 percent of Muslims are Sunni, and the remaining are Shi'i. The largest population of Shi'is is in Iran, followed by Pakistan, India, Iraq, Turkey, and Yemen. Minority Shi'i populations, such as the international Isma'ilis or the 'Alawis of Syria, are significant less for their numbers than for their cultural or political influence. Of the world's Muslims, less than 20 percent live in the Arabic-speaking Middle East and North Africa.

Muslim populations have tended to have a higher growth rate, on average, than the global population. As a result, the overall proportion of Muslims in the world is on the rise, and an increasing number of Muslims are young. A combination of these two factors (growth and youth) sets the framework for contemporary discourses on Muslim demographics in light of heightened security concerns that prevail in Western nations. Islamic positions on abortion and contraception, however—necessary elements of population planning and control—are diverse. Recent attempts to stabilize growth, with the support of the religious elite, in countries such as Iran and Indonesia, have yielded success. Although the overall rate of growth of Muslims will continue to decline, the global Muslim population is expected to continue to grow faster than the world's non-Muslim population in the coming decades.

Islamist political thought tends to favor a high-growth-rate model, attributing the concern over rising Muslim populations to Western attempts at limiting Muslim power. On the other hand, segments in Western societies, particularly in Europe, have exhibited concern that the high growth rate of Muslims in Europe will result in a significant shift in Europe's ethnic and religious makeup. Evidence suggests, however, that the growth rate of Muslim populations in Europe follows the patterns of the countries of origin for the first generation but normalizes and aligns with the patterns of the host population in subsequent generations. Thus although the Muslims of Europe will continue to increase in number relative to native Europeans, extrapolations of future Muslim populations on the basis of the high birthrates of first generation Muslim immigrants do not yield accurate results.

A look at the countries of the Muslim world shows that no single political model or outlook unifies them all. There are secular democracies, Islamic republics, monarchies, and dictatorships. Over the course of the past century, Muslim majority countries have fought wars with each other, fallen into the spheres of influence of either the eastern or western blocs during the cold war, and also striven to be nonaligned. That any of these positions or alliances can be justified as "Islamic" indicates the pliability of political thought among Muslims according to pragmatic needs and immediate strategic, cultural, and historical contexts. It should be understood that political thought among Muslims is neither static nor monolithic, nor should it always be considered as normatively "Islamic."

There is no single authority that speaks for all Muslims. The standard reference for normative Islam, however, remains the text of the Qur'an, the mass of prophetic sayings, and the legacy of the intellectual and interpretive tradition across the centuries, which is collectively reappropriated and reapplied in changing historical contexts. The platforms of the Jama'at-i Islami in Pakistan and India, for example, differ on account of their unique contexts—one rooted in a Muslim majority country that was founded in the name of Islam, the other in a Muslim minority democratic context. Political thought among Iranians stems from Shi'i historical and religious experiences and the interaction of these with a myriad of modern influences, including nationalism and imperialism. In contrast, Saudis draw on their Sunni Hanbali-Wahhabi background. Muslims in America reflect this contingency and diversity within the Muslim world and Islamic history. Unsurprisingly, the political thought and activism of American Muslims are increasingly in conformity with the sociology of American political culture.

See also authority; democracy; jurisprudence; minorities

Further Reading

John Esposito and Dalia Mogahed, Who Speaks for Islam? What a Billion Muslims Really Think, 2007; Gavin Jones and Mehtab Karim, eds., Islam, the State, and Population, 2005; Jonathan Lawrence, "European Islam in the Year 1451," in Europe 2030, edited by Daniel Benjamin, 2010; Pew Research Center, The Future of the Global Muslim Population: Projections for 2010–2030, 2010, http://features.pewforum.org/FutureGlobalMuslimPopulation-WebPDF.pdf; Idem, Mapping the Global Muslim Population, 2009, http://pewforum.org/Muslim/Mapping-the-Global-Muslim-Population.aspx; Katrina Riddell, Islam and the Securitisation of Population Studies: Muslim States and Sustainability, 2009.

MAHAN MIRZA

Deobandis

The Deobandi movement emerged from religious schools and institutions devoted to the purist religious tradition associated with an Islamic school, the Darul Uloom (Dār al-'Ulūm), founded in 1866 in the North Indian city of Deoband. While considered traditional and orthodox today, Deoband originally represented a modern approach, emulating British colleges with its fixed curriculum, salaried teachers, regular class schedules, and hostel facilities. Its founders, Muhammad Qasim Nanotawi (1832–79) and Rashid Ahmad Gangohi (1829–1905), wanted to continue the tradition of Shah Waliullah (1703–62), who had sought to cleanse South Asian Islam of local customs. In their view, British rule had undermined religious laws and learning. The return to the true Islam of the pious forebears (al-salaf) through the reform (iṣlāḥ) of religious practice and thought was the prime theological objective. The study and implementation of the prophetic traditions (hadiths) received special attention. However, this did not entail challenging traditional adherence (taqlīd) to the Hanafi law school or the guidance of teachers (shaykh). Sufi practice (tasawwuf) was condoned, even encouraged, if it proceeded within the limits of Islamic law (shari'a), as it helped to foster the morality, moderation, and stability of personality and mind. The Deobandis regarded their own approach as the only true Islam and were critical of other sects and law schools. In particular, they attacked Sufi shrine-based devotion common in South Asia as it detracted from the focus on Allah being the one and only God (tawḥīd). This critique led to particularly strong competition with the Barelwi sect, which defended traditional religious practices.

The defeat of the anticolonial revolt of 1857–58, in which a number of Muslim notables and scholars also were implicated, left a deep impact on the founding generation of the Deoband school. Its adherents came to emphasize religious learning and piety, joining other scholars of the time in renouncing jihad as a means of militant resistance against British rule. It was the abolition of the Muslim majority province of East Bengal in 1912 that spurred Muslim leaders across the theological spectrum into action. In Deoband, a new generation of scholars argued for a political role of the school. They included the Shaykh al-Hind Mahmud al-Hasan (1851–1920), Husain Ahmad Madani (1879–1957), and 'Ubaydallah Sindhi (1872–1944). Deobandi scholars traced their political philosophy back to Sayyid Ahmad Shahid (1786–1831), who was a puritan reformer and had led a movement of jihad against Sikh rulers in northwest India.

As British rule was regarded as an obstacle to proper Islamic practice and life, colonial India was viewed by many Deobandis as dār al-ḥarb, the land of war, as opposed to being the land of Islam, dār al-islām. This theological opposition led the Deobandis to cooperate with nationalists from the Indian National Congress under Mohandas Gandhi. The Silk Letter Conspiracy of 1916 revealed the extent to which Deobandi scholars had become involved in clandestine efforts against the British. Deobandis soon dominated the first public organization of Muslim religious scholars of India, Jamiat-Ulama-i Hind (JUH) after its foundation in 1919. The Khilafat movement (1919–24) turned into a mass campaign to mobilize Indian Muslims against the abolition of the Ottoman caliphate. The JUH aimed to create conditions in India under which Muslims could follow a religious life in accordance with the demands of Islam. For a future independent India, it envisaged a government commissioner of Islamic affairs who would be the highest arbiter in religious and social matters concerning Muslims. This position favored a united India, in contrast with demands for a separate Muslim state as advanced by the Muslim League.

Shortly before the partition of the subcontinent, a faction of the JUH broke away to form the Jamiat-Ulama-i Islam (JUI), which continued to operate in Pakistan. In India, the JUH avoided political activity. While the JUI was the largest religious party in Pakistan, its political influence remained limited to local pockets in the former Northwest Frontier Province and Baluchistan. During the reign of Pakistan's military dictator, General Zia-ul-Haq (r. 1977–88), with U.S. strategic support, selected Islamic schools (madrasas) in the Afghanistan border area following the Deobandi curriculum, were used to train tribal militias as mujahidin, or holy warriors, for intervention in the Soviet-Afghan War (1978–89). Simultaneously Pakistan directed the militias to the conflict in Kashmir, where they helped revive the civil war in the Indian-controlled territory. These militias drew much of their motivation from sectarian doctrines striving to defend "true" Islam and uprooting un-Islamic practices, which led to sectarian strife with Shi'i groups as well as attacks on Christian, Hindu, and Ahmadi targets. After the Afghan mujahidin groups failed to control the country, a new movement of religious students, the Taliban, emerged from some Deobandi madrasas near the Afghan borderland in 1994 with active support of the Pakistani government. The new international war in Afghanistan in 2001 toppled the Taliban, who withdrew into Pakistan. There, they regrouped and reemerged as a major force, later forming an alliance of tribal religious groups, the Taliban Movement of Pakistan.

While the politicization of Deobandi militias owed much to political and ethnic factors, the vast majority of Deobandi madrasas remained committed to religious learning, offering educational opportunities to aspiring rural and suburban families. As the share of madrasa education did not exceed 3 percent in Pakistan in the early 21st century, their influence remained limited. Their religious education became more formalized with the introduction of degree courses for religious scholars. The more advanced schools also offered secular subjects and the national curriculum. The Darul Uloom madrasa in Deoband split in 1982 in a factional dispute, creating a rival institution, the Darul Uloom Waqf, in the same city. The old school was dominated by the descendants of Husain Ahmad Madani's family, while the new school was controlled by the offspring of Deoband founder Nanotawi. The regional and global expansion of Deobandi institutions relied on diaspora groups from the colonial era but also on traditional migrants from Muslim trading groups as well as other migrants. The global influence of Deobandi thought significantly expanded through the Deobandi-dominated missionary movement, the Tablighi Jama'at. Many observers believe it to be the largest transnational Islamic grassroots movement, operating in all countries where Muslims live.

See also Barelwis; India; madrasa; Pakistan; Taliban; Tablighi Jama'at

Further Reading

"Darul Uloom Deoband-India," http://www.darululoom-deoband.com; "Jamiat-Ulama-i-Hind," http://www.jamiatulama.org; Muhammad Khalid Masud, ed., Travellers in Faith: Studies of the Tablighi Jama'at as a Transnational Islamic Movement for Faith Renewal, 2000; Barbara Daly Metcalf, Islamic Revival in British India: Deoband, 1860–1900, 1982; Ahmed Rashid, Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil, and Fundamentalism in Central Asia, 2000; Dietrich Reetz, "The Deoband Universe: What Makes a Transcultural and Transnational Educational Movement of Islam?" Contemporary Studies of South Asia, Africa and the Middle East 27, no. 1 (2007); Idem, Islam in the Public Sphere: Religious Groups in India, 1900–1947, 2006; Sayyid Mahboob Rizvi, History of the Dara'l-'ulum, 1980; Yoginder Sikand, Bastions of the Believers: Madrasas and Islamic Education in India, 2005.

DIETRICH REETZ

difference of opinion

A difference of opinion (ikhtilāf) is a ubiquitous feature of Islamic law. More often than not, on any given issue a number of equally legitimate legal rules exist. Classical legal theory (uṣūl al-fiqh) tended to explain the legitimacy of differences of opinion as a result of the many ways in which the divine textual sources of the law (Qur'an and sunna) could be interpreted. Given that one of the main functions of a ruler or judge is to apply Islamic law, the legitimacy of a plurality of interpretations of the Divine Law (ijtihād) posed acute problems: Which law should the ruler implement? Which body of rules is the judge to apply? What makes the applied rule legitimate? In the classical period, Muslim legal theorists' justifications for the legitimacy of the applied rule vacillated between emphasizing the legitimacy of the institutional role of the applier of the rule (i.e., did the applier legitimately occupy the role of the ruler or judge?) and the scholarly competence of the individual applier (i.e., was the individual applier himself a mujtahid [expert jurist]?).

In the early classical period, the legitimacy of a judicial application of one opinion over another depended on whether the judge possessed the competence to derive the relevant legal rule from the textual sources of the Divine Law. In theory, this competence required the possession of knowledge of the divine textual sources, rules of textual construction and the accepted methods of legal reasoning, and moral probity. The scholar of the Shafi'i school Mawardi (d. 1058) regarded the absence of these qualifications as ground for invalidating a judge's appointment and his judicial decisions. Two generations later, Ghazali (d. 1111) upheld the necessity of these qualifications for judges but did not regard them as essential for the validity of the cases that the judge had decided. As long as the judge's appointment by the ruler was legitimate, he was willing to accept the validity of past decided cases even if the judge was not a mujtahid in his own right. Similarly, the Maliki scholar Abu al-'Abbas Ahmad b. Idris al-Qarafi (d. 1285) identified the validity of the judicial decision as resting not on the individual judge's expert competence but on "receipt (from an authorized authority) of a specific jurisdiction (wilāya khāṣṣa)" (Jackson, 1996, 160). Jackson interprets Qarafi's justification as motivated by the desire to protect the legitimacy of disagreement among the major Sunni legal traditions of his time. Qarafi held that a judge's decision according to the rule of any one of the established legal traditions (madhāhib) could not be challenged on the ground that the rule rested on an incorrect understanding of the sources of the Divine Law. Qarafi argued that a firm consensus had validated the legitimacy of the differences of opinion as enshrined in the four Sunni legal traditions. Any judicial decision based on a legal rule upheld by any one of these traditions was valid because of this consensus. This meant, for example, that a Hanafi jurist who had the ear of the sultan could not seek to invalidate a judicial decision based on the application of a Maliki rule by arguing that the Maliki rule is an incorrect interpretation of the divine sources. Such an argument would be a violation of the consensus.

The Ottoman solution to the problem of which rules should be applied favored the Hanafi legal tradition over others. Hanafi doctrine, in contrast to the other Sunni legal traditions, permitted the ruler to restrict judges to the application of a specific legal tradition. Based on this legal doctrine, the Ottomans directed all judges, regardless of school affiliation, to apply only Hanafi legal rules in certain types of cases.

As a legacy of this older Ottoman prejudice and initial 19th-century Ottoman attempts at codifying Islamic law, much of the law constituting the legal codes to be applied by judges was heavily indebted to the Hanafi legal tradition, even in areas where the majority of a region's inhabitants belonged to another legal tradition. Between 1880 and 1955, for example, the Egyptian legislature directed judges of religious courts to construe family law statutes according to the Hanafi legal tradition. This changed shortly after the shari'a became explicitly identified as a constitutional source for the legal rules of the country (article 2 of the 1971 Constitution). The Supreme Constitutional Court started hearing cases in which the application of Hanafi rules had undesirable consequences. In many of the decisions in these cases, the justices asserted, much like Qarafi, that only laws that were unanimously agreed upon were binding from a shari'a perspective. Thus, in the absence of consensus, the Supreme Constitutional Court of Egypt ruled that political authorities were free to pursue legal rules that more faithfully fulfilled the objectives of the shari'a. Here the difference of opinion on an issue of legal controversy opened the possibility of weakening a legislative statute that had previously directed judges to follow the rules of one tradition.

For the contemporary Egyptian scholar Yusuf al-Qaradawi, a difference of opinion broadly indicates an area that the shari'a left open to discretionary human judgment (al-umūr al-ijtihādiyya). He argues further that where difference of opinion exists, ordinary Muslims can legitimately engage in deciding issues of the common good, such as the proper constitutional framework for their politics, setting policy, making law, and electing their leaders. When several competing options exist on an issue, Qaradawi insists that ground must be found for preferring one opinion to another and denies that the preference can be arbitrary. In his view, there must be some nonarbitrary way to tip the favor of one legal rule over others. Reasoning that the "opinion of two is more likely to be correct than the view of a single person," he attempts to justify the democratic practice of voting as one such way of deciding upon the constitutional framework and issues of policy that is, at the minimum, consistent with the shari'a.

See also consensus; ijtihād and taqlīd; jurisprudence; shari'a

Further Reading

Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 1982; Sherman A. Jackson, Islamic Law and the State: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Shihāb al-Dīn al-Qarāfī, 1996; Baber Johansen, "The Constitution and the Principles of Islamic Normativity against the Rules of Fiqh: A Judgment of the Supreme Constitutional Court of Egypt," in Dispensing Justice in Islam: Qadis and Their Judgments, edited by Muhammad Khalid Masud, Rudolph Peters, and David Stephan Powers, 2006; Rudolph Peters, "What Does It Mean to Be an Official Madhhab?" in The Islamic School of Law: Evolution, Devolution, and Progress, edited by Peri Bearman, Rudolph Peters, and Frank E. Vogel, 2005; Yusuf al-Qaradawi, "Islam and Democracy," in Princeton Readings in Islamist Thought, edited by Roxanne L. Euben and Muhammad Qasim Zaman, 2009.

MAIRAJ SYED

diplomacy

Diplomacy is the art and practice of conducting external relations, as in the negotiating of treaties, alliances, and other agreements. Islamic history is replete with records of diplomatic activity of various sorts from the earliest period. Accordingly, classical Islamic political theory dealt with many different aspects of diplomacy, such as the negotiation of agreements relating to war and peace or to trade, limits on such agreements and rules relating to their observance, the qualifications of Muslim envoys, and the treatment of foreign ambassadors. These topics are discussed in a number of genres in classical historical (tarīkh), legal (fiqh), and ethical (adab) literature.

Examples of the Prophet Muhammad's diplomacy abound in classical historical literature, including the earliest known biographies of the Prophet, Ibn Ishaq's Sirat Rasul Allah (Life of the Messenger of God) and Waqidi's Kitab al-Maghazi (Book of military expeditions). Arbitration, negotiations for ransoming prisoners or for trade agreements, guarantees of security, and military alliances between tribes were all well-established pre-Islamic Arabian customs. Muhammad's statecraft, beginning in the early Meccan period of his prophethood and continuing until his death, used all of these practices in the interest of the developing Muslim community (umma) and later the state founded in Medina. The most important treaty concluded by Muhammad—the one most often cited as a precedent by subsequent Muslim theorists—was the treaty of Hudaybiyya in 628. This agreement, among other things, declared a truce between the Muslims and Quraysh (the Prophet's tribe) of Mecca, as well as their allied tribes, for ten years. The truce lasted less than two years, however. In 630, a tribe allied to the Quraysh violated the truce when they attacked and killed a member of a tribe allied to the Muslims, whereupon Muhammad ordered the Muslims to march on Mecca. The city fell without resistance.

Diplomacy was also a significant aspect of Muslim statecraft under the Rāshidūn caliphs and their Umayyad and Abbasid successors. The historical records of this period detail instances of negotiations between Muslim military commanders or envoys of the caliph and non-Muslim leaders. An important principle governing jihad was that non-Muslims should receive the call to Islam and be given a chance to convert or become dhimmīs (protected communities) before any attack. As a result, histories of the early Islamic conquests contain numerous accounts of parlays between Muslim and non-Muslim commanders on the eve of battle. The early histories also record negotiations to resolve conflicts within the Muslim community. The most famous is the arbitration to resolve the conflicting claims to the caliphate of 'Ali b. Abi Talib and Mu'awiya in 658, which failed to resolve the dispute and led to the uprising of the Kharijis against both men.

In classical legal treatises dealing with the external affairs of the Islamic state, the main concern of the jurists was to outline the rules for conducting jihad. Since the majority of jurists viewed jihad as a permanent struggle between the Islamic state and non-Muslims, diplomacy had limited objectives. It could be conducted to convince non-Muslims to surrender without fighting and to open their territory to the preaching of Islam, or it could precede a truce (i.e., a suspension of jihad). Ibn Rushd (d. 1198) summarizes disagreements of the jurists over the permissibility, terms, and duration of such truces in Bidayat al-Mujtahid (Primer for jurists). He writes that although some scholars did not permit truces except under dire necessity, most scholars of the Maliki, Hanafi, and Shafi'i schools permitted the Muslim ruler to negotiate truces whenever he deemed it in the Muslims' interest. The Syrian jurist Awza'i (d. 774) permitted an agreement requiring Muslims to pay a tribute or some other compensation to the enemy, but other scholars, especially Shafi'i (d. 820), forbade such terms unless necessary to stave off catastrophe. The jurists also disagreed over the maximum length of a truce; some suggested three or four years, but the majority agreed on ten years based on the treaty of Hudaybiyya. Once a truce or other agreement was concluded, Islamic law required Muslims to observe it faithfully. As Shaybani (d. 805) writes in Kitab al-Siyar (Book of the rules of war), a treaty is akin to granting amān (assurance of safety) and as such cannot be violated. If the Islamic state wished to end a treaty before its term, such an intention had to be clearly conveyed to the other party before hostilities resumed. Similarly, in Islamic law, Muslim envoys were to act in good faith during their missions. The immunity of a foreign messenger (rasūl) or ambassador (safīr) was assured throughout the duration of his diplomatic mission.

In classical literature, Kitab Rusul al-Muluk (Book of envoys of kings) by Abu Ya'la b. al-Farra', is the most detailed treatment of diplomacy and diplomats. This short work describes the qualities of an envoy with illustrative vignettes from pre-Islamic and Islamic history up to the Abbasid period. The Mirrors for Princes genre, aimed at providing practical guidelines on statecraft to the ruler, also dealt to some degree with the qualifications, functions, and treatment of envoys.

The development of the European "law of nations," from which evolved public international law, along with new diplomatic norms and practices significantly influenced Islamic approaches to diplomacy. Ambassadors from the Italian city-states were resident in Istanbul from the 16th century. Although the Ottomans dispatched numerous diplomatic missions to European capitals, they did not establish embassies until the end of the 18th century. In the 20th century, as Muslim states gained independence, they invariably acceded to international law. Most have ratified the principal treaties governing diplomacy, including the Vienna conventions on diplomatic relations (1961) and consular relations (1963). State practice is largely endorsed in current Muslim scholarship, which argues for the essential compatibility between Islamic law and international diplomatic law. The Iranian seizure of the American embassy in Tehran in November 1979, and the subsequent hostage crisis, was one of the most serious breaches of diplomatic norms in recent history. The Iranian government defended its actions by claiming the embassy personnel were engaged in subverting the Islamic Republic, but Iran was subjected to heavy international criticism, including from Muslim governments and scholars.

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; alliances; international relations

Further Reading

M. Cherif Bassiouni, "Protection of Diplomats under Islamic Law," American Journal of International Law 74, no. 3 (1980); Muhammad Hamidullah, The Muslim Conduct of State, 1977; Afzal Iqbal, Diplomacy in Islam, 1962; Yasin Istanbuli, Diplomacy and Diplomatic Practice in the Early Islamic Era, 2001; Majid Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, 1955.

SOHAIL H. HASHMI

dissent, opposition, resistance

Though dissent is often understood in negative terms, primarily as a means of expressing opposition, in the Islamic tradition dissent can also be construed in terms of a positive duty. The duty of commanding right and forbidding wrong has been emphasized as a primary obligation for Muslims throughout Islamic history. It has often been construed as a duty to dissent against unjust forms of government; a Prophetic tradition recorded by Ahmad b. Hanbal and others states that to be killed as a result of speaking up to an unjust ruler is the best form of holy war. Thus, Islam has a long tradition of political dissent; even the earliest caliphs faced some dissenters motivated to speak out against injustice or the un-Islamic comportment of the ruler.

Equally prevalent within the tradition, especially among Sunnis, has been a trend of limiting the conditions under which the exercise of this duty may be carried out. The Hanbali thinker Abu Ya'la b. al-Farra' (d. 1066) offers one set of restrictions on the duty that is mirrored by many other Sunni writers. Ibn al-Farra' argues that the obligation to command right and forbid wrong, even to political leaders, applies only when it can be carried out without a risk of bodily harm to oneself, when it is likely to succeed, and when its exercise does not carry the risk of engendering a greater evil. Effectively, these restrictions serve to limit the extent to which this duty can be used to legitimate political rebellion. Many Sunni thinkers argued that because of these or similar restrictions, dissent against those in political power could be carried out only in the heart rather than through physical violence or even spoken opposition. These restrictions limited the likelihood that political dissent would turn into actual rebellion.

Even with these limitations, however, dissent has of course always been a characteristic of Islamic communities; furthermore, it has sometimes resulted in physical rebellion. Marshall Hodgson describes, for example, the widespread "piety-minded" opposition that eventually contributed to the success of the Abbasid revolution. Shi'ism has often been understood as a movement founded in part on the basis of political opposition, as early Shi'is saw the imam as an alternative to the injustices of the ruling caliph. Abdulaziz Sachedina, a scholar of Shi'ism, argues that early Shi'is' position as political resisters of the caliphate had a strong influence on some important aspects of Shi'i theology, including the eschatological nature of its doctrine of the Mahdi, who came to be understood as a redemptive figure of political resistance. In the contemporary context, Shi'ism continues to be the source of political resistance in many regions, especially in Muslim-majority countries in which Shi'is are a minority and seek greater political access and social privilege.

Two other contemporary Islamic dissent movements are Islamism and reformism. Individuals supporting these movements are likely to limit their resistance to the sphere of speech, in accordance with the restrictions described earlier. However, at particular moments each of these movements has manifested itself in a violent manner. Mohammed Hafez's study of resistance in Muslim-majority countries demonstrates that the move to rebellion or violence is precipitated by particular identifiable factors. Islamic resistance is much more likely to become violent if resisters are denied other means of expressing their dissent; thus, resisters in countries that lack institutional access and popular participation in the government are more likely to turn to violence. When governments provide the inclusive space in which dissenters can express their opposition in meaningful ways, they are more successful at preventing dissent from becoming violent rebellion.

See also commanding right and forbidding wrong; quietism and activism; rebellion; revolutions

Further Reading

Juan R. I. Cole and Nikki R. Keddie, eds., Shi'ism and Social Protest, 1986; Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Mohammed M. Hafez, Why Muslims Rebel: Repression and Resistance in the Islamic World, 2003; Marshall G. S. Hodgson, The Venture of Islam, 1974; Abdulaziz Abdulhussein Sachedina, Islamic Messianism: The Idea of the Mahdi in Twelver Shi'ism, 1981.

ROSEMARY B. KELLISON

dissimulation

Literally "caution" or "wariness," taqiyya, the technical term for dissimulation, is an Islamic legal dispensation that allows the believer to commit an act that would ordinarily be forbidden or to omit an act that would ordinarily be required in cases of danger from a hostile or potentially hostile audience. The term is related to but distinguished from other legal dispensations such as darūra (dire need), which derives from a general, impersonal situation, and ikrāh (coercion), which, like taqiyya, is caused by a hostile party but is not necessarily related to questions of religious identity. Throughout Islamic history taqiyya has been most strongly associated with the Twelver Shi'i tradition, which has the most developed literature on the topic, but has been adopted in various historical contexts by members of other Shi'i sects as well as Kharijis, Sunnis, and various Islamic movements. The social use of taqiyya by persecuted groups such as the Moriscos of 16th-century Spain or Shi'is under the rule of the Ghaznavids, Seljuqs, Mamluks, Ottomans, and other oppressive Sunni regimes may be likened to a dramaturgical discipline that guided members of a minority group to manage their identities and adjust their behavior not only in cases of severe duress, such as at heresy trials, but also in their everyday encounters with the majority.

Jurists found the justification for taqiyya in the Qur'an and hadith. Verse 16:108 of the Qur'an reads, "Whoever expresses disbelief in God after having accepted belief [will suffer greatly]—except him who is forced while his heart is still at peace in belief." This verse is said to refer to the case of the Companion of the Prophet 'Ammar b. Yasir, who was compelled to worship pagan idols and deny the Prophet Muhammad by polytheists in Mecca. He witnessed his parents, Yasir b. 'Amir and Sumayya bt. Khabbat, being brutally killed for refusing to worship the gods of the polytheists, but 'Ammar said what was demanded of him and thus survived. Afterward, when 'Ammar reported to the Prophet what had happened, the Prophet asked him how he felt in his heart, and 'Ammar responded that his heart "was at ease in belief." The Prophet informed him that this was all that was necessary, and if the polytheists were to attack him in a similar fashion in the future, he should do the same thing. The term taqiyya likely derives from Qur'an 3:28, which reads, "Let not the believers take unbelievers for their allies in preference to believers. Whoever does this has no connection with God, unless it be that you but guard yourselves against them out of fear" (illā 'an tattaqū minhum tuqātan). Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari and other commentators report the recognized variant reading taqiyyatan, a verbal noun construed as a cognate accusative (fear), rather than tuqātan, a plural adjective construed as an accusative of condition (fearful, fearing). If the variant is accepted, one may say that the term taqiyya occurs in the Qur'an with its technical meaning; in either case, there is little doubt that the cognate verb tattaqū in this passage refers to dissimulation.

In one sense, taqiyya served as the regime of secrecy adopted by underground, revolutionary movements, the premodern term for which was da'wa (call). This form of taqiyya was used in the movement leading up to the Abbasid revolution, which involved the extensive participation of Shi'is, and in the various Isma'ili da'was, which led to the establishment of the Fatimid state, the Qarmati state in eastern Arabia, and the territories of the Nizari "Assassins" in Iran and Syria. Legacies of this revolutionary usage are seen in Twelver hadith reports that stress the centrality of taqiyya to one's religious obligations and impress on the believer the need above all else to keep the name and location of the imam—the leader of the movement—secret. The Abbasid revolution was conducted in the name of al-riḍā min ahl al-bayt, "the agreed-upon one from among the descendants of the Prophet," in part to avoid conflicts within the movement but also for the sake of secrecy. It is also in this sense that taqiyya has figured in the description of modern political movements, including various Islamist political parties whom detractors accuse of pretending to accept democratic principles while they actually intend to ignore them in the event that they attain political power.

In the most common sense, taqiyya is used by the Twelver Shi'is and other sectarian groups who live as stigmatized minorities and potential targets of discrimination or persecution. Whereas the legal literature refers to a limited number of behaviors, such as denying adherence to the sectarian group in question or refraining from highly visible obligations such as prayers, taqiyya, in order to be performed successfully, may extend to nonlegal matters and involve hiding, for example, one's town or region of origin. It is generally recognized that the person who is able to assess the need for taqiyya—the threat of danger in the case at hand—is the performer himself (al-muttaqī). It necessarily involves an audience before whom one performs it (al-muttaqā minhu), which may include government officials, judicial officials, or lay members of the majority group. It allows one to commit acts that are legally forbidden or omit acts that are legally obligatory without changing the underlying legal status of those acts; these matters are collectively the substance of taqiyya (al-muttaqā fīhi).

The most frequent practices subject to taqiyya are those that are most visible. For Shi'is living in Sunni societies, many of these have to do with prayer. Shi'is in many societies have often suppressed their distinctive form of the call to prayer—for example, the use of the phrase "come to the best of works" in the dawn prayer instead of al-ṣalātu khayrun min al-nawm ("Prayer is better than sleep"), as well as the addition of the creedal statement ashhadu anna 'Aliyyan waliyyu llāh ("I witness that 'Ali is the ward of God"). Shi'is have also suppressed their doctrinal position that praying behind a Sunni prayer leader or praying Friday prayer with the Sunnis is actually invalid, as refusal to do so would place them in danger as heretics. They often avoided the common Shi'i practice of combining the noon and afternoon prayers, or the sunset and evening prayers, even when not traveling. Likewise, touching the forehead to a muhr, or pellet of clay from Karbala, in prostration and holding the hands at the sides of the body rather than folded on one's chest or belly when in standing position would also reveal adherence to Shi'ism and so were avoided.

A curious consequence of the regular use of dissimulation to conceal Shi'i views on details of religious practice was the establishment of taqiyya as a principle of Shi'i hadith criticism. If several hadiths report that the imams voiced contradictory opinions on a legal issue, and if one of those opinions agreed with one upheld in Sunni law, Shi'is assumed it to be false, for it must have been uttered by the imam for the benefit of a Sunni audience. The correct opinion in such cases must be that which opposed the Sunni view.

Other matters subject to taqiyya have been Shi'i doctrines concerning the status of the imams and Companions of the Prophet, for a number of the latter, those who openly opposed 'Ali or usurped the position of leader of the community that rightly belonged to him, especially Abu Bakr, 'Umar b. al-Khattab, 'Uthman b. 'Affan, and 'A'isha, are technically unbelievers and should be cursed. Because of the tensions with Sunnis that curses and insults of such figures bring out, many Shi'i authorities, including Ayatollah Khomeini and Ayatollah Khamene'i, have ruled that Shi'is should avoid cursing them for the sake of creating unity in the Muslim community.

Other matters involve any distinctive Shi'i practice, such as the tradition for men to wear a signet ring on the right hand rather than the left hand or the celebration of the Prophet's birthday on a slightly different date. In addition, the modification of identity in an Islamic context led Shi'is to certain practices, including modifying one's name, particularly the nisba (filiation), in order to conceal one's exact place of origin, which might reveal one's sectarian identity. The most famous case of this is that of Afghani, who was not actually Afghani but an Iranian whose nisba was Asadabadi; he changed his name to hide the fact that he was a Shi'i. In a number of cases, Shi'is are known to have adopted a forged genealogy (nasab), as when Afghani claimed descent from the renowned hadith scholar Tirmidhi or Baha' al-Din al-'Amili claimed descent from the famous Sunni theologian Ghazali. Other practices connected with the performance of taqiyya are changing one's distinctive clothing in order to hide one's affiliation or to adopt an assumed identity, such as that of a merchant or dervish. Documents were also important props for the performance of taqiyya; these included ijāzahs, which are diplomas or certificates of study, as well as works dedicated to rulers or other potential patrons. In addition to establishing the scholarly credentials and accomplishments of the holder, they also suggested his doctrinal acceptability.

Taqiyya has also served as the broad rubric under which Shi'is have discussed all types of relation with the majority community, including ones that are framed in positive rather than negative terms. A hadith report attributed to the sixth imam, Ja'far al-Sadiq, urges Shi'is not only to tolerate the Sunni majority and patiently endure living among them but actually to show themselves exemplary members in the majority society, praying in the first row along with the Sunnis, visiting their sick, attending their funerals, and so on.

Although dissimulation is an accepted principle in Sunni Islamic law, some Sunni commoners and scholars alike have often denounced Shi'is for their constant resort to taqiyya, accusing them of making taqiyya the basis of their religion and comparing them to the hypocrites (munāfiqūn) of the Qur'an, contemporaries of the Prophet Muhammad who had outwardly adopted Islam but secretly worked to undermine his prophetic mission. Such critiques are often exaggerated by the fact that the Sunnis have been in most instances the majority and have felt little sympathy with members of minorities who suffer regular discrimination and persecution. Nonetheless, in historical contexts where Sunni Muslims were persecuted, most often by Christians, they regularly resorted to taqiyya. Muslims captured by the Byzantines, Muslim communities in Sicily and the Balkans, and, most famously, the Moriscos of Spain all resorted to dissimulation in order to maintain adherence to Islam while outwardly adopting Christianity. It is known that in Spain the Moriscos performed ablutions and prayed in secret and used various ruses to hide the fact that they fasted during Ramadan, abstained from eating pork and drinking wine, slaughtered animals according to Islamic law, and so on. They also performed double marriage ceremonies, once in church and once afterward with an Islamic marriage contract.

See also jurisprudence; shari'a; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Etan Kohlberg, "Taqiyya in Shī'ī Theology and Religion," in Secrecy and Concealment, edited by Hans G. Kippenberg and Guy G. Strousma, 1995; Devin J. Stewart, "Taqiyyah as Performance: The Travels of Bahā' al-Din al-'Āmilī in the Ottoman Empire (991–93/1583–85)," Princeton Papers in Near Eastern Studies 4, no. 1 (1996).

DEVIN J. STEWART

division of labor

The increased degree of division of labor and occupational specialization in the manufacturing and service sectors of medieval Islamic economies was essential to their economic performance. Classical economic theory demonstrates that a greater division of labor leads to greater output, better quality products, increased efficiency, and greater implementation of technical innovations in the manufacture of commodities.

The Arabic literary sources provide a great deal of information about individual trades and occupations, which permits a reliable statistical assessment but no theory of the division of labor. A quantitative study of Islamic occupations covering the period from 700 to 1500 reveals 1,853 unique trade names and occupations. This occupational classification permits us to measure the degree of specialization within each of the industries in the manufacturing and service sectors in comparison to earlier and contemporary societies; the relative distribution of manpower in the economy; and other related aspects such as gender and ethnic labor, Islamic labor organization, social and economic integration, and optimal economic performance. The numbers reveal a relatively limited specialization in the primary sectors of agriculture and mining, ranging between 29 and 49 occupational terms over the period, but a considerable expansion in the manufacturing sector in the early and later Middle Ages, ranging between 398 and 418 names, and numerous occupations in the tertiary or service sector, ranging between 522 and 883 trade names. The small number of occupations found in the primary sector points to less division of labor in this sector, although the bulk of the population lived and worked in rural areas. This finding is due to the simple nature of agricultural tasks and to the fact that that they were performed by all members of the family.

In contrast, the impact of an increased division of labor was very visible in urban centers. In the cities, the ratio of those employed in manufacturing ranged from 44 percent to 32 percent of the labor force and from 51 percent to 66 percent of those employed in services. Extensive division of labor occurred in key urban industries such as textiles, food preparation, building, metalworking, and leather. The textile industry showed the most intensive specialization, with trade names reflecting the manufacture of new items, the use of new raw materials, and the development of new techniques. This industry employed a commercially significant share of the full-time urban labor force, including both male and female workers. The textile industry was also unique in having a government manufacturing component in the form of the ṭirāz (textiles) factory. The manufacture of luxury items generated greater specialization and greater productivity. Studies of the Italian textile industry have indicated greater dependence on raw materials from the Middle East than on technical and organizational patterns derived from Islamicate models, such as the division of labor, specialization, or manufacturing techniques. Increased specialization in the building trades also corresponded to new building techniques and materials and increased demand for private and monumental buildings in the cities, as well as manufacturing installations such as presses and mills in specific urban and rural environments, an indication of growth in the economy in general.

The increased division of labor in the service sector was linked to an increased drive for commercialization demonstrated by the division of labor in the manufacturing sector, geared to greater volume and better products for local sale and export, as well as increased economic activity throughout. The correlation between the increased demand for manufactured items and population growth is reflected in diversification and occupational specialization in the service sector. Occupations in industrial services such as wholesale commerce, retail marketing, finance, and transport increased, as did the number of categories of professional service providers and skilled workers. Religious institutions provided service occupations in mosques, religious teaching, the police force, and the judiciary. In Mamluk Egypt and Syria, the effects of long subjection to an ethnic political and military regime are reflected in the number of military-cum-administrative occupations and offices in the economy. In the Islamic city's division of labor, service occupations play a fundamental role in integrating manufacturing, legal, and economic functions.

Division of labor occurred also along gender and ethnic lines. In the textile industry, females monopolized spinning occupations and specialized in silk dyeing, sewing, and brocade making, while commercial weaving remained a male occupation. There were female brokers and sellers of agricultural products, but there is no evidence that women's guilds existed anywhere, even in the modern period. Ethnic and religious division of labor was manifested in trades exercised almost exclusively by Jews, Armenians, Berbers, and Copts over long periods and was prominent in the military and administrative occupations of the Turks and Persians. Strict ethnic division of labor mitigated against economic integration and technical innovation. Slave labor, in contrast, never developed an occupational specialization.

The quantitative analysis of occupational terms mapped the division of labor in the Islamic economic sectors, but the results should also be qualified according to historical circumstances. The results indicate that in comparison to previous and contemporary Roman, Byzantine, and European economies, the Islamic Middle East had much more diversified manufacturing and service sectors. Nonetheless, variations in regional patterns also occurred. For instance, North Africa and Spain had less sophisticated manufacturing industries and trade occupations than the Middle East. The division of labor varied according to the size and function of urban centers: cities that served as major administrative centers had scope for more occupational specialization and greater division of labor than others.

There is insufficient information about occupational structures and division of labor patterns to indicate a major change over the premodern period. Increased division of labor is sometimes seen as compensating for a lack of technical innovation with sheer manpower numbers, which in the long term provokes stagnation, conservatism, and social barriers to progress and integration. Despite the absence of innovation in methods of production, however, the Islamic occupational world remained closely involved with science and technology. Musicians, time keepers, astronomers, and writers of fiscal manuals consulted and made use of mathematics, while physicians, scribes, secretaries, calligraphers, binders, agriculturists, animal trainers, and veterinarians used written manuals to learn and instruct.

MAYA SHATZMILLER

Beginning in the 16th century, the discovery of the route around the Cape of Good Hope to the Indian Ocean, which allowed Portuguese, British, and other merchants direct access to East Africa, India, and eventually Indonesia and the Far East, drastically cut the revenues from long-distance trade in the Islamic world and the Middle East in particular, reducing the merchant sector of the economy. Increasingly direct contact with the international markets, culminating in the 19th and 20th centuries with the European colonization of most Muslim societies on the globe, led to the disruption or disintegration of long-established economic relations. As a result, an international division of labor developed in which the colonies in the Muslim world and elsewhere provided raw materials and cheap labor, while the citizens of industrialized nations provided skilled labor and administrators. Locally, foreign investors with access to capital and to the government were able to take advantage of cheap materials and labor, taking the place of local investors and employers. The manufacturing sectors of the economy in the Muslim world suffered, as traditional artisans were unable to compete or were forced into new sectors. Textile production and animal transport were especially hard hit. In agriculture, many regions in the Muslim world became increasingly dependent on a limited number of cash crops such as cotton or tobacco and thus more susceptible to international fluctuation in commodity prices. Privatization and the creation of large estates forced peasants to leave rural areas and migrate to the major cities.

While the Muslim world has been subject to many of the same trends found in the global economy, such as the reduction of the percentage of the population engaged in agriculture, the manufacturing sector remains relatively weak in most Islamic societies. Agriculture remains important, although it has become less labor-intensive, and the service and tourism sectors have grown rapidly in many nations of the Islamic world. In the oil-producing states, a new economic pattern based primary on oil revenues emerged in the 20th century. In Saudi Arabia, Kuwait, and the Gulf countries, little manufacturing or industry takes place unless it is directly connected with the oil industry. The service sector in these countries is very strong, but the majority of the labor is foreign, including workers from other Arab nations, Iran, Pakistan, India, the Philippines, and elsewhere. The division of labor along ethnic and gender lines remains strong in Islamic societies and is more pronounced than in other regions of the world. One of the legacies of colonialism is an important presence of foreign companies, experts, advisors, and skilled workers in many sectors, often from the former colonial powers or from other western European nations. Female education and labor force participation rates in the Middle East and North Africa and in other Islamic societies are among the lowest in the world as a consequence of conservative cultural norms and social values, and this remains a prominent cause of low productivity. The gender-segregated division of labor is also more pronounced than in other regions of the globe, with women working primarily in light manufacturing and service industries, clerical occupations, informal and domestic activities, and agriculture.

EDITOR

See also economic theory; guilds; trade and commerce; women

Further Reading

Eleanor Abdella Doumato and Marsha Pripstein Posusney, eds., Women and Globalization in the Arab Middle East: Gender, Economy and Society, 2003; Valentine M. Moghadam, Women, Work, and Economic Reform in the Middle East and North Africa, 1998; Maya Shatzmiller, Labour in the Medieval Islamic World, 1994.

Druze

The Druze religion is a faith that arose from within Fatimid Isma'ilism, one of the branches of Shi'ism. The faith appeared in Egypt during the last years of the reign of the sixth Fatimid caliph al-Hakim bi-Amr Allah (r. 996–1021), whom some extremist Isma'ili followers—and later all Druze followers—regarded as an incarnation of God. The Druze who survive as a small minority in Syria, Lebanon, Israel, and Jordan (their estimated number in these countries totaled around one million in the beginning of the 21st century) diverge substantially from Islam, both Sunni and Shi'i.

A number of Isma'ili preachers (dā'īs) who arrived in Cairo from Persia and Central Asia propagated radical doctrines concerning Hakim. Notable among them were Muhammad b. Isma'il al-Darazi (or Darzi), who gave his name to adherents of the Druze faith (durūz), and Hamza b. 'Ali al-Labbad (the feltmaker) of Zawzan in eastern Iran, who is viewed as the founder of the Druze religion. By dispatching delegations of individual dā'īs, Hamza attempted to spread the new religion as an internal preaching (da'wa) within the already existing Isma'ili missionary movement. In a series of epistles—a number of which were later incorporated into the Epistles of Wisdom (Rasa'il al-Hikma), constituting the Druze canon—Hamza preached the divinity not only of Hakim but also of the earlier Fatimid caliphs beginning with al-Qa'im (r. 934–46). Relying upon early extremist Isma'ili doctrine, Hamza also preached the abrogation (naskh) of the Muslim religion and its Isma'ili inner interpretation (ta'wīl). The old religion, and the existing political rule under which it had flourished, had to be replaced by a new one: that of the Druze. The main pillar of the new faith became the belief in God's unity as manifested in his incarnation, al-Hakim. Hamid al-Din al-Kirmani (d. ca. 1021), the great Isma'ili dā'ī and a witness to the emergence of the Druze religion, stated that according to Druze doctrine, Muslim tenets should be rejected as "superstitions [khurāfāt], husks [qushūr] and mere stuffing [hashw]. Salvation does not depend on them."

Hamza built up his preaching organization to spread the new religion throughout the world. The wide range of the Druze missionary system is reflected in the Epistles of Wisdom, which are addressed to a variety of peoples and include, inter alia, the treatment of doctrinal themes and organization of the new religion as well as polemics against such faiths as Sunni Islam, Isma'ilism, Nusayrism, Judaism, and Christianity. The active political phase of the Druze faith, however, did not last long. Hamza and the other prominent dā'īs supporting him in disseminating the new faith—primarily Muhammad b. Wahb al-Qurashi, Salama b. 'Abd al-Wahhab, and Baha' al-Din al-Muqtana—began their religiopolitical activity in 1017 (considered the first year of the Druze era) and ended it in 1035, the year of the closing of the da'wa and the beginning of an era of concealment (dawr al-satr), a period in which the Druze faith had to cease its proselytizing activity. In 1021, Hakim disappeared suddenly under mysterious circumstances. According to Druze doctrine, the era of concealment would come to an end only with the eschatological return of Hakim, which would mark the definitive victory of the Druze faith. Hakim's successor, Zahir (r. 1021–35), denied his predecessor's claim of divinity. The entire Druze community was subjected to persecution and forced to retreat to remote mountainous areas, chiefly in Lebanon and Syria. Under such circumstances, the Druze doctrine could not continue to develop. Druze religious writings were accessible to only a small minority of initiated scholars ('uqqāl, literally "learned"); they were entirely unavailable to the vast majority of the uninitiated (juhhāl, literally "ignorant"). The 'uqqāl alone participated in weekly religious sessions, traditionally held on Thursday nights; the uninitiated were not committed to the performance of religious commandments, with a few exceptions. The Five Pillars of Islam were not observed, and one of the epistles of the Druze canon—al-naqd al-khafī (the hidden destruction)—was even dedicated to their systematic rejection.

In the remote areas of Lebanon and Syria, however, the Druze were able to return to the political arena. Druze leaders (amirs) gradually rose to power, maintaining a de facto autonomous semifeudal rule. Fakhr al-Din II (1585–1653), of the Ma'n dynasty, ruled—formally under the sovereignty of the Ottomans—over most of Lebanon and parts of Syria and Palestine. In the 18th century, the house of Shihab gained ascendancy over rival feudal lords. The history of the Druze in Syria and Lebanon over the past four centuries has been marked by a continuing struggle for hegemony between themselves and their Christian-Maronite neighbors. The intercommunal rivalry led to periodic violent clashes, culminating in the civil war that broke out in 1860 and turned into a sweeping Druze massacre of Christians. In the 19th century, two Druze clans—the Junbalat and the Arslan—emerged as the chief rivals for leadership. French involvement on behalf of the Maronites ended in the creation of a self-governing Christian hegemony that became the basis of an enlarged Lebanon, first under the French Mandate in 1920 and then as an independent state in 1943 in which the Druze were also represented. The leading Druze political figure since independence, until his assassination in 1976, was Kamal Junbalat, who was succeeded by his son Walid. The political leadership of the Druze in Syria traditionally has been in the hands of the Atrash family. Traditional leadership in Israel has come from the Tarif clan from the village of Julis in Galilee.

Despite the Druze involvement in political activity during certain periods of their modern history, they were predominantly characterized as quiet and nonpolitical. This approach is deeply embedded in the principle of taqiyya (precautionary dissimulation), which in the Druze faith—as among other minority Muslim groups (mainly within Shi'ism)—is a fundamental doctrine. Relying upon this principle, the Druze were allowed in time of danger outwardly to adopt the faith of the dominant majority. Kais Firro, an Israeli scholar of the Druze community, rejects this explanation of Druze political behavior, however, claiming that it is based on external, non-Druze, and even anti-Druze, sources.

See also Fatimids (909–1171); Hakim bi-Amr Allah (985–1021); Isma'ilis; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Nejla M. Abu-Izzeddin, The Druzes: A New Study of Their History, Faith and Society, 1993; David R. W. Bryer, The Origins of the Druze Religion . . . (PhD diss., University of Oxford), 1971; Kais M. Firro, A History of the Druzes, 1992; Hamid al-Din al-Kirmani, al-Risala al-Wa'iza, vol. 14, ed. Muhammad Kamil Husayn, 1952; Silvestre de Sacy, Exposé de la religion des Druzes, 2 vols., 1838; Daniel de Smet, ed. and trans., Les épîtres sacrées des druzes (Rasa'il al-Hikma), 2007.

MEIR M. BAR-ASHER

East Africa

The proximity of the cradle of Islam in the Arabian Peninsula to the East African coast led to the new religion's early arrival in East Africa and the absorption of Arabic influences. East African Islam was also influenced by the central position of the coast on the trade route between the Middle East and the Far East and by relations with Persia and Yemen. The geographical position of the East African coast contributed to the development of the Swahili culture and language, which combined external Islamic elements with local ethnic, religious, and linguistic features.

Archeological and numismatic evidence indicate the existence of a Muslim settlement at Shanga in the Lamu archipelago on the Kenyan coast as early as 780. Evidence of Muslim settlement between the 10th and 13th centuries has been found in Pemba, Zanzibar, and Kilwa, which are all in present-day Tanzania. In the course of the 14th century, Islam spread along the coastline up to the Comoro Islands and Madagascar and into the hinterland. It is estimated that by the 14th century, there were more than 30 Muslim communities. These communities were composed of Eastern Bantu, Sudanic and Southern Cushitic, and Northeast-Coastal Bantu speakers, together with communities of Arabic, Indian, Persian, and Yemenite immigrants, mostly traders and merchants.

The concept of a supreme God was found already in the pre-Islamic beliefs of the region, but it was associated with the worship of spirits and ancestors. Some of these pre-Islamic beliefs were assimilated into the new religion, as observed by later travelers, such as Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad b. Battuta in the 14th century. The existence of immigrants that came from the town of Shiraz in Persia suggests that Persian forms of Islam may have been present at an early stage, which may have led to the introduction of Shi'i elements. Yet the Fatimid dynasty's dominance in trade with India and the East Indies along the Red Sea since the 11th century resulted in the dominance of Sunni influences in the area. With the migration of shurafā' (plural of sharīf) families from Yemen and the Hadhramaut beginning in the 13th century, local Muslims adopted the Shafi'i madhhab (one of the four schools of law in Islam). It is in urban settlements such as Mombasa, Zanzibar, Kilwali, and Kilwa, which flourished between the 12th and 14th centuries, that these developments can be traced. Kilwa was the most powerful Islamic settlement on the coast, known for its Islamic architecture, governance, and center of learning, as well as its jihad against the "infidels" of the hinterland.

The Portuguese conquest of the East African coast, which occurred from 1498 to 1530, threatened to wipe out the age of Islamic prosperity. As part of their attempts to secure control of the maritime trade routes against the Ottomans, the Portuguese established Fort Jesus in Mombasa and subjugated most of the Muslim settlements along the coast. Powerful Islamic settlements such as Kilwa declined, and new centers, such as Lamu and Pate, emerged with new ruling elites, mostly from shurafā' families. Islamic scholarship began to flourish on the coast, including written literature in both Arabic and Swahili. Attempts to convert coastal Muslims to Christianity were rarely successful and led local Muslims to seek external aid in order to expel the Portuguese.

During the 17th century, the sultanate of Oman became a considerable force in the Indian Ocean. At the request of local Swahili leaders, such as the Mazru'i dynasty from Mombasa, the Omanis helped the latter expel the Portuguese from all areas north of Mozambique at the beginning of the 18th century. The Omanis gradually began to conquer areas along the coast, however, and during the 1820s they established the Zanzibar Sultanate. In 1837, Sa'id b. Sultan from the Al Bu Sa'idi dynasty made Zanzibar his main place of residence. Through the influence of the new sultanate, a more Arabized form of East African Islam flourished until the arrival of the Europeans.

European protectorates were established over Zanzibar, Tanganyika (both which are in present-day Tanzania), Kenya, Uganda, and other territories toward the end of the 19th century. European colonial rule was generally based on indirect rule, in other words, on collaboration with local Muslim rulers who continued their traditional ruling systems. Sufi tarīqas (Sufi brotherhoods) such as the 'Alawis, Qadiris, and Shadhilis, which had flourished in the area in previous centuries, became the main basis for social organization and the spread of Islam over new communities during the colonial era. Many workers who emigrated from the hinterland to the coastal areas were also converted to Islam. Yet European colonialism also encouraged Christian missionary activity and colonization of European settlers, which resulted in a notable decrease in Islamic diffusion. Thus, with the rise of the East African secular nation-states in the early 1960s, Muslims were substantial minorities in the new states but not a dominant factor in the determination of political and ideological agendas.

Since the 1980s, feelings of marginalization of Muslims in states dominated by Christians elites such as Kenya and Uganda have resulted in an Islamic revival, accompanied by politicization and even radicalization. Influences from revolutionary Iran and Saudi Arabian Wahhabism have resulted in the establishment of educational and welfare networks that in some cases have translated into a demand for active political representation.

See also Ethiopia and Eritrea; Sudan

Further Reading

Justo Lacunza-Balda, "Translations of the Quran into Swahili, and Contemporary Islamic Revival in East Africa," in African Islam and Islam in Africa: Encounters between Sufis and Islamists, edited by Eva Evers Rosander and David Westerlund, 1997; Ira M. Lapidus, A History of Islamic Societies, 2002; Randall L. Pouwels, "The East African Coast c. 780 to 1900 C.E.," in The History of Islam in Africa, edited by Nehemia Levtzion and Randall L. Pouwels, 2000; J. Spencer Trimingham, Islam in East Africa, 1964.

IRIT BACK

economic theory

Throughout its history, Islam has sought to regulate all aspects of life, including economics. Its holy book contains verses concerning such matters as credit, trade, resource allocation, taxation, redistribution, and inheritance. The Qur'an prohibits ribā, a pre-Islamic credit practice, which commonly led borrowers into enslavement (2:274–80, 3:130, 4:160–61). It prescribes an annual tax called zakat on certain forms of wealth and income in order to finance eight categories of public expenditure, including defense, the propagation of Islam, and poor relief (2:177, 2:215, 4:8, 9:60, 24:22). It entitles all surviving children of a deceased person to a share of his or her estate (4:11–12, 176). It requires individuals to be honest and fair in commercial transactions (55:7–9).

Intellectual Heritage

Over the ages, a wide variety of economic policies have been justified through these prescriptions and prohibitions, including ones that are mutually incompatible. Often the justifications in question have rested also on the sunna, the normative practice of the Prophet Muhammad. From the dawn of Islam to the present, the use of interest on loans has been treated as illegitimate through an expansive interpretation of the ban on ribā, understood as usury. The preindustrial guilds that regulated the activities of craftsmen were given monopolistic and monopsonistic privileges out of a sense of fairness defined in Islamic terms. In certain times and places, agricultural taxes were collected according to rules prescribed by the Qur'an.

In defining proper economic behavior and prescribing economic policies, the fundamental sources of Islam did not provide a methodology of economics, a theory of economics involving causal relationships, or empirical accounts of how incentives shape economic performance. Nowhere in the Qur'an or the sunna does one find what one might call an economic analysis of some phenomenon. For premodern theories based at least partly on Islam, one must look to great Muslim philosophers, most notably Ghazali (1058–1111), Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328), Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406), and Taqi al-Din al-Maqrizi (1364–1442). Ghazali and Ibn Taymiyya drew also on the great Hellenic philosophers of antiquity. In line with Aristotle, they treated greed, avarice, deceit, corruption, and oppression as traits that could be overcome, to one degree or another, through moral education. As for Ibn Khaldun and Maqrizi, they were impressed by the immutability of human selfishness and hunger for power. They attributed recurrent patterns of overtaxation, poor governance, and expropriation primarily to ineradicable human drives and only secondarily to deficient socialization or education.

Yet, in writing about matters central to economics, the great Muslim thinkers of the Middle Ages did not forge a distinct or coherent approach to interpreting phenomena such as trade flows, inflation, public finance, productivity, and living standards. In short, they did not develop what we would recognize today as a discipline of economics. Hence, when the rise of western Europe became a threat to Muslim sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire, Safavid Iran, Mughal India, and elsewhere, Muslims who began to reflect on the underlying causes found little of economic relevance in the works of earlier Muslim thinkers. Unable to derive adequate guidance from their own intellectual heritage, they inferred, by and large, that their troubles stemmed from moral failings. Only in the 19th century did their successors begin to formulate coherent economic responses. By then the thinking of most economic reformers was divorced from identifiable Islamic concepts; insofar as they were guided by economic theory, their presumptions, concepts, and terminology were largely of foreign provenance. Upholding this pattern in the first half of the 20th century, Muslim leaders, including those committed to Islamic causes, formulated economic policies without reference to Islam's intellectual heritage. For their part, contributors to Islamic thought did not develop distinctly Islamic interpretations of economic problems or solutions to overcoming them. The half century leading up to World War II constituted a period of near-complete separation between religious and economic thought in the Muslim world.

Rise of Islamic Economics

These two spheres began to reunite in the 1940s with the emergence of a school of economic thought that claimed to draw inspiration primarily from Islam's traditional sources. Called "Islamic economics," it was initiated by Abu al-A'la Mawdudi (1903–79), an Indian whose goal was to preserve the religious identity and cultural heritage of India's Muslim minority rather than to solve its economic problems. Mawdudi set out to demonstrate the comprehensiveness of Islam as a source of guidance by proposing distinctly Islamic approaches in various areas, including economics. Promoting Islamic economics as a superior alternative to capitalism and socialism, the leading economic systems of his time, Mawdudi offered Islamic banking as a just system of finance respectful of Islam's ban on interest, zakat as the basis of a redistribution system meant to eradicate poverty, and norms of economic behavior drawn from Islam's traditional sources as a remedy for corruption and mistrust in the marketplace.

Over the following two decades, other seminal contributions to Islamic economics were made by Sayyid Qutb (1906–66), an Egyptian, and Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr (1931–80), an Iraqi. Like Mawdudi, they invoked the economic performance of Islam's initial decades in seventh-century Arabia as proof of how Islamic principles can benefit societies economically. Though differing on certain details of the historical record, these pioneers took it for granted that Islamic principles were followed broadly in the days of Prophet Muhammad, that subsequent Muslim leaders invited economic troubles by skirting rules for personal gain, and that Islamic economic teachings are equally beneficial in a modern economy based on impersonal exchange as in a medieval economy whose exchanges are mostly among acquaintances.

None of the early contributors to Islamic economics attempted to explain why, once in place, the ideal economic policies proved unsustainable. Focusing on identifying exemplary behaviors by revered early Muslims, their writings attributed the behaviors to personal virtues rooted in piety. Echoing Ghazali and Ibn Taymiyya, they also emphasized the possibility of overcoming personal shortcomings through faith and education. From its inception, then, Islamic economics was in conflict with the theoretical framework of neoclassical economics, the dominant economic methodology since the mid-20th century. Under the assumption that in most contexts people are essentially selfish, neoclassical economics tries to identify the incentives that lead individuals and collectivities to particular outcomes and, in addition, the social mechanisms responsible for the incentives themselves. Islamic economists have by and large disregarded the incentives responsible for Muslim economic underdevelopment, rampant corruption in Muslim-governed societies, and huge inequalities both within and among Muslim countries, to cite just a few of the failures they attribute to the prevailing, un-Islamic economic systems of the Muslim world. This orientation has drastically limited the attention Islamic economics receives from scholars with formal training in economics. Most professional economists of the Muslim faith continue to treat economics as a secular domain at least implicitly by conducting their analyses within neoclassical theoretical frameworks divorced from religion.

Methodological Transformation

Islamic economics entered a new phase during the Middle East's oil boom of the mid-1970s, as political threats to the oil-rich monarchies made them increase their aid to various Islamist movements, including Islamic economics. Well-funded organizations began a campaign to raise the profile of Islamic economics within scholarly circles. Journals of Islamic economics were founded, international conferences were organized, and subfields of Islamic economics were defined to match those of the American Economic Association, the world's leading association of professional economists. Research presented under the rubric of Islamic economics began to use mathematics and to borrow concepts, terms, and methods from neoclassical economics and, to a lesser and declining extent, Marxian economics.

The resulting research output has continued to ascribe a key role to Islamic morality in enabling efficient resource allocation, ensuring fair trades, and providing a safety net to the disadvantaged. By the same token, it has incorporated incentives into its theoretical framework through such concepts as utility functions and offer curves. Islamic variants of neoclassical models have been developed, such as general equilibrium models of an economy without interest and aggregate consumption models with zakat-paying individuals. Contributions promote the view that markets work well provided the participants pass their choices through an Islamic moral filter. They thus depart from a central tenet of neoclassical economics, whose roots go back at least to Adam Smith (1723–90): the view that markets serve general welfare precisely when individuals and firms seek selfishly to maximize utility or profit.

Themes and Topics

Major differences have existed with regard to the specifics of the moral filter in question. For almost any widely condemned economic outcome or practice, Islamic economics offers writings that call on good Muslims to avoid it, if not also to take preventive steps. The use of child labor, income inequality, poor working conditions, industrial pollution, and disharmony in the workplace are among the generally troubling phenomena that the norms of Islam are expected to alleviate. However, there have also been writings that treat social patterns considered troubling by most Islamic economists as unavoidable and not necessarily problematic. A research center in Qum, Iran, has proposed sharp restrictions on regulations concerning workplace conditions and child labor.

Conspicuously missing from Islamic economics has been research aimed at explaining the operation of economies governed under Islamic law after the first few decades. Very few attempts have been made to understand the operation of the Abbasid, Mamluk, Ottoman, Safavid, or Mughal economies or to draw lessons from their records for modern economic development. In this respect, Islamic economics has maintained a pattern set by Mawdudi, who found little value in economic practices after the first few decades of Islam on the ground that Muslim economic life was corrupted. Research aimed at explaining the successes and failures of Islamic economic institutions has been conducted mainly outside the rubric of Islamic economics.

The theme that corruption spread among Muslims after Islam's "golden age" in the seventh century has coexisted in Islamic economics with the attribution of the Muslim world's current economic shortcomings to Western imperialism. Starting around the 18th century, many contributors hold, Europeans destroyed local crafts, monopolized natural resources, replaced Islamic institutions with Western institutions, and took over key aspects of economic governance. They also lowered Muslim standards of honesty and weakened adherence to Islam's ethic of brotherly cooperation.

By far the most popular topic in Islamic economics is Islamic finance, which constitutes its main practical achievement. The size of the global Islamic finance sector, estimated at $400 billion as of 2010, has prompted much empirical research aimed at evaluating its performance, as well as theorizing to explain the findings. Only some of this research takes place under the guise of Islamic economics. Its analytical tools are drawn mostly from secular schools of economic thought.

See also capitalism; communism; Islamization; socialism

Further Reading

Sohrab Behdad, "A Disputed Utopia: Islamic Economics in Revolutionary Iran," Comparative Studies in Society and History 36, no. 4 (1994); Umar Chapra, Islam and the Economic Challenge, 1992; Mahmoud A. El-Gamal, Islamic Finance: Law, Economics, and Practice, 2006; S. M. Ghazanfar, ed., Medieval Islamic Economic Thought: Filling the "Great Gap" in European Economics, 2003; Timur Kuran, Islam and Mammon: The Economic Predicaments of Islamism, 2004; Idem, The Long Divergence: How Islamic Law Held Back the Middle East, 2011; Mervyn K. Lewis and Latifa M. Algaoud, Islamic Banking, 2001; Sayyid Abul-Ala Mawdudi, Islamic Way of Life, 1950; Tim Niblock and Rodney Wilson, The Political Economy of the Middle East, vol. 3: Islamic Economics, 1999; Maxime Rodinson, Islam and Capitalism, translated by Brian Pearce, 1966; Abraham L. Udovitch, Partnership and Profit in Medieval Islam, 1970.

TIMUR KURAN

education

Islamic education should be viewed historically against the background of pre-Islamic times, which Muslims call the jāhiliyya, or "age of ignorance." Muslims equate the polytheistic state of affairs in Arabia before the mission of the Prophet Muhammad with paganism, savagery, and barbarism—the antithesis of civilization. In contrast, Islam means to understand and acknowledge that there is no god but God and to submit to His will. For Muslims, the Islamic religion and way of life thus perfectly represent the wholeness and holiness of education and are synonymous with enlightenment, culture, and civilization.

Islamic education builds on two major principles: acquiring knowledge is both a lifelong pursuit and a religious duty. A correlation exists between knowledge and action for the welfare of the Muslim community—and humanity in general. Hence, Islamic learning aspires to develop persons who acquired a solid general education and are well-grounded in, and shaped by, the virtues of Islam so that they can become productive members of society.

This inclusiveness of Islamic learning is evident in the Qur'an and the hadith; it is also expressed in proverbs, aphorisms, and wisdom sayings. Scholarly discussions of educational theories and practices are offered in a wide variety of medieval Arabic and Persian writings, particularly in classical Islamic philosophical, ethical, and didactic works. The transformations and challenges in contemporary Islamic societies resulting from postcolonial developments, interaction with the West, globalization, migration, and the reality of Muslim life in non-Islamic countries constitute the basis for discourses on education within an Islamic framework.

The Qur'an expressly prioritizes learning and education. God is humankind's undisputed supreme teacher, for God "taught humankind that which they knew not" (Q. 96:5). In the first revelation to the Prophet Muhammad, he was given the divine command to "read" or "recite" words of revelation and thus to proclaim and teach the Word of God to his people and to the world (Q. 96:1–5). Numerous other Qur'anic passages deal with the instruction of believers in the faith and their spiritual growth as individuals and members of the community. Some passages also demand the application of reason and understanding in matters of faith. Similarly, the Qur'an determines the ideal political and religious leaders as those whom God "endowed abundantly with knowledge and bodily perfection"; they will be the leaders on Earth, even if they have "not been given amplitude of wealth" (Q. 2:247).

The imperative to seek knowledge is clearly expressed in many well-known sayings and traditions attributed to the Prophet Muhammad. The command "Seek knowledge, even unto China" sanctifies the idea that the search for knowledge (talab al-'ilm) has no geographic or cultural boundaries. The Prophet's insistence that "the pursuit of knowledge is incumbent on every Muslim, male or female" highlights that learning is a religious duty, irrespective of gender. Another prophetic statement calls for well-educated leadership, as "the person with the best knowledge of the Book of God and most experience in reading [it] should lead the people [in prayer]."

In early Islam, instruction took place in teaching sessions and study circles in mosques or privately in the homes of scholars. Oral instruction was a predominant feature of learning, and personal contact between the teacher and students was considered the best guarantee for the authenticity of the transmitted knowledge. This idea of authoritative transmission has remained crucial to Islamic learning throughout history, especially in the religious disciplines. Nonetheless, as early as the seventh century, lectures and seminars regularly were based on written collections of notes used by scholars and students as memory aids. In the ninth century, "the book" emerged in Muslim society and was soon recognized as a powerful medium of education.

By the tenth century, the Muslim world extended from Spain to China. This religiopolitical development significantly stimulated Islamic learning, causing the Arabic-Islamic civilization to become a "knowledge society" characterized by a considerable degree of religious tolerance and intellectual open-mindedness. Baghdad (founded in 762), the capital of the Abbasid caliphate, was the vibrant commercial, cultural, and intellectual metropolis of the Muslim world. It witnessed dynamic activities in the humanities and great advancements in the natural sciences. Significant achievements in mathematics, astronomy, chemistry and alchemy, medicine, pharmacology, optics, physics, engineering, architecture, irrigation, and agriculture attest to the industriousness of medieval Muslim scholarship and education. It is also evident in history and geography, in the codification of law, and in the development of philology and grammar. Classical Islamic philosophy demonstrates originality and brilliance in abstract thinking, while Islamic mysticism (Sufism) played a significant role in the transmission of knowledge ('ilm), as it was generally considered a prerequisite for gnosis (ma'rifa). Influential scholarly families played a decisive role in recruiting, funding, and controlling the intellectual elite of medieval Muslim society.

Academies remarkably free of cultural, ethnic, or confessional constraints were established. For example, Baghdad's famous translation academy and research center—Bayt al-Hikma, or House of Wisdom—was officially sponsored by the caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33) and employed numerous Christian, Syriac-speaking scholars to prepare Arabic translations of philosophical and scientific works, particularly those in Greek. In Cairo, the Shi'i Fatimids (969–1171 in Egypt) founded academies to study Shi'i theological tenets, as well as much of the intellectual heritage of the Greeks, Iranians, and Indians. The Dar al-'Ilm, or House of Learning, founded in Baghdad in 993 by a Buyid vizier, was administered by two Shi'i notables and a judge; its director of studies, however, was a Sunni (Hanafi) professor.

Azhar ("the Radiant"), the famous mosque and university, was founded in 970 as a Shi'i institution. When the Sunni Ayyubids took power in Egypt (1171–1250), Azhar became a Sunni place of learning and eventually the principal religious university of the Islamic world. Major centers of Islamic learning also developed in cities such as Damascus, Aleppo, Basra, Kufa, Qum, Mashhad, Isfahan, and Farghana in the East; Qayrawan, Tunis (Zaytuna mosque-university from the eighth century), and Fez (the Qarawiyyin mosque and college was founded in 859) emerged in the West; and Córdoba, Toledo, and Granada represented Andalus (Islamic Spain). Famous medical schools existed in Gondeshapur (Iran), Alexandria (Egypt), and Harran (Iraq).

Colleges specializing in Sunni religious and legal instruction were established to meet the growing need for skilled personnel. In addition to mosque- and shrine-colleges, the most important type of college—the madrasa (lit. "a place to study")—flourished from the 11th to 14th centuries. Its most notable example, the Nizamiyya in Baghdad, was founded in 1057 by the vizier Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092) in response to the Fatimid "threat" of spreading Shi'i doctrine and learning, best exemplified by the great Azhar mosque-university in Egypt. In the 13th century, many Shi'i madrasas were established in Iraq and Persia, especially in Hilla, Qum, Rayy, and Kashan. The madrasa—both Sunni and Shi'i—became a tangible feature of Islam's culture and civilization, often financed by a pious endowment (waqf) supporting both faculty and students. The madrasa combined living and teaching accommodations. It was usually built close to a large mosque and led by an imam-professor. The madrasa was largely concerned with Islamic jurisprudence (fiqh), Qur'anic exegesis (tafsīr), theology (kalām and 'aqīdu), tradition (the hadith), Arabic language, and logic (the latter two disciplines being considered essential for accurate expression and sound thinking).

Although this issue has been viewed controversially, some modern scholars suggest that with the rise of an extensive network of (predominantly Sunni) madrasas in the Eastern Islamic world, and given the constraints in the various subjects taught, the religious scholars ('ulama')—by then thoroughly professionalized under state patronage—came to influence the cohesiveness and unity of Islamic thought. To be sure, this decisive institutional victory of dogmatic thought over discursive scholarship resulted in conservatism and, among certain scholars, an opposition to "secular" learning. Traditional Islamic learning (both Sunni and Twelver Shi'i) became increasingly deductive and textually centripetal, particularly regarding the text of revelation itself. Inductive reasoning, required to deal scientifically with matters not yet fully established, was nearly excluded from the curriculum of the madrasa, although it was practiced to some extent in legal reasoning, philosophy, and the physical sciences as such.

Key appointments at madrasas were regularly made by the donor, who designated a prominent scholar for the chair he established. These appointments were monitored by the ruler, but imam-professors of the important "cathedral mosques" were appointed by the caliph himself. Through this web of indirect and direct governmental "patronage" and supervision, the military and political elites in medieval Muslim societies exercised a significant degree of control over the 'ulama' and ensured that scholars would provide the political regime with the religious legitimization it needed. However, despite the fact that madrasas in medieval times had a political dimension, the 'ulama' were free to supervise and regulate the transmission of knowledge without interference from the political elite.

In view of this complex situation, from the 8th through the 16th centuries, there was a continuous tradition of Islamic scholarship dealing with pedagogy and didactics. Farabi (d. 950), probably the most important Islamic political philosopher, made significant contributions to Islamic learning in the context of political and ethical thought, expressed in his books The Perfect State, The Political Regime, and The Attainment of Happiness. Living in Baghdad, Farabi insisted that virtuous societies must be based on a political order whose guiding principle is the realization of human excellence through virtue. Therefore, both rulers and citizens need a certain degree of education, and human societies attain perfection to the extent that their rulers organize their citizens' duties according to their knowledge and specialization, give them laws, and provide leadership in other aspects of communal life. Rulers must become philosopher-kings, perfect in their intellectual faculties and divinely inspired. Farabi claimed that philosophy was indispensable for the founding and survival of the "virtuous state," while prophecy was indispensable for the founding of a virtuous state but not for its survival.

Khatib al-Baghdadi (d. 1071), an intellectual historian from Baghdad, emphasized that the teacher must ensure equal learning opportunities for all his students, regardless of whether they are Muslims, Jews, or Christians—a statement clearly suggesting that the true spirit of learning does not know religious boundaries. Ghazali (d. 1111), one of the great architects of Islamic learning, affirmed in his monumental work The Revival of Religious Studies that orthodox belief, spirituality, and reason were the foundations of traditional Islamic learning. He shaped the theory and practice of Islamic education in a way that is still evident today.

The Tunisian historian and social philosopher Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406) determined in his famous Muqaddima (Prolegomena) three types of theoretical and practical knowledge. First, there is the knowledge of essences, which leads to understanding the realities behind phenomena. Second, there is the knowledge of the natural world and human culture, which enables humans to arrange their lives and control the world they live in. Such "knowledge of civilization" includes technology as well as social and political relationships. Third, there is moral knowledge, which refers to the human ability to think and gradually acquire experience so that ordinary citizens will deal reasonably with each other, rulers will govern in the best interest of society, and thus human life in general will improve. In this context, Ibn Khaldun stresses the role of experience, social skills, and the ability to cooperate. However, human intellect should not be overestimated in learning and human growth, for Ibn Khaldun states that religious knowledge, based on Muhammad's prophecy, was to be preferred and overrides reason and philosophical thought whenever it contradicts divine law (shari'a); this was particularly true in politics. Therefore, prophecy must be accepted as the unquestionable foundation of a sound political society in which humans, as naturally social and political beings, would actively build their existence.

Mulla Sadra Shirazi (d. 1641), a Twelver Shi'i thinker and important educator in Shiraz, insisted that scientific knowledge must be balanced with intuitive knowledge. He severely criticized the worldliness of the 'ulama' of his age and stressed the otherworldly aspect of learning—a view that significantly influenced the theory and practice of religious learning in later times. In contrast, other Shi'i clerics, like the Lebanese 'Ali al-Karaki (d. 1534) and the Iranian Muhammad Sabzavari (d. 1679), suggested that scholars take a more world-embracing attitude. They expressly encouraged religious scholars to become socially active and even to associate with the powerful in order to educate and guide them.

European colonial powers in the Middle East and Southeast Asia had a dramatic impact on Islamic society. They provided Muslim intellectuals and enlightened rulers with the grounds for educational reform in their attempt to raise the standard and widen the scope of learning. Muhammad 'Ali (d. 1849) in Egypt, Sultan 'Abdulmajid I (d. 1861) in Turkey, and Sayyid Ahmad Khan (d. 1898) in India are just a few examples.

In the Arab world, the intellectual reform movement of the Nahda (Awakening) made important steps in reconciling traditional and modern (Western) areas of knowledge in a spirit of openness while retaining the values of Islam and a Muslim identity. In Egypt, Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) called for the reformulation of Islamic doctrine in the light of modern thought, while Qasim Amin (d. 1908) campaigned for the liberation of women. Educational reforms were carried out by Muhammad Bayram (d. 1889) in Tunisia, the Alusi family in Iraq, and by 'Abd al-Hamid b. Badis (d. 1940) in Algeria. In Turkey, Atatürk (d. 1938), founder and first president of the Turkish Republic, implemented the idea of secular nationhood in an Islamic country and secularized the country's educational system.

Throughout much of the 20th century, Islamic education was transformed not only by the struggle between secular and Islamic ideologies but also by a new politicization of Islam in large parts of the Muslim world. In Egypt, the situation of the 'ulama' changed radically in 1952 when the Nasserist regime nationalized the waqfs, thus depriving Azhar University of its financial basis. A 1961 reform aimed to integrate Azhar and their 'ulama' into what was considered "modern society." This reform successfully introduced secular fields of study into the traditionally religious Azhar curriculum. These changes had long-term effects on the 'ulama"s social and political identity: by creating a state-controlled religious monopoly, the regime forced the 'ulama' into complete political submission, but it also provided religious scholars with the space and instruments for their political emergence in the 1970s and 1980s.

In addition to reputable secular universities in the Muslim world, and the robust efforts of the Arab Gulf states to modernize their educational systems, institutionalized Islamic learning in the early 21st century was associated with the highly respected centers of religious scholarship in Cairo, Mecca, Medina, Najaf, and Qum, as well as Hyderabad, Lucknow, and Saharanpur in India, and Dar al-Ulum of Deoband (founded in 1867)—the most renowned Indian madrasa and the largest in Asia. New international Islamic universities were established in Islamabad, Pakistan (1980), and in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia (1983); both admitted women as well as men. Muslim intellectuals and politicians demonstrated a growing awareness of the need to reform the madrasa program of study to enable students to deal with the challenges of modern society and to come to a more relevant understanding of their faith while upholding the identity and the industriousness of 1,400 years of Islamic learning.

See also jurisprudence; knowledge; philosophy; propaganda; Sufism; theology

Further Reading

Jonathan Berkey, The Transmission of Knowledge in Medieval Cairo: A Social History of Islamic Education, 1992; Sebastian Günther, "Be Masters in that You Teach and Continue to Learn: Medieval Muslim Thinkers on Educational Theory," Islam and Education—Myths and Truths; Comparative Education Review 50, no. 3 (2006); Robert W. Hefner and Muhammad Qasim Zaman, eds., Schooling Islam: The Culture and Politics of Modern Muslim Education, 2007; George Makdisi, The Rise of Colleges: Institutions of Learning in Islam and the West, 1981.

SEBASTIAN GÜNTHER

Egypt

Located in the northeastern corner of Africa, Egypt is the most populated Arab state, with a population of over 80 million and an area slightly more than three times the size of New Mexico (385,229 square miles). The Nile River cuts through the country, linking it to the Mediterranean Sea in the north and Africa in the south. Several great civilizations developed on the banks of the Nile: the most ancient is the Pharaonic, which thrived for more than 3,000 years. Egypt's strategic location as a trading center connecting Africa, Europe, and Asia made it attractive to invading foreign armies. It fell under the rule of the Persians, Greeks, Romans, Byzantines, Arabs, Mamluks, Ottomans, and British, finally to become an independent nation-state in 1954. Egypt has been part of the Muslim world since 641 and is predominantly Arab and Islamic in culture. Over 90 percent of Egypt's population is Sunni Muslim, and the rest are mostly Coptic Christians; there are also small numbers of Shi'is, Baha'is, Jews, and Christians of other denominations. Many Egyptians belong to Sufi orders.

Long recognized as a main cultural and Islamic center in the Arab and Muslim worlds, Egypt is home to the oldest Islamic educational institution, Azhar University, which was built by the Fatimids in 970 to propagate the Shi'i doctrine. Under the Ayyubids, Azhar University was converted to a Sunni institution and the four legal madhhabs (schools)—Maliki, Hanafi, Shafi', and Hanbali—have been taught side by side for centuries, attesting to the country's tradition of religious and cultural toleration. Egypt has produced scores of Muslim scholars that made prominent contributions to Islam such as al-Layth b. Sa'd (713–91), Badr al-Din al-Zarkashi (1344–73), Ibn Hajar al-Asqalani (1372–1448), Shams al-Din al-Sakhawi (1428–97), and Jalal al-Din al-Suyuti (ca. 1445–1505).

By the end of the 19th century, the movement of Islamic modernism emerged in Egypt, inspiring political and social reform in the Arab and Muslim worlds. Started by Afghani (1837–97) and Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), Islamic modernism was a revival movement that sought to rescue Islam from further decline by adopting the positive aspects of Western civilization, reinterpreting the Qur'an along modern lines, exercising ijtihād (independent reasoning), restricting the powers of the government, and achieving Muslim unity. Afghani and 'Abduh's message bifurcated into Islamic reformism on the one hand and secular nationalism and liberalism on the other, with Muhammad Rashid Rida (1865–1935) as the foremost exponent of the former and Sa'd Zaghlul (1825–1927), Qasim Amin (1863–1908), Lutfi al-Sayyid (1872–1963), and Taha Hussein (1889–1973) as the main representatives of the latter. In 1928, one of Rida's disciples, Hasan al-Banna, started a grassroots movement, the Muslim Brotherhood, that eventually became a mainstream Islamic movement and the most important opposition force in Egypt, with branches all over the Arab and Muslim worlds.

The emergence of the Muslim Brotherhood has to some extent shaped the interaction between Islam and politics in Egypt. Having assimilated the reformist precepts of Afghani, 'Abduh, and Rida, Banna produced a reformist framework that presented Islam as a comprehensive way of life, the catalyst for social and political change, and the essential basis of the postcolonial state. Still inspired by the teachings of its founders, the Muslim Brotherhood continues to work at the individual and communal levels to reconstruct the social, political, economic, and cultural dimensions of society along Islamic lines in preparation for the eventual establishment of the Islamic state. This approach has set the organization in a collision course with various regimes. The most severe confrontation took place with Nasser's regime (1952–70), which brutally suppressed the organization. In this context, Sayyid Qutb, a prominent member of the Muslim Brotherhood, produced a polarizing ideology that constituted a clear deviation from the main orientation of the Muslim Brotherhood. Qutb viewed the incumbent regimes as jāhilī (un-Islamic) for not accepting the hākimiyya, or sovereignty, of God and for not implementing the shari'a (Islamic way of life). Qutb's ideas inspired future generations of young Islamic activists, particularly the al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya and al-Jihad groups that assassinated Anwar Sadat in 1981 and engaged in violent clashes with the Mubarak regime during the 1980s and mid-1990s.

Egyptian independent Islamic thinkers continue to influence Islamic political thought in the region. Religious scholars and intellectuals such as Shaykh Muhammad al-Ghazali (1917–96), Shaykh Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), Muhammad Galal Keshk (1929–93), Tariq al-Bishri (b. 1933), and Muhammad Salim al-'Awwa (b. 1942) have attempted to synthesize Islam and modern civic concepts and institutions. Their writings address such issues as democracy, political participation, human rights, and citizenship.

EMAD EL-DIN SHAHIN

Inspired by protests against the regime in Tunisia in the fall of 2010, a revolutionary wave of demonstrations spread throughout 2011 into other regions of the Arab world, in particular Egypt, Yemen, Syria, and Bahrain. This wave of Arab awakening became known as "the Arab Spring" and received wide media attention in the Islamic world and the West. It began when thousands of Egyptians staged a peaceful demonstration on January 25, 2011, in Tahrir Square of Cairo, demanding the resignation of the Mubarak regime. (There were protests in other parts of Egypt as well, though less noticed by the media.) The movement relied on techniques of civil resistance, as well as cell phones, text messaging, and Internet technology (especially social media) for communication. It counted Muslims and Copts, as well as both men and women, among its participants, with copies of the Qur'an and Christian crosses held high in the hands of demonstrators. The uprising was spontaneous and drew its strength from the middle classes; it also was leaderless and organized on an ad hoc basis, which some observers saw as a weakness. The revolution garnered international support as it received round-the-clock coverage by the Qatar-based satellite news network Aljazeera.

The uprising, which came to be called "the Egyptian revolution," clearly targeted state corruption, the rule of emergency law, police brutality, and the abuse of tens of thousands of political prisoners. On February 2, 2011, violent clashes occurred between anti-Mubarak and pro-Mubarak forces. The Muslim Brotherhood and the Salafi segments of the Islamists on the extreme right of Egyptian society were apparently taken by surprise and did not play a significant role in the organization of the uprising. The revolution proved successful in bringing down President Mubarak, who had ruled Egypt since 1981 and was forced to resign on February 11, 2011. (On August 3, 2011, he went on trial together with his two sons and top police officers.) In the wake of the Egyptian developments, the autocratic regimes of 'Ali 'Abdallah Salih in Yemen and of Mu'ammar Qaddafi in Libya were ousted as well, leading to the assassination of the latter (on October 20, 2011) and the exile of the former. In these two cases, tribal conflicts and outside involvement, including French-led NATO forces in Libya and American intelligence and drone bombing in Yemen, played a significant role—actions that were not required in Egypt, where the uprising remained both peaceful and powerful.

After Mubarak's resignation, the military elite of the Egyptian army, led by trusted generals appointed by Mubarak, held on to power. Egyptian society, however, remained restive into the fall of 2011, when first elections took place, awarding the majority of the vote to the Muslim Brotherhood (about 40 percent) and the Salafi party (about 20 percent) with no significant counterweight organization visible in the center or on the left of the political spectrum. The leadership of the Egyptian army discounted the significance of the vote and manifested its determination to remain in power. The Muslim Brotherhood and the Islamist Salafis did not find a common platform. The Coptic Church supported the popular sentiment and observed a guarded caution, fearing for its survival as a non-Islamic minority. In December 2011, Muslim women took to the street for the first time in great numbers, demanding an end to military rule. A presidential election was planned for July 2012.

The general mood in Egypt in early 2012 remained tense, oscillating between fear of chaos and religious strife on one side and hope for decisive change toward democracy and a new order of freedom on the other. The political response of America and Europe to the Arab Spring and the persistent Egyptian revolution reflected both sides of the dilemma. Americans and Europeans were also concerned about the repercussions of Egyptian developments on the security of Israel and the consequences for the entire Middle East. One concern was that a Shi'i crescent would dominate the northern rim of the Arab world, stretching from Iran, via Iraq and Syria, into Lebanon, and enter into a struggle over control of Arab oil and the Sunni core of the Arabian peninsula, including a number of smaller states clustered around Saudi Arabia. Two political frontier lines seemed possible, one cutting through the waters in the Arab/Persian Gulf and the other running along the mountains of the Turkish border with Syria and Iraq. It seemed possible that Egypt in the south and Turkey in the north might develop systems of political order that combined Islam with the ideals of freedom and democracy. To achieve such a position of sovereignty and power, Egypt would need to maintain its peaceful process of restructuring and revolution.

GERHARD BOWERING

See also 'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49); Muslim Brotherhood; Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935); Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)

Further Reading

John Esposito, Islam: The Straight Path, 2004; Derek Hopwood, Egypt: Politics and Society, 1945–1984, 1985; Nadav Safran, Egypt in Search of Political Community: An Analysis of the Intellectual and Political Evolution of Egypt, 1804–1952, 1961.

elections

The concept that the public should participate in the selection of its political leaders and legislators became an important feature of Islamic reformist thought in the late 19th and early 20th centuries through the works of Khayr al-Din al-Tunisi (1822–90), Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905), and Muhammad Rashid Rida (1865–1935). It was developed more fully by contemporary Islamic thinkers, including Yusuf al-Qaradawi, Muhammad Salim al-'Awwa, Tariq al-Bishri, and Ahmad Kamal Abu al-Majd. Their support for elections derived from the principle that political authority (sulṭa) lies with the community (umma). In their view, the Qur'an, the sunna, and the historical experiences of the Rightly Guided Caliphs (632–61) all confirm that the people are entitled to select their ruler. According to Qaradawi, this idea lies at the foundation of the faith. It is most clearly captured in the Prophet's statement that Muslims are empowered to choose who will lead them in prayer. 'Awwa further argues that the public's right to choose the ruler can be traced back to the selection of Abu Bakr as the first successor to Muhammad. Abu Bakr ascended to power through a process by which two prominent members of the community ('Umar and Abu 'Ubayda) showed their support for him by pledging an oath of loyalty (bay'a); the community in turn showed its support through its own bay'a. 'Awwa, who argues that the first bay'a constituted a nomination and the second a referendum, concludes, "one of the most significant results of this event was the decision that a ruler can be chosen only through consultation with the community of Muslims." This principle was upheld by the Rightly Guided Caliphs and serves as the foundation for Islamic government.

These theorists further propose that the public should participate in day-to-day governance. 'Awwa asserts that one of the central purposes of an Islamic state is to "serve the interests (maṣāliḥ) of the governed." These interests can be ascertained only through consultation (shūrā) with the community. The concept of shūrā has clear doctrinal support in both the Qur'an and the sunna, but the texts are not clear regarding which members of the community should be consulted. Abu al-Majd observes that the classical texts sometimes refer to "the people of consultation" (ahl al-shūrā), which is understood to mean those members of the community with knowledge relevant to the issue at hand. At other times, the texts refer to the "people who loosen and bind" (ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd), who are understood to be the most respected and influential members of the community. The reformist thinkers under discussion argue that the circle of persons involved in shūrā should expand to include the entire umma. Abu al-Majd develops this point by invoking an event as reported in prophetic tradition (hadith). The passage describes the Prophet consulting with his followers about how to treat prisoners captured in a recent battle. The Prophet not only consulted with the believers who were present but also told them to travel to their homes, consult with their relatives, and return to inform him of their opinions. Abu al-Majd argues that this proves shūrā was conceptualized from the earliest days of Islam to include the entire community and that this conception of shūrā should be revived in modern times. 'Awwa agrees, concluding that shūrā "will have no meaning if the view of the majority [of the umma] is not adhered to."

The classical texts do not indicate the procedure for conducting shūrā. 'Awwa observes that neither the Qur'an, the sunna, nor the experiences of the Rightly Guided Caliphs offer "any specific method for conducting this consultation or any fixed system for its application." Muslims are free to develop the specific mechanisms that are best suited to their time and circumstances. Qaradawi and other reformist thinkers argue that the most effective mechanism for shūrā under modern conditions is free and fair elections that produce a parliament. The deliberations of an elected parliament constitute a collective process of interpretation (ijtihād) that adapts the principles of shari'a to the challenges of daily governance. These deliberations are also described as a form of ijmā', or consensus building, in which the community gradually reaches agreement over the course of action that conforms with shari'a and best serves the interests of the community. In this view, elections provide a transparent and reliable means for identifying those citizens who command the public's respect and thus can be entrusted with the responsibility of exercising ijtihād on behalf of the community. In order for elections to work effectively, every citizen must participate fully and seriously. Qaradawi makes a detailed case on this point. He writes that voting is analogous to testifying in a court of law, since it entails a personal witness to the moral and professional suitability of a candidate. He cites a Qur'anic passage to the effect that each believer is obligated to testify in court if he has information relevant to a case. Thus, by analogy, each Muslim has a religious obligation (farḍ) to vote, since he has a religious duty to convey his knowledge of the candidate for office. 'Awwa holds a similar view and invokes the Qur'anic proclamation, "Do not conceal testimony, for he who conceals it has a sinful heart."

While these reformist thinkers support elections, they have reservations about unrestrained popular sovereignty. In their view, elections must produce legislative bodies that operate within predefined ethical boundaries. Unconstrained democracy can legalize vice, perpetuate injustice, and strengthen tyranny. All of these outcomes are at odds with Islam. In order to avoid them, an Islamic democracy requires that man-made law conform to the moral precepts of shari'a. No law may violate shari'a and allow what is forbidden in Islam (such as adultery or alcohol consumption) or prohibit what is required (such as prayer, charity, or pilgrimage). In practice, this means that the representatives of the people who draft man-made laws must have substantial knowledge of Islam. They need not be 'ulama', but they should be willing to consult with specialists on religious law when the topic under discussion requires it.

Some contemporary Islamic thinkers hold a more skeptical view of elections. Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), for example, argues that sovereignty can lie only with God and that the only source of law is shari'a. While he accepts the principle that a ruler should consult with his subjects, he rejects the premise that shūrā includes an elected parliament that issues legislation. Ayman al-Zawahiri, a leading ideologue of al-Qaeda, adopts an even more critical stance. He argues that the creation of an elected parliament that issues laws elevates human beings to the level of lawgivers, which usurps a power reserved only for God.

See also democracy; public opinion

Further Reading

Ahmad Kamal Abu al-Majd, Nazarat Hawla al-Fiqh al-Dusturi fi al-Islam, 1962; Muhammad Salim al-'Awwa, Fi al-Nizam al-Siyasi li-l-Dawla al-Islamiyya, 1989; Sayed Kotb (Sayyid Qutb), Social Justice in Islam, translated by John B. Hardie, 1953; Idem, Hiwar la Muwajaha, 1988; Yusuf al-Qaradawi, Min Fiqh al-Dawla fi al-Islam, 1997; Bruce K. Rutherford, Egypt after Mubarak: Liberalism, Islam, and Democracy in the Arab World, 2008.

BRUCE K. RUTHERFORD

endowment

Known in Arabic as waqf or in North Africa as ḥabs, the endowment was the preeminent socioeconomic institution of premodern Islamic society. Found extensively throughout the Muslim world, endowed property constituted, at times, upward of half of all useful land in a given vicinity. Modern legislation and state centralization subjected endowments to drastic reforms, however, and their importance has declined dramatically in contemporary times.

The origins of the institution have often been traced to analogous legal arrangements found in pre-Islamic cultures, most notably the concept of piae causae found in Roman Byzantine law. More recent scholarship, however, has cast doubt on this influence, finding significant discrepancies between the waqf and its pre-Islamic counterparts and arguing that the former should therefore be thought of as a distinctly Islamic institution. The earliest textual evidence of an endowment in the Islamic period is a tradition of the Prophet encouraging one of his Companions to establish an endowment for the sake of charity.

The creation of an endowment, often recorded in an endowment deed known as a waqfiyya, involves the transfer of ownership of a given property from the erstwhile owner to God, rendering it inalienable thereafter in perpetuity—that is, ineligible to be given as a gift, sold, or inherited. Endowments paradigmatically took the form of real estate such as farmland or rented shops, residences, or other buildings, the proceeds of which would then be devoted to charitable causes or public utilities such as mosques, schools, hospitals, bridges, or fountains. It was not uncommon, however, to endow movable property such as books or weaponry for the sake of God, though there was some dispute about the legality of this.

The endowment's proliferation throughout Islamic societies has been attributed to its utility in fulfilling certain social and economic needs. In particular, the alienation of an estate was an effective way to protect it against confiscation by rulers or fragmentation through the precise rules of inheritance laid out in Islamic inheritance law. What came to be known as the family endowment (waqf ahlī), as distinct from the strictly charitable endowment (waqf khayrī), often served as a useful way to provide a regular income to one's relatives or descendants or perhaps a subset (e.g., the needy) among them. Administrators of the endowment were entitled to compensation from its proceeds, usually 10 percent of the endowment income, in exchange for maintaining the endowed property and ensuring the proper disbursement of funds to its beneficiaries.

Endowments were established by a wide range of individuals—both men and women—but the most prominent endowments were the exclusive domain of the upper classes, including rulers; their relatives; and high officials such as viziers, judges, and military commanders. In particular, the ruling elite often used the endowment of mosques and madrasas (Muslim schools) as a means of securing the favor of the scholarly class and thereby legitimacy among the masses—a necessary political strategy given that premodern governance was largely ill-equipped to wield the extensive power exercised by the modern, bureaucratic nation-state. The effect of endowments on the religious and scholarly landscape of major cities in the Islamic world was enormous, as through the law of endowment a plethora of institutions arose that supported intense scholarly, pious, and charitable aims, including mosques, elementary schools, madrasas, Sufi lodges, and hospitals.

The onset of modernity in the Muslim world signaled the decline of the endowments, which in turn threatened, particularly in the Sunni Islamic world, the viability of the 'ulama' (religious scholars) class, whose attachment to institutions of learning and worship, subsidized through endowments, rendered them financially dependent on the latter's success. In some places, the weakening and displacement of traditional religious leadership was one of the key goals of modernization; in others, colonial powers were simply interested in the revenues produced by endowed land, in the land itself, or in more efficient and productive use of resources. Relying on both religious arguments alleging the illegality of family endowments as well as Western theories of economic development, which disapproved of the exclusion of property from the economic cycle, these efforts largely met with success. Modern regimes throughout the Islamic world have simply confiscated endowed land and property or have brought it under direct government control through a ministry of endowments.

See also madrasa; mosque

Further Reading

Peter C. Hennigan, The Birth of a Legal Institution: The Formation of the Waqf in Third-Century A.H. Hanafi Legal Discourse, 2004; George Makdisi, The Rise of Colleges: Institutions of Learning in Islam and the West, 1981.

JUNAID QUADRI

environment

Islamic environmentalism generally finds its inspiration in three main theological concepts. First, the unity of God (tawḥīd) as Creator implies that all creation is one. All creatures are equal in this regard and worthy of protection, whether humans, animals, or the physical environment. Second, in the Qur'an humankind is called to be God's trustee (khalīfa) on Earth, and thus is accountable to manage equitably and responsibly the Earth's bountiful resources. Finally, a number of sayings (hadith) of the Prophet Muhammad enjoin kindness to animals, preservation of natural resources (especially water), and their fair distribution among all.

The environmental anxieties that gripped the Western world in the 1960s also sparked some soul-searching in religious circles. Just a few months before the publication of Lynn White's groundbreaking essay indicting monotheism—chiefly Christianity—as the cause of the ecological crisis, Seyyed Hossein Nasr published Man and Nature: The Spiritual Crisis of Modern Man. Nasr's adherence to the philosophy of Frithjof Schuon that all religions derive from the same absolute source limited his influence somewhat, and his concerns were more theoretical than practical.

Since the early 1990s, perhaps the two most influential Muslim environmentalists have been Mawil Izzi Dien and Fazlun Khalid, both British. Izzi Dien was one of six Muslim ecologists to be commissioned in 1983 by Saudi Arabia to write a short treatise on Islamic principles of environmental conservation. As he later noted with regret, little of that wisdom was ever implemented in government policy. Besides his participation in international forums, Izzi Dien wrote the first monograph—with the exception of Nasr—on Islam and ecology, The Environmental Dimensions of Islam. Khalid, for his part, is the first Muslim environmental activist with a global reach. In 1994, he founded the Islamic Foundation for Ecology and Environmental Sciences (IFEES), which launched projects in the United Kingdom and several Muslim-majority countries. Perhaps the best known of these was a successful 2005 wildlife preservation campaign in the Zanzibar archipelago aiming to stop fishermen from using dynamite. The IFEES also developed a research center; a database to exchange information with other similar organizations; and an educational wing that publishes articles, books, and a biannual newsletter.

Many other Muslim scholars have weighed in since the 1990s, as Richard C. Foltz's bibliography on Islam and ecology indicates, and new local initiatives have continued to appear on the Internet. But as Foltz notes, although several Muslim countries have state-sponsored environmental programs, they are poorly implemented and take a back seat to the priorities of economic development and the alleviation of poverty.

Another challenge is how to educate the mostly pious masses about the urgency of environmental protection, renewable energy generation, and global warming mitigation. Much of the literature has focused on Islamic principles derived from the Qur'an and sunna, and scholar-activists like Khalid emphasize the shari'a-compliant nature of their initiatives. Indeed, some of the traditional provisions of Islamic law are being revived, like ḥima (conservation zones) and ḥārim (inviolable zones, mostly for the protection of water). Yet the contemporary context is so vastly different from that of the medieval period that discourse on "shari'a" today is more about environmental ethics than classical Sunni or Shi'i law.

A last challenge concerns the framing of environmental priorities. The contemporary Islamic theology of creation, as in Christian and Jewish circles, is anthropocentric—that is, God mandates humankind to act as his trustees on Earth (the khalīfa principle). This clashes with the more biocentric forms of environmentalism, in which humans have no priority in their rights over animal and plant species.

See also caliph, caliphate

Further Reading

Richard C. Foltz, Islam and Ecology Bibliography, 2005, http://fore.research.yale.edu/religion/islam/islam.pdf; Richard C. Foltz, Frederick M. Denny, and Azizan Baharuddin, eds., Islam and Ecology: A Bestowed Trust, 2003; Mawil Izzi Dien, The Environmental Dimensions of Islam, 2000; David Johnston, Earth, Empire, and Sacred Text: Muslims and Christians as Trustees of Creation, 2010; Seyyed Hossein Nasr, Religion and the Order of Nature, 1996; Ibrahim Ozdemir, The Ethical Dimension of Human Attitude towards Nature: A Muslim Perspective, 2008; Lynn White, "The Historical Roots of Our Ecological Crisis," Science 155 (1967).

DAVID L. JOHNSTON

equality

Islam has often been described as an egalitarian religion that in principle does not recognize racial, ethnic, or hereditary distinctions. The nomadic egalitarianism of the Arabs, in which the Arab leader was first among equals, contributed to the ideal, found in the formative period of Islamic political thought from the mid-seventh to mid-ninth century, that all Muslims were equal in moral worth and had the right to speak out and advise others.

This egalitarianism, however, applied only to Arabs in the early formative period and was later subsumed by the ideal of benevolent absolutism that characterized the caliph's court. Early Muslims saw themselves as both Arabs and Muslims, and conversion was not encouraged until about the eighth century. Non-Arab Muslims were given a second-class status, and the sense of a multinational Islamic community did not develop until the early part of the Abbasid period (750–1250).

While classical Islamic jurisprudence insisted that all free Muslim men were on the same level before God, this did not necessarily extend to equality in everyday life, and class distinctions grew with the consolidation of the Abbasid Empire. The Islamic ideal of equality, however, depended upon being Muslim, free, and male: normative classical Sunni Islam accepted legal, political, and social inequalities between masters and slaves, men and women, and Muslims and non-Muslims. Slavery was recognized although its practice was moderated. Legally, slaves were persons with civil and criminal rights but also were the property of their owners.

The inequality between Muslims and non-Muslims was based on the concept of the dhimma, essentially a contract through which the Muslim community accorded protection to Jews, Christians, Zoroastrians, and in some cases other non-Muslims, on the condition that they paid the jizya (a poll tax), acknowledged the domination of Islam, and agreed to certain legal and social inequalities. Women were subject to unequal marital, divorce, and inheritance rights, although they could inherit and independently own property.

The extent of such inequalities and exclusion from the polity varied. Perhaps the most restricted were women, who by the Abbasid period were largely isolated from the public sphere. Military slaves (e.g., the Mamluks, 1250–1517), by contrast, frequently exercised power. While in theory non-Muslims had restricted political responsibility and were exempt from the duty put upon Muslims "to command right and forbid wrong," in practice non-Muslims were often employed in government service because of their administrative expertise.

The Ottoman reforms of the mid- to late 19th century partially resolved the legal inequality of non-Muslims and of slaves, but family law was left relatively untouched. The legal equality of slaves was established in 1887, although slavery was not abolished in most states of the Arabian Peninsula until as late as the second half of the 20th century. The Ottoman Constitution of 1876 affirmed equality among people of different faiths. The current constitutional commitment to equality between Muslims and non-Muslims and to men and women varies from one Muslim country to another.

The principle of equality (musāwā) features strongly in contemporary Islamic political thought. While the Arab socialism of many Arab countries in the 1950s and 1960s was largely secular, socialism more recently has been a prominent theme within Islamic thought. The Egyptian Islamist theoretician Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) denounced unjustifiable social inequalities and immorally gained wealth. The Muslim Brotherhood member Muhammad al-Ghazali (1917–96) connected the lack of social justice in postwar Egyptian society with what he saw as a retreat from Islam, for which he partly blamed the 'ulama' (religious scholars) of Azhar University. Mustafa al-Siba'i (1915–64), former head of the Syrian branch of the Muslim Brotherhood, also wrote on Islamic socialism.

While some contemporary thinkers reject the principle of equality—either between Muslims and non-Muslims or between men and women—as a Western imported principle that is incompatible with classical normative Sunni Islam, the concept of equality figures prominently in contemporary Islamic political thought in part because Western polemic against Islam has given so much attention to these issues.

Many modernists argue that the Qur'an sanctions equality between men and women and between Muslims and non-Muslims and that such equality is an expression of the values of a "true" Islam. A common position is that the legal and political discrimination that non-Muslims received in the classical Islamic period was not necessarily a reflection of the true Islam. The so-called Constitution of Medina, an agreement (dating from about 622) between Muhammad and the Jews, who, as monotheists, were distinguished from other nonbelievers at the time, the Arab polytheists, is invoked as a precedent for establishing equality between Muslims and non-Muslims despite religious differences. This thinking has had considerable influence on political activists within the Islamic world. Notwithstanding skepticism concerning sincerity and details, the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood has recently argued for the compatibility of Islamic law with the principle of Egyptian nationality whereby all citizens, Muslims and non-Muslims, enjoy equal rights.

Many contemporary feminists argue that the true values of Islam are compatible with gender equality and make a distinction between the egalitarian nature of Islam in terms of its ethical vision as stated in the Qur'an (e.g., in 33:35) and the discrimination against women sanctioned by classical Islamic jurisprudence. Taking a contextual approach to the Qur'an and building on the ideas of Fazlur Rahman (d. 1988), Amina Wadud argues that equality between men and women can be established through the notion that the Qur'an established a trajectory of reform and that while the restrictions against women were appropriate for the context of pre-Islamic Arabia, they were not meant to be interpreted as a timeless exposition of Islamic values. Few would, it is argued, state that because slavery is condoned by the Qur'an, it should be legal today. Many other discussions within contemporary Islamic thought on gender take the position that Islam sanctions an understanding that men and women are equal but different: equal in terms of their value before God and their spirituality but different in terms of the social roles that Islamic law stipulates.

See also minorities; women

Further Reading

Leila Ahmed, Women and Gender in Islam: Historical Roots of the Modern Debate, 1992; Nazih Ayubi, Political Islam: Religion and Politics in the Arab World, 1991; Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought, 2001; Enayat Hamid, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 2005; Charles Kurzman, ed., Liberal Islam: A Sourcebook, 1998; Sayyid Qutb, Social Justice in Islam, translated by John Hardie, 1970; Amina Wadud, Qur'an and Woman, 1999.

RACHEL M. SCOTT

ethics

Broadly speaking, the concept of ethics refers to any normative evaluation of acts. While some make a conceptual distinction between morality and ethics based on a distinction between obligations of the "right" owed to other persons and the pursuit of the "good," this entry subsumes under the term "ethics" both theories of moral obligation (to others, to God) as well as theories of the good, of virtue, or of the cultivation of the self.

On this broad understanding of the concept, then, Islamic ethics can be found in a wide range of genres and discourses in addition to the revelatory texts of the Qur'an and hadith. They include exegesis and commentary on revelation (tafsīr, sharḥ, ta'wīl); investigation into the ontology of ethics in dialectical theology (kalām) and philosophy (falsafa); the epistemological investigation into the sources and conditions of moral knowledge in Islamic legal theory (uṣūl al-fiqh) and falsafa; the elaboration of substantive moral rules in positive law (fiqh, furū' al-fiqh); and the study of and the search for individual virtue, the perfection of motivations, and spiritual purification in Sufi mystical practices as well as some genres of philosophy. This entry will, of necessity, focus only on a select few of these sources of ethical thought.

Ethics in the Qur'an

The Qur'an presents itself as a universal ethical code for humankind, in sharp contrast to the tribal particularism of pre-Islamic Arab codes. It presents a conceptual scheme for both sociopolitical ethics and the duties and virtues of individual believers. The values, norms, and commands revealed in the Qur'an transform select pre-Islamic ones while introducing a normative revolution. Such pre-Islamic values as generosity, courage, loyalty, veracity, and forbearance are given Islamic validation as virtues that believers are commanded to cultivate in the service of Islam within the limits set down by God. For example, the Qur'an praises generosity in the giving of charity, while condemning both profligacy and spending of one's wealth out of vanity and the desire for praise. Similarly, the pre-Islamic value of absolute in-group loyalty (wafā') was transformed by the more complex ethical terrain of the new religion. Loyalty to family and tribal kin was not only expanded to the community of believers (which trumped more particular loyalties) but also constrained by other Islamic commitments. Believers were commanded to not violate oaths or transgress against divine commands, even in the service of communal interests. Loyalty within sociopolitical contexts thus becomes subsumed within the general obligation of loyalty to the covenant with one's Creator, which the Qur'an indicates is required by man's recognition that he is created by a sovereign, autonomous God.

However, the Qur'an views pre-Islamic Arab society predominantly in negative terms. It is characterized as jāhiliyya, a concept that refers to a state of moral recklessness arising from submission to human-social passions and whims. The normative revolution in Islam consists in its theocentricity. God Himself is referred to in ethical terms (many of the names of God refer to ethically salient features of God's essential nature), and man's attitude toward God is the primary criterion of moral evaluation. The summum malum for a created being is kufr, a state of being that alludes to unbelief, ingratitude, and the (public) denial of God's existence (takdhīb) and that results in acts of insolence, arrogance, presumptuousness, mockery of revelation, and the violation of divine limits. That the kafir goes astray by committing acts that are substantively unjust, criminal, sinful, forbidden, or tyrannical (referred to in the Qur'an variably as ẓulm, jurm, fasād, munkar, sharr, sū', faḥshā', khabīth, ḥarām, etc.) is not itself fully constitutive of the state of kufr; rather, it is the consciously held and affirmed beliefs in one's own independence and self-sufficiency in the formulation of judgments, moral and otherwise. The reliance on one's own judgment, which lies at the root of error and kufr, is often referred to as hawā, or (roughly) the lustful, whimsical, and passionate inclination of the human animal. Importantly, the reliance on reason to arrive at sound moral and practical judgments can fall under the scope of hawā.

The summum bonum for a created being is thus īmān, a state of being that includes belief in God and His revelation, performance of all mandated rituals, good works and observances, obedience to all commands and prohibitions, and, perhaps most centrally, the willingness to put all trust in God and to subordinate one's individual judgment to Him. The mu'min is the one who accepts God's guidance (hudā), fears God (muttaqī), is grateful to God (shākir), and is upright (ṣālih) according to God's prescriptions.

The Qur'an also has much to say on the ethics of social relations among humans. While the specific norms and rules of social relations are elaborated within Islamic law, it is possible to generalize some of the broad principles and major themes of Islamic sociopolitical ethics. The Qur'an exhorts strong bonds of communal loyalty, extensive social solidarity, charity for the poor, and obedience to those in authority. The sociopolitical vision is a moderately egalitarian one. Rulership is just only when exercised in the interests of the ruled according to divine guidance. Extreme inequalities are condemned, the poor are said to have a claim on the property of the rich, and wealth is strictly detached from evaluations of virtue, desert, and piety. At the same time, the Qur'anic vision is less ascetic and unworldly than that of early Christianity. Wealth is not, per se, a sign of impiety, nor are other good things of this world. The Qur'anic emphasis is on remaining within the limits of enjoyment established by God and on purifying individual motivations. As such, it might be said that the Qur'an attends to considerations of moral psychology or a realistic attempt to take humans as they are according to an understanding of their motivations, capacities, and needs.

There are, however, limits to the Qur'an's egalitarian vision. In addition to some of the inegalitarian distributions of roles and rights within the Muslim community along gender lines, Qur'anic ethics distinguishes sharply between Muslims and non-Muslims. The primary solidarity community is the community of believers, at least from the Medinan period on. Muslims are enjoined not to value relationships of loyalty with non-Muslims at the expense of the Muslim community. Among other reasons, non-Muslim communities are seen as potential political and military rivals to Muslims. Similarly, while Muslims acquire rights by virtue of being Muslim (i.e., they do not need an explicit relationship to a state or ruler), non-Muslims may acquire rights only contractually. However, the Qur'an enjoins strict adherence to compacts with non-Muslims (particularly in the Medinan verses, with Jewish and Christian ones), and this forms a means of constructing relationships of mutual moral obligation.

Islamic Theories of Metaethics

Any systematic theory of ethics must address ontological and epistemic questions. First, do moral norms and values have an objective existence or are they created by some being subjectively? Second, how do humans know what morality requires? Can they arrive at true knowledge of morality through reason or intuition or do they require morality to be revealed to them authoritatively? Islamic investigations into metaethics have taken both (dialectic) theological and philosophical forms, and all possible combinations of answers have been given to the ontological and epistemic questions.

The Mu'tazili theologians asserted a doctrine of "ethical objectivism" and "rationalism." Their doctrine was "objectivist" because it held that norms exist independently of God's will. God cannot will or command what is immoral. The basic claim is that our description of certain acts as "good," "bad," "just," "unjust," and so on has some basis in objectivity yet not quite in the same way as our descriptions of the material world. These are "intuitions" that are extremely hard to flatly deny and can be discovered or made intelligible by certain intellectual and discursive acts. Their doctrine was "rationalist" because they held that reason gives independent knowledge of right and wrong and the status of revelation. Revelation helps and often fills in the gaps of reason but is not per se essential to all moral knowledge. Mu'tazilis do recognize that some acts are known to be good only by revelation in some select cases, like the good of prayer and worship, noting that reason alone might have found them worthless or optional. But even here, it is stressed that God reveals their goodness rather than makes them good.

These themes would be echoed later in the doctrines of the philosophers (falāsifa), who added a conception of a hierarchy between rational philosophy and religion. While philosophy represents both the purest path to moral (and other) knowledge and (for some) the highest form of human flourishing (sa'āda; eudaimonia), thinkers such as Farabi (ca. 878–950), Ibn Sina (980–1037), and Ibn Rushd (1126–98) held that religion was strictly necessary for giving specific form to the general principles deducible through reason and for convincing and motivating the masses (who would not be able to comprehend complex rational proofs) through its inspirational, imaginative, and symbolic powers.

The eventual orthodox view, however, was the Ash'ari view, which defended a doctrine of "theistic subjectivism" or "voluntarism"—morality is something that is determined or willed by a certain agent (in this case God), not something that exists objectively and can thus be discovered. The doctrine was defended primarily on the grounds of God's omnipotence: if man could judge right from wrong, and thus presume to judge what God can and cannot prescribe for him, this would imply limits on God's power. So-called intuitions can be shown to be the product of circumstance and socialization, while judgments of "reason" are seen as arbitrary, mere statements of will, desire, or feeling. They contradict one another, cannot prove their premises, and render revelation useless. A person may think that some actions are good and others bad, but that person has no proof for this judgment without knowledge of their ontological status. God's omnipotence means that He can command things that seem to us immoral. The role of reason is to prove the truth of revelation and then to help with the interpretation of revelation and possibly to extend it to uncovered areas according to certain approved methods. Epistemically, thus, Ash'arism is "hermeneutic" or "traditionalist" rather than rationalist, and for this school, applied normative ethics thus largely manifests itself as law.

Beyond "Law"? Contemporary Political Ethics

By and large, Islamic law retains its traditional prestige in ethical matters. Almost all practical ethical questions admit of being treated as "jurisprudential" (fiqh) questions. However, in addition to the traditional alternatives or supplements to law (particularly Sufism), some contemporary Islamic thinkers are developing approaches to ethical questions, particularly in the social and political realms, which are both indebted to and also unconstrained by traditional jurisprudential methods. Thus thinkers might draw from classical legal theory to emphasize religion's insistence on worldly welfare (maslaha) or the overall objectives of the law (maqāṣid), such as protecting religion, life, reason, progeny, and property.

However, with this foundation in the concepts and categories of "law" as traditionally understood, it is a short step to speaking about Islamic normativity almost entirely in these general terms or even to invoke a more abstract "spirit" of justice, equality, mercy, spirituality, or self-sacrifice, which ethical claims must embody. Many thinkers are also unwilling to exclude non-Muslims or lax Muslims from this ethical purview. At this point, a nonparticularist Islamic ethics emphasizing universal interests and a "spirit" of justice and mutual human concern might be regarded as fundamentally "postlegal." A particularly relevant exemplar of this trend is the European writer Tariq Ramadan, who expands the idea of the maqāṣid from five to dozens of human interests, speaks of "two revelations" (the Qur'an and the universe), and insists that "the real" is a source of law, all while refusing to exclude non-Muslims and their forms of reason from the realm of "Islamic ethics." Similar patterns of thought that are partially indebted to concepts and values of law but not recognizably jurisprudential can be found in Islamic theories of feminism, democracy, medical ethics, and the environment.

See also jurisprudence; rights; Sufism; theology

Further Reading

Richard M. Frank, "Moral Obligation in Classical Muslim Theology," Journal of Religious Ethics 11, no. 2 (1983): 204–23; George F. Hourani, Reason and Tradition in Islamic Ethics, 1985; Toshihiko Izutsu, Ethico-Religious Concepts in the Qur'an, 1966; Oliver Leaman, An Introduction to Classical Islamic Philosophy, 2001; Fazlur Rahman, "Some Key Ethical Concepts of the Qur'an," Journal of Religious Ethics 11, no. 2 (1983): 170–85; Tariq Ramadan, Radical Reform: Islamic Ethics and Liberation, 2009; Bernard G. Weiss, The Spirit of Islamic Law, 1998.

ANDREW F. MARCH

Ethiopia and Eritrea

The early phase of Muhammad's life was closely associated with the Axumite kingdom (first to tenth centuries) of Ethiopia. His own wet nurse, Umm Ayman, was Ethiopian, and one of his first followers, the Ethiopian Bilal b. Rabah, became the first mu'adhdhin (the person who calls the faithful to prayer in the mosque) of the emerging community. But the focal point of relations between Ethiopia and Muhammad came to be the tale of Najashi, the Christian "king of kings" of Ethiopia based at Axum. According to the story (not mentioned in the Qur'an but well-known from the sīra [life of the Prophet]), it was the Axumite ruler Ashama who provided refuge to Muhammad's followers when they were persecuted by the Quraysh of Mecca. As the Ethiopian king had been the only leader who responded to the Prophet's request, Muhammad reputedly later instructed his followers to "leave the Abyssinians as long as they leave you," meaning that they were not to initiate jihad against them even though they were Christians. This early seventh-century tale left a legacy of two contradictory interpretations: one that the existence of Christian Ethiopia could be tolerated because of its act of benevolence, the other that the Ethiopian ruler had actually converted to Islam even though the Ethiopians denied it, so that the existence of Christian Ethiopia was not legitimate after all.

In contrast to other Africans, the Ethiopians did not usually accept Islam as a divine revelation. The conversion of Ethiopia to Christianity had begun already in the fourth century, and by the seventh century Ethiopian Christianity had come to be identified as the official religion, with well-established institutions and networks of churches and monasteries. Nonetheless, thanks to long-distance trade, Islam was adopted by local groups such as the 'Afar and the Somalis and in coastal towns such as Zeil'a and Massa'wa (in present-day Eritrea). The inland town of Harar was another important Muslim community, a center from the 13th century onward of the Qadiri Sufi order, which was active in the diffusion of Islam. Many Muslim communities also appeared in the Christian highlands, where they are known mainly as Jabarti and reputed to be descendants of the ṣaḥāba (Companions of the Prophet). In the 13th century, the Sidama Muslim principalities of 'Adal and 'Yifat in present-day Somalia gained power and threatened the southern boundaries of the Solomonic dynasty kingdom. Yet it was not until the 16th century that Islam in Ethiopia shed its image as peripheral and faction-ridden and started being perceived as a threat to Christian Ethiopia.

During the years 1529 to 1543, Imam Ahmad b. Ibrahim (known as Ahmad "Gran," or Ahmad the Left-Handed) of 'Adal led a holy war (jihad) during which he conquered most of Ethiopia, destroyed churches and monasteries, and converted many Ethiopians to Islam. Christian Ethiopia was saved by the arrival of the Portuguese and the Ethiopian perception of Islam as a unified political and military force, able to destroy Christianity dates from the Muslin occupation in the 16th century. During the 17th and 18th centuries, waves of Oromo migrations from the south, many of whom converted to Islam during this period, reinforced the Islamic hegemony over the southern boundaries of Ethiopia and shifted the demographic balance, only partly offset by the waves of Ethiopian expansion to the south toward the end of the 19th century.

Although Ethiopia proper was not occupied by a European power, the imperialist race for control of the Middle East and the Horn of Africa did affect its relations with the Muslims, both inside and outside Ethiopia. Islamic revival in neighboring countries occasionally aroused Ethiopian fear of Muslim invasions from countries such as Egypt, Sudan, and Somalia; Eritrea was occupied by Italy and thus separated from Ethiopia. The transfer of Eritrea to Ethiopia as part of the Ethiopian Federation in 1952 led to the emergence of the Eritrean Liberation Front (established in 1960). Islam was one of the main motivating forces of this movement, especially in the ideology and activities of the Eritrean Liberation Front. In the consolidation of 20th-century Ethiopia, on the other hand, Islam was usually marginalized by the increasing strength of Christianity, the state religion. After the revolution of 1991, a new dialogue emerged between the republican and secular Ethiopian state and its Muslim subjects, but although the Muslims gained more economic power and freedom of worship, they still claimed to be politically underrepresented. According to the 2007 census, Muslims constitute about 34 percent of the population in Ethiopia and less than half in Eritrea, but the leadership of both countries continues to debate whether to pursue policies of integration and equality or marginalization and deprivation.

See also East Africa

Further Reading

Hussein Ahmed, "The Historiography of Islam in Ethiopia," Journal of Islamic Studies 3, no. 1 (1992); Haggai Erlich, Ethiopia and the Middle East, 1994; Paul Henze, Layers of Time: A History of Ethiopia, 2000; Asafa Jalata, Oromia and Ethiopia: State Formation and Ethnonational Conflict, 1868–1992, 1993.

IRIT BACK

ethnicity

The relationship between Islam and ethnic identity has created dynamic forms of political expression in all Muslim cultures. The form of government adopted during the time of the Prophet Muhammad and the first four caliphs was largely in accordance with Arab tribal practice. The leader of the community was a tribal shaykh who acted as a mediator and arbitrator of conflicts within the community and also served in the expanded role of military leader during times of crisis. For much of Arab history, a tension has remained between the mobile and democratic values of the Bedouins and the more authoritarian tendencies of the Byzantine and Persian political traditions that were absorbed into the Umayyad and Abbasid caliphates. The dominant political discourse that emerged in Muslim culture was authoritarianism, which was seen as preferential to the threat of anarchy in society.

During the initial expansion of Islam in the century after the Prophet, Islam was brought to vast new territories by armies consisting of Arab tribal units, and an ethnic divide between the conquerors and the conquered influenced conceptions of both religion and rule. Islam was associated with being Arab, and non-Arab Muslims, both converts and their descendants, became known as mawālī (clients). In many cases, this term was literal: slaves who had been captured in the conquest converted and were subsequently liberated by their Arab masters, or converts who accepted Islam at the hands of an Arab Muslim became formal clients of Arab tribes and used the tribal gentilics as part of their own names. Especially under the Umayyad caliphate, the association of Arab identity with adherence to Islam had widespread effects on Islamic religion and culture, some of which changed and dissipated during the Abbasid era (750–1258), but lingering effects remained in Islamic law, theology, and culture. Arabs were granted rights or given privileges that other Muslim believers were not, and among the Arabs, certain tribes and clans were favored over others. The organization of the army and of stipends from the state treasury favored early converts and was biased against non-Arab Muslims. The majority view among Sunnis was that the caliph had to be a member of the Quraysh tribe in particular; the more egalitarian Kharijis rejected this rule and did not limit the caliphate to Arabs, whether Quraysh or not. According to Islamic law, while slavery was legal, Arabs could not be enslaved. The exclusion of Jews and Christians from the Arabian Peninsula, a policy attributed to 'Umar b. al-Khattab (586–644), may be seen in part as a demonstration of the ethnic superiority of Muslim Arabs to outsiders. Many legal works continued to suggest that Arabs should not marry their daughters to non-Arabs, as a woman should not be married to a husband of inferior status. Similar distinctions were sometimes made between the Quraysh or the clan of Hashim and other less reputable Arab tribes. Similarly, Sayyids, or descendants of the Prophet, gained enormous prestige in many Islamic societies. Early leaders expressed concern about increasing numbers of non-Arab converts and about children of Muslim men with non-Arab women (generally captured concubines). At the same time, the special status accorded to Arabs was in some sense made permanent by the sanctity attributed the Arabic language. While a careful reading of the Qur'an suggests that the Arabic language of that scripture was part of an exceptional attempt to make biblical monotheism easily comprehensible to the Arabs, these same verses were interpreted as indicating Arabic's superiority as sacred language. It came to be considered the language that God speaks and the language in which the inhabitants of paradise converse: the richest, most perfect language. Arabs therefore were considered superior to their 'ajam (mutes, speakers of barbaric or incomprehensible language)—most often taken to mean Persians. By the time of Shafi'i (d. 820), the idea that native speakers of Arabic had privileged access to God's message as contained in the Qur'an and were therefore more reliable interpreters of the sacred text had become widespread.

These forms of discrimination angered the increasing numbers of non-Arab converts to Islam, who saw the discriminations as incompatible with the universality of Islam's message and the Qur'an's insistence on the inherent equality of believers' souls. Arabic, to them, was a language, not a racial designation—an international language of religion and scholarly discourse shared by many peoples. Some non-Arab Muslims expressed their dissatisfaction by adopting the views of the Kharijis, who did not privilege Arabs, which may explain the success of the Kharijis among the Berbers in North Africa, such as the Rustamid dynasty (777–909) with its capital Tahert in the central Maghrib. Others adopted Shi'ism; even though the Shi'is granted authority exclusively to descendants of the Prophet, they generally discriminated less among the believers. The most prominent manifestation of this protest was the Shu'ubis, a term that derives from the word shu'ūb (nations), which occurred in Qur'an 49:13: "O people! We created you from one male and one female, and made you nations (shu'ūb) and tribes so that you may know each other." It was championed mostly by Persians who, while recognizing the accomplishments of the Arabs in conquest, the spread of the faith, bravery, and eloquent poetry, stressed superior achievements of the Persians in high civilization, refinement, administrative skills, and so on, claiming that they deserved at least as much recognition for their contributions to the Muslim community as the Arabs. The heyday of the controversy occurred in the ninth and tenth centuries, but aspects of it have resurfaced regularly in various contexts to the present day.

Arab dominance did not, however, continue in the political sphere, and one may describe the premodern history of Islam as falling into three periods of political regime. Until the tenth century, most regions of Islamdom were under the rule of Arabs; in the 10th and 11th centuries, many regions came under the rule of Persians; and from the 11th until the 19th century, almost all areas of the Muslim world were ruled by ethnic Turks or Mongols, whose dominance continued in the Middle East until World War I and the abolishment of the Ottoman Empire in 1924. For nearly a millennium in the Persianate world, the upper echelons of society were seen as divided along ethnic lines into Turks, who constituted the military and ruling class, and Tajiks, Persians, or non-Turks, who were the administrators, accountants, tax-collectors, and land owners. The division was viewed as natural and not unfair because Turks and Mongols were considered ethnically suited to military exploits because of their sturdiness, fierce nature, ability to endure hardship, and superior skills in horsemanship and archery. Even in contexts where Turks did not make up the bulk of the military, rulers often used troops belonging to foreign ethnic groups because of their military skills, internal solidarity, lack of attachment to the local populace, and direct allegiance to the ruler. The Fatimids in Egypt (969–1171) employed both troops who belonged to the Berber Kutama tribal confederation from North Africa and "Sudanese" troops from sub-Saharan Africa. The 14th-century historian Ibn Khaldun argued, reflecting primarily on the Berber dynasties of North Africa, that there was a strong relationship between the life of political regimes and ethnic groups. Tribal groups from outside settled regions have much stronger ethnic solidarity than settled peoples, and this enabled them to work as efficient military units, conquering territories and establishing new dynasties. The settled life of the conquerors, however, corrupted them and made them lose their ethnic solidarity in just a few generations, and this made them vulnerable to new tribal invaders.

Ethnic identity has overlapped with language and religion in the Muslim world in complex ways. In the modern period, Arabness is often established by speaking Arabic as one's mother tongue, regardless of one's ethnic background, so that Egyptians or Moroccans see themselves as Arabs even though very few of them are actually descendants of Arab tribesmen. Arab nationalism, the belief that the Arab nations should unite and form one nation, is based on the idea that the Arab nations for the most part share an ethnicity. In contrast, the individual nationalisms often emphasize the unique ethnic origins of their citizens, Lebanese claiming descent from the Phoenicians, Egyptians from Pharaonic ancestors, and so on. In other cases, ethnic identities are interpreted as overlapping entirely with religious sects, so that the Coptic Christians see themselves as true descendants of Pharaonic Egyptians, distinct from their Muslim compatriots, whom they view as the descendants of foreign invaders, even though the genetic makeup of the two groups is nearly identical. Similarly, Armenians, Greeks, and Assyrians in the Middle East are distinguished as much by their adherence to particular sects of Christianity as by language or ethnic background.

While authoritarianism has remained the dominant political system in Islamic societies in modern times, including the colonial and postcolonial periods, other systems have persevered. Some Islamic cultures have used and continue to use Islamic beliefs to strengthen decentralized forms of government: examples abound from the Bedouin to the Moros of Mindanao. Sometimes Islam has been embraced as the basis of political mobilization in reaction to the intrusion of an invading power. Examples include the Naqshbandi Sufis in the Caucasus region and various religious groups that organized in Africa in the 19th century to fight encroaching European powers, such as the followers of the Mahdi in Sudan. The first proclaimed secular state in the Muslim world was the Azerbaijan Democratic Republic of 1918–20. This brief experiment was followed by the revolution led by Atatürk (1923–38) that would end the Ottoman Empire and form a nation-state out of its ashes. Atatürk's revolutionary vision had foundations in Western political thought and also in Ottoman legal traditions. Despite his secular ideals, Atatürk nevertheless drew on religious imagery and Turkish history in his political discourse. In many ways, his reforms were not an attack on religion per se but rather an attack on the hegemony of the religious class over society.

For the next century, Muslims in Africa and Asia developed a sort of "confessional nationalism" in which religion distinguished the boundaries of linguistic, cultural, and political identity. In 20th-century India, Muslim political identity developed in reaction to the Hindu-dominated Indian independence movement. A clique of elites advocated wider Muslim political expression and rights, even though many of the early Pakistani elite were only nominal Muslims. These elites created Pakistan without fully delineating the meaning of an "Islamic Republic." In order to forge a nation-state, Pakistan's first leader, Muhammad Jinnah (r. 1947–48), advocated the use of Urdu as the national language at the expense of Bengali. This caused lasting tensions that led to the creation of Bangladesh in a bloody civil war in 1971. For South Asian Muslims, religious identity and ethnic identity were often synonymous. A similar phenomenon developed in the newly independent Arab world, where states also tried to co-opt Islam. In many new states in Africa, the transition was less successful. Precolonial elites were more substantially disrupted in Africa. Muslims form a large but not dominant community in many African states, such as Guinea-Bissau, Tanzania, Ivory Coast, Nigeria, Eritrea, and Ethiopia. Politics in these states is often, though not always, organized along confessional lines. The newly independent states of modern Central Asia have also tried to co-opt Islam as an official ideology—as a new ideological cement to hold together the Central Asian peoples of the region and as a replacement for Soviet communism. Across Central Asia, Islamic identity is on the rise while tribal identity continues to decline. Shared Islamic identity among warring factions helped end the Tajik Civil War (1992–97). Similar tensions exist in other areas of the globe, and Islam is used as a societal glue in other regions as well. In Southeast Asia, both the government and opposition groups use Islam for the political mobilization of the populace. The Malaysian state has embraced an Islamic identity in order to promote Malay unity and political leadership in a multiethnic society. Indonesia is home to Nahdatul Ulama, the largest Muslim organization by membership in the world. This traditional Sunni organization was founded in 1926 and was mobilized as a political movement by Abdurrahman Wahid, who was elected president in 1999.

In other instances, competition between religious and national identities has led to the submergence of one in the favor of the other. The Pan-Arabism of the 1960s and 1970s was promoted largely at the expense of traditional religious identity. Conversely, the rise of popular Muslim identity in the Arab world in the late 20th century occurred at the expense of Pan-Arabism. In Somalia, the inability of both Islamic and pan-Somali identity to gain sustainable traction resulted in decades of instability. Occasionally Muslims have sacrificed religious and ethnic identity in pursuit of political goals. During the Crusades, Muslim-Crusader coalitions often aligned against other Muslim-Crusader alliances. In the 18th century, Russian Tartars helped the Russian Empire expand into Central Asia at the expense of local Muslim elites. A more recent example is the Bedouin of Israel and the Sinai, who have often strived to maintain political independence by establishing a close relationship with the Israeli state rather than Arab centers of power.

The late 19th and early 20th centuries saw a revival of Pan-Islamic thinking. For the first time, advances in communication and transportation technology made it possible to imagine a global Muslim state. In the late 19th century, modernity made the concept of a Pan-Islamic community imaginable for the first time. Muslim thinkers from the Jadids of Central Asia to Afghani (1838–97) and Muhammad Iqbal (1877–1938) proposed a global community of Muslims. For some, the abolition of the Ottoman caliphate between 1923 and 1924 was a great setback for the ideal of Pan-Islamic unity. The Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), established in 1969, embodies ostensibly Pan-Islamic aspirations but has been handicapped by important rivalries between its most powerful states: Saudi Arabia and Iran. On occasion within the OIC, ethnic concerns trump Pan-Islamic sentiments. While most issues are decided nearly unanimously, regional voting blocs—Arab, African, Central Asian—form occasionally.

Ethnic-religious minorities continue to play an important role in the modern politics of many nations in the Muslim world. Before the U.S. invasion of Iraq and overthrow of Saddam Hussein's regime, Sunni Arabs controlled the military and administration of the nation. Syrian president Bashshar al-Assad belongs to the 'Alawis of Syria, who follow a religion that is an offshoot of Shi'i Islam. The 'Alawis are strongly represented in the military and government as well. In other nations, substantial populations of underrepresented minorities have presented a continuing political problem. The Shi'is of Lebanon, whom the constitution assigned a subordinate position in national politics, engaged in a civil movement under the leadership of Musa al-Sadr (d. 1978) in the 1960s and 1970s, claiming more political rights and a larger share of public works and services. Shi'i minorities in Saudi Arabia, long denied any official recognition, have suffered widespread discrimination and have gained some ground only in recent years. In North Africa, the French tried to exploit the ethnic differences between Arabs and Berbers: with the Berber Dahir, a decree issued in 1930, the French Protectorate of Morocco sought to make the division a permanent feature of legal and political institutions. After independence from the French, Berbers in Algeria and Morocco have struggled for the rights to publish and broadcast in the Berber language and to educate their children in Berber. The Kurds have long represented one of the most difficult political problems for states in the region, as they are one of the largest ethnic groups in the world who remain stateless, divided as they are among Iran, Iraq, Syria, and Turkey. While the Treaty of Sèvres (1920) assigned to them a national territory, Atatürk's military successes, confirmed in the Treaty of Lausanne (1923), put an end to the project, and since then they have suffered various forms of discrimination and persecution, particularly in Turkey and Iraq, where thousands of Kurds were imprisoned, deported, and massacred under Hussein. One consequence of the U.S. overthrow of Hussein is that the Kurds now have something resembling an autonomous state in the north of Iraq. At the same time, the official treatment of Kurds in Turkey has improved since 2000: Turkey's bid for membership in the European Union has led the government to rescind the death penalty, partially repeal the ban on the Kurdish language, and allow limited broadcasts on radio and television in Kurdish. Nevertheless, these rights remain restricted; for example, the mayor of Diyarbekir was prosecuted in 2007 for sending a holiday card for the New Year written in Kurdish.

See also family; Quraysh; tribalism

Further Reading

Ian Almond, Two Faiths, One Banner: When Muslims Marched with Christians across Europe's Battlegrounds, 2009; Michael Brett and Elizabeth Fentress, The Berbers, 1997; Patricia Crone, God's Rule—Government and Islam: Six Centuries of Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2005; Ignaz Goldziher, Muslim Studies, vol. 1, 1967; Jacob M. Landau, The Politics of Pan-Islam: Ideology and Organization, 1994; David McDowall, A Modern History of the Kurds, 2004; James T. Monroe, The Shu'ūbiyya in al-Andalus: The Risāla of Ibn Garcia and Five Refutations, 1970; Andrea Pacini, ed., Christian Communities in the Arab Middle East: The Challenge of the Future, 1999.

JOSEPH HAMMOND

Europe

Muslim presence in Europe has a long and varied history. Between the early 8th and late 15th centuries, parts of Spain (Andalus) and Southern Italy were under Muslim rule, and starting from the 15th century, the Ottoman Empire expanded into southeastern Europe and twice advanced as far as Vienna. Whereas Muslim rule of Andalus was ended by the Reconquista in 1492, the effects of the Ottoman presence continue to be strongly felt until today. The wars in former Yugoslavia during the 1990s, which also assumed traits of a religious strife, deeply disturbed the rest of Europe and had severe repercussions on the relations between the West and the Islamic world.

Contemporary discussions about Islam in Europe mostly refer to the more recent presence of Muslims in Western Europe. As of 2010, approximately 18.5 million Muslims are estimated to live in these countries, with the largest communities in France (outnumbering both Protestants and Jews), Germany, the United Kingdom, and Italy. The majority of Muslim migrants arrived in Europe after World War II either as refugees from former European colonies to the colonizing country (North Africans in France, South Asians in Great Britain) or as "guest workers," cheap labor hired by European states (Turks in Germany, Turks and Moroccans in the Netherlands since the 1960s). Later, they were joined by students from Muslim countries, refugees from various international crises, and also by a growing number of European converts to Islam.

Despite the highly diverse background of Muslims in Europe, discussions since the 1980s have increasingly focused on issues of "Muslim identity" and "European Islam." Previously, migrants had been perceived mainly in ethnic terms (as Turks, Arabs, etc.) and in a more regional context, but the religious angle came to predominate the association with migrants due to events on the global stage such as the Islamic Revolution in 1979 that "Islamized" public debates about these minorities. This development presented grave challenges to European states and societies, as well as to Muslim migrant communities and their second- or third-generation offspring (who were not automatically naturalized in all European states). The problems are further complicated by the fact that the Western approach to religion is far from homogeneous. Rather, the relationship between secular politics and religious communities ranges from the British combination of a state church and a liberal model of recognition of religious communities by the state to the German church laws that focus on corporative intermediate units to the rigorous French laïcité and its strict separation of religion and the public sphere. All these approaches, however, are tailored to the model of the Christian churches and often conflict with the far more amorphous structure of Islam.

For Muslims in Europe, on the other hand, the challenges are of two sorts. On the organizational level, the constant demand by most European states for a national representative body—if possible, single and uniform—to serve as interlocutor in legal issues (such as religious instruction in public schools) led to the emergence of several Muslim umbrella organizations. The most important of these include the Exécutif des Musulmans de Belgique (founded in 1996), the Muslim Council of Britain (1997), the Conseil Français du Culte Musulman (2003), the Dutch Contactorgaan Moslims en Overheid (2004), and the German Koordinierungsrat der Muslime (2007). They consist mostly of coalitions of local or regional associations but are far from unanimously acknowledged by the Muslim community; in addition to inner rivalry, groups like the 'Alawis or the Ahmadis, which are deemed heterodox or even heretic in the Islamic world, are either excluded or refuse to be coerced under an all-encompassing Muslim umbrella.

The second challenge for Muslims in Europe consists of the relationship between Islamic law and secularism. Whereas in previous centuries Muslim scholars ruled out the possibility of Muslims living under non-Muslim rule in what they perceived as the "abode of war" (and instead demanded Muslims to emigrate to the "abode of Islam"), present-day Muslims are permitted to live as minorities under non-Muslim rule, although Islamic law (shari'a) is not formally acknowledged in any European country (only Greece concedes a special status to the Muslim minority in Thrace). Discussions about how to adapt the provisions of Islamic law to the European environment gave rise, in the early 21st century, to a new genre of legal literature, a so-called Muslim minority right (fiqh al-aqalliyyāt al-muslima), propelled both by Muslim scholars who settled in the West (such as Taha Jabir al-Alwani) and by some eminent experts from the Islamic world. In this regard, too, institutionalization is to be observed in the shape of the European Council for Fatwa and Research set up in Dublin in 1997. This committee, which comprises 38 Muslim scholars from 21 Middle Eastern and European countries, organizes regular international conferences and issues statements and fatwas on all kinds of legal problems confronting Muslims in Europe; its president is the Qatar-based Yusuf al-Qaradawi, one of the most potent representatives of contemporary Islam.

Apart from individual scholars such as Qaradawi, organizations from Islamic countries run or backed by the state also compete for authority over Muslims in Europe (such as the Mecca-based Muslim World League or the Turkish Presidency of Religious Affairs), as do transnational groups such as the Muslim Brotherhood or the Tablighi Jama'at. But there are also important individual Muslim voices even at the European level. While outspoken secular approaches (Soheib Bencheikh) have not caught on, Tariq Ramadan, a Swiss-born conservative reformer and grandson of Hasan al-Banna, the founder of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, has established himself as one of the most influential, albeit highly controversial, contemporary Muslim intellectuals. However, the real influence both of European Muslim organizations and individual reformers on the bulk of Muslims in Europe is difficult to assess, given that, for example, in Germany the mosque associations and umbrella institutions represent less than 30 percent of Muslims living in the country.

Several organizations have attempted to comply with European expectations and emphasized the compatibility of Islam and Western political and social values: in 2002, the German Central Council of Muslims (Zentralrat der Muslime) issued an "Islamic Charter," which was intended as a declaration on the relationship between Muslims, the state, and society, and in January 2008 the Federation of Islamic Organizations in Europe in Brussels published a "Muslims in Europe Charter" to the same effect. These efforts (which aim at fundamental problems such as Islamic ethics, equality of the sexes, democracy, and human rights) notwithstanding, several more practical issues of contention persist: the question of the headscarf, Islamic religious instruction in public schools, the education of imams, the construction of mosques, and the practice of ritual slaughtering. More often than not, controversies in these areas are taken to court, and decisions vary greatly even within individual states.

An especially sensitive topic that affects the relations between Muslims and Western societies is Islamist terrorism and Islamism at large. Great Britain in particular served for a long time as a retreat for many activists from the Islamic world threatened by persecution in their countries of origin, among them also radical preachers of jihad, long before London itself was hit by (home-grown) Islamist terrorists in July 2005. Events such as the conflict over Salman Rushdie's novel The Satanic Verses (1989), the riots in the suburbs of Paris (2005), or the publication of the controversial Danish Muhammad cartoons (2006)—all of which had severe consequences far beyond their European context—show the potential of agitators to eclipse the peaceful majority of Muslims living in Europe and to provoke hostility among Europeans toward everything Islamic.

The debates about what has aptly been described as "globalized Islam" is determined by several important issues: the contest for legal and spiritual authority over Islam in Europe, the interaction between organizations in the Islamic world and European Muslim individuals and associations, the attempts to create a European Muslim identity, and the emergence of international terrorism. In the process of reaching common ground for coexistence, both sides have to redefine traditional stances with regard to the relation between religion and society.

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; minorities; Muslim Brotherhood; Muslim League; al-Qaradawi, Yusuf (b. 1926)

Further Reading

Aziz al-Azmeh and Effie Fokas, eds., Islam in Europe: Diversity, Identity and Influence, 2008; Christopher Caldwell, Reflections on the Revolution in Europe: Can Europe Be the Same with Different People in It?, 2009; Gilles Kepel, Allah in the West: Islamic Movements in America and Europe, 1997; Jytte Klausen, The Islamic Challenge: Politics and Religion in Western Europe, 2005; Yusuf al-Qaradawi, Fiqh of Muslim Minorities. Contentious Issues and Recommended Solutions, 2003; Tariq Ramadan, Western Muslims and the Future of Islam, 2004; Olivier Roy, Globalized Islam: The Search for a New Ummah, 2004.

RAINER BRUNNER

excommunication

In Islam, excommunication is the denial by some members of the Muslim community of the rights of other members whose religious beliefs or practices are deemed incompatible with Muslim status.

Unlike Roman Catholicism, Islam has no central institution or legal body authorized to engage in excommunication and also no generally accepted legal procedures whereby jurists or courts can reach such a verdict. The lack of these central institutions and common procedures, together with a general willingness to allow for differences in the ways Islam is practiced and understood, has led to a significant degree of tolerance among different Muslim denominations and groups. Still, the Islamic world has hardly ever been free of attempts to curb the religious freedom of Muslim groups regarded as heterodox. Certain legal judgments, chief among them the judgment of apostasy, are applied in ways that allow for the persecution of heterodoxy.

The parameters of Muslim debates about excommunication were set in the aftermath of the First Islamic Civil War (656–61). One party, the Kharijis, justified the murder of the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56), on the grounds that he had committed a capital sin (kabīra), which showed that he was an unbeliever and therefore deserved death. A group of radical Kharijis went further and felt justified to kill grave sinners as unbelievers. After the defeat of the Kharijis, their various enemies, who dominated the early development of Islamic law, rejected positions that would make a grave sinner lose his legal protection as a member of the Muslim community. Thereafter, however, discussions of excommunication in Islam focused less on the practices than on the convictions of the accused. When practices are considered grounds for excommunication, it is mostly because they are assumed to reveal a heterodox mindset or to lead to it. An exception is the view of the Hanbali school of law that neglecting the duty of prayer leads to unbelief and apostasy.

The Qur'an distinguishes between a Muslim and a polytheist (mushrik) and also between a believer (mu'min) and an unbeliever (kafir). From Qur'an 49:14, it is clear that there were Muslims in the days of Muhammad who were not considered believers. Muhammad, however, accepted these people, often referred to as "hypocrites" (munāfiqūn), as members of his community and thus set a standard for the toleration of heterodox opinions in Islam. This, together with a well-known hadith stating that the Muslim community would divide into 73 sects of which only one would be saved, facilitated the acceptance of heterodox groups in early Islam. Even so, scholars routinely accused one another of unbelief (kufr). This, however, rarely meant to deprive the accused of his rights as a Muslim but rather expressed that he had forfeited his prospect of otherworldly reward on account of his opinions. In Islam, a "declaration of unbelief" (takfīr) can be either a mere protest that a certain opinion is unorthodox or a formal, legal accusation or ruling that the holder of the opinion in question has forfeited his legal protection as a Muslim and should be killed. The legal means to do the latter is the judgment of apostasy in Islamic religious law (shari'a).

One of the earliest attempts in Islam to use the judgment of apostasy to curb heterodox opinions was the so-called Qadiri creed, published by the caliph Qadir (r. 991–1031) in 1017. Expressing the convictions of a group of traditionalist jurists among the Sunni Muslims, Qadir declared that whoever held that the Qur'an was not eternal but created in time—as most Mu'tazilis indeed did—"is an unbeliever who can be killed (kāfir halāl al-dam) after he had been given the opportunity to repent from this position." Muslim jurists unanimously accepted that an apostate from Islam could be killed, and most required that he must first be granted a "right to repent" (istitāba), enabling him to return to Islam unharmed. Heterodox groups who regarded themselves as members of the Muslim community were assumed to have committed apostasy clandestinely, or without realizing the full extent of their doctrinal deviation. In legal terms, this was regarded as zandaqa—in other words, clandestine apostasy in which the accused pretends to be a Muslim, though he has in fact abandoned his Muslim faith.

In the decades following the creed of al-Qadir, Muslim jurists focused on heterodox views disseminated by Isma'ilis and philosophers. Among the latter, the followers of Ibn Sina raised the attention of the prominent Shafi'i jurist Ghazali (d. 1111), who in 1095 published a fatwa (religious opinion) as part of his book The Incoherence of the Philosophers. Ghazali, however, did not dispense entirely with the earlier tolerant attitude toward heterodoxy in Islam; instead, he aimed to qualify it. He stressed that heterodox groups in Islam should all be tolerated by other Muslims as long as they did not teach a limited number of doctrinal offenses identified by him. In his Decisive Criterion for Distinguishing Islam from Clandestine Apostasy, he offers a systematic justification for religious tolerance in Islam as well as where the limits of tolerance should be set, in other words, which doctrinal positions lead to excommunication from Islam. For Ghazali, the Muslim community falls into two groups—the rightly guided and the heterodox—both to be protected as members of Islam. A third group of people (including Ibn Sina), who pretended to be Muslims but whose convictions showed them to be unbelievers, were subject to the death penalty for apostasy.

Muslim jurists after Ghazali had a variety of legal options regarding heterodox teachings in Islam. Many adopted a tolerant position toward heterodoxy. Others followed Ghazali. Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), for instance, issued several fatwas in condemnation of Isma'ili Shi'is, Druzes, and the Nusayri-'Alawi group in Syria and Lebanon. These and similar condemnations were formulated as judgments of apostasy. During the late 18th and 19th centuries, the Wahhabi movement in central Arabia advocated the excommunication of Muslims who prayed at graves and thus revealed convictions that the Wahhabis regarded as apostasy from Islam.

With the advent of Islamic fundamentalism in the 20th century, there was a surge of excommunications based on the judgment of apostasy, among them the execution of Mahmoud Mohamed Taha in 1985 in Sudan and the forced dissolution of Nasr Hamid Abu Zayd's marriage to a Muslim woman 1995 in Egypt. Khomeini's fatwa in 1989 against the British-Indian writer Salman Rushdie can also be seen as an excommunication along the lines of the legal reasoning of Ghazali, although the scant justification given by Khomeini also points to blasphemy as a ground for the death penalty. The law of apostasy has also been used to curb the religious freedom of members of the Baha'i faith in Iran and of the Ahmadi movement in Pakistan.

See also Ahmadis; apostasy; commanding right and forbidding wrong; fundamentalism; Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); heresy and innovation; Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (ca. 980–1037); inquisition; Kharijis; shari'a

Further Reading

Yaron Friedman, "Ibn Taymiyya's Fatāwā against the Nuṣayrī-'Alawī Sect," Der Islam 82, no. 2 (2005); Yohanan Friedmann, Tolerance and Coercion in Islam: Interfaith Relations in the Muslim Tradition, 2003; Frank Griffel, Apostasie und Toleranz im Islam, 2000; Sherman A. Jackson, On the Boundaries of Theological Tolerance in Islam, 2002.

FRANK GRIFFEL

exegesis

As a translation of the Arabic term tafsīr, exegesis signifies primarily the process and results of textual interpretation, particularly scriptural interpretation. While texts of various genres were the subject of systematic interpretation, the scope of this article is restricted to exegesis of the Qur'an. According to both classical and contemporary Muslim sources, the interpretation of the Qur'an began during the period of its revelation as the Prophet Muhammad sought to explain ambiguous or unfamiliar references to his earliest audiences.

Classical and Medieval Processes and Products

Such rudimentary glossing is captured as a stage in the more developed interpretive procedures that were eventually codified by medieval scholars like Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328). According to this Hanbali scholar-activist, the Qur'an itself is its own best interpreter. A verse or verses in one part may clarify or elaborate what is expressed more elliptically in another part. When intra-Qur'anic exegesis proves insufficient, Ibn Taymiyya's four-step hermeneutical procedure seeks recourse in the sunna. By sunna, he means specifically those exegetical comments that Muslim tradition traces back to the Prophet Muhammad. Within collections of exegetical hadiths, the number of such statements is relatively small, which explains the need for steps three and four—that is, reference to the recorded statements of Muhammad's Companions and their Followers (tābi'ūn). Among the most noted names in the former category are 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661), the Prophet's cousin and son-in-law; 'Abdallah b. 'Abbas (d. 687–88), another cousin; and the Kufan Companion 'Abdallah b. Mas'ud (d. 635). In the latter, prominent names include the Meccan Mujahid b. Jabr (d. ca. 720), the Transoxanian Dahhak b. Muzahim (d. 723), the Medinan 'Ikrima (d. 723), and the blind Basran Qatada b. Di'ama (d. 735). Taken in its entirety, this four-step process is traditionally known as al-tafsīr bi-l-ma'thūr (or bi-l-riwāya), interpretation according to the received tradition. Its counterpart in Muslim discussions of classical hermeneutical principles is al-tafsīr bi-l-ra'y (or bi-l-dirāya), interpretation by informed personal opinion. (A subset of this latter category, al-tafsīr bi-l-ishāra, refers to the esoteric and allegorical readings to be found in Sufi commentaries.) The thousands of volumes, in all major Islamic languages, that 14 centuries of Qur'anic commentary has generated are an admixture of these two forms of exegesis. Their basic structure is a linear, sequential, verse-by-verse exposition (tafsīr musalsal).

That exegetical library spans the full spectrum of intellectual, spiritual, and sectarian orientations within the Muslim tradition, such as Sunni, Shi'i, Sufi, Hanbali, Maliki, Ash'ari, and Mu'tazili. Among the most famous of these productions from the classical and medieval periods of Islam are those of Muqatil b. Sulayman (d. 767), Tafsir al-Qur'an (Exegesis of the Qur'an); Tabari (d. 923), Jami' al-Bayan 'an Ta'wil ay al-Qur'an (Clarifying the interpretation of Qur'anic verses); Abu 'Abd al-Rahman Muhammad b. al-Husayn al-Sulami (d. 1021), Haqa'iq al-Tafsir (Realities of interpretation); Abu Ishaq Ahmad b. Muhammad b. Ibrahim al-Tha'labi (d. 1035), al-Kashf wa-l-Bayan 'an Tafsir al-Qur'an (The unveiling and clarification of the interpretation of the Qur'an); Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Tusi (d. 1067), al-Tibyan fi Tafsir al-Qur'an (Exposition of the interpretation of the Qur'an); Mahmud b. 'Umar al-Zamakhshari (d. 1144), al-Kashshaf 'an Haqa'iq Ghawamid al-Tanzil wa-'Uyun al-Aqawil fi Wujuh al-Ta'wil (The unveiler of the hidden realities of revelation and choicest opinions on interpretation); Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210), al-Tafsir al-Kabir (Mafatih al-Ghayb; The major commentary, known as The keys of the unseen) Abu 'Abdallah al-Qurtubi (d. 1273), al-Jami' li-Ahkam al-Qur'an (Compendium of the rules of the Qur'an); 'Abdallah b. 'Umar al-Baydawi (d. ca. 1292), Anwar al-Tanzil wa-Asrar al-Ta'wil (The lights of revelation and secrets of interpretation); 'Imad al-Din Isma'il b. 'Umar b. Kathir (d. 1373), Tafsir al-Qur'an al-'Azim (Commentary on the mighty Qur'an); Jalal al-Din al-Mahalli (d. 1459) and Jalal al-Din al-Suyuti (d. 1505), Tafsir al-Jalalayn (Commentary of the two [scholars named] Jalal).

Modern Developments

This multifaceted tradition of classical commentary shapes and structures modern and contemporary interpretation of the Qur'an but does not control it. New directions and emphases have emerged, and their genesis is connected, either directly or indirectly, to the effects of migration, economic development and stagnation, colonialism, the European Enlightenment and political upheaval. Influential efforts to which the tag of "modernism" has been attached include those of Sir Sayyid Ahmad Khan (d. 1898) in South Asia, Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) and his disciple Rashid Rida (d. 1935) in Egypt, and Hamka (Haji 'Abdul Malik Karim Amrullah, d. 1981) in Indonesia. The need to address the consequences of social, political, and cultural change prompted not a break with the enduring exegetical tradition, but an expansion of intellectual interests and foci. Philosophical rationalism, the advances of scientific knowledge, historical-critical analyses of both secular and sacred literature, and the growing imperative to engage compelling social and political issues all have influenced the shape and scope of Qur'anic commentaries in the 20th century and beyond.

The attempt to find foreshadowing in the Qur'an of modern scientific advances (tafsīr 'ilmī), while not unknown in earlier periods, achieved particular popularity in the first half of the 20th century, stimulated especially by the Egyptian exegete Tantawi Jawhari (d. 1940) and his 26-volume al-Jawahir fi Tafsir al-Qur'an al-Karim (Jewels of the interpretation of the generous Qur'an). Such work found a European advocate in the French physician Maurice Bucaille, whose The Bible, the Qur'an and Science continues to enjoy popularity on proselytizing (da'wa) websites and in other forums of Muslim popular discourse. "Scientific" interpretation did not, however, garner wide support and has been continuously challenged on both exegetical and scientific grounds.

Exegesis in the Service of Political and Social Change

More successful, and certainly more broadly influential, has been the work of contemporary commentators who seek to use tafsīr as an instrument of political and social change. Two names dominate discussion of this phenomenon: the Pakistani journalist, ideologue, and politician Mawdudi (d. 1979) and the Egyptian scholar-activist Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966). Born in India in 1903 to a notable Delhi family, Mawdudi received a classical Muslim education that prepared him for the writing and translation projects to which he allocated time throughout his life. After the partition, Mawdudi moved to Lahore and assumed leadership of the Pakistani branch of the Jama'at-i Islami, the political party that he and others founded earlier in the 1940s. Mawdudi was a prolific author, but his most influential work was the multivolume translation and commentary on the Qur'an, Tafhim al-Qur'an (Understanding the Qur'an). A number of translations from Urdu to English have been completed, including one that is available on the Internet.

Qutb's Fi Zilal al-Qur'an (In the shade of the Qur'an) is significantly influenced by Mawdudi's earlier work. Both are unsparing in their critique of social and political behavior, whether by non-Muslims or Muslims, that contravenes Islamic norms, and their commentaries characterize such conduct as tantamount to a contemporary jāhiliyya, or a reversion to the moral and intellectual barbarism of the pre-Islamic "age of ignorance." Qutb was born only three years after Mawdudi, but his education and early professional life followed a quite different path. Yet he, too, moved from journalism to political activism, a move that eventually cost him his life: he was executed for sedition in 1966. Qutb's commentary follows an important trend of 20th-century interpretation, as it seeks to collapse the distance between the corrupt present and the pristine past, the latter understood as the period of the Prophet's life and the formation of the first Islamic community. This collapse quite deliberately expels the accumulated exegetical heritage of intervening centuries. Qutb expresses little confidence in the classical and postclassical commentaries that constitute that tradition. Rather, he reads the text of the Qur'an as a manifesto for a new political order or, more precisely, for a restoration of the divinely ordained social contract of the earliest Muslim society. Those who reject this reading and its underlying hermeneutics are dismissed as nonbelievers (kuffār), whether they call themselves non-Muslims or Muslims.

Genre Diversification

While Qutb's Fi Zilal, arguably the most influential commentary of the 20th century, follows the traditional structure of verse-by-verse analysis, much Qur'anic interpretation occurs in other forms and genres. Given the centrality of the Qur'an to Muslim thought and practice, it is not surprising that there is frequent reference to it, in all varieties of Islamic literature, to support arguments and to secure their authority. A 2006 article, for example, studied the exegetical judgments contained in Osama bin Laden's Declaration of War and his Statement of the World Islamic Front Urging Jihad against Jews and Crusaders. Countless other works, whether theological, philosophical, or mystical, can be mined for their exegetical insights. The many books, pamphlets, and tracts of thematic interpretation (tafsīr mawḍū'ī) are yet another source of sustained Qur'anic interpretation. These works gather passages relevant to a particular topic, such as marriage, God's oneness, or fasting, and treat them as a coherent collection. Their value as resources for pedagogy and preaching has assured the ever-growing number and popularity of this type of commentary.

A characterization as "thematic commentary" could also be applied to the writings of a newer generation of Muslim commentators: those whose intellectual formation has not taken place in the traditional centers of Islamic learning, but in European, North American, Australian, and South African universities. An earlier generation of such individuals would include figures like Mohammed Arkoun (b. 1928), the French-educated Algerian scholar whose pioneering work on a multidisciplinary approach to the understanding of the Qur'an makes a clear distinction between the dynamically understood fait coranique, the original prophetic proclamation, and the "Closed Official Corpus" created by the imposition of a dogmatic exegetical orthodoxy. It would also include Fazlur Rahman (d. 1988), the Pakistani scholar whose writings and whose years on the faculty of the University of Chicago shaped a dual legacy of doctoral graduates and engaged exegetical discourse. His Major Themes of the Qur'an, certainly a significant English-language example of tafsīr mawḍū'ī, introduced the Qur'an to countless American college students.

Some of the most interesting and challenging work to emerge from this Euro-American context concerns those verses of the Qur'an that treat the social and spiritual status of women. Both male and female scholars have contributed to this interpretive dialogue, and the conversation has been varied and frequently at variance. In the first decade of the 21st century, a younger generation of Muslim women scholars risked both academic and social censure by constituting themselves as qualified successors to the intellectual lineage of the classical and medieval mufassirūn—that is, commentators on the Qur'an. They have challenged earlier interpretations of statements like "but their men have a degree above them" (Q. 2:228) or "men are the managers of the affairs of women" (Q. 4:34). They have focused particular attention on the threefold admonishment mandated by Qur'an 4:34. The command "to beat" rebellious or disobedient wives (wa-dribūhunna) has legal and social implications of concern to Muslims in many political contexts. Other exegetical investigations have focused on the significance of gendered language in the Qur'an and on the verses that address marriage, divorce, polygyny, child support, and the testimony of female witnesses.

A Contested Arena

The study and interpretation of the Qur'an has never been an uncontested activity or one devoid of political consequences. Traditional Muslim historiography credits the 'Alid–Umayyad split, a precursor to Sunni and Shi'i sectarianism, to a failed arbitration on the Qur'an. Ninth-century Baghdad was convulsed by the caliph Ma'mun's (r. 813–33) efforts to enforce his interpretation of the Qur'an's ontological status, an interpretation and enforcement rescinded by a subsequent caliph, Mutawakkil (r. 847–61). The 19th-century Indian reformer Sayyid Ahmad Khan used a rationalist hermeneutic to justify and promote cooperation between Indian Muslims and the British colonial government. The Sudanese leader of the reformist Republican Brothers, Mahmoud Mohamed Taha (d. 1985), who was executed during the military regime of Ja'far Nimeiri (r. 1969–85), espoused the exegetical preeminence of the Meccan verses and chapters (sūras), arguing that these transcend the chronological and cultural constraints of the Medinan sūras and provide a dynamic foundation for democratic social practices and values.

In the 20th century, innovative Muslim scholarship on the Qur'an has damaged academic careers, been subject to publication suppression, and even led to death threats. Although separated by a generation, two Egyptian academics offer examples of those who have felt the force of conservative opposition to their work. In 1947, Muhammad Ahmad Khalafallah (d. 1997), a student of the literary scholar Amin al-Kholi (d. 1967), submitted a thesis on Qur'anic narratives that stressed their function in forming the spiritual and ethical attitudes of their recipients rather than their historical accuracy. His thesis was rejected by its University of Cairo examiners, and he eventually lost his university position. About 40 years later, another faculty member at the University of Cairo, Nasr Hamid Abu Zayd (d. 2010), published a hermeneutical treatise, Mafhum al-Nass (Understanding of the text), built on contemporary linguistic theories of textual formation. For Abu Zayd, sensitivity to the cultural consciousness of both the Qur'an's initial recipients and its contemporary hearers stands as a fundamental exegetical principle. In the view of his critics, however, this stance challenges both the eternal truth of the divine revelation and the cumulative consensus of its commentators. Legal and professional actions taken against Abu Zayd became so dangerous that he sought self-exile in Europe.

The history of non-Muslim study and interpretation of the Qur'an has created another arena of contestation. Earlier forms of this exercise, such as Peter the Venerable's (d. 1156) translation project or the early modern publications of Theodor Bibliander (d. 1564), were largely in the service of Christian polemic. The 19th- and 20th-century efforts of scholars like Gustav Weil (d. 1889), Ignaz Goldziher (d. 1921), Theodor Nöldeke (d. 1930), Richard Bell (d. 1952), and John Wansbrough (d. 1992) that purport to be straightforward scholarly analyses have been criticized as covert proselytization, intellectual colonialization, or unabashed blasphemy.

See also Qur'an

Further Reading

J.M.S. Baljon, Modern Muslim Koran Interpretation (1880–1960), 1961; Asma Barlas, "Women's Readings of the Qur'ān," The Cambridge Companion to the Qur'ān, edited by Jane Dammen McAuliffe, 2006; Gerhard Böwering, "The Scriptural 'Senses' in Medieval Ṣūfī Qur'ān Exegesis," in With Reverence for the Word: Medieval Scriptural Exegesis in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, edited by J. D. McAuliffe, B. D. Walfish, and J. W. Goering, 2003; Ignaz Goldziher, Die Richtungen der islamischen Koranauslegung, 2nd ed., 1952; J.J.G. Jansen, The Interpretation of the Koran in Modern Egypt, 1974; Jane Dammen McAuliffe, "An Introduction to Medieval Interpretation of the Qur'ān," in With Reverence for the Word: Medieval Scriptural Exegesis in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, edited by J. D. McAuliffe, B. D. Walfish, and J. W. Goering, 2003; Angelika Neuwirth, "Structure and the Emergence of the Community," The Blackwell Companion to the Qur'ān, edited by Andrew Rippin, 2006; Walid Saleh, The Formation of the Classical Tafsīr Tradition: The Qur'ān Commentary of Al-Tha'labī (d. 427/1035), 2004; Rotraud Wielandt, "Exegesis of the Qur'ān: Early Modern and Contemporary," Encyclopaedia of the Qur'ān, edited by Jane Dammen McAuliffe, 2001–6; Stefan Wild, ed., The Qur'ān as Text, 1996.

JANE DAMMEN MCAULIFFE

F

Fadlallah, Muhammad Husayn (1935–2010)

Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, a leading Twelver Shi'i religious authority in Lebanon, combined the training of a traditional Shi'i jurist with the analysis and concerted activity of a political ideologue. He exerted a strong influence on the political aspirations and military activism of the Shi'is of Lebanon, including Hizbullah (Hizb Allah) in particular; of Lebanese Sunnis; and of Shi'is and Sunnis outside Lebanon. He was born in 1935 in Najaf, Iraq, the foremost center for Shi'i legal education in the world, while his Lebanese father, 'Abd al-Ra'uf Fadlallah (1907–84), was studying and teaching there. The Sayyids claimed descent from the Prophet's grandson Hasan through his son Hasan al-Muthanna. Fadlallah's grandfather, Sayyid Najib (1863–1917), had been a scholar of some renown in Bint Jubayl, his hometown in southern Lebanon, where he taught at his personal madrasa (Muslim school). Fadlallah grew up in Najaf, studying first with his father and then under a number of other teachers, including Abu al-Qasim al-Kho'i (1899–1992), Muhsin al-Hakim (1889–1970), and Mahmud Shahrudi (1882–1974). He completed his education under Kho'i in 1965 and received from him a certificate recognizing him as a mujtahid or fully qualified jurist.

While in Najaf, Fadlallah showed a profound interest in literature, particularly Arabic poetry, and edited a journal titled Majallat al-Adab (Journal of literature). He also became involved in Iraqi politics, and his early debates with Marxists and secularists and his experience with the organization of leftist movements influenced his views concerning political action. He was inspired by the teachings and example of the prominent Iraqi Shi'i authority Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr, who advocated the involvement of jurists in political and social spheres and, before being executed by Saddam Hussein's regime in 1980, played an important role in the Islamist political mobilization of Shi'i youth through Iraq's Da'wa Party.

In 1966, having completed his studies, Fadlallah moved back to Lebanon and settled in al-Nab'a quarter, an eastern suburb of Beirut populated by poor Shi'is, immediately establishing himself as an effective community leader and an excellent teacher. He founded the Islamic Legal Institute, a center where students could study teaching the traditional curriculum of Najaf, and also built mosques and centers for Shi'i religious ceremonies. In 1976, in the course of the Lebanese Civil War, the Nab'a quarter was bombarded and eventually occupied by the Maronite Christian Phalangists. The experience of bombardment and being driven out of his home in a Beirut suburb along with thousands of other Shi'i residents radicalized Fadlallah. During this time, he wrote the book al-Islam wa-Mantiq al-Quwwa (Islam and the logic of power) under heavy shelling and working by candlelight. It shared with other modern Arabic works on political theory an emphasis on resistance and the right to resist drawn ultimately from French anticolonialist writings, but it had an innovative aspect aimed at critiquing the traditional quietist position adopted by Shi'i jurists. He drew on Friedrich Nietzche's (1844–1900) 1887 work On the Genealogy of Morality, which critiqued the passive posture historically adopted by Christians, characterizing it as slave morality, and suggested that they should adopt noble morality instead, seeking to attain redress for grievances by taking revenge through action rather than through the imagined revenge traditionally adopted in Christian thought. Fadlallah applied this same argument to Shi'i tradition, urging their jurists to adopt an activist stance and to become directly involved in social, economic, political, and military issues. The work describes two opposing groups, the mustad'afun (the downtrodden), referring primarily to Shi'is but also to Muslims in general, and the mustakbirun (the arrogant), referring primarily to the United States and Israel, whom he held responsible for the crimes of the Phalangists. According to Fadlallah, following the examples of 'Ali and Husayn, Muslims must oppose force with force; they have a duty to gain economic, political, and military power in order to resist these oppressive forces in an effective manner.

At this juncture, Fadlallah, newly ensconced in the Bi'r al-'Abd quarter in southern Beirut, was named by Abu al-Qasim al-Kho'i, the leading jurist and religious authority in Najaf after the death of Hakim in 1970, as his representative in Lebanon. This gave Fadlallah access to khums funds—the 20 percent income tax collected from Shi'i believers for religious purposes—which allowed him to undertake large charity projects such as the building of schools and hospitals. He, somewhat more than his quietist and learned rival Muhammad Mahdi Shams al-Din (d. 2001), filled the void left by the mysterious disappearance of Musa al-Sadr in Libya in 1978. Islam and the Logic of Power, published in 1976, had established him as a leading Islamist ideologue, and he continued to decry foreign influence in Lebanon and encroachments on Lebanese sovereignty, particularly in the journal of the Lebanese Muslim Students Organization, al-Muntalaq (The outbreak). Establishing himself in the role of mentor and guide to Islamist cadres throughout Lebanon, he wrote against the Israeli invasions of 1978 and 1982, as well as the presence of the multinational UN peace-keeping force in Lebanon, whom he saw as supporting the illegitimate rule of Pierre Gemayel's government. For this reason, he endorsed the October 1983 attacks on U.S. Marines' and French troops' barracks. After the Israeli invasion of southern Lebanon in 1982, Israeli aggression became a constant focus of his writings, which urged sustained and tactical resistance. By 1983, Fadlallah had become a major public figure in Lebanon and beyond.

Assessments of Fadlallah's relationship with Hizbullah, the political and military Shi'i movement that originated in the early 1980s and was backed by the Islamic Republic of Iran, have varied. Some claim that he was the spiritual guide of the movement, that he had a major hand in directing it, and that he was directly responsible for planning its operations. Others deny this, clearing him of guilt for specific terrorist attacks. The CIA, taking the former view and holding him responsible for the deaths of 241 American servicemen in the Marine barracks bombing and also for kidnappings of U.S. and other European citizens in Lebanon in the early 1980s, attempted to assassinate him in 1985 with a car bomb outside the Imam Rida Mosque where he preached. An estimated 80 to 105 people were killed, but Fadlallah survived. Later, in 2006, during the war between Israel and Hizbullah, Israeli planes bombed his home, but he happened to be elsewhere. It is undeniable that he exerted an important influence over Hizbullah, inspired its leaders, and had close ties with the organization. His articles appeared regularly in al-'Ahd (The pledge), Hizbullah's official journal. His bodyguards were Hizbullah operatives, and they manned checkpoints on the way to his house and the Imam Rida Mosque. However, he did not accept an official role for both tactical and ideological reasons: he could deny responsibility for any specific actions taken by Hizbullah, and he did not want to have his opinion be hampered by an adherence to a particular political program.

Fadlallah was a radical yet pragmatic political ideologue. He was looked on with suspicion in the West because he condoned violence and strategic action against U.S. and Israeli interests. He insisted that Islamic resistance was not terrorism and that force must be met with force, and he urged armed resistance to the Israeli occupation of Lebanon, the West Bank, and the Gaza Strip. He wrote legal opinions justifying the use of suicide bombing against military targets and forbidding the normalization of ties with Israel, and he called for a boycott of American products. However, he often differed from hard-line ideologues in his pragmatism, for he showed himself willing to accept gradual, incremental changes and to work with other groups in Lebanese society, including the Christians. He also condemned the killing of civilians, and in particular denounced the 9/11 attacks as illegitimate. His approach differed from that of Musa al-Sadr, who had led a civil rights movement for Shi'is in the 1960s and 1970s, for he saw that important changes were best achieved not by widespread social movements but by select, indoctrinated cadres through organized, tactical work. Much of his rhetoric, however, including the constant opposition of al-mustakbirūn to mustaḍ'afūn, resembled that adopted by Musa al-Sadr and Ayatollah Khomeini. Fadlallah, at least by the late 1980s, did not endorse Khomeini's concept of wilāyat al-faqīh, the absolute rule of the leading Shi'i jurist, but rather supported a constitution that would allow wide participation of societal groups and would be controlled by a system of checks and balances. In 1988, he proposed a model he called dawlat al-insān (the human state), in an obvious reference to human rights guaranteed through regime change. In this he differed with the leadership of Hizbullah, who adopted the views of Khomeini and his successor in Iran, Khamene'i.

Fadlallah's views on the top jurists of the Shi'is also provide significant evidence of his independence of Hizbullah. Fadlallah, born in Najaf, had participated in the long tradition of study in the shrine cities of Iraq that was challenged by the rise of Qum as a major center of learning beginning in 1922. When Kho'i died in 1992, Hizbullah followed Iranian government circles in claiming that the leading Shi'i jurist was first the Sayyid Rida Gulpayegani, who died in 1993; then Muhammad 'Ali al-Araki, who died in 1994; and then the "leader" of the Islamic Republic of Iran, Ayatollah Khamane'i. Throughout, Fadlallah accepted 'Ali al-Sistani, who had acceded to the position of marja' al-taqlīd (source of emulation) in Najaf, as the leading authority. However, Fadlallah soon came to be recognized as a senior authority in his own right. In 1986, the Iranians had already recognized Fadlallah as an ayatollah and regional authority. Beginning in 1994, Fadlallah called for the marja'iyya, the position of supreme legal authority for the Twelver Shi'is, to be modified from a personal institution into an international organization, not unlike the Vatican, with specialized bureaus and functionaries; it should not be synonymous with the Islamic Republic of Iran. In 1995, Fadlallah's supporters published a manual of his legal rulings, a necessary step toward recognition as a senior, international Shi'i legal authority. His reputation continued to grow, in part because of his innovative legal positions, and before his death, some supporters even suggested that he should succeed Sistani as the next marja' al-taqlīd in Najaf. Fadlallah became known for his relatively liberal views on women, in keeping with his emphasis on resistance and mobilization. He encouraged women to participate in sports and to develop strength. He stressed that women had a social responsibility equal to that of men. He upheld the rights of women to resist violence and coercion of husbands or male relatives. He wrote fatwas (religious opinions) against honor killings and female circumcision and permitted abortion if the life of the mother was in danger. A number of jurists in Najaf and Qum accused him of violating consensus on some issues in which he rejected commonly accepted rulings in the Twelver legal tradition, including his qualified permission of cloning, his argument that Jews and Christians and indeed all people regardless of religious affiliation were not ritually impure, and the ruling that one may resort to astronomy to determine the beginning of the month of Ramadan, rather than relying on sighting the new moon with the naked eye.

See also Hizbullah; ijtihād and taqlīd; jurisprudence; Lebanon; al-Sadr, Muhammad Baqir (1935–80); shari'a

Further Reading

Talib Aziz, "Fadlallah and the Remaking of the Marja 'iya," in The Most Learned of the Shia: The Institution of the Marja' Taqlid, edited by Linda S. Walbridge, 2001; Jamal Sankari, Fadlallah: The Making of a Radical Shiite Leader, 2005.

DEVIN J. STEWART

faith

In the Qur'an, faith (īmān) and its antithesis, unbelief (kufr), denote two radically opposed moral categories. Faith leads the believer to perform good works continually in this world and to receive a blessed existence in paradise in the next, while its opposite leads the unbeliever to wreak continual havoc and corruption in this world and to suffer hellfire in the hereafter. In fact, the terms most frequently used in the Qur'an to designate the Muslim community, the followers of the Prophet Muhammad's mission, are al-mu'minūn (the faithful) and alladhīna āmanū (those who have faith) rather than "Muslims," while those who reject and oppose the Prophet's mission are kafirs (unbelievers). Faith is the basic condition for membership in the Muslim community, while lack of it excludes one from the community. This idea lies behind a number of key Islamic terms, such as ummahāt al-mu'minīn (the mothers of the believers), which is applied to the wives of the Prophet Muhammad in the Qur'an on the grounds that the Muslims essentially form one family, with the Prophet as their father and his wives as their mothers, the basis of which is faith. Another key term, amīr al-mu'minīn (Commander of the Faithful), a title adopted by the caliphs beginning with 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), similarly is based on the identification of faith as the central identifying characteristic of the community's members.

In Islamic tradition, a distinction is often made between having faith (īmān) and being Muslim (islām). In a famous hadith report, the angel Gabriel questions the Prophet about the meaning of the two terms and his response shows that islām is external (ẓāhir) and more general ('āmm), while faith is internal (bāṭin) and a more specific (khāṣṣ) matter. Islām, outward adherence to the Islamic faith, includes the performance of basic ritual obligations such as praying, fasting, almsgiving, making the pilgrimage, and uttering the creed that there is no god but God and that Muhammad is the messenger of God. Īmān refers to the inner belief in the one God, His angels, His scriptures, His messengers, the Day of Judgment, and fate, whether good or bad. However, the terms are nearly interchangeable in the Qur'an: "Then We evacuated those of the believers who were there, But We did not find any Muslims there except one house" (53:35–36). In other contexts, the distinction holds: "The desert Arabs say, 'We believe.' Say, 'You have no faith'; but say, 'We have submitted our wills to God,' for faith has not yet entered your hearts'" (Q. 51:14). Islam, therefore, is the quality of outward adherence to the religion, whereas faith is a matter of complete inner conviction.

The Qur'an upholds the possibility that an apparent believer may lack internal faith. A group among the Prophet's community in Medina, termed munāfiqūn (hypocrites) or alladhīna fī qulūbihim marad (those who have a disease in their hearts), are described as adhering to Islam outwardly but actively working to undermine it in secret. In later texts, the term ahl al-qiblah (those who pray toward Mecca) is used to designate all ostensible Muslims, including those who harbor concealed heresy or lack of faith. The accusation of unbelief, termed takfīr, is a grave matter in Islamic law, because the apostate is deemed deserving of capital punishment. The outward signs of lack of faith, or heretical beliefs, may be words or deeds. Uttering blasphemies against God, the Prophet Muhammad, other prophets, the sacred books, angels, the Companions of the Prophet, or Islamic doctrines or obligations that were conveyed by the Prophet or appear in the Qur'an and are subject to consensus may reveal that one is actually an unbeliever. Acts such as the desecration of sacred monuments or holy ground produce the same result. Various Muslim groups differed over other Muslims' status with regard to faith. The Kharijis, in particular the Azariqa and the Najdis, condemned grave sinners and all non-Kharijis as infidels who could be killed, enslaved, or robbed of their possessions with impunity. Other groups, such as the Murji'a, claimed that faith is not determined by deeds and that one could not condemn a grave sinner as an unbeliever, except one who has abandoned prayer altogether, a view that became generally accepted in Sunni Islam. Indeed, popular views held that faith alone, and particularly devotion to the Prophet—and for Shi'is, to the imams as well—can make up for sins and a poor record of devotions and, through intercession, gain one entrance to paradise.

Creeds detailing the beliefs required of Muslims have been written from the early Islamic centuries until the present, and one of their main functions was to correct or exclude groups considered to hold heretical beliefs. Most jurists required the believer to know the very basic elements of Islamic theology and nothing more, but many theologians required a stronger adherence to complex creeds and wrote long doxographies detailing the beliefs of many Islamic sects, arguing that only one of these was "the saved sect" (al-firqa al-nājiya). Between 833 and 848, the Abbasid caliphs Ma'mun (r. 813–33), Mu'tasim (r. 833–42), and Wathiq (r. 842–47), in league with Mu'tazili theologians, initiated the inquisition (miḥna), attempting to enforce public adherence to the doctrine that the Qur'an was created rather than eternal. The Qadiri Creed, publicly promulgated by the Abbasid caliph Qadir (r. 991–1031) and his son and successor Qa'im (r. 1031–75) in the early 11th century, was inspired by traditionalist theologians and condemned Mu'tazili and Shi'i views as heretical in an attempt to exclude them from public religious discourse. Other influential Sunni creeds were written by Abu Ja'far al-Tahawi (d. 933), Abu Hafs 'Umar b. Muḥammad al-Nasafi (d. 537), Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), and Muhammad b. Yusuf al-Sanunsi (d. 1486).

See also blasphemy; God; theology

Further Reading

Toshihiko Isutzu, Ethico-Religious Concepts in the Qur'an, 2002; W. Montgomery Watt, "Conditions of Membership of the Islamic Community," Studia Islamica 21, no. 1 (1964); A. J. Wensinck, The Muslim Creed, 1932.

DEVIN J. STEWART

family

The family is the building block of Islamic societies. Family structures, as well as ideas about the family, play crucial roles in the economic, social, and political life of Islamic communities. The text of the Qur'an presents a number of important ideas about family, including the idea that attachment to family and one's relatives are part of the human obsession with the material world. The audience of the Qur'an is berated for its obsession with the amassment of material wherewithal, succinctly represented by "property and sons." The new religious dispensation urges the audience to give up this obsession, even if it requires breaking with relatives: "If your fathers, your sons, your brothers, your wives, your clan, the wealth you have acquired, the merchandise for which you fear that there will be no sale, and dwellings that you desire are dearer to you than God and His messenger and jihad in His way, then wait until God causes his command to pass" (Q. 9:24). Islam requires a radical break with existing structures: "You will not find folk who believe in God and the Last Day loving those who oppose God and His messenger, even though they be their fathers, their sons, their brothers, or their clan" (Q. 58:22). Several passages stress that one's relatives and progeny cannot help one on Judgment Day (Q. 60:3). At the same time, though, obligations toward blood relatives are confirmed, and the believers are urged to help their relatives and maintain contact with them, as well as to honor their parents.

The Prophet is a blood relative of the primary audience to whom he was sent to preach God's word. Prophecy works in a predictable manner, in part because God has a customary way (sunnat Allāh) of dealing with humanity, but also because human nature is predictable and people tend to be recalcitrant and set in their ways, so that they most often reject the prophetic messages that reach them. Prophets are members of the nations to whom they have been sent, and in the cases of tribal societies, they are actually related by blood ties to the members of the society to whom they preach, literally their "brothers." For this reason, Noah is described as the brother of his people, Hud the brother of the tribe of 'Ad, Salih the brother of the tribe of Thamud, Lot the brother of his people, and Shu'ayb the brother of the tribe of Midian (Q. 7:65, 73, 85; 11:50, 61, 84; 26:106, 124, 142, 161; 27:45; 29:36; 46:21; 50:13). These examples all suggest an emphasis on the Prophet Muhammad's blood ties to the rest of the Quraysh tribe, his primary audience. The importance of this is twofold. A member of the tribe is understood to have the same cultural background as his audience and should therefore be able to convey God's message to them in the appropriate language and manner. In addition, the fact that he is a close relative of his audience and not an outsider should impress upon them that he has their best interests at heart and could not be trying to mislead them for surreptitious or ulterior motives. A hadith report depicts the Prophet gathering the tribe and asking them from a hilltop outside Mecca whether they would believe him if he told them that a neighboring tribe was going to raid them the next day. When they all assented, he told them that his divine message was exactly analogous, except that he was warning of a much more devastating impending event, the Day of Judgment. The point is that they would have no reason to doubt the truth of his first warning because he is a member of their group and would have no reason to lie or distort the truth.

The blood ties of the Prophet played a critical role in his biography and the political machinations of the Quraysh tribe in response to his mission. The Prophet was initially protected, even though his preaching was rejected and perceived as a threat by the majority of his own tribe, because he enjoyed the backing of his clan, Hashim, under the leadership of his uncle and foster father, Abu Talib. This gave him immunity from attack. The clan continued to protect him even when they were boycotted by the rest of Quraysh. The Prophet lost the protection of his clan when Abu Talib died and leadership of the clan passed to another uncle, Abu Lahab 'Abd al-'Uzza, an enemy of the Prophet who was cursed in the Qur'an itself—"May the hands of Abu Lahab perish, and may he perish!" (Q. 111:1)—and this ultimately forced Muhammad to leave his native town. The story of Joseph in the Qur'an portrays a betrayal of a charismatic figure by his brothers as well as his kind treatment of them, and it may be read as an indirect comment on the trials of the Prophet with the members of his own tribe and his efforts to treat them with clemency and forgiveness.

Historical prophecy runs in families. The Qur'an refers to the prophets among the progeny of Adam, Noah, or Abraham (Q. 6:84; 19:58; 29:27; 57:26) and clearly shares with the Hebrew Bible the notion of Abraham as the patriarch. It also refers to the Tribes of Israel, using the term asbāṭ, cognate with the Hebrew term shevatim, rather than the ordinary Arabic term for tribes, qabā'il. Aaron is repeatedly held up as the brother of Moses, his help and support in his prophetic mission.

A crucial idea in the Qur'an and the Prophet's mission was that the believers form a new spiritual family, which supersedes and replaces the original biological or genetic family. Salvation history provides a number of examples of the distinction between the two. Abraham rejects his father's beliefs and society. When a son of Noah is drowned in the flood, he remonstrates with God, who had promised to save his household. God responds, "O Noah! He is not of your household. He is of evil conduct, so ask not of Me that whereof you have no knowledge" (Q. 11:45–46). The point is not that the son was illegitimate, though some commentaries suggest this interpretation, but rather that, as an unbeliever, he did not belong to Noah's true family, the basis of which was faith. Noah's wife and Lot's wife are presented in a similar fashion: unbelievers who do not literally belong to the families of their husbands even though they are married (Q. 66). The believers are brothers of one another, and their new family will be the basis of a future nation (Q. 3:103). Though literal adoption is no longer allowed, foster children are part of the spiritual family: "Call them by their fathers' names; that will be more equitable in the sight of God. If you know not their fathers, then they are your brothers in faith and your clients" (Q. 33:5). The Prophet put this new understanding of family into literal effect after the flight to Medina, when he made the muhājirūn, those Meccan Muslims who had fled with him to safety in Medina, "brothers" of the anṣār (Muslims from Medina) in an event termed "the Brothering" (al-mu'ākhāh). The Prophet, exceptionally, was not paired with one of the anṣār but with his cousin 'Ali. This was not a mere announcement of affection or goodwill: the paired brothers entered into a defined legal relationship. They were obligated to support each other and could inherit from each other.

Even though in the Arab tribal system, wives remained members of their fathers' rather than their husbands' tribes, the Prophet's wives are assigned a special status in the Qur'an. Tellingly, the believers are instructed that the Prophet's wives are like their mothers: "The Prophet is closer to the believers than themselves, and his wives are their mothers" (Q. 33:6). The implication of the verse is not only that the believers form a spiritual family but also that Prophet Muhammad actually stands in the place of their father. Indeed, historical variants of this verse preserved in medieval Islamic texts such as the famous commentary of Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923) add the phrase, "and he [i.e., the Prophet Muhammad] is a father to them." The term ahl al-bayt (the people of the house) is used in the Qur'an as a term of respect for wives, referring to Abraham's wife Sarah (Q. 11:73), for example, and to the Prophet Muhammad's wives, who are declared to be purified by divine act: "God's wish is to remove uncleanness from you" (Q. 33:32–33).

The prophetic mission introduced modifications of pre-Islamic family arrangements and associated practices. Polygyny was limited to four women, and marriage to two sisters was forbidden. The institution of formal adoption was abolished; an adopted child would no longer acquire the lineage of his or her adoptive father. The Qur'an severely criticizes the favoring of daughters over sons in Arabian society, a result of the emphasis on increasing one's male progeny, the agnate group that was the basic military and economic unit of tribal society. The text denounces female infanticide and mocks men in the audience for being upset when they are informed of the birth of a daughter, claiming that God himself has daughter goddesses.

One pre-Islamic institution that survived was that of clientage, and the patron-client relationship became crucial in the early Islamic centuries in the spread of Islam. Slaves who had been captured in warfare and converted to Islam while serving their Muslim masters became freedmen (mawālī) formally attached to the tribe of their former masters. Other free individuals simply converted at the hands of the members of Arab tribes and adopted the tribal nisba or gentilic as part of their new name.

Islamic law recognizes as a fundamental unit not only the nuclear family but also the extended family, with some emphasis on the father's relatives over the mother's. A remnant of the Arab tribal system from pre-Islamic times, the 'aṣaba or agnate group—a man, his brothers, his father, his sons, and his brother's sons—represent the fundamental tribal fighting unit. They are the ones who rush to take revenge for an injury or insult to any one of their members, and they are liable to be pursued for revenge if any one of their members causes such injury or insult. The 'aṣaba appears, importantly, in inheritance law: according to the Sunni madhhabs, when the set fractions do not take up all the estate, the remainder is inherited by the 'aṣaba. Shi'i law rejects this rule, merely granting increased proportional shares to the other more closely related heirs. They, or the clan or tribe, are also responsible for paying blood money for injury or death. Laws regarding child custody are based on the premise that the natural allegiance of a child is to the father's side of his or her family, and custody always reverts to the father even though young children may remain with their mothers temporarily. In addition, most Islamic languages preserve a strong distinction between the mother's and father's sides of the family, so instead of having one term each for uncle or aunt, there are (at least) two terms. In Arabic, for example, a father's brother is 'amm and a father's sister is 'amma, while a mother's brother is khāl and a mother's brother is khāla. In many Islamic societies, the paternal uncles are associated with the father's role as the formal face of the family and a strict disciplinarian, while maternal uncles are associated with the nurturing, informal, and affectionate role of the mother.

Some aspects of marriage law reflect the endogamic ideal of the pre-Islamic Arabs. Some law books contain rulings that Arab women may not be married off to non-Arab men or that female descendants of the Prophet should not be married to Arabs descended from tribes considered base. In most Islamic societies, endogamy became highly preferred, especially for females, and Islamic law confirms that a Muslim man may marry a Jewish or Christian woman, while a Muslim woman does not have the corresponding right to marry a Jewish or Christian man, despite the fact that they all believe in God. The preferred marriage is between a young man and his paternal cousin—his father's brother's daughter; marriage between first cousins is not prohibited but favored. The reasons for this are several, including that it keeps wealth within the agnate unit, something succinctly expressed in modern Egypt as "putting our oil in our flour." While the percentage of such marriages that occur is not extremely high in most contexts, the idea is so pervasive that bint 'ammī (my cousin) is a typical term of endearment for one's wife, an equivalent to "honeybunch" or "sugarplum." In addition, when a young woman receives a suitor, her cousin (ibn 'amm) is often asked to relinquish his prior right to her, even in a perfunctory manner, before a match is arranged. This is widely understood to be the traditional way, even though it is the opposite of some other traditional societies, such as that of the Mongols, where exogamy was the ideal and was supposed to strengthen the individual tribe.

Closely associated with the family structure is the concept of honor, which regulated the behavior of family members and governed their interactions with society at large. There are two quite distinct types of honor, termed sharaf and 'ird in Arabic: the first refers to oneself and the second refers to people under one's protection, including, especially, the women of one's household, but also other relatives, clients, and supplicants. One's reputation depends on one's ability to defend oneself and one's dependents and control their behavior.

Lineage has played crucial roles in Islamic political history. Despite the fact that the Prophet's mission seems to have instituted a radically new spiritual family and, along with it, a radically new form of political organization, governed not by a hereditary ruler or a tribal chieftain but by a religious authority, even the first caliphs, the Prophet's immediate successors, were related to him. Abu Bakr (r. 632–34) was the Prophet's father-in-law, father of his wife 'A'isha, and 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44) was the Prophet's father-in-law as well, father of his wife Hafsa. 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56) was the Prophet's son-in-law, having married two of the Prophet's daughters, Ruqayyah and Umm Kulthum, and 'Ali b. Abi Talib was the Prophet's son-in-law as well, having married his daughter Fatima, in addition to being his cousin. The leadership of the Islamic empire quickly changed, however, to dynastic succession with the caliphate of Mu'awiya, the establishment of the Umayyad dynasty, and the designation of Yazid as heir apparent.

Not only the caliphal dynasties of the Umayyads and the Abbasids but also the leadership of their opponents, the Shi'is, were based on the dynastic principle. Shi'is of all stripes, like the Abbasids, claimed authority on the grounds that they represented the descendants of the Prophet Muhammad, who had been granted by divine fiat the right and responsibility to shepherd the Islamic community. One of the Shi'is' main proof texts in support of this was a transmitted report in which the Prophet had said to 'Ali that he, with respect to Muhammad, was in the position of Aaron with respect to Moses, serving as the assistant or lieutenant of the prophet. The biblical analogy served to attach the authority of 'Ali and his descendants to that of the Prophet, with the subtext that the political and spiritual leadership of the imams was the natural and logical continuation of prophetic authority. The divisions of Shi'is into the major groups of Twelvers, Isma'ilis, and Zaydis, as well as most of the factional disputes within each group, likewise focused on the dynastic principle and succession within the family. The exceptions were the Kharijis, who rejected the dynastic principle and held that any capable Muslim would be the caliph or imam.

As the Abbasid caliphs lost control over the peripheral regions of the Islamic empire from their center in Iraq, the typical pattern was for local governors or military commanders to establish hereditary dynasties, and Islamic history is replete with polities ruled by dynastic families, though other systems existed in contexts such as the Mamluk Empire in Egypt and Syria. The famous historian Ibn Khaldun proposed an organic theory of states in which he argued, from his study of Maghribi history, that dynastic succession was a cyclical pattern. New dynasties were established by seminomadic, uncivilized tribes who invaded settled regions and by virtue of their strong group affiliation, which he terms 'aṣabiyya, are able to dominate the less tribal inhabitants. Once settled, though, they inevitably become accustomed to the comforts of civilization, lose their tribal cohesion and rough nature, and are then subject to invasion by another tribal group.

Some provisions in Islamic law recognize that descendants of the Prophet, termed sayyids or sharifs, have special status. They cannot receive alms, for this would be disparaging to the family of the Prophet, but they are entitled to receive part of the khums or "fifth" that is levied on war booty. Descent from the Prophet grants one high social status, something recognized as important in marriage law, not to mention other customary privileges accorded to sayyids in regions of the Muslim world from Morocco to India. Some Shi'i legal works contain the rule that a man cannot marry two wives who are both sayyidas on the logic that they are like sisters, and Islamic law forbids him from marrying sisters.

Most Islamic societies were organized into corporate entities first, such as neighborhoods, villages, religious minority communities, and so on, and then into families. The family remained a crucial economic and social unit in society. Though medieval Islamic society was relatively mobile, and merchants and others could travel more or less freely from one Muslim polity to the next without applying for citizenship or satisfying other formal requirements, one's position in society was determined to a great extent by heredity. It was commonly understood that society was hierarchical not only by force of circumstances but also by divine design and that ranks had to be respected. Professions of all kinds were understood to run in families, and the same often held for government posts. Supervisors of endowments; professors of Islamic law; judges of towns, cities, and provinces; and so on were often succeeded by their sons or nephews, and such practices were usually questioned only when the successor was deemed utterly corrupt or incompetent.

Unsurprisingly, Islamic law assumes a patriarchal system in which the head of the family is male, paternity determines what family one belongs to, and men are generally dominant over women. While men and women are each held to believe in the same way and to have roughly equal religious obligations, one may argue that in a blunt, practical sense, a woman's value is half that of a man of similar status. According to the traditional system of blood money payments, which likely goes back to pre-Islamic customs in pagan Arabia, a free Muslim woman is worth 50 camels, exactly one-half the price of a free Muslim man and equal in value to a Jewish or Christian male or a male slave. Similarly, a daughter's share of inheritance from her parents is half that of a son, and the testimony of a woman in court is worth effectively one-half of the testimony of a man. Nevertheless, women have many rights under Islamic law, including the right to own and dispose of property without the interference of their husbands, something that women in Western societies did not have until quite recently. Husbands are required to pay for the food, shelter, clothing, and upkeep of their wives and children, while wives are not required to use any of their own property or income, even if it is vast, to support the family.

Social hierarchy, or a system of class distinctions, may be detected—and was upheld—in various areas of the law, particularly in marriage law. The law of kafā'a (suitability) held that a husband had to be of appropriate status to marry a woman from a family of high status and could be used to annul marriages of an heiress who ran off with a servant or the local butcher. When a specific dower was not mentioned in the marriage contract, it was assumed that the bride was entitled to mahr al-mithl (the dower of a similar woman), meaning a woman of similar social standing, and it was determined in practical terms by referring to the dowers received by her sisters, or if she had no married sisters, her cousins on her father's side of the family. Many of the financial obligations of the husband toward his wife were determined not by universal rules but by judging what could be expected by a woman of similar social standing. For example, if it was not ordinary for a woman of the wife's status to breast-feed her children, the husband was obliged to provide a wet nurse as part of his normal marital obligations for her upkeep. If this was so and she nevertheless breast-fed the baby, she was entitled to the salary that would have been paid to the wet nurse.

In most contexts in the premodern Muslim world, the shari'a fit into a system that was based on a more or less rigid separation of the government or military class from the bureaucracy, judiciary, and functionaries and the merchants, craftsmen, tradesman, and the populace in general. These groups were often divided along ethnic lines, and the law served the smooth operation of the system by promoting public order, keeping crime in check, and limiting the potential abuses of the ruler and the military class. The goal of this system was order rather than equality. The material benefits of the realm were not to be distributed evenly but according to merit and rank, recognizing appropriate distinctions between the various groups that made up society.

The family in the Islamic world is undergoing many of the transformations observed in other areas of the world, and this is having a tremendous effect on the economics and politics of the region. Modernization and its associated changes are producing a move away from the extended family to the nuclear family as the fundamental unit of society, and the single household that includes multiple married couples—a patriarch and his wife and all his sons and their wives—is becoming a rarity. The birth rate in many regions in the Islamic world, despite being quite high, is decreasing, and the age at which people marry is increasing for both men and women, largely because of the number of years spent in education and training. Social mobility has increased, also because of education, and the youth are not as constrained as in the past to follow the professions of their forefathers. It is interesting, though, that in a country like Egypt it is common to see pharmacists marry pharmacists, doctors marry doctors, engineers marry engineers, and so on, in part because while they are studying in their university faculties, they are not as subject to the social strictures that limit free interaction between young men and women in other contexts. While there have been a number of attempts to reform or modify specific areas of Islamic law with regard to marital rights, access to divorce, and child custody, a strong commitment remains throughout the Islamic world to the legal framework that governs family life, and the family—more than the individual—is still seen as the corporate entity that reproduces the economic, social, and political categories of society.

See also authority; honor; shari'a; women

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Speaking in God's Name: Islamic Law, Authority and Women, 2001; Abdullahi An-Naim, Islamic Family Law in a Changing World: A Global Resource Book, 2002; Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2010; Wael B. Hallaq, Shari'a: Theory, Practice, Transformations, 2009; Devin J. Stewart, Islamic Legal Orthodoxy: Twelver Shiite Responses to the Sunni Legal System, 1998; Knut S. Vikør, Between God and Sultan: A History of Islamic Law, 2005.

DEVIN J. STEWART

al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950)

Abu Nasr Muhammad al-Farabi was, along with Ibn Sina, the most important representative of Islamic Aristotelianism. Farabi played a crucial role in the transmission of Greek philosophical thought to the Muslim world. His synthetic philosophy became the point of departure for all major branches of Islamic philosophy, including political philosophy. At the heart of his political thought, which is a major component of his philosophical system, lies the doctrine of the excellent city ruled by a philosopher-king.

Named Avennasar or Alfarabius in the medieval West, Farabi became known among the Arabs as "the second teacher," the first being Aristotle. Born in Turkestan as the son of a Turkish officer in the caliph's palace guard, Farabi probably studied first under Yuhanna b. Haylan, a Christian teacher of philosophy in Marv (Khurasan) and in 908 followed him to Baghdad, where he lived as a private citizen rather than a man of the caliphal court. In Baghdad, Farabi was in close contact with Bishr Matta b. Yunus (d. 940), the Jacobite translator of Greek philosophical works, and Farabi became the teacher of the Jacobite Yahya b. ʿAdi (d. 972), the chief representative of Christian Aristotelianism in Baghdad. In 942, Farabi accepted the invitation of the Shiʿi Hamdanid ruler of Aleppo and spent the rest of his active life there at the court with other men of letters until his death.

Farabi argues that the goal of human existence is the attainment of happiness, which consists of conjunction (ittiṣāl) with the Active Intellect (al-ʿaql al-fāʿil, the active principle of understanding that is an emanation of God) and the separation from matter. But the overwhelming majority of human beings are not able to achieve this goal on their own and need a guide to lead them. The governance of the city (al-siyāsa al-madaniyya) is thus necessary due to the majority's need for guidance toward true happiness.

The city governed by the ruler-sage, who possesses the acquired intellect (al-ʿaql al-mustafād; which allows him to communicate with the Active Intellect) and whose inhabitants assist each other in the affairs through which happiness is obtained, is called "the excellent city" (al-madīna al-fāḍila). Such a city resembles a perfectly sound body whose parts (i.e., different social and professional groups, formed by the inhabitants of the city) assist one another in perfecting and protecting the life of the whole body. The city's ruler relates to other inhabitants as the heart relates to other body parts and the First Cause (God, considered as the sustainer of the world) to other existents. The inhabitants of the excellent city have different ranks depending on their closeness to the ruler. Those closest to the ruler possess qualities and habits that allow them to pursue his objectives in their actions, while those ranking below them pursue the objectives of those above them and, through their intermediacy, the objectives of the ruler. Every rank is governed by the rank above it and governs the rank below it. The innate nature (fiṭra) of the city's inhabitants makes each of them suitable for performing a particular task. However, the inhabitants become parts of the city not only through their innate nature but also through acquired, voluntary habits (al-malakāt al-irādiyya) such as crafts and arts.

The ruler must have achieved intellectual perfection; his imaginative faculty must also be perfect, enabling him to receive revelations from the Active Intellect about particulars and universals (e.g., about humanity as a universal notion and about Peter or Mary as particular human beings). Thanks to what the Active Intellect bestows on his passive intellect, such a ruler becomes a sage and philosopher; thanks to what the Active Intellect bestows on his imaginative faculty, he becomes a prophet and forewarner (mundhir). Such a man belongs to the highest rank of humanity and enjoys the highest degree of happiness. In order to be an efficient ruler, he must be able to express his knowledge in words, to guide people toward happiness, and to rigorously perform the tasks that constitute the routine of king's office.

A ruler who possesses all the aforementioned qualities is called "the true king" (al-malik fī al-ḥaqīqa). Should no one qualify to be a true king at a certain time, however, the city must be ruled by the traditional king (al-malik bi-l-sunna): a sage who follows and preserves laws issued by previous leaders and city founders. He typically does not issue new laws but can do so concerning an unprecedented case.

Although all inhabitants of the excellent city seek happiness and share common beliefs and principles, only a tiny minority—the sages—know these beliefs and principles through concepts and demonstrations. The majority—the believers (muʾminūn)—know them through their likenesses (muthul), which appear in the imagination as imitations (muḥākāt) of the intelligible forms of these beliefs and principles. The intelligible realities of happiness and principles, known through demonstration, are perfect and immutable, so there is a complete harmony among all the sages. However, the likenesses through which these realities are presented to the believers differ from each other, which leads to differences in opinions among the inhabitants of different excellent cities. According to their treatment of these differences, the believers can be divided into several groups. When those seeking guidance (mustarshidūn) discover an inconsistency in one of the likenesses, they replace that likeness with another that is closer to the truth and free from that contradiction. If the likenesses of the principles become obstacles to those who pursue ignorant goals (like obtaining rank or wealth), then they attempt to falsify those likenesses. When yet another group discovers certain inconsistencies in some likenesses due to the weakness of their understanding, they rashly dismiss those likenesses as false.

The variety of nonexcellent cities can be reduced to two types: the ignorant city (al-madīna al-jāhila) and the sinful city (al-madīna al-fāsiqa). The inhabitants of the ignorant city have incorrect conceptions of happiness and adhere to corrupt practices. The inhabitants of the sinful city share the sound beliefs of the inhabitants of the excellent city but perform the corrupt actions of the inhabitants of the ignorant city.

Inhabitants of the ignorant city live in permanent conflict and struggle; everyone's goal is to subdue or destroy the other. Whoever is most dominant over others is the happiest. All relationships among people rest on need and necessity. Natural justice is nothing but the right of the strongest, whereas the conventional rules of justice are observed due to mutual fear and weakness of the involved parties or due to external force.

Farabi's political teachings appealed to a number of Muslims—mainly Shiʿi rulers such as Sayf al-Dawla in Aleppo (r. 944–67) and the Fatimids (909–1171) in Egypt and Syria. However, his teachings were never effectively implemented. The key merit of his political writings lies in introducing Muslim intellectuals to Greek (in particular, Plato's) theories of government and providing a set of distinctive principles well suited for the evaluation and assessment of contemporary critical regimes.

See also city (philosophical); government; philosopher-king; utopia

Further Reading

Charles E. Butterworth, The Political Aspects of Islamic Philosophy, 1992; Hans Daiber, The Ruler as Philosopher: A New Interpretation of al-Fārābī's Views, 1986; Miriam Galston, Politics and Excellence: The Political Philosophy of Alfarabi, 1990; Muhsin S. Mahdi, Alfarabi and the Foundation of Islamic Political Philosophy: Essays on Interpretation, 2001; Ian Netton, Al-Fārābī and His School, 1992; Richard Walzer, ed. and trans., Al-Farabi on the Perfect State, 1985.

YANIS ESHOTS

Faraj, Muhammad ʿAbd al-Salam (1954–82)

Muhammad ʿAbd al-Salam Faraj (1954–82) was an ideologue belonging to the group that assassinated Egyptian president Anwar Sadat during a parade on October 6, 1981, in Cairo.

Faraj worked as a maintenance electrician at the Faculty of Arts of the University of Cairo in Giza. According to people who met him there, he was a "kind, soft-spoken and quiet" man. He was hanged for his role in the assassination of Sadat on April 15, 1982, together with the actual assassins.

Faraj is the author of a small book, The Neglected Duty, which does not mention Sadat by name but presents a justification for the assassination of any Muslim ruler who does not rule by the prescripts of Islamic law. Faraj quotes Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) and Qur'an 5:48: "Whosoever does not rule (yahkum) by what God has sent down—they are the unbelievers." He concludes that a Muslim ruler who does not rule by the shari'a becomes, by doing so, an apostate who has to be killed for his apostasy. This view had been similarly expressed in Sayyid Qutb's (d. 1966) Qur'an commentary In the Shade of the Qur'an and in the writings of the Pakistani activist and ideologue Mawdudi (d. 1979).

The neglected duty mentioned in the title of Faraj's book is the duty to wage jihad. This duty, according to Faraj, following traditional doctrine, is a collective duty that the state has to fulfill. When the state neglects to do so, however, it is no longer a collective duty but becomes an individual duty that is incumbent on every Muslim. In addition, not only individuals but also various types of Muslim nongovernmental organizations may see it as their duty to carry out the divine obligation to wage jihad if the government is in the hands of non-Muslims or Muslims perceived as apostates.

The group that assassinated Sadat had contacts with Shaykh ʿUmar ʿAbd al-Rahman, who worked at the time as a preacher in the Fayyum oasis. Early in 1981, these contacts were broken off for security or other reasons. When he was interrogated in the wake of the Sadat assassination, ʿAbd al-Rahman admitted believing that a Muslim who rules by laws other than the shari'a had to be killed. He expressed doubts, however, about whether Sadat had been properly notified of this doctrine. These doubts saved his life: the authorities released him, and this gave ʿAbd al-Rahman the opportunity to continue his career in Pakistan and the United States.

About 500 copies of The Neglected Duty were printed in great haste, probably in 1980. The original edition contains many misprints, a result of the typesetter's carelessness and fear of discovery by the political police. Once a number of copies of the book had been distributed, the group that distributed the pamphlet and actually assassinated Sadat realized that the police would be able to trace the copies back to them. They decided to burn the remaining copies.

Nevertheless, a few copies survived, and in the trial of Sadat's assassination in the fall of 1981, the prosecution added one of these to the file. On December 8, 1981, the Cairo daily Al-Ahram (The pyramids) published parts of an official refutation of the contents of the book. This refutation was written by the mufti of the Republic, Shaykh Jad al-Haqq ʿAli Jad al-Haqq (mufti of Egypt from 1978–82). The newspaper article contained quotations from The Neglected Duty. This brought the open publication of the full text within the realm of possibility, and the weekly newspaper Al-Ahrar (The free) took this risk on December 14, 1981.

Al-Ahrar's version of the book contains even more misprints than the original and is hence occasionally unintelligible. Yet it is the basis of most current editions and reprints and remains one of the few uncensored documents originating with the takfir (to brand someone as a kafir, or unbeliever) movement of the 1980s.

See also apostasy; Egypt; excommunication; fundamentalism; al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya

Further Reading

Muhammad ʿAbd al-Salam Faraj, Al-Farida al-Gha'iba, translated by Johannes J. G. Jansen as The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat's Assassins, 1986; Johannes J. G. Jansen, The Dual Nature of Islamic Fundamentalism, 1997.

JOHANNES J. G. JANSEN

Fatimids (909–1171)

An Isma'ili dynasty that ruled from North Africa and Egypt from 909 to 1171, the Fatimids represented the crowning success of the Isma'ili movement. The Isma'ilis had organized a far-flung revolutionary movement in the hope of replacing the Abbasid caliphs with their own imams, descendants of Ja'far al-Sadiq through his son Isma'il. The religiopolitical message of the movement, designated as al-da'wa al-hādiya or "the rightly guiding mission," was propagated by a network of dā'īs (missionaries) throughout the Muslim world and achieved particular success in North Africa. Here the dā'ī Abu ʿAbdallah al-Shi'i (d. 911) was active among the Kutama Berbers of the lesser Kabylia from 893. Between 903 and 909, he conquered Ifriqiya, in what is now known as eastern Algeria and Tunisia, from the Sunni Aghlabids who ruled it as vassals of the Abbasids. ʿAbdallah al-Mahdi (d. 934), who had succeeded to the central leadership of the Isma'ili movement in 899, left the secret headquarters of the da'wa movement in Salamiyya and entered Qayrawan (Kairouan) on January 4, 910, to become the first Fatimid caliph. The new dynasty was designated as such (Fāṭimiyya) because Mahdi and his successors traced their genealogy to the Prophet Muhammad's daughter Fatima and her spouse, ʿAli b. Abi Talib, the first Shi'i imam.

The early Fatimids did not control any region of the Maghrib beyond Ifriqiya proper for any extended period. Enemies of the Abbasids and the Umayyads of Spain, they also had numerous hostile encounters with the Byzantines in the Mediterranean, having inherited the island of Sicily as successors to the Aghlabids. Their main problem, however, was the rebellious activities of the Khariji Berbers of the Zanata tribal confederation, especially the prolonged revolt of Abu Yazid (943–47), who also capitalized on the hostility of the Sunnis toward their new Shi'i overlords.

Fatimid rule was firmly established in North Africa only under Mu'izz li-Din Allah (953–75). This caliph also made detailed plans for the conquest of Egypt, then ruled by the Ikhshidids on behalf of the Abbasids. Jawhar, a long-serving commander of the dynasty, led the Fatimid expedition to Egypt in 969, and with the arrival of Mu'izz in Cairo in 973, the North African phase of the Fatimid caliphate came to an end.

After the Fatimid conquest, Egypt became a major commercial and cultural center, but the Fatimids' attempts to advance further east through Syria were checked by a resurgence of Byzantine power, by the armies of the Qarmatians (dissident Isma'ilis) in Bahrain, and later by the Seljuq Turks. The Fatimids did, however, supplant the Abbasids as protectors of the holy cities of Mecca and Medina.

The Fatimids continued their mission (da'wa) in Egypt, especially from the time of Mu'izz, with particular success outside the Fatimid state, especially in Yemen, Iraq, Persia, and Central Asia. In Egypt, the population continued to adhere mainly to Sunni Islam, insofar as it was not Christian. The Fatimids paid great attention to the education of their *dā'*īs and ordinary Isma'ilis, founding a number of distinctive traditions as well as institutions of learning in Cairo. The movement underwent several splits, however. In the reign of Hakim bi-Amr Allah (996–1021), some *dā'*īs preached extremist ideas leading to the formation of the Druze community. On the death of Mustansir bi-llah in 1094, the Isma'ilis divided into the Musta'li and Nizari factions, named after two of Mustansir's sons who claimed his heritage. The Musta'li Isma'ilis of Egypt and elsewhere acknowledged the caliph Musta'li (1094–1101) and the later Fatimid caliphs as their imams, while the Nizari Isma'ilis of Persia and Syria recognized a different line of imams held to descend from Nizar b. al-Mustansir (d. 1095), the original heir-designate of Mustansir. By 1132, in the aftermath of Amir bi-Ahkam Allah's assassination and the irregular succession of his cousin Hafiz, the Musta'li Isma'ilis themselves split into Hafizi and Tayyibi branches. Only the Hafizis, concentrated mainly in Fatimid Egypt, recognized Hafiz and his successors in the Fatimid dynasty as their imams.

The political decline of the Fatimid caliphate began during the long reign of Mustansir, who was eventually obliged to turn to the Armenian general Badr al-Jamali for help. In 1074, Badr arrived in Cairo with his Armenian troops, eventually to acquire all the highest positions of the Fatimid state. Henceforth, military men appointed as viziers, rather than the Fatimid caliphs themselves, exercised effective power in the state. Salah al-Din (Saladin) ended Fatimid rule on September 10, 1171, when he had the sermon at the Friday public prayers (khutba) read in Cairo in the name of the Abbasid caliph. A few days later, 'Adid, the 14th and last of the Fatimid caliphs, died while the new Ayyubid masters of Egypt had begun their systematic persecution of the Isma'ilis there.

See also Egypt; imamate; Isma'ilis; North Africa; Saladin (1138–93); Seljuqs (1055–1194)

Further Reading

Michael Brett, The Rise of the Fatimids: The World of the Mediterranean and the Middle East in the Fourth Century of the Hijra, Tenth Century CE, 2001; Farhad Daftary, The Ismā'īlīs: Their History and Doctrines, 2007; Heinz Halm, The Empire of the Mahdi: The Rise of the Fatimids, translated by M. Bonner, 1996; al-Qadi Abu Hanifa al-Nu'man b. Muhammad, Founding the Fatimid State, translated by Hamid Haji, 2006; Paul E. Walker, Exploring an Islamic Empire: Fatimid History and Its Sources, 2002.

FARHAD DAFTARY

fatwa

A fatwa (fatwā, pl. fatāwā) is a nonbinding legal opinion issued by a qualified Islamic scholar in response to a question posed by an individual, judge, or government. The Arabic root f-t-y appears in two of several Qur'anic verses that instruct the Prophet Muhammad in answering the early Muslims' questions (Q. 4:127 and 4:176). Following his death in 632, many of Muhammad's Companions acted as the first muftis (jurists who issue fatwas), basing their legal opinions on their knowledge of the Qur'an and of Muhammad's exemplary practices and guidance. From the first Islamic century to the present, the issuing of fatwas (iftā') has been a central Islamic institution providing believers with legal and moral advice and contributing to the ongoing development of Islamic law.

Process, Form, and Function

The work of a mufti is distinct from that of a judge (qadi). Whereas a judge faces rival claimants, evaluates evidence, and reaches an enforceable decision, a mufti issues an advisory opinion on the basis of the information provided to him by a petitioner (mustafti). In addition to those areas of law governed by the courts, the mufti must be prepared to answer queries regarding ritual practices, ethics, and religious tenets. Muftis may dispense fatwas privately or in the service of a court or government. In Muslim Spain, judges were required to solicit fatwas from court muftis; judges have also sought muftis' assistance with difficult cases or support for controversial judgments. Unlike most court decisions, the fatwas of prominent muftis have been preserved in collections as valuable precedents and for training new jurists. Although the need for judges trained in Islamic law has declined since the institution of secular courts in most modern Muslim states, the practice of iftā' has continued to thrive. This is especially true for questions related to ritual practice and worship and to Muslim life in majority non-Muslim countries.

Private muftis derive their legitimacy from public and peer recognition of their scholarly expertise, upright character, and sound judgment. Muftis may be women, but in practice, they have primarily been men who have achieved the necessary competence to issue fatwas after a lengthy period of formal instruction in the religious and linguistic sciences. Initially, muftis were expected to be mujtahids, those jurists capable of independently deriving a legal rule from the Qur'an and the sunna (normative example) of Muhammad. By the tenth century, most muftis practiced taqlīd (emulation) rather than ijtihād (independent reasoning) by affiliating with the interpretive tradition of one school of law (madhhab) and relying on opinions established by that school's earlier authorities. Theoretical treatises on iftā' rank muftis according to their level of expertise and assign them a corresponding degree of interpretive license; mujtahids may respond to new and difficult issues, whereas lesser jurists may only apply existing school doctrines.

Most Sunni legal theorists allow the questioner (mustafti) to approach more than one mufti with the same question, which must address a real rather than hypothetical situation. Adherents of the dominant Twelver branch of Shi'i Islam have in modern times been expected to designate one high-ranking mujtahid as their marja' al-taqlīd, or "source of emulation" in religious affairs. Unlike the fatwas of other jurists, those of a marja' are binding for his followers.

Fatwas may be written or oral and range from a simple "yes" or "no" to a lengthy treatise. A shorter, "minor" fatwa might communicate a well-established legal rule to a nonspecialist, while a "major" fatwa might detail the mufti's reasoning in deriving a new rule for an unprecedented case. Major fatwas are generally directed to educated audiences and are more likely to be preserved.

Political Fatwas

A political fatwa is one that either is issued by an official mufti or is political in content. Although less numerous than private and judicial fatwas, political fatwas have served as powerful instruments of religious legitimation, political criticism, doctrinal disputation, and popular mobilization.

Muftis operated independently prior to their gradual incorporation into government administration, first as advisors to the early caliphs and later as high-ranking officials, such as the Ottoman shaykh al-Islam, the Persian and Mughal Sadr, and the grand mufti of several modern states. Although state muftis have often been expected to legitimate governmental policies, they have also wielded considerable influence of their own. Ottoman sultans regularly sought the chief mufti's sanction for administrative and military initiatives, including justifications for jihad against Muslim states in Mamluk Egypt and Safavid Iran. Conversely, several Ottoman and Moroccan sultans were deposed by fatwas. Contemporary state muftis and fatwa-issuing institutions respond to government and private requests, ruling on such issues as regional conflicts, interest banking, and medical ethics. In the process, they help define a national Islamic identity.

Muftis have also used fatwas to dispute doctrinal points or identify individuals and groups for inclusion or exclusion from the Muslim community. Takfīr, or declaring Muslims to be unbelievers, has often been accomplished through fatwas, as have accusations of apostasy and blasphemy. In 1989, Iran's supreme leader Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89) issued a statement calling for the execution of author Salman Rushdie for insulting Islam in his novel The Satanic Verses. Although not strictly a fatwa, this death sentence was quickly treated as such, gaining heightened prominence because of Khomeini's status as the head of state and a marja' al-taqlīd. The prevalent use of takfīr by militant Islamist groups to justify jihad against nominally Muslim rulers led to a unique form of counter-fatwa, the Amman Message, in 2005. Signed in Jordan by nearly 200 high-level jurists, the statement recognizes eight legitimate schools of Islamic law and prohibits declarations of apostasy within these schools. In reaction to the issuance of fatwas by militants lacking the requisite professional qualifications, the Message also restricts iftā' to properly trained jurists.

Osama bin Laden's coauthored 1998 fatwa calling on all Muslims to wage jihad against Americans is a prominent example of this trend, as Bin Laden is widely considered unqualified for either iftā' or declarations of war. Yet the fatwa garnered support, thus additionally exemplifying the use of fatwas for popular political mobilization. Colonial resistance movements in British India and French Algeria also included fatwas calling on Muslims to emigrate from foreign-occupied territory. In each case, rival interests secured fatwas urging accommodation rather than emigration.

The spread of new media technologies has placed more fatwas in the realm of public discourse. By the close of the 20th century, fatwas had become readily accessible through journals, radio and television programs, and Internet sites. Controversial fatwas are often circulated and debated by both specialists and lay Muslims worldwide.

See also ijtihād and taqlīd; judge; judicial courts; jurisprudence; shari'a; shaykh al-Islam; source of emulation; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Wael B. Hallaq, A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunnī uṣūl al-fiqh, 1997; Muhammad Khalid Masud, Brinkley Messick, and David S. Powers, eds., Islamic Legal Interpretation: Muftis and Their Fatwas, 1996; Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen, Defining Islam for the Egyptian State: Muftis and Fatwas of the Dār al-Iftā, 1997; Knut S. Vikør, Between God and the Sultan: A History of Islamic Law, 2005.

JOCELYN HENDRICKSON

freedom

The concept of freedom (hurriyya) was well-known to Islamic thought in all periods as the opposite of slavery. Although in premodern times there was no school of thought calling for the abolition of slavery, it was universally recognized that being a slave was an undesirable condition and being free a desirable one; at the same time, to manumit a slave was an act of virtue. This valuation colors some of the secondary uses of the contrast between freedom and slavery discussed in the following paragraphs.

As in other societies familiar with the institution of slavery, there was a tendency to use the relationship between master and slave as a metaphor for unequal relationships. Thus a saying ascribed to a daughter of the first caliph, Asmā' bt. Abi Bakr (d. 692), as well as to 'Umar b. al-Khattab, 'A'isha bt. Abi Bakr, and the Prophet, equates marriage with slavery; likewise, humans are thought of as slaves—or servants—of God in the sense that they are owned by Him. A well-attested strain in Sufi thought contrasts enslavement to the things of this world with the freedom that results from emancipating oneself from them.

In the political domain, premodern Islamic texts occasionally invoke the relationship between master and slave as a metaphor for oppression. Thus the Spanish Muslim Ibn Hafsun (d. 918), the leader of a rebellion against Umayyad rule supported mainly by Muslims of native Spanish descent, told his followers that the Arabs had enslaved them and that his wish was to deliver them from their slavery ('ubūdiyya). An earlier example is a speech attributed to Abu Hamza al-Mukhtar b. 'Awf, a Khariji rebel against the Umayyads in the later 740s. He says that Mu'awiya, followed by the Marwanid rulers, "made the servants of God slaves," and he ascribes to the Umayyads in general the sentiment that "the people are our slaves." A story set on the eve of the Battle of Qadisiyya, around 636, takes us closer to the time of the Prophet: two of the envoys sent by the Muslim commander to negotiate with the Persian general Rustam tell him that the Muslims have come to Iraq to deliver those who so wish from being slaves of men to being servants of God. This wording echoes a letter said to have been sent by the Prophet to the people of Najran.

Two points need to be made about such attestations. The first is that they employ only one side of the metaphor: while the notion of political slavery as an undesirable condition is explicit, any notion of political freedom as its contrary remains implicit. The second is that this notion of political slavery is not taken up in the Islamic tradition of systematic political thought. Thus antidespotic and antipatrimonial values often expressed in terms of political freedom in the European tradition are articulated in other ways in the premodern Islamic tradition.

Since the late 18th century, the European idea of political freedom has spread widely in the Islamic world. One of the earliest responses to the idea was that of the Egyptian chronicler Jabarti (d. 1824–25) in his Ta'rikh Muddat al-Faransis bi-Misr (The history of the French presence in Egypt), in a critical commentary on the proclamation issued by Napoleon on his invasion of Egypt in 1798. The way in which Jabarti explains the term suggests that he misunderstood it (whereas the egalitarianism of the French seems to have been immediately intelligible to him). Later authors had no trouble understanding the concept and saw it as central to European success; thus the Tunisian statesman Khayr al-Din Pasha (d. 1890) distinguished "personal freedom" from "political freedom" and described freedom as "the basis of the great development of knowledge and civilization in the European kingdoms." The idea of political freedom has thus become part of the standard vocabulary of political discussion in the Islamic world. In rendering the concept into Arabic, the metaphor at the root of the European concept was preserved: the word employed (hurriyya) is the same word that in premodern times denoted freedom as opposed to slavery (this contrasts with Chinese, where the term used to translate "freedom" originally meant "doing as one pleases," with much less favorable connotations).

Despite the fact that it lacks an explicit precedent in the Islamic tradition, the idea of political freedom has also found favor among Islamists. Thus Mawdudi (d. 1979) emphasized the complete freedom people enjoyed in expressing their opinions under the early caliphs. More generally, he saw the message of the Qur'an as having set people free of "the bonds of slavery" and given them "a real charter of liberty and freedom." Likewise Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), who was entranced by the message delivered by the Muslim envoys to Rustam, frequently used a language of liberation (tahrīr) in his presentation of one of his favorite themes: the elimination of the domination of men over men. This is not, of course, to say that Islamists have espoused the idea of political freedom in the spirit of European liberals; while taking a positive view of freedom as such, they often criticize the excessive freedom they see as prevalent in the West.

See also democracy; individualism; slavery

Further Reading

Michael Cook, "Is Political Freedom an Islamic Value?" in Freedom and the Construction of Europe, edited by Quentin Skinner and Martin van Gelderen, forthcoming; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Bernard Lewis, The Political Language of Islam, 1988; Franz Rosenthal, The Muslim Concept of Freedom Prior to the Nineteenth Century, 1960.

MICHAEL COOK

free will

Islamic theologians addressed the problem of the freedom of human will as early as the eighth century, primarily in connection with destiny (qadar) and God's attributes, among the metaphysical questions delineated by Islam's six articles of faith: belief in God, the angels, the scriptures, the prophets, Judgment Day, and destiny. Overall, Muslim theologians may be grouped into three main categories with regard to this topic: those who denied free will and advocated determinism, those who advocated the free will of the human agent, and those who upheld an intermediate view, combining the stances of the first two groups.

The first category of theologians came to be known as the jabriyya or determinists, meaning those who believe that the action of the human agent is preordained. Among the theological schools that advocated this position is that of Jahm b. Safwan (d. 745). According to the theologian and heresiographer Shahrastani (d. 1153), Jahm argued that "the human being is incapable of anything, and capacity cannot be attributed to him in any respect; all human actions are pre-determined (majbūra). The human being has no capacity, will or choice. God creates his actions as much as he does in all inanimate objects. Actions are then attributed to the human being metaphorically, just as they are to inanimate objects. We thus say that the tree bore fruit, the water flowed, the stone moved, the sun rose and set." Also considered among the jabriyya are the followers of Husayn b. Muhammad al-Najjar (d. 844). Shahrastani relates that Najjar said, "The Creator—Exalted be He—is the ultimate agent Who wills good and evil. . . . He creates the actions of His servants, the good and the evil, the beautiful and the ugly. The servants of God only acquire these actions." Among other key theologians who denied free will and argued that human actions are created by God are Dirar b. ʿAmr (d. early ninth century) and Ibn Ishaq al-Rawandi (d. 859).

The second category, those who argued for absolute human freedom, is best represented by the Muʿtazili school of theology. In his Maqalat al-Islamiyyin (The tenets of faith of the followers of Islam), Abu al-Hasan al-Ashʿari (d. 935) reports that according to Abu al-Hudhayl al-ʿAllaf (d. 850), one of the founding figures of the Muʿtazili tradition, capacity is necessary for any action to take place. This means that the capability to undertake actions precedes the actions themselves, which allows for free will. Similarly, Ibrahim al-Nazzam (d. ca. 846) argued that all human actions or motions (harakāt) are caused by the human agent directly and that the will necessitates or brings about its object. Abu Hashim al-Jubbaʿi (d. 933) extended the Muʿtazili theory of free will to the problem of reward and punishment in the afterlife, arguing that they depend both on the actions one performs as well as on the actions one omits. Jubbaʿi argues that since one has the freedom to perform or refrain from the obligations God imposes, one accordingly merits reward for acting and deserves punishment for not acting. A more comprehensive outline of the Muʿtazili theory of free will may be traced in Qadi ʿAbd al-Jabbar's (d. 1025) magnum opus, al-Mughni fi Abwab al-Tawhid wa-l-ʿAdl (The chapters on God's oneness and justice), where he argues that all Muʿtazilis agreed that human acts are not created and that "whoever says that God . . . is their creator and cause has committed a grave error." He adds that the "will and the object willed are both acts by the servants of God . . . and whatever results from that will is due to the human act, whether such result is found in the agent of the act or in another object." In addition, the human being is capable not only of physical actions but also of "acts of the heart like thinking, willing and believing," or what might be called mental operations. Both will and the capability of fulfilling that will are human acts. Like other Muʿtazilis, Qadi ʿAbd al-Jabbar leaves room for involuntary acts that affect human will and capacity and may either hamper them or cause them to perform undesired acts. He argues that these should be neither praised nor blamed from either a moral or a religious perspective.

In the third category, those who held an intermediate position between arguing for free will and completely denying it are the Ashʿaris, members of a theological school founded by Ashʿari. Ashʿari argued that acts are created by God and then "acquired" by human agents. In his famous work *al-Luma*ʿ (Flashes of insight), Ashʿari argues, "If we find that infidelity is evil and corrupt compared to that which it opposes (i.e., faith), and if we find that faith is exhausting and involves pain. . . . But the infidel intends that his infidelity appear truly beautiful, even though the reality is at odds with his intention. . . . If this is the case, this means that infidelity has been caused to appear ugly by an agent that intends it to be so. This causing agent cannot be the infidel himself, who would want infidelity to be truly beautiful and true." Ashʿari believes that if the human being is the free cause of his own acts, his acts would always lead to a desirable result. Hence there must be another cause underlying human actions, and this cause is God. Shahrastani explains Ashʿari's concept of acquisition (kasb) as follows: God creates an act based on the temporary will and choice of the servant of God. Thus God is the actual cause of the act, while the human agent only acquires the act or attributes it to himself because he wills it temporarily. However, this explanation does not resolve the problem of making God the ultimate cause of both evil and good deeds. Later Ashʿaris such as Juwayni (d. 1085) tried to overcome this problem; he argued that there is an immediate connection between an act and the capacity of the human agent undertaking it. That capacity, however, is ultimately caused by another cause, and that other cause by another cause, in a chain that goes back to the ultimate cause of all causes, or God. This leaves a marginal yet nominal level of freedom for the human agent; for while it acknowledges that the human agent has true capacity to perform the act, it argues that the ultimate cause is still God.

Apart from theology, the problem of free will was addressed in both Islamic philosophy and mysticism. The Peripatetic orientation of Muslim philosophers makes the possibility of human free will as difficult to ascertain as it is in the Aristotelian system, because of the complex implications of Aristotle's Physics, De Interpretatione, and Metaphysics. Ibn Sina's (d. 1037) claim in the Metaphysics of The Book of Healing that every possible existent is possible in itself and necessary with respect to its ultimate cause, the necessary existent, leads him to a deterministic reading, as Catarina Belo has recently argued. Still, his position in the treatise on destiny, Risala fi Sirr al-Qadar (Epistle on the secret of destiny), along with his later critique of Aristotle's naturalistic metaphysics, creates room for human freedom and choice. The same holds for Ibn Rushd (d. 1198). The teleological structure of his Physics and Metaphysics and his restricted characterization of will in Manahij al-Adilla fi ʿAqaʾid al-Milla (The methods of proof on the articles of faith) lead him to a deterministic reading. Nonetheless, in his Commentary on Plato's Republic, the emphasis he places on the role of individual imagination opens up the possibility of human freedom and choice, especially on the political level. Sufi thinkers such as Junayd (d. 910) and Qushayri (d. 1074) generally assert that trust in God's will and power (tawakkul) and contentment with God's will and decree (riḍā) are an essential part of living as a true servant of God and hence conditions for attaining communion with Him. This view is bolstered by an emphasis on the need to renounce one's conscious desire to determine one's life (tadbīr). While Sufis have tended to take a deterministic position, it differs from the theological determinism discussed earlier. The latter is based on the ontological denial of free will, while the former is based on a subjective willingness to accept and harmonize oneself with God's decree. If this is taken into consideration along with the fundamental Sufi doctrine of the annihilation of the human will in the divine will, particularly as it was characterized by philosophical mystics such as Junayd and Ibn al-ʿArabī (d. 1240), a new theory of the subjective origins of freedom in Islamic thought might be constructed.

See also Ashʿaris; Muʿtazilis; theology

Further Reading

Abu al-Hasan al-Ashʿarī, Maqalat al-Islamiyyin wa-Ikhtilaf al-Musallin, 1980; Caterina Belo, Chance and Determinism in Avicenna and Averroes, 2007; G. Gimaret, Theories de l'acte humain en theologie musulmane, 1980; J. van Ess, The Flowering of Muslim Theology, 2006; W. M. Watt, The Formative Period of Islamic Thought, 1973; Harry Wolfson, The Theology of the Kalām, 1979.

AHMED ABDEL MEGUID

Friday prayer

The Friday gathering at which Muslims listen to a sermon (khuṭba) and perform a set of ritual prostrations (rakaʿāt) is known as ṣalāt al-jumʿa or jumuʿa (congregational prayer) within the Muslim legal tradition. The ṣalāt al-jumʿa is taken to be the reference of the Qur'anic verse, "When the call is proclaimed on the day of assembly (yawm al-jumʿa), make haste to the remembrance of God, and abandon your selling" (62:9). There is some evidence to suggest that the congregational Friday prayer ritual was derived from and in part in a mimicry of the Jewish and Christian Sabbath traditions. The manuals of jurisprudence list various elements of and conditions for the validity of Friday prayer, some of which have obvious political implications, both theoretical and practical. Furthermore, in historical terms, the establishment of Friday prayer under the auspices of, and in the name of, an individual ruler was an outward symbol of the ruler's hegemony and, along with the minting of coinage in the ruler's name, the most important of such symbols.

The political importance of Friday prayer is underscored by reports relating to the Prophet Muhammad's institution of Friday prayer, indicating that it formed an element in the formation of the first Muslim community in Medina following the hijra in 622. Through the establishment of this political community, the Muslims were able to expand their empire throughout the Arabian Peninsula and beyond. A regularly cited hadith report found in the collection of Sulayman al-Tabarani (d. 970) underlines the role of Friday prayer in political community formation: "Whoever abandons al-jumʿa when having either a just or an unjust Imam, will have no [valid] prayer, fasting, alms or pilgrimage." Failure to perform Friday prayer in a Muslim state context puts at risk the validity of all of one's other religious duties and ultimately excludes the individual from community membership.

The development of law concerning the legitimate and illegitimate performance of Friday prayer became a cipher for political theory among some jurists. That the leader of the Friday prayers, the imām al-jumʿa, should be appointed by the ruler, termed variously sultan, imam, or wālī in the legal literature, is a widely accepted position. The view is based on the notion that one should not lead prayers in another's home without the owner's permission. It was particularly promoted within the Hanafi school, which was founded by the great eighth-century jurist Abu Hanifa (d. 767) and later dominated the Muslim world through its official standing in both the Mughal and Ottoman empires. Similarly, there was a prevalent view that there can only be a single Friday prayer in any city. In this way, this weekly occasion became an opportunity for creating and enforcing political cohesion, and there is plenty of evidence to suggest that caliphs and sultans used it for precisely this purpose.

Before the Friday prayer prostrations, there was a period reserved for a sermon, or rather two sermons, with a short break between them. The historical sources describe how it had become accepted practice for the preacher (khaṭīb) to mention the name of and utter a blessing for the current ruler as an element of the khuṭba. This element is not universally replicated in the works of Islamic law. When jurists do mention the blessing for the sultan, they do not make it obligatory for the valid performance of the prayer. This failure, or perhaps refusal, to stipulate, in an explicit manner, that the blessing for the sultan must be part of the Friday prayer should not be seen as an act of open rebellion by the jurists. Rather, it reflects the general juristic tendency, particularly in ritual law such as prayer, of the individual and the necessary conditions for his or her effective performance of a duty demanded by God. In any case, as some hadiths of the Prophet's Companions indicate, the blessing for the sultan was an innovation, introduced into the practice after the life of Muhammad: if the prayer for the preservation of the ruler was an essential element of the khuṭba, the Prophet would have had to pray for himself in the third person—a strange practice for which no evidence exists.

In the Imami Shiʿi tradition, the legal status of the Friday prayer was the subject of great controversy. The common understanding among the jurists, both Sunni and Shiʿi, was that a legitimate ruler had to give his permission before a valid Friday prayer could be held in a city, but Imami jurisprudence upheld a theoretical commitment to the idea that all governments other than that led by the rightful imam were illegitimate. The Twelfth Imam of the Imami Shiʿis had been incognito since 870 and hence was unavailable to provide the essential validating decree. For some Imami jurists, this meant that Friday prayer had lapsed during the period of the imam's concealment (ghayba), and holding Friday prayer was, therefore, forbidden until he revealed himself. The debate around the legitimacy of Friday prayer in later Imami jurisprudence became intricate and politically charged, particularly when the presence of a "just jurist" (faqīh ʿādil) was introduced by some jurists as a legitimating element. During the Safavid period, some jurists argued that Friday prayer could become "optionally" obligatory (wājib takhyīrī, i.e., one can perform it or one can perform the usual noon prayers instead, but one must perform one of the two) through the activating presence of the just jurist, who could substitute for the imam. The Safavid state officially supported this view, appointing an imām-i jumʿa to each city as the Friday prayer leader. The move was controversial and provoked a series of rebuttals and counter-rebuttals in a debate that continued into the 21st century.

The importance of the Friday prayer event as a political tool within Muslim societies is obvious. Through the khuṭba, the objectives of the government's religious policy can be made known, as they have been in modern-day Saudi Arabia. The khuṭba can also function as a conduit for revolutionary propaganda as it did in the months leading up to the Islamic Revolution in 1979, when Ayatollah Khomeini's Friday sermons from Najaf in Iraq, and then later from Paris, were smuggled into Iran on cassette tapes. The holding of a communal congregational prayer has, unavoidably, proven to be of great political possibilities, both in terms of its formal requirements and in its potential as a vehicle for social mobilization.

See also Pillars of Islam

Further Reading

Norman Calder, "Friday Prayer and the Juristic Theory of Government: Sarakhsī, Shīrāzī, Māwardī," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies, 49, no. 1 (1986); Andrew J. Newman, "Fayd al-Kashani and the Rejection of the Clergy/State Alliance: Friday Prayer as Politics in the Safavid Period," in The Most Learned of the Shiʿa, The Institution of the Marjaʿ Taqlid, edited by Linda Walbridge, 2001; Haggay Ram, Myth and Mobilization in Revolutionary Iran: The Use of the Friday Congregational Sermon, 1994.

ROBERT GLEAVE

friendship

Friendship is an informal, voluntarily entered, and noncontingent social relationship. It is distinguished from kinship and servitude in that it is acquired by choice, not ascribed or inherited. According to the Qur'an, friendship—overwhelmingly but not exclusively rendered by words deriving from the root w-l-y—is to be sought with God, prophets, and other believers, in that order. Those who reject God—for example, Satan and his supporters, and unbelievers who actively oppose the believers—are not to be befriended. God is, because of the succor He provides, the best and most trustworthy friend. Cognizant of this, when Abraham experiences adversity, he rejects Gabriel's assistance in the expectation of God's help, which is in fact provided; this earns Abraham the title khalīl Allāh, "the bosom-friend" of God. As might be expected, only the elect attain this level of friendship. The very pious and the saintly do, however, benefit from a special relationship with God and are consequently called awliyāʾ Allāh, or "friends of God." The close relationships—ranging from discipleship to veneration—developed with such saintly figures, notably Sufi shaykhs, have been criticized by many reformist groups (e.g., the Salafi movement).

Friendship with the Prophet Muhammad is described by the term ṣuḥba, or companionship; thus both intimate friends of Muhammad, such as Abu Bakr, and those who had limited contact with him, are called ṣaḥāba, or "Companions," perhaps because this relationship implies discipleship. Later, in the scholarly context, a disciple, or an advanced student, would, along the same lines, come to be known as a ṣāḥib (literally, companion).

Companionship was the dominant form of friendship enjoined in manuals of guidance and counsel for rulers, so-called Mirrors for Princes, and was actively pursued by Muslim leaders. From Umayyad times, caliphs and rulers sought courtiers and boon companions (nadīm), some becoming favorites or lifelong friends. One courtier, Abu Hayyan al-Tawhidi (d. 1023), after decades of mixed fortunes at court, wrote a treatise on the subject, titled Kitab al-Sadaqa wa-l-Sadiq (On friendship and friends). The Kitab Fadl al-Kilab ʿala Kathir min man Labisa al-Thiyab (The superiority of dogs over many who wear clothes) of Ibn al-Marzuban (tenth century) also treats friendship, but, as the title suggests, using humor and satire.

By virtue of the inevitable asymmetry, friendship with God, the Prophet, saintly figures, caliphs, and other high officials, even teachers, resembles patronage; indeed, the term frequently used to describe God, Muhammad, a religious leader, or a ruler, is mawlā (Lord, master, protector). Additionally, mawlā is the term used to describe non-Arabs who were affiliated to Arabs. This clientage (walāya) was an important feature of early Islam, socially and politically.

Walāya is also the term used to describe political alliance; its antithesis, barāʾa, means dissociation or disavowal. These are both variously discussed in historical, religiopolitical and juridical Sunni texts, even latter-day tracts produced by the likes of Mulla 'Umar, the spiritual leader of the Taliban and, from 1996 to 2001, de facto head of state in Afghanistan. For Shi'is, these concepts appear as two of their fundamental principles of belief, tawallā and tabarruʾ (also tabarrī and Persian tabarrā). These doctrines developed in connection with early theological discussions about dissociation (barāʾa) from the first two caliphs, Abu Bakr and 'Umar b. al-Khattab, regarded as usurpers of 'Ali b. Abi Talib's rightful succession to Muhammad, and about the consequently implied allegiance (walāya) to ʿAlī. Paradoxically, it appears to have been the Khārijīs who first developed theories of dissociation in connection with their unhappiness with this same ʿAlī. Dissociation (barāʾa) formed the basis for the elaboration of theories of excommunication, either of the historical individuals to be denigrated or of contemporaries to be shunned.

Muslims are bound together as friends by the ultimate communal norm—namely, the adherence to Islam. This makes the Muslims an umma, or a community, one that transcends tribal or kinship relations, though Muhammad also frequently described Muslims as brothers (ikhwa), suggesting that kinship, even metaphorically, remains the most potent and valorized social relation. Clientage, by obligating shared sympathies and antipathies, in many respects resembled (and was meant to resemble) kinship, and even Muhammad cemented his ties to his closest Companions through marriage (and the ensuing kinship).

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; Pillars of Islam

Further Reading

Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought, 2001; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2005; Ibn al-Marzuban, The Book of Superiority of Dogs over Many of Those Who Wear Clothes, translated and edited by G. R. Smith and M.A.S. Abdel Haleem, 1978; Tawhīdī, De l'amitié, translated by Eveyne Larguèche and Françoise Neyrod, 2006.

SHAWKAT M. TOORAWA

fundamentalism

Fundamentalism refers to contemporary religiopolitical movements that aim to establish the primacy of scriptural authority as a defense against the moral, political, and social decay that supposedly defines the modern world. It is also often used in everyday language to designate inflexible and dogmatic beliefs of any kind, religious or otherwise. Such common connotations tend to obscure the specific cultural and historical circumstances that produced both the term and the movement it originally described. The term "fundamentalism" was coined in 1920 by Protestant Evangelicals eager to rescue American Christianity and culture from what they characterized as the degeneration inaugurated by "modernism in theology," "rationalism in philosophy," and "materialism in life." Committed to "do battle royal for the Fundamentals," such warriors for God launched an offensive against liberalism, Darwinism, and secularism in particular, declaring the Bible the authoritative moral compass for American life, infallible not only in regard to theological issues but also in regard to matters of historical, geographical, and scientific fact.

The broadened understanding of fundamentalism presumes that there is sufficient commonality and overlap among Christian, Muslim, Jewish, Hindu, Buddhist, and other kinds of religious revivalism to warrant a single rubric despite significant cultural, historical, and linguistic differences. There are some good reasons for this assumption. In general, these are historically contemporaneous, distinctively religious movements that assert the authority of transcendent truths and timeless traditions in response to a perceived crisis precipitated by rapid cultural, social, and economic transformations. As urbanization, industrialization, and the crises they are said to engender are distinctive to the contemporary epoch, fundamentalism has, as Bruce Lawrence writes in Defenders of God, "historical antecedents, but no ideological precursors." Fundamentalists may well see themselves as custodians of continuity, yet it is precisely this self-description that distinguishes them from believers for whom tradition was simply lived rather than justified. Tradition becomes a conscious commitment in need of systematic justification when longtime rituals, beliefs, and practices can no longer be taken for granted. Paradoxically, then, defenders of tradition are actually reconstructing it in response to challenge and change.

Fundamentalism and Modernity

This means that efforts to restore the primacy of supposedly timeless truths and traditions inadvertently reveal how thoroughly intertwined contemporary religiopolitical movements are with the conditions, ideas, and processes fundamentalists oppose. This is evident in fundamentalist depictions of modernity as a condition of decay or disease evinced by pervasive corruption, disorder, relativism, and immorality. Fundamentalists contend that such ills are the wages of human hubris, by-products of the misguided assumption that the ever-enlarging scope of human mastery evinced by rapid scientific and technological advances demonstrates the irrelevance of metaphysical sources of knowledge about the world. Such an assumption transfigures sins into natural urges, recasts selfishness as the wellspring of collective life, and reduces the divine plan for the universe and all things in it to a system of physical causality just waiting to be mastered by human ingenuity. Stripped of the moral compass only faith in God provides and bereft of the religious scaffolding that endows life with meaning and purpose, humans are portrayed as lurching toward an abyss we no longer have the ability to recognize, let alone navigate. At this critical juncture, we are told, only the righteous attuned to God's will are capable of charting the path to redemption. Like the prophesies of Cassandra, however, their warnings and guidance are largely destined to fall upon deaf ears.

To the degree that this perspective characterizes a wide range of contemporary religiopolitical movements, fundamentalists can be said to share an ambivalence toward modernity and the rationalist epistemology, or human-centered theory of knowledge, that in part constitutes it. Scholars have interpreted this ambivalence in quite different ways, however. Some portray fundamentalism as the last gasp of atavistic impulses and archaic commitments, the residue of premodern beliefs and practices rendered obsolete by scientific advances, technological innovations, and the globalization of capital. Others argue that fundamentalists' restorative aspirations are less exhortations to re-create the past than rhetorical techniques designed to indict the present. In this view, fundamentalists are antimodern rather than premodern, committed to fighting modern pluralism, secularism, relativism, and rationalism in the name of divinely ordained truth and the sociomoral order it authorizes.

Still other scholars contend that fundamentalism is simultaneously a reaction to and an expression of modernity, its existence and purpose predicated on the socioeconomic processes, philosophical arguments, and political arrangements fundamentalists vociferously oppose and with which they are deeply engaged. This argument in particular has much to recommend it. These religious revivalists are not, for example, Luddites who object to technology on principle. On the contrary, fundamentalists from Jerry Falwell to Osama bin Laden have proven themselves quite fluent in the visual rhetoric made possible by modern techniques of communication and propaganda, deftly deploying various media to lambaste many of the epistemological premises and methods that made such technology possible in the first place.

In addition, comparisons among contemporary religiopolitical movements reveal some striking patterns in education and social class that belie characterizations of fundamentalists as predominantly rural, impoverished, uneducated, or too backward to heed the call of reason and the authority of science. Many Christian fundamentalists are middle-class, college-educated urban children of rural parents. Similarly, Muslim fundamentalists are frequently the progeny of rural migrants to the city, beneficiaries of an expanded higher education system initiated by modernizing elites, and recipients of advanced training in the natural and applied sciences. Unlike the largely impoverished and uneducated Afghan Taliban, for example, a significant contingent of al-Qaeda is comprised of middle-class, somewhat cosmopolitan young men with university educations in engineering, architecture, medicine, agricultural science, technical military science, or pharmacy. One case in point is Muhammad 'Ata, the alleged ringleader of the 9/11 attack on the United States, who was a student at the Technical University of Hamburg-Harburg and had a degree in architectural engineering. Khalid Shaikh Muhammad, said to be crucial to planning both the 9/11 attacks and the murder of the journalist Daniel Pearl, is an engineer, and Ayman al-Zawahiri, Bin Laden's second-in-command, is a doctor.

Conceptualizing fundamentalists as simultaneously children of modernity and among its fiercest critics suggests that they are, among other things, interlocutors in a debate not only about the state of the modern world but also about what modernity itself means. This conclusion does little, however, to differentiate fundamentalism from a succession of movements, thinkers, and arguments, religious and otherwise, that have criticized the processes and presuppositions associated with modernity from its inception. Moreover, given scholarly disagreements about when, precisely, the modern period begins, if or when it ended, and what it consists of, predicating definitions of fundamentalism on modernity may seem a bit like building on quicksand. Finally, inasmuch as fundamentalists themselves seek to challenge prevailing assumptions about what it does or should mean to live in the contemporary world, such arguments beg questions both about what modernity is and whether fundamentalism is usefully understood in terms of it.

These questions are posed sharply by shifting the theoretical perspective from the Euro-American "center" to the "periphery" inhabited by what are often called postcolonial peoples. Many scholars suggest that, at the other end of the colonial project, modernity registers less as an objective index of historical and intellectual maturation than a deracinated account of the ways Europe has ordered its past in relation to its present. Indeed, the content and contours of modernity are rooted in a persistent—albeit contested—narrative in which the rise of capitalism, the consolidation of the nation-state, the discoveries of the scientific revolution, and the development of Enlightenment philosophy are depicted as both cause and consequence of Europe's emergence from the Middle Ages in which "a Great Chain of Being" issuing from God was thought to hold sway.

This vision of civilizational maturation is double edged. On the one hand, it implicitly positions the West as (in Marx's words) the beacon that "shows to the less developed the image of its own future" by deriving modernity tout court from the universalization of historically and culturally specific experiences, assumptions, and standards. On the other hand, it explicitly offers to all peoples the promise of mastery, of control not only over recalcitrant facts and things but also over human suffering through the application of increasingly effective scientific and technical solutions. As the European colonial enterprise gathered scope and speed, this double-edged vision of modernity would spread to other shores by way of territorial incursions, cultural domination, and noblesse oblige. For many colonized peoples, then, modernity and the mastery it promised came to be understood as a prerogative of conquest rather than an index of freedom.

Fundamentalism, Islamism, and the Politics of Terminology

Does the terminology of fundamentalism, like the category of modernity with which it is so closely intertwined, obscure rather than illuminate critical differences among the specific political contexts, cultural idioms, and historical experiences informing contemporary religiopolitical movements? Many scholars of colonial and postcolonial societies explicitly reject fundamentalism on precisely these grounds. In this view, fundamentalism says too little by encompassing too much. For how can a single term derived from a specific moment in American Christianity say anything of substance about the assassins of Egyptian president Anwar Sadat, Hindus who attacked the mosque at Ayodhya, Christian militants who bomb abortion clinics, and Israeli settlers who justify violence in the occupied territories as sanctioned by God?

Many contend that if fundamentalism is empty at best, at worst it deepens longstanding prejudices and generates new distortions by remaking what is unfamiliar in familiar terms. This problem is particularly acute in the case of the contemporary Islamic religiopolitical movement, not least because Islam itself has so often been obscured by a haze of ignorance, prejudice, and polemic, both in the past and in the present. As a result, the term "Islamic fundamentalism" is nearly as controversial as the phenomenon it purports to describe.

At first glance, many objections to it appear to hinge on its origins: fundamentalism was born in a time and place equally distant from the seventh-century Arabia of the Prophet Muhammad and the maelstrom of contemporary Muslim politics. Yet terms originating in one place and language frequently become part of a transcultural political lexicon used widely, if not always consistently, to capture recognizably common phenomena. Both nationalism and socialism are often cited as two cases in point. Another such example is "the West," a category of relatively recent provenance through which Euro-American history and geography have been retroactively organized. Scholars from diverse disciplines routinely argue that what is called the West is an amalgamation of multiple traditions—including Greek, Roman, Judaic, and Christian—and owes myriad debts to diverse civilizations past and present. They further argue that while it has always been difficult to pinpoint exactly where the West begins and ends, this is particularly true now that peoples, information, and material goods crisscross cultural and national borders at will, creating hybrid and multiple identities that shift and reconstitute themselves in unpredictable ways. Such scholarly arguments notwithstanding, "the West" continues to be invoked by people throughout the globe, evoking powerful allegiances and enmities.

What is ultimately at stake in most objections to Islamic fundamentalism, however, is power rather than etymology or geography. As philosophers, linguists, and translators have demonstrated, language not only reflects but produces our understandings of the world. Disputes about terminology often raise critical questions about who is using what words to describe whom and for what purposes. In a postcolonial world characterized by rapid globalization, any discussion of Islam operates within a web of social relations in which power—both actual and perceived—has already been apportioned unequally among various peoples, classes, regions, genders, and cultures. Given this context, many argue that the universalization of terms and categories derived from specifically European and American experiences reflects and reinforces the cultural hegemony of West over non-West, center over periphery. Scholarship organized around such categories and background assumptions may thus reveal less about Muslim practices and cultures than about the ability of those who already have power to produce, disseminate, and control a series of descriptions and images about themselves and the rest of the world.

Given this politics of terminology, it is instructive that there was no equivalent for fundamentalism in Arabic, the language of the Qur'an, until the need to approximate the English term called for one. Uṣūliyya, derived from the word for fundamentals or roots (uṣūl), has emerged as an Arabic name for Islamic fundamentalism, but its currency is due to the way it approximates the English fundamentalism rather than any correspondence with aspects of the Islamic tradition. (On the contrary, uṣūlī is associated with scholarship on the roots and genesis of Islamic jurisprudence, and experts in this discipline are often referred to as al-uṣūliyyūn.) In a 1995 interview, the spiritual leader of Hizbullah in Lebanon, Shaykh Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, rejected the terminology of fundamentalism as more revealing of Western projections than Muslim revivalism:

> We Islamists are not fundamentalists in the way the Westerners see us. We refuse to be called fundamentalists. We are Islamic activists. As for the etymological sense of uṣūliyya, meaning returning to one's roots and origins [uṣūl], our roots are the Qur'an and the true sunna or way of the Prophet, not the historical period in which the Prophet lived or the periods that followed—we are not fundamentalists [uṣūliyyūn] in the sense of wanting to live like people at the time of the Prophet or the first Caliphs or the time of the Umayyads.

Some scholars regard the debate about appropriate terminology as concluded, yet alternatives to the term "Islamic fundamentalism" in use range from "radical Islam" to "Islamic extremism" and "Islamic terrorism" to "political Islam." Indeed, new names for the phenomenon continually arise. A case in point is "jihadism," a neologism derived from the Arabic "jihad" (to struggle or strive) that is frequently used in the press to denote the most violent strands of Islamism, and those associated with what are alternatively called "suicide bombings" or "martyrdom operations" in particular. Older terms put to new uses occasionally gain wide currency as well. Such is the case with "Salafism," which refers to contemporary Muslims who generally eschew the interpretive methods and norms of the classical Islamic schools and take as a guide for proper behavior only the word of God, the teachings of the Prophet Muhammad, and the example set by the salaf, the earliest and most pious of Muslims. Perhaps the most widely used term among scholars of Muslim societies is "Islamism," although it is not universally accepted and is frequently invoked with caution and caveats. As some observers argue, for example, Islamism wrongly implies that those who claim the name have captured the essence of Islam; thus it is no more appropriate than calling the former Branch Davidian leader David Koresh a Christianist.

Scholars' apparent preference for the term "Islamism" has not, however, yielded agreement about how to best define or identify it, let alone understand or explain it. Some emphasize the socioeconomic characteristics of the Islamist movement; others identify certain patterns in recruitment, organization, and mobilization; still others foreground the theological and philosophical tendencies of Islamist thought; and some home in on the regional and sectarian dynamics of various Islamist groups. Such disunity is, in part, a function of the disciplinary and methodological differences among historians, anthropologists, political scientists, and scholars of religion, all of whom regard Islamism as within their academic jurisdiction. The best scholarship on Islamism is substantively interdisciplinary and methodologically plural, attending closely to the complex interplay among Islamist ideas and objectives, the specific public spheres in which they operate, and the material conditions that inform and are in turn transformed by them. Yet ultimately, even the most careful scholarship suggests that the kaleidoscopic literature on the subject is less a reflection of academic balkanization than the irreducible diversity of contexts and concerns animating a powerful yet rapidly changing Islamist movement.

Islamism: Origins and General Characteristics

In contrast to the confusion swirling around matters of terminology and definition, the advent of Islamism is almost universally traced to 1928, the year Hasan al-Banna (1906–49) founded the Egyptian Society of Muslim Brothers (al-Ikhwan al-Muslimun). By all reports, Banna was gifted with great personal charisma, rhetorical skill, and organizational acumen; by the time of his assassination in 1949, he had already built a formidable organization with deep roots in Egyptian society and a broad base of membership, ranging from civil servants to soldiers, urban laborers to rural peasants, and village elders to university students. As Banna was more activist than theologian, however, the task of developing an Islamist theoretical framework would largely fall to thinkers who came to prominence in the decades after his death. The most important among them include Sayyid Qutb from Egypt (1906–66), Abul al-A'la Mawdudi from Pakistan (1903–79), and Ruhollah Khomeini from Iran (1902–89). Under the tutelage of these and other Islamist thinkers and activists, the organization Banna founded would inspire a movement that now stretches throughout the Middle East, North Africa, South Asia, and beyond, continuously adapting and transforming itself to divergent political exigencies and changing historical circumstances.

While the Muslim Brotherhood continues to be a formidable presence in places like Egypt and Jordan, its profile and political purchase in contemporary Muslim-majority societies have frequently been eclipsed by what are often dubbed "radical" Islamist groups. Such groups include Egypt's al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya, the Pakistan-based Lashkar-e-Taiba (Army of the Pure), the Islamic Salvation Front in Algeria, and al-Qaeda, the fluid Islamist network linked to violent operations from the Philippines to Kashmir, including the assault on the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in 1998, the attack on the World Trade Center and Pentagon in 2001, and the bombings of a Bali nightclub in 2002 and Madrid commuter trains in 2004. Whereas Banna had largely sought to coax action out of quiescence without acceding to the demands of those he described as "overzealous and hasty," these organizations tend to eschew the gradualist path of grassroots sociomoral transformation in favor of immediate, direct, and often violent challenges to the legitimacy of Muslim governments and the power of "infidel" regimes.

This distinction must not be overdrawn, however. Despite significant differences in emphasis and strategy, there is also a fair amount of continuity and overlap between the Muslim Brotherhood and such "radical" groups. Hamas, for example, was founded in 1987 to serve as the "strong arm" of the Muslim Brotherhood by several members convinced that the organization's strategy of "Islamization without confrontation" had been outpaced by events in the Israeli-occupied territories. Conversely, many radical groups share the commitment to charitable endeavors that had been central to Banna's strategy of recruitment and sociomoral transformation. Islamists from Morocco to Pakistan are well known for building schools, mosques, and health clinics, as well as for raising funds to support impoverished Muslims who have been abandoned by ineffective or corrupt state bureaucracies.

Islamism is thus a 20th- and 21st-century phenomenon, its history deeply intertwined with the local, regional, and geopolitical dynamics of the contemporary world. As the present always builds on the past, however, Islamism must also be located within a long and complex tradition of religious reform, revivalism, and even insurrectionism in the history of Muslim-majority societies. The activism and intransigence of many contemporary Islamists, for example, has been likened to the Kharijis, a seventh-century group of Muslims known for an uncompromising emphasis on righteous deeds and the unadulterated authority of the Qur'an. While Islamists often object to such a comparison, they do depict themselves as disciples of Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328), the 14th-century jurist who argued that Mongol rulers who mixed Islamic prescriptions with tribal law (the Yasa) had contravened shari'a and could therefore be forcibly removed from power.

Finally, Islamist ideas and preoccupations must be understood as a continuation of 19th-century Muslim political thought rather than a radical break from the concerns and dilemmas that characterized it. For example, Banna's insistence on Islam as a comprehensive way of life and a set of religiopolitical imperatives distorted by corruption, sectarianism, and indifference is, in many ways, an extension of the work of such Muslim reformists as Jamal al-Din al-Afghani (1839–97), Rifa'a Rafi' al-Tahtawi (1801–73), and Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905). Like Banna, these thinkers had sought, in different ways, to revive and reinterpret the foundations of Islam as a bulwark against the rise of European power and the internal weakening of the Ottoman Empire.

The preceding discussion only hints at the scope and depth of persistent disagreements about how to best name, define, and delimit this complex and diverse movement. Given such disagreement, it is particularly useful to approach Islamism as an interpretive framework rather than a set of propositions and strategies to which every Islamist subscribes in the same way or to the same degree. Understood as an interpretive framework, Islamism does not simply reflect or obscure a set of material conditions and socioeconomic grievances but instead constitutes a lens on the world that determines how and in what terms such conditions and constraints are understood. Such an approach enables observers to attend to the differences and diversity of what travels under the rubric of "Islamism" without losing sight of it as a complex system of representation that articulates and defines a range of identities, categories, and norms; organizes human experience into narratives that assemble past, present, and future into a compelling interpretive frame; and specifies the range and meaning of acceptable and desirable practices. In short, this approach makes it possible to define Islamism without essentializing or instrumentalizing it.

Islamism refers to those 20th- and 21st-century Muslim groups and thinkers that seek to recuperate the scriptural foundations of the Islamic community, excavating and reinterpreting them for application to the contemporary social and political world. Such foundations consist of the Qur'an and the normative example of the Prophet Muhammad (sunna, hadith), which constitute the sources of God's guidance, in matters pertaining to both worship and human relations. In general, Islamists aim at restoring the primacy of the norms derived from these foundational texts in collective life, regarding them not only as an expression of God's will but also as an antidote to the moral bankruptcy inaugurated by Western cultural dominance from abroad, aided and abetted by corrupt Muslim rulers from within the umma (the Islamic community).

Against this backdrop, Islamists conceptualize their work in terms of diagnosis and cure. Muslims must first recognize that the modern world is diseased, its inhabitants corrupted by a condition that Qutb, borrowing from the South Asian Islamist scholar Abul Hasan Nadwi (d. 1999), calls jāhiliyya. Jāhiliyya derives from the Arabic verb meaning "to be ignorant" and, in Muslim tradition, refers specifically to the epoch in Arabia before Islam had been revealed to the Prophet Muhammad. As used by contemporary Islamists, however, jāhiliyya signals a pathology into which a society descends when it willfully turns away from the truths Allah has already made manifest. The new jāhiliyya is thus distinguished from the old by sheer human arrogance. More specifically, it is defined by an unwarranted confidence in human beings' ability to know, govern, and master the world without divine guidance along with the presumption that human beings have the right and wisdom to legislate rules for collective behavior. Within an Islamist framework, this presumption is not only a symptom of human hubris but a transgression against Allah's sovereignty (ḥākimiyya), the scope of which encompasses both public and private domains of human affairs as well as both visible and unseen dimensions of the universe. For many Islamists, such transgression is at the root of all human sovereignty in the modern epoch—nationalist, democratic, communist, and monarchical alike. It is equally evident in a long history of Euro-American aggression against Islam in which the Christian Crusades, European colonialism, Israeli treatment of Palestinians, ethnic cleansing in Bosnia, German anti-Turkish violence, the American invasion of Iraq, and Dutch cartoons of Muhammad are but a few examples.

While the roots of the new jāhiliyya are usually traced to the West, Islamists also contend that it is no longer an exclusively foreign pathology. In their view, Muslim rulers who claim for themselves the legislative authority that belongs only to Allah represent a metastasizing cancer within the umma, inaugurating an internal crisis of unprecedented scope and scale. Given such a diagnosis, the cure is clear and its implementation urgent: divine sovereignty must be restored over all domains of collective life, an imperative that entails establishing the primacy of Islamic law through the agency of the state. This in turn requires righteous action, for while shari'a is an expression of divine wisdom and will, it is only realized on Earth by human struggle in the path of God (jihād fī sabīl Allāh). Actualization of ḥākimiyya thus requires a vanguard of Muslims who have penetrated the miasma of jāhiliyya and its false gods of materialism, science, and rationalism. These are the true believers who are capable of not only recognizing the scope of Islam as a way of life but also cultivating the discipline, faith, and courage to reshape the world in its image.

As the following discussion makes clear, there is a great deal of disagreement among Islamists about what, precisely, the establishment of Islamic law entails and what practices are appropriate or justifiable in pursuit of it. Yet even this preliminary sketch makes visible several common features that are, again, better understood as broad tendencies rather than fixed attributes—that is, characteristics of an Islamist framework that not every Islamist endorses in the same way all the time. In contrast to those Muslims who primarily seek to cultivate a mystical understanding of the divine through study or ascetic contemplation, for example, Islamist aspirations may be characterized as explicitly and intentionally political. Using German sociologist Max Weber's terminology from The Sociology of Religion, Islamism is not defined by an "other-worldly" orientation in which salvation requires withdrawal from worldly affairs. It is, rather, a movement in which salvation is possible only through participation in the world, or more precisely "within the institutions of the world, but in opposition to them." As Islamist exhortations to change collective life require words and deeds, they may be further defined not only as political but also as activist, thus distinguishing them from the quietism characteristic of some Saudi Salafis, whose acquiescence to established power is no less political than Islamist intransigence.

Islamism and the Politics of Authenticity

Islamist aspirations to restore foundations located in a mythical past are far from unique. Nor are Islamists alone in their conviction that scriptural authority is guaranteed by its divine author—for in that all Muslims agree. Rather, what distinguishes Islamists from many other Muslims is the claim to recuperate an "authentic Islam" comprised of self-evident truths purged of alien and corrupting influences, along with an insistence on remaking the foundations of the state in accordance with such purified prescriptions. Islamists depict such fidelity to the unadulterated word of God as the ultimate expression of deference to divine omniscience. Indeed, humility is not only a proper expression of faith but also a constitutive feature of the human condition, in contradistinction to the nature of Allah. From this vantage point, aspirations to fully know and master the natural and social worlds reflect a human hubris deaf to the Qur'anic admonition that "Allah knows, but/and you do not know" (Q. 3:66).

The Islamist emphasis on the limits of human knowledge, however, requires humility only in relation to Allah. What it rarely yields is humility in regard to their own claims to speak in His name or forbearance toward Muslims who disagree with Islamist claims about what the divine Will requires. This suggests that while Islamist challenges to state power are obviously political, the Islamist claim to authenticity is also political in the coercive power it routinely enacts and justifies, most notably by way of the silences it imposes and the debates it forecloses. As Aziz al-Azmeh points out in Islams and Modernities, "The notion of authenticity is not so much a determinate concept as it is a node of associations and interpellations, a trope by means of which the historical world is reduced to a particular order, and a token which marks off social and political groups and forges and reconstitutes historical identities." Whether in the service of Arab nationalism, Christian fundamentalism, European romanticism, or 19th-century Muslim modernism, the claim of authenticity is an act of power that functions not just to reflect the world but to construct it by determining who is included and excluded, who may and may not speak authoritatively, what is the proper realm of debate, and what is beyond contestation.

It is certainly the case that a single "Islam" captures and organizes the perspectives of millions who self-identify as Muslim (among other things), yet what travels under the name "Islam" is inescapably diverse, multiethnic, and defined as much by disagreement as by consensus. Just as the Torah and Bible sometimes lend themselves to radically divergent interpretations of what it means to be Jewish or Christian, the Qur'an and hadith are complex and susceptible to many different, and at times contradictory, enactments. This means that Islam is not a fixed essence but rather, as Talal Asad points out in "The Idea of an Anthropology of Islam," a discursive tradition that captures what is imagined as continuous and unitary in dialectical relationship to those concrete articulations and practices by which it is transformed and adapted in different contexts for plural purposes. It is precisely this understanding of religion that is anathema to Islamists who seek to fix the parameters of Islamic authenticity once and for all. Doing so enables them to arrogate for themselves the right to determine who qualifies as a good Muslim; discredit those 'ulama' (Muslim scholars) unable or unwilling to purge Islam of purported impieties; declare nominally Muslim rulers apostates unfit to govern; and characterize all who disagree as corrupt, heretical, guilty of unbelief, or victims of false consciousness.

In Sunni Islamism, such arguments frequently entail the claim that ordinary, untrained Muslims have the right and obligation to engage the sacred texts directly, without the mediation of those religious scholars who have traditionally served as gatekeepers of the Islamic tradition. Given this claim, it is unsurprising that many prominent Sunni Islamists—from Banna to Zaynab al-Ghazali and from Qutb to Bin Laden—are autodidacts rather than formally trained or credentialed 'ulama'. As the sacred texts contain the rules and regulations meant to govern both public and private affairs, this insistence on unmediated access to the texts can be understood as the grounds on which such self-taught Islamists claim for themselves the stature of religious experts who have penetrated the moral bankruptcy of jāhiliyya to clearly see what others cannot. Indeed, despite Islamists' tendency to characterize the "real Islam" as self-evident, many actually assume that only a small vanguard of believers will have the ability to recognize it and act decisively to remake the world in its image. In this way, Islamists position themselves as purveyors of God's will who, like Plato's philosopher-king in The Republic, are no longer enthralled by dark shadows cast on cave walls but capable of beholding the truth in direct light.

On the one hand, then, Islamists are committed to establishing a religiopolitical order that simultaneously presumes the supremacy of the few capable of true knowledge and promises a world in which dissent itself will become both unnecessary and illegitimate. On the other hand, this emphasis on the potential wisdom of untrained believers entails a kind of democratization of access to the authority conferred by knowledge of the sacred texts. This claim that religious knowledge depends on commitment rather than training or expertise can be seen as part of a broader challenge to elite power evident in Islamist arguments that Muslims have the right and obligation to determine when rulers are illegitimate and that those who prefer order to justice, security to freedom, and money to piety have forfeited any claim to authority.

This particular aspect of Islamism evokes the Protestant Reformation and, as Ellis Goldberg argues in his article "Smashing Idols and the State: The Protestant Ethic and Egyptian Sunni Radicalism," echoes Calvinists' attempts to transfer "religious authority away from officially sanctioned individuals who interpret texts to ordinary citizens." Such a comparison has sparked a great deal of speculation regarding a possible "Islamic Reformation," along with a range of arguments about whether and how Islamism might facilitate the democratization of Muslim societies, much as the Protestant Reformation is said to have heralded the emergence of European "liberal democracy." While such parallels are evocative, they are frequently overdrawn. A fuller understanding of Islamism requires first situating it in relation to a historical shift in the nature and locus of religious authority in Islam beginning in the 19th century. As scholars such as Muhammad Qasim Zaman have shown, mass higher education and a variety of new technologies enabling broad dissemination of information and knowledge have made available to amateurs what had previously been the purview of religious experts. At the same time, such processes have inaugurated a fragmentation of authority within the very ranks of the 'ulama' that continues to the present day. In this context, the ascendance and influence of autodidacts such as Qutb, Banna, 'Abd al-Salam Faraj, and Bin Laden simultaneously express and accelerate an ongoing renegotiation of authority over who may speak for Islam and on what basis.

This discussion requires an additional qualification, as the prevalence of autodidacts among prominent Sunni Islamists contrasts sharply with recent developments in Shi'i Islamism, particularly as articulated by one of its best known figures, Ruhollah Khomeini. A jurist and learned mujtahid (legist), Khomeini is most widely known as a spiritual leader of the revolutionary movement that overthrew the Shah of Iran in 1979, as well as expositor of the "guardianship of the jurist" (in Arabic, wilāyat al-faqīh; in Persian, velāyat-i faqīh), the doctrine that would become the foundation of rule in the Islamic Republic of Iran. Like many Sunni Islamists, Khomeini understands the legitimacy of sovereignty in terms of Allah's exclusive right of legislation and defines justice as the rule of revealed law. Yet Khomeini also argues that, as law requires both institutions and executors, the best guarantor of legitimate sovereignty is rule by those jurists (fuqahā'; sing. faqīh) most knowledgeable in matters of shari'a. As Islamic law encompasses both matters of worship and human relations, Khomeini reasons, so must the authority of those with the expertise required to implement Islamic law extend to political as well as religious domains.

Here Khomeini augments the already formidable authority of the Shi'i fuqahā', who had previously been designated custodians of Shi'i religious belief and practice in the absence of the Hidden Imam (the legitimate leader of the Muslim community believed to have disappeared into occultation in the late ninth century). Such justifications for institutionalizing clerical authority and broadening its scope bear little resemblance to the arguments of Sunni Islamists such as Qutb, Banna, and Faraj, whose writings often exhibit a palpable frustration with religious scholars who they contend have a greater stake in stability than justice. At the same time, several prominent Sunni Islamists are also religious scholars, from Yusuf al-Qaradawi (b. 1926), the founder of the influential website Islam Online, to 'Umar 'Abd al-Rahman (b. 1938), the Egyptian cleric linked to the assassins of Sadat, now serving a life sentence in an American federal penitentiary for "seditious conspiracy" in connection with the 1993 World Trade Center bombing. Both Qaradawi and Abd al-Rahman are credentialed scholars in Islamic law from Azhar, Egypt's preeminent university and mosque. These and other trained Islamist scholars exemplify the political coming of age of what Malika Zeghal has called peripheral 'ulama': products of Azhar whose sympathies and affiliations with Islamists undermine conventional wisdom about a sharp divide between establishment Sunni 'ulama' and untrained, anticlerical Islamist upstarts.

Islamism and the Politics of Gender

Gender is frequently considered tangential to the knotty problems of defining Islamism and charting its central dynamics. Yet scholars from a variety of disciplines have shown that gender is consistently the terrain over which battles for political control and cultural identity are fought. In times of internal crises and external threats, women's bodies and behavior are frequently transformed into symbols of moral purity or vessels of cultural corruption. This is especially true of contemporary fundamentalists who, as Martin Riesebrodt argues in Pious Passion, tend to "idealize patriarchal structures of authority and morality," endorse gender dualism as God-given or natural, and vigorously condemn recent changes in gender relations as a symptom and symbol of secularist moral bankruptcy. Islamists are a case in point. Their concerns with the place and purity of Muslim women reveal the unwritten gender norms—in other words, standards of masculinity and femininity that organize human beings into political, social, and reproductive roles and reflect and reinforce prevalent assumptions about the "nature" of men and women—arguably at the heart of Islamist politics and political thought.

Despite important differences among Islamist thinkers, many explicitly or implicitly endorse gender norms in which female nature is inextricably tied to the domestic realm, and women are symbolically transformed into an index of moral and cultural virtue. This view is built on the premise that men and women are equal in belief but perform fundamentally different and complementary functions in society. While men are naturally made to rule in both the public and private domain, a woman's primary role is to be a wife and mother as well as to ensure the integrity of the family, the first school of moral education. As such functions are rooted in an inescapable human nature expressive of divine will, a woman's inability or unwillingness to perform her duties signals a disobedience to God and presages the corruption of the Muslim family from within. From this vantage, the Western insistence on full equality between the sexes only liberates women from moral constraint, enslaving them to mutually reinforcing sexual and capitalist exploitation. As women are responsible for producing the next generation of Muslim men destined to restore Islam to its former glory, it is not only the virtue of women or the integrity of the family that hangs in the balance but also the future of Islamic civilization itself.

Several Islamist thinkers make these arguments explicitly and in detail, but in much of Islamist thought and rhetoric, the nature and significance of women are established indirectly and symbolically and through three recurrent images in particular. The first of the three images is of women as silent symbols of cultural, moral, and sexual vulnerability—voiceless figures in need of masculine protection or defiled bodies that mutely demand vengeance. So, for example, 'Abdallah 'Azzam, one of Bin Laden's mentors, graphically details the agonizing humiliation of young men unable to act when the Afghan woman is "crying out for help, her children are being slaughtered, her women are being raped, the innocent are killed and their corpses scattered." In the second image, women function as a chorus that speaks in permitted cadences to ratify masculine endeavors. Such is the case, for example, in Bin Laden's 1996 "Declaration of War against the American Occupying the Land of the Two Holy Places," where the women exhort men to jihad in the following way:

> Prepare yourself like a struggler, the matter is bigger than words! Are you going to leave us . . . for the wolves of Kufr [unbelief] eating our wings?! . . . Where are the freemen defending free women by arms?! Death is better than life in humiliation! Some scandals and shames will never be otherwise eradicated.

In the third image, women are creatures not of this world but of another: they are virginal rewards for the courageous martyr in the afterlife. This is evident in the final instructions for the 9/11 hijackers, for example, in which Muslim "brothers" are urged to purify their carnal impulses, sharpen their knives for the slaughter (dhabḥ), and heed the call of the ḥūr 'ayn (the black-eyed ones) awaiting them in paradise.

Such rhetoric primarily registers women as an extension, mirror, or measure of masculinity and, in tandem with explicit Islamist arguments about the proper nature and purpose of men and women, embeds gender within a divinely ordained social hierarchy. So understood, deviance from this gendered script tends to signal disruption of a much broader religiopolitical order it both presumes and seeks to bring into existence. When precipitated by foreign aggression, such disruption exacerbates a predisposition to translate conflict into an assault on Muslim masculinity and to conceptualize women as potential conduits for Western corruption in need of guiding, guarding, and covering. Such a gendered script has posed a significant challenge to Muslim women who have sought a place and voice within the Islamist movement. Despite significant differences among them, such women have had to navigate carefully between Islamist characterizations of women's visibility and agency as symptomatic of jāhiliyya on the one hand and essentializing arguments that equate Islam with veiling, female genital mutilation, and honor killings on the other.

Zaynab al-Ghazali (1917–2005) and Nadia Yassine (b. 1958), two of the few women who have risen to positions of leadership in the Islamist movement, have negotiated such constraints and pressures quite differently. Ghazali founded Jama'at al-Sayyidat al-Muslimat (the Muslim Women's Association, or the MWA), an organization devoted to educating women in the Islamic tradition and training them in the practice of da'wa (call to greater piety), in the 1930s. She even stepped in to help reconstitute the Muslim Brotherhood in the 1950s, after the Egyptian state formally dissolved the organization and executed or incarcerated virtually all of its ideological leadership in response to a member's alleged attempt to assassinate President Gamal Abdel Nasser. Ghazali was in many ways a pioneer whose own life demonstrated a fierce resistance to conventional norms of domesticity, even as much of her early work articulated an Islamist gender ideology that defines women as wives, mothers, and "builders of men." Yassine, by contrast, has come to prominence as the daughter of the founder of Morocco's Justice and Spirituality Association (JSA) and its unofficial spokeswoman. Unlike Ghazali, Yassine has positioned herself as a dedicated wife and mother who embraces an "Islamic feminism" that urges women to engage the sacred texts directly through ijtihād (independent reasoning, judgment, or interpretation). If women and men do, in fact, have distinct perspectives on the world, Yassine suggests, women have a special obligation to recuperate what they see as the gender parity of the Qur'an buried beneath those "macho interpretations" of Islam on which men have built their privilege and power.

Importantly, Yassine and Ghazali are only among the most visible examples of a larger trend: the increasing participation of women from diverse social backgrounds in da'wa (practices and arguments meant to exhort, invite, and guide Muslims to what is regarded as proper conduct and moral devotion). Women's participation in da'wa is not a brand new phenomenon, as is evident in Ghazali's work with the MWA. Yet scholars have shown that the number of dā'iyyāt (those engaged in da'wa) is significantly increasing in places such as Egypt, Pakistan, Saudi Arabia, and the United States. This reflects, in part, current doctrinal emphases on da'wa as incumbent on both men and women and less dependent on technical knowledge than moral virtue and practical familiarity with Islamic tradition. This increase is also tied to a number of political and socioeconomic transformations in Muslim-majority societies. Crucial among them is the expansion of mass education that has simultaneously increased women's literacy and social mobility and made Islamic texts more accessible. Also crucial are the proliferation of technologies—from the tape cassette to the Internet—that facilitate the circulation of religious knowledge even among those who cannot read or travel, the precedent set by the vigorous participation of Iranian women in postrevolution debates about Islam, and the model of legal activism evident in the Islamist movement's own challenge to the status of the 'ulama' as gatekeepers of religious knowledge.

If Ghazali and Yassine exemplify the feminization of da'wa among elites, the mosque movement in Egypt illustrates the growing participation of women from diverse social backgrounds in religious classes devoted to studying and debating what Islam requires for a woman to be virtuous in the contemporary world. As Saba Mahmood shows in The Politics of Piety, participants in the mosque movement conceptualize piety in terms of a deep and holistic commitment to self-transformation. Consequently, they are concerned less with matters of sovereignty and politics conventionally understood and more with the "moral cultivation" of those daily practices seen as crucial to becoming closer to God. Some Islamists have criticized this focus on practices of worship as apolitical and overly privatized, yet such criticism misses the force of Islamists' own insistence on religion (dīn) as a way of life in which the domains of public and private are inextricably linked. As Mahmood argues, these women's intense efforts at "retraining ethical sensibilities" have a "sociopolitical force" that extends well beyond matters of governance, facilitating no less than the emergence of a "new social and moral order." Evidence of its transformative power may be found not only in the sheer numbers and variety of women—wealthy and poor, literate and illiterate—participating in the mosque movement but also in the rhetorical and political efforts by the state and some Islamists to curtail, control, or discredit it.

Taken together, these examples show how Muslim women from different perspectives and social classes are increasingly insisting on engaging the sacred texts directly for and with one another without the mediating authority of men, who have traditionally held the monopoly on such activities. Despite the proliferation of voices intent on claiming for themselves the authority to demarcate what is authentically Islamic and un-Islamic once and for all, contestation over Islam's scope and meaning proceeds apace, facilitated at least in part by women formerly excluded from the conversation. This is true despite the fact that Islamist women's agency and claims to authority are frequently still predicated on a willingness to follow fairly patriarchal rules about where, how, and with whom they may practice their vocation.

Islamism, Political Action, and Violence

If gender is frequently an implicit preoccupation among Islamists, jihad is arguably Islamists' most consistently explicit concern. Jihad is derived from the Arabic verb that means "to struggle" or "to strive," yet it is a particular kind of struggle of concern to many of the most prominent Islamists: the often violent struggle against apostates and infidels both at home and abroad to which every individual Muslim must contribute. Many (though not all) Islamists represent this understanding of struggle as jihad tout court, yet it is a historically specific interpretation derived from a selective use of texts and precedents, foremost among them the claim by Ibn Taymiyya that Muslim rulers who had violated Islamic law could be subject to forcible removal. It is, moreover, an interpretation that breaks with much of antecedent doctrine and practice. The claim that fighting unbelievers is the preeminent enactment of individual Muslim piety, for example, is a departure from the distinction Muslim exegetes had developed between a "collective obligation" (fard kifāya, a duty a group of people within the community may perform on behalf of the rest) operative in jihad against foreign enemies and an individual duty (fard 'ayn) that must be fulfilled by every Muslim in the event that the umma is under attack. This interpretation also explicitly rejects Muslim modernists who emphasized the largely defensive character of jihad and sought to show that relations between Muslims and non-Muslims were normally peaceful rather than antagonistic.

Within Islamist terms, jihad is a means and an end rolled into one: it is a form of action necessary to eradicate obstacles to restoring a just community on Earth that simultaneously brings human action into accord with God's plans and purposes. While the Qur'an states (2:256) that "there is no compulsion in religion," for many Islamists, it is only in a state in which Islamic law reigns supreme that human beings are free from enslavement to one another's rule and all are equal by virtue of their common submission to God. From this perspective, the realization of justice, liberty, equality, and choice itself necessitates the forcible removal of the constraints imposed by jāhiliyya, along with those who aid and abet it. This entails action on two distinct yet interrelated fronts: domestic and global. Within the umma, jihad is in the service of challenging the legitimacy of Muslim rulers who claim for themselves the sovereignty that belongs only to Allah. By rereading Qur'an 5:44 (conventionally rendered as "He who does not judge by what God has revealed is an unbeliever") as "Those who do not govern by what God has revealed are unbelievers," Islamists contend that rulers who have abandoned the prescriptions of Islamic law have forfeited any claims to obedience and are lawful targets of jihad. In this way, revolt becomes an act of restoration rather than destruction. Much as the 17th-century English philosopher John Locke sought to legitimize revolution by characterizing a government that violates the purposes for which it was created as unlawful, Islamists depict the ruler who violates shari'a as the outlaw rather than those who justifiably rise up to depose him.

At the same time, jihad is regarded as a necessary response to the pervasive power—both actual and perceived—of those outside the umma who have demonstrated hostility to Muslim lives, lands, pieties, and sensibilities. This view of jihad reframes it as a matter of self-defense, in language that subsumes individuals into archetypes of "infidels" and "believers" and vitiates more conventional distinctions between, for example, soldier and civilian or collective and individual responsibility. Indeed, for many Islamists, the scope and depth of this physical as well as symbolic assault ultimately renders fine distinctions between offensive and defensive jihad irrelevant. As Qutb famously argued in Ma'alim fi al-Tariq (Signposts along the Road), jihad must be regarded as a "permanent condition, not an occasional concern," one that in current circumstances requires deeds rather than words, struggle rather than contemplation, and revolution at home as well as resistance abroad. Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam Faraj, author of the pamphlet justifying the assassination of President Sadat, argues along similar lines that the nature of the attack makes political authorization by a legitimate caliph (deputy, referring to a legitimate successor to the Prophet's leadership) unnecessary. As Faraj writes, leadership "over the Muslims is (always) in their own hands if only they make this manifest. . . . If there is something lacking in the leadership, well, there is nothing that cannot be acquired."

These arguments about jihad may be said to constitute a common grammar and framework of analysis, yet, as in so many other matters, Islamists disagree with one another not only about strategy but about substance. Challenges to the equation of jihad with violence against infidels have come not only from non-Islamist exegetes but also from within the ranks of Islamists themselves. A case in point is Yassine of Morocco's JSA, who insists that jihad is the dedicated struggle against arrogance (istikbār), particularly in its common form as the lust for power and domination. As jihad against istikbār is both a final goal and a prescription for action, Yassine contends, it is antithetical to violent practices that aim at domination. For Yassine, the primary instruments of jihad are not bombs but words, particularly those deployed in the art of persuasion. When Islamists seek to legitimize violent revolution by recourse to Islamic texts, they contravene the true meaning of jihad to serve their own arrogant ends. By the same token, Yassine argues, Bin Laden's decision to "fight evil with evil and barbarity with barbarity" not only violates specific Islamic prohibitions against harming civilians, women, and children but also betrays the ethical imperative to embody the message of a merciful God who cautions believers that "you have no power over them" (Q. 88:22).

Even Islamists who endorse the more radical view of jihad adapt this framework and grammar to suit the distinct public spheres in which they operate and to which they carefully calibrate their political commitments. In his justification for the assassination of Sadat, for example, Faraj depicts the struggle to reclaim the moral foundations of the Egyptian state as a fight against jāhiliyya from within and further argues that the jihad against a corrupt nationalist regime at home must take precedence over fighting enemies elsewhere. The charter of Hamas welds Islamist rhetoric to that of nationalist resistance in an effort to both fight Israeli occupation and compete for adherents with the Palestinian Liberation Organization, yet simultaneously insists that all Muslims recognize the primacy of the jihad for Jerusalem. In contrast to both Faraj and Hamas, Bin Laden embraced a global jihad that essentially collapses distinctions between national and international, offensive and defensive fighting, and enemies at home and those from afar.

Here as elsewhere, these Islamists claim to speak for an unchanging authentic Islam that exists outside of time and space. Far from transcending history and local circumstances, however, this understanding of jihad mirrors the very state-sanctioned violence against which Islamists have struggled for almost a century. Indeed, along with thousands of Muslims caught in the machinery of 20th-century state violence, prominent Islamists from Qutb to Ghazali to Zawahiri are well known to have been radicalized by extended and often brutal terms of incarceration. It is thus unsurprising that Islamists forged by interrogation torture in prison camps would conclude that the preeminent enactment of Muslim piety is violent struggle. In this context, as scholar of Middle Eastern politics Timothy Mitchell argues, Islamist views of the world can be characterized as both a mode of resistance to state mechanisms of coercion and an expression of them. This is powerfully illustrated in Ghazali's memoirs Ayyam min Hayati (Days of my life), where she describes how the "darkness of prisons, the blades of torture and the vicious beatings only increase the endurance and resolve of the faithful."

Conclusion

The example of jihad shows why any definition—let alone understanding or explanation—of Islamism requires attending not only to the multiple and various ways Islamist thinkers reinterpret Islam but also to the specific conditions and cultures in which they are embedded and the partisans and audiences they seek to address. These conditions and contexts determine the extent to which an Islamist framework resonates with Muslims who live in a wide range of cultural contexts and geographic locations. Such resonances are, in turn, facilitated by a concatenation of forces that mark this particular moment in history. These include the ways in which contemporary global inequalities compound the legacy of European colonialism to reproduce a sense of Muslim powerlessness relative to the West; ongoing Euro-American political and financial support of corrupt autocrats, many of whom preside over nation-states stitched together by Western fiat; the persistence of authoritarian regimes eager to control domestic unrest by catalyzing "Muslim rage" toward external targets; the sense of emasculation produced by decades of political repression and economic frustration; and the flow of images of bloodied Muslim bodies delivered by a burgeoning array of video, satellite, and electronic media. Islamism is thus constituted by a complex dialectic between the selective appropriation of texts and precedents by Islamist thinkers and leaders, and the ways such ideas are enacted and reworked by Islamist activists forged in the crucible of Egyptian prisons, Pakistani villages, Gazan refugee camps, Saudi schools, French housing projects, British mosques, and the battlefields of Afghanistan, Bosnia, Chechnya, and Iraq.

See also 'Abd al-Rahman, 'Umar (b. 1938); authority; al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49); Bin Laden, Osama (1957–2011); Egypt; Faraj, Muhammad 'Abd al-Salam (1954–82); al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya; guardianship of the jurist; jihad; Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89); knowledge; Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la (1903–79); modernity; Muslim Brotherhood; al-Qaeda; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66); shari'a; Shi'ism; sovereignty; Sunnism; 'ulama'; West, the; women

Further Reading

Talal Asad, "The Idea of an Anthropology of Islam," Center for Contemporary Arab Studies Occasional Paper Series, March 1986; Aziz al-Azmeh, Islams and Modernities, 1993; James Barr, Fundamentalism, 1978; Osama bin Laden, "Declaration of War against the Americans Occupying the Land of the Two Holy Places," 1996; Norman J. Cohen, The Fundamentalist Phenomenon, 1991; Roxanne L. Euben, Enemy in the Mirror: Islamic Fundamentalism and the Limits of Modern Rationalism, 1999; Roxanne L. Euben and Muhammad Qasim Zaman, Princeton Readings in Islamist Thought: Texts and Contexts from al-Banna to Bin Laden, 2009; Muhammad Husayn Fadlallah, "Islamic Unity and Political Change: Interview with Shaykh Muhammad Hussayn Fadlallah," Journal of Palestine Studies (1995); Zaynab al-Ghazali, Aysam min Hayati [Days of My Life], 1978; Yvonne Haddad, "The Qur'anic Justification for an Islamic Revolution: The View of Sayyid Qutb," The Middle East Journal 37, no. 1 (Winter 1983): 14–29; Johannes J. G. Jansen, The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat's Assassins and Islamic Resurgence in the Middle East, 1986; Bruce Lawrence, Defenders of God, 1989; Saba Mahmood, Politics of Piety: The Islamic Revival and the Feminist Subject, 2005; George M. Marsden, Fundamentalism and American Culture: The Shaping of Twentieth-Century Evangelicalism, 1870–1925, 1980; Sayyid Qutb, Ma'alim fi al-Tariq [Signposts along the Road], 1964; Martin Riesebrodt, Pious Passion: The Emergence of Modern Fundamentalism in the United States and Iran, translated by Don Reneau, 1990; Max Weber, The Sociology of Religion, 1964; Nadia Yassine, "Inside Bin Laden's Head," 2005; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, The 'Ulama of Contemporary Islam: Custodians of Change, 2002; Malika Zeghal, "Religion and Politics in Egypt: The Ulema of al-Azhar, Radical Islam, and the State (1952–94)," International Journal of Middle East Studies (1999).

ROXANNE L. EUBEN

G

al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya

Al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya, or The Islamic Group (hereafter, Gama'a), appeared in Egypt as a distinct organization in the early 1980s, but its core membership, ideology, and tactics emerged in the mid-1970s, primarily on university campuses, when a changing political climate favored appeals to religious ideals. After demonstrating a capacity for successful mobilization by repeatedly winning elections that gave it control over the General Union of Egyptian Students, the Gama'a launched multiple initiatives aimed at gaining wider exposure and advancing its agenda, which drew inspiration from a radical interpretation of the social and political vision of the Muslim Brothers.

Beginning by sponsoring religious conferences, organizing daily prayers, distributing literature, appropriating bulletin boards, and offering classes, the group soon progressed to providing occasional services, such as inexpensive meals and low-cost copying, and selling articles of clothing identified with the movement. At the same time, it urged strict compliance with its view of proper Islamic morals, which often resulted in attempts to police gender relations, prevent the sale of alcohol, impose a dress code, and censor the presentation of films and theatrical performances. Such unauthorized vigilante assertions inevitably led to conflicts that were not always easily contained, as they threatened to stir up latent friction between political rivals, clan groups, social classes, and sectarian communities.

With its strength initially concentrated in the urban centers of Upper Egypt (e.g., Asyut, Minya, and Sohag), the attitudes and behaviors characteristic of the organization tended to reflect features of a regional subculture emphasizing traditional rural values such as honor, strength, and loyalty. These qualities surfaced with increasing force and frequency after the organization's leaders sought out and designated the blind Shaykh 'Umar 'Abd al-Rahman as their spiritual guide. At their request, evoking the Qur'anic verse that became the group's motto ("Fight against them till all opposition ends, and obedience is wholly God's" [Q. 8:39]), this Azhar-trained jurist-scholar (mufti) issued legal opinions consistent with the extremist doctrine of takfir—that is, the legitimating of violence against people deemed to have become infidels.

Uncompromising opposition to President Anwar Sadat's peace initiative toward Israel served to increase the militancy of the Gama'a, as their protests moved from the campus onto the streets. A series of confrontations, arrests, incarcerations, and escapes into a clandestine underground followed, reaching a climax in the mass crackdown on Islamist activists in September 1981 and shortly thereafter the assassination of Sadat by assailants who belonged to a different but allied organization known as Jihad.

Throughout the 1980s, the Gama'a remained active although contained by extensive government surveillance, while some members managed to flee to Afghanistan to join the struggle against the Soviet invasion. But in the early 1990s, the Gama'a once again staged an aggressive campaign to challenge the regime of Husni Mubarak both by promoting popular opposition and by targeting prominent secular intellectuals, foreign tourists, or state officials. Then, in the late 1990s, Karam Zuhdi and several other Gama'a leaders announced from prison their renunciation of violence and a revision of their religious thinking, leading to their release in 2003 and an apparent moderate direction for the movement.

See also Egypt; fundamentalism; jihad; terrorism

Further Reading

Gilles Kepel, Jihad: The Trial of Political Islam, 2002; Carrie Rosefsky Wickham, Mobilizing Islam: Religion, Activism, and Political Change in Egypt, 2002.

PATRICK D. GAFFNEY

genealogy

In English usage, "genealogy" refers to (1) a blood relationship in the form of a lineage, pedigree, or family stock; (2) an account or representation of a blood relationship; and (3) a discipline for the study of blood relationships. The Arabic term nasab relates to the first and second senses. 'Ilm al-nasab (or 'ilm al-ansāb) refers to genealogy in the third sense, as a discipline, or simply the knowledge of blood relationships. The term nasab has passed into several other languages used by Muslims, where it carries similar meanings.

In Muslim societies, an individual's genealogy is almost always traced through male ancestors with a man named as his father's son (ibn, written here as b.) and a woman named as her father's daughter (bint, here bt.). As elsewhere, certain bloodlines are remembered, whereas others are forgotten, and the ancestor originating a lineage is critical. Classical Islamic sources refer to the Prophet himself—who was from the tribe of Quraysh and the clan of Hashim—as Muhammad b. 'Abdallah b. 'Abd al-Muttalib and trace his genealogy to Adam and the origins of humanity, including among his ancestors major Arab tribal figures and, in addition to Adam, the prophets Noah, Abraham, and Ishmael.

Many families trace their genealogies to the Prophet Muhammad, his Companions, or other famous early Muslims. In Muslim societies, descendants of the Prophet are often called *sayyid*s, although sometimes the term sayyid is reserved for descendants of Muhammad's grandson Husayn, compared to a sharif, a descendant of his grandson Hasan (yet confusingly, sometimes the term "sharif" refers either to a descendant of Hasan or Husayn). Muhammad left no sons; Hasan and Husayn were the sons of Muhammad's cousin, 'Ali b. Abi Talib, who married Muhammad's daughter, Fatima. Ruling dynasties in Jordan (the Hashimites) and in Morocco (the 'Alawis) trace their ancestries to Hasan. Families who are descendants of Abu Bakr bear the ancestral appellation al-Siddiqi, those of 'Umar b. al-Khattab al-'Umari, those of the Shi'ite Imam Musa al-Kazim al-Musawi, and so on.

From early on in Islamic history, the value of a prestigious genealogy was debated by Muslims. Traditions attributed to the Prophet on this matter are as numerous as they are contradictory. Muhammad reportedly instructed his Companions to remember their genealogies and praised his own family and ancestry. He is also reported to have said, "When a people's nobleman comes to you, honor him." At the same time, in many hadith reports, Muhammad rejects the significance of noble birth and restates Qur'an 49:13: "The noblest among you before God is the most righteous among you." Muhammad is also thought to have referred to 'ilm al-nasab as a useless discipline, the ignorance of which does one no harm. One solution to these apparent contradictions has been to state that genealogy matters for this world but not the next.

Genealogies, real and fictitious, have played a major role in national traditions that explain the origins of Islam outside of its earliest boundaries. In these traditions, Islam is often remembered to have been brought by noble Arabs, descendants of 'Ali, or Sufi masters. The merchant-prince conqueror of Darfur, Zubayr Rahma Mansur, for example, reportedly bore the nisba, or filiation, 'Abbasi, indicating his descent from the Prophet's uncle. Besides providing explanations for the arrival of Islam, such blood ties strengthen communities' bonds with the wider Muslim community.

Historically, genealogical claims have played a significant role in legitimating dynasties. Dynasties that emerged in Umayyad (661–750) and Abbasid (750–1258) times and onward claimed descent from Muhammad's family or from his Companions, other early Muslims, or aristocratic Arab tribes. In Iran, dynasties also attached themselves to the Iranian epic or Sasanian past. The arrival of Turco-Mongolian rule in Muslim lands initiated new lines of noble ancestry. Babur (d. 1530), the founder of the Mughal dynasty in India, claimed to be a direct descendant of Timur (d. 1405) on his father's side and of Chingiz Khan (d. 1227) on his mother's side. Several dynasties have also claimed descent from 'Ali, in some cases through one of his descendants recognized as an imam, in other words, the rightful leader of the Muslim community. The Fatimids (909–1171), who ruled first in North Africa and then in Egypt and southern Syria, claimed descent from the Shi'i imams through Isma'il, son of the sixth imam, Ja'far al-Sadiq. In Iran, the Safavids (1501–1722)—who originated as leaders of a Sufi order in Persian Kurdistan and were Kurds, not Arabs—claimed descent from 'Ali through the seventh imam Musa al-Kazim and were responsible for the conversion of Iran to Twelver Shi'ism. Across the Islamic world, many a failed rebellion has also advanced genealogical claims, especially for descendants of 'Ali.

The families of *sayyid*s and sharifs have been accorded enormous prestige in various Muslim societies, such as Iran and Morocco, and claims of such noble ancestry have played important roles in certain families' gaining not only preferential treatment in society but also access to patronage in the form of royal stipends and hereditary judgeships, positions as shrine superintendents and endowment supervisors, and other sinecures. Their prestige has also frequently allowed them to act as power brokers and mediators between central governments and provincial rebels, urban populaces and conquering forces, or disputing urban factions.

Ideas about genealogy continue to play significant roles in the defense, formation, and reformation of communal and national identities. Scholarship here is new but highly suggestive. Andrew Shryock has discussed "genealogical nationalism" and the role such a phenomenon has played in the transformation of popular conceptions of tribe and state in modern Jordan.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); Hasan b. 'Ali (ca. 624–70); Husayn b. 'Ali (626–80); imamate; kinship; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Clifford Edmund Bosworth, "The Heritage of Rulership in Early Islamic Iran and the Search for Dynastic Connections with the Past," Iran 11 (1973); Idem, The New Islamic Dynasties: A Chronological and Genealogical Manual, 1996; Devin DeWeese, "The Politics of Sacred Lineages in 19th-Century Central Asia: Descent Groups Linked to Khwaja Ahmad Yasavi in Shrine Documents and Genealogical Charters," International Journal of Middle East Studies 31, no. 4 (1999); Louise Marlow, Hierarchy and Egalitarianism in Islamic Thought, 1997; Andrew J. Shryock, Nationalism and the Genealogical Imagination: Oral History and Textual Authority in Tribal Jordan, 1997; Idem, "Popular Genealogical Nationalism: History Writing and Identity among the Balqa Tribes of Jordan," Comparative Studies in Society and History 37, no. 2 (1995); Zoltan Szombathy, The Roots of Arabic Genealogy: A Study in Historical Anthropology, 2003; Daniel Martin Varisco, "Metaphors and Sacred History: The Genealogy of Muhammad and the Arab 'Tribe,'" Anthropological Quarterly 68, no. 3 (1995).

SARAH BOWEN SAVANT

Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111)

Abu Hamid Muhammad b. Muhammad al-Ghazali al-Tusi (the "Proof of Islam") is the most renowned Sunni theologian of the Seljuq period (1038–1194). He was born in Tus, in what is now northeastern Iran in 1058 (or, as recently argued by the Yale-based scholar Frank Griffel, ca. 1056). After his initial education in law in Jurjan, he moved to Nishapur, where he became a student of the leading Ash'ari theologian Juwayni (d. 1085) and the Sufi Abu 'Ali al-Farmadhi (d. 1084–85). Ghazali's alliance with the Seljuq court led to his 1091 appointment as a professor of Shafi'i law at the Nizamiyya college in Baghdad at the invitation of the powerful Seljuq vizier Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092). Ghazali taught in Baghdad until 1095. During this period, he composed a number of polemical and dogmatic treatises in which he defended official Sunni theology against internal and external ideological threats, particularly the Isma'ilis and the philosophers.

In 1095, following a profound spiritual crisis described in his autobiographical and apologetic work al-Munqidh min al-Dalal (The Deliverer from Error), Ghazali resigned from his teaching post and left Baghdad. He traveled to Damascus, Jerusalem, Hebron, and the Holy Places in Mecca and Medina, performing the pilgrimage in 1096. It was during his travels that Ghazali wrote his most influential work, Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din (The Revival of the Religious Sciences).

In The Revival, Ghazali laid out his program for a far-reaching religious reform. His underlying assumption was that, due to the disproportionate influence of jurisprudence (fiqh) and dogmatic theology (kalām) on Islamic religious life, the Islamic spiritual tradition had become moribund, and the spiritual "science of the path to the hereafter" ('ilm tartiq al-ākhira), taught by the Prophet and the first generations of Muslims, had been forgotten. In Ghazali's view, the map of Islamic religious sciences needed to be redrawn and this spiritual science (allegedly revived but in fact largely developed by Ghazali himself from philosophical and Sufi sources) was to take on central importance. The remaining religious disciplines, including jurisprudence, hadith, Qur'anic exegesis, and dogmatic theology, were to be demoted to a subsidiary status.

Following his return to Tus in 1097, Ghazali gradually enlisted the support of the Seljuq ruling elite to promote the ideals of The Revival. This led to his 1106 appointment as a professor at the Nizamiyya college in Nishapur—a position analogous to the one he had held in Baghdad—by one of Nizam al-Mulk's nine sons, Fakhr al-Mulk (d. 1106). Ghazali accepted this position with the belief that he was the divinely appointed renewer (mujaddid) of Islam at the beginning of the sixth Islamic century (beginning 1107). However, as shown by Kenneth Garden in al-Ghazali's Contested Revival, Ghazali's appointment met with significant opposition among religious scholars and jurists in Nishapur, not least due to The Revival's assault on the traditional religious disciplines and the controversial nature of the science of the hereafter, especially in view of its pronounced philosophical component. Ghazali's enemies appealed to Sanjar b. Malikshah (the Seljuq king of Khurasan in 1097–1118, then the supreme sultan until 1157), who summoned Ghazali to court. Although Sanjar acquitted him of all charges, Ghazali eventually retired from public teaching and returned to Tus, where he died in 1111. Despite powerful political patronage, Ghazali's religious reform did not have the broad social resonance for which he had hoped, and its influence was limited to intellectual and Sufi circles.

Ghazali's political theory was shaped by the political realities of his time (the power struggle between the Seljuqs, who effectively controlled the Abbasid caliphate, and the Isma'ilis of Alamut), his theological and teaching activity at the service of the Seljuqs in Baghdad and Nishapur, and his agenda as a religious reformer. Despite the unwillingness he declared in The Deliverer from Error to serve political authorities (as expressed in his vow at the tomb of Abraham in Hebron never again to serve rulers), Ghazali remained involved in politics throughout his life.

In his anti-Isma'ili treatise Fada'ih al-Batiniyya (The Infamies of the Batinites, ca. 1094), commissioned by the Abbasid caliph Mustazhir (r. 1094–1118), Ghazali sought to establish the caliph's legitimacy, countering the rival Isma'ili claims in favor of the Fatimid caliphate in Cairo. While concurring with the Isma'ilis that the Muslim polity must be governed by a divinely appointed leader (imam), Ghazali maintained that this leader must be elected (ikhtiyār) rather than designated (nass) by his predecessor—the practice followed by the Isma'ilis. Ghazali argued that the election need not have a wide basis (a broad consensus of religious scholars) and could be accomplished through the oath of allegiance (bay'a) of a single individual if that individual possessed uncontested military supremacy (shawka) and could provide a power base for the elected leader. Such an elected leader was, for Ghazali, the Abbasid caliph Mustazhir, who was supported by the military power of the Seljuq sultan. In effect, Ghazali legitimized the political status quo, in which the Seljuq sultans pledged allegiance to and effectively appointed the caliph, thereby validating their own authority. He represented this symbiotic system of government as a warrant of peace, unity, and stability for the Muslim polity.

Ghazali also rejected the Isma'ili view that the imam must be a divinely inspired religious scholar uniquely qualified to interpret the shari'a. He argued that in the same way the imam (i.e., in Ghazali's view, the Abbasid caliph) relied on the sultan for military support, so also he could rely on religious scholars ('ulama') for support in matters of religion. Therefore, the imam himself need not be an expert religious scholar.

In his dogmatic treatise al-Iqtisad fi al-I'tiqad (The Golden Mean in Belief, ca. 1095) and in the brief political section (book 14, chapter 5) of The Revival, Ghazali reiterated his views on the relation between the imamate and the sultanate and emphasized that obedience to the sultan, who has military supremacy, is obligatory, even if he is ignorant and unjust. This is because any attempt to depose him would result in unendurable civil strife (fitna), which must be prevented at all costs.

Ghazali's concept of the ideal ruler is reflected in the ethical advice offered to rulers in his Mirrors for Princes: chapter 10 of The Infamies of the Batinites; book 2, chapter 10 of Kimiya-yi Sa'adat (The Alchemy of Happiness); Nasihat al-Muluk (The Counsel for Kings), of which only the first part is authentic; and some of his Persian letters. (The Alchemy, The Counsel, and the letters were all composed in Persian, as they were addressed to the non-Arabic-speaking Seljuq ruling elite.) In these works, Ghazali urged rulers to be mindful of their impending death and the Day of Judgment, when they will be held accountable for any injustice done to their subjects. These Mirrors for Princes are to be understood in the context of Ghazali's religious reform laid out in The Revival. Their primary focus is ethical and religious rather than political.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); madrasa; Nizam al-Mulk (1018–92); philosophy; Seljuqs (1055–1194); Sufism

Further Reading

Leonard Binder, "Al-Ghazālī's Theory of Islamic Government," Muslim World 45, no. 3 (1955); Gerhard Böwering et al., "Ġazālī," Encyclopaedia Iranica, vol. 10, 2001; Kenneth Garden, al-Ghazālī's Contested Revival: Ihyā' 'ulūm al-dīn and Its Critics in Khorasan and the Maghrib (PhD diss., University of Chicago, 2005); Idem, "al-Māzarī al-dhakī: al-Ghazālī's Maghribi Adversary in Nishapur," Journal of Islamic Studies 21, no. 1 (2010); Frank Griffel, Al-Ghazālī's Philosophical Theology, 2009; Carole Hillenbrand, "A Little-Known Mirror for Princes by al-Ghazālī," in Words, Texts and Concepts Cruising the Mediterranean Sea, edited by R. Arnzen and J. Thielmann, 2004; Idem, "Islamic Orthodoxy or Realpolitik? Al-Ghazālī's Views on Government," Iran 26 (1988); Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam, 1981; Henri Laoust, La Politique de Gazālī, 1970; Erwin I. J. Rosenthal, Political Thought in Medieval Islam: An Introductory Outline, 1958; William Montgomery Watt, "Reflections on al-Ghazālī's Political Theory," Glasgow University Oriental Society Transactions 21 (1966).

ALEXANDER TREIGER

ghāzi

Derived from the earliest traditions of the Prophet Muhammad's raids against the infidels, the term ghāzī denotes one who fights the enemies of God, whether non-Muslims outside the borders of the Islamic lands or religious dissidents within the lands under Islamic rule. The ghazw differs from the jihad (struggle in the cause of Islam) in that it refers to a campaign that is limited in either scope or duration.

During the age of the original Islamic Conquests (from 634 until 717), the term ghāzī was rarely used. From the 720s and 730s, however, the first famous ghāzīs of Islamic history began to appear, many of them no longer under government sponsorship or control. Some of these ghāzīs, such as the famous Sayyid Battal, about whom epics were written, became legendary figures and religio-political models. Due to the influence of such figures, prominent personal engagement in ghazwas also became de facto government policy under the early Abbasid caliphs, the so-called ghāzī-caliphs, who both sponsored and occasionally led summer raids on Byzantium.

Due to the political breakup of the universal caliphate in the ninth century, the best way for the founder of a polity to gain political legitimacy for his rule was to be a ghāzī. Thus most of the founding figures of the great medieval and early modern Islamic kingdoms—including such major ones as the Samanid, Ghaznavid, Seljuq, Ghurid, Mamluk, Mughal, and Ottoman governments—cultivated careers as ghāzīs and also incorporated ghāzīs into their armies. The members of modern Islamist groups view themselves as the heirs and preservers of the ghāzī tradition.

See also Ghaznavids (977–1086); Ghurids (1009–1215); jihad; Mamluks (1250–1517); Mughals (1526–1857); Ottomans (1299–1924); Samanids (819–1005); Seljuqs (1055–1194)

Further Reading

Ali Anooshahr, The Ghāzī Sultans and the Frontiers of Islam: A Comparative Study of the Late Medieval and Early Modern Period, 2009; Khalid Yahya Blankenship, The End of the Jihād State: The Reign of Hishām Ibn 'Abd al-Malik and the Collapse of the Umayyads, 1994; Michael Bonner, Aristocratic Violence and Holy War: Studies in the Jihad and the Arab-Byzantine Frontier, 1996; Jürgen Paul, The State and the Military: The Samanid Case, 1994; D. G. Tor, Violent Order: Religious Warfare, Chivalry, and the 'Ayyar Phenomenon in the Medieval Islamic World, 2007; Paul Wittek, The Rise of the Ottoman Empire, 1938.

D. G. TOR

Ghaznavids (977–1086)

The Ghaznavids were founded in 977 by Sebuktegin b. Qarū Bechkem, a Turkish military slave, in the town of Ghazna in eastern Afghanistan. In 999, Sebuktegin's son and successor, Mahmud b. Sebuktegin, in cooperation with the Qarakhanid Turkic nomads, overthrew the Ghaznavids' nominal overlords, the Samanids, which were, at the time, the most important political power of the eastern Islamic world. Under Mahmud, who ruled from 998 until his death in 1030, the dynasty reached its apogee, controlling most of Iran, Afghanistan, and much of northern India. Mahmud based his right to rule on fierce dedication to holy warfare against the infidels and heretics of India, Iran, and adjacent areas of Central Asia; because of this he is known to history as "Mahmud Ghazi." It was during his reign that the Muslim conquest of the Indian subcontinent began in earnest.

In 1040, Mahmud's son and successor, Mas'ud, lost all the dynasty's Western possessions to the Turkish Seljuqs and the nomadic Turkmen whom they led. Henceforth, from 1040 until the fall of the Ghaznavids in 1186, the Ghaznavid realm was limited to eastern Afghanistan, Baluchistan, and northwest India, while the Seljuqs inherited the Ghaznavids' former position as the leading dynasty of the Islamic east.

The Ghaznavids had a significant impact on the history of Islamic political thought in several key areas. First, the Ghaznavid era marks an important stage in the political acceptance of the de facto divorce of the governing power from the caliphate, a process that had begun with the establishment of the Ghaznavids' Persian predecessors, the Saffarids and Samanids. The Ghaznavid achievement of a new level of religious and political legitimacy is demonstrated by the fact, emphasized in the medieval sources, that Mahmud of Ghazna was the first person other than the caliph to be called by the title sultan, a term that at that time denoted the embodiment of legitimate authority, as opposed to a mere wielder of power.

Second, the Ghaznavids were the first major ruling dynasty in the history of the central and eastern Islamic lands to be founded by a Turkish slave. Moreover, in contrast to their Saffarid and Samanid predecessors, who derived their political and military support from the various armed elements of the free, indigenous Muslim population, the Ghaznavids relied heavily on Turkish slave soldiery. The Ghaznavids thus inaugurated the Turkic political dominance of the ethnically Arab and Iranian Islamic heartlands that was to last until the 20th century.

Perhaps as a result of their reliance upon an alien political class, the Ghaznavids came to be seen as the embodiment of political despotism. Authors who espoused this absolutist ideal, therefore, most notably the Seljuq minister Nizam al-Mulk, regarded Mahmud as a paragon of Islamic sovereignty, admiring in particular the elaborate internal spy system that Mahmud established.

Finally, the Ghaznavids bequeathed a militant Sunni holy warrior legacy to Muslim India, which became a salient feature of its political tradition; Mahmud of Ghazna was the declared political ideal of Islamic successor states such as the Ghurids, the Delhi Sultanate, and the Mughals, which eventually conquered virtually the whole of the Indian subcontinent and continued to rule much of it until the advent of British rule.

See also Afghanistan; Central Asia

Further Reading

W. Barthold, Turkestan down to the Mongol Invasion, 1968; C. E. Bosworth, The Ghaznavids: Their Empire in Afghanistan and Eastern Iran, 994–1040, 1973; Idem, The Later Ghaznavids: Splendour and Decay, 1977; Julie Meisami, Persian Historiography to the End of the Twelfth Century, 1999; Nizam al-Mulk, The Book of Government or Rules for Kings: The Siyasat-nama or Siyar al-Muluk of Nizam al-Mulk, 1960; Muhammad Nazim, The Life and Times of Sultān Mahmūd of Ghazna, 1971; André Wink, Al-Hind: The Making of the Indo-Islamic World. Vol. 2: The Slave Kings and the Islamic Conquest 11th–13th Centuries, 2002.

D. G. TOR

Ghurids (1009–1215)

The chiefs (maliks) of Ghur, an obscure mountainous region in central Afghanistan, came to prominence after 1150, when the armies of 'Ala' al-Din Husayn (r. ca. 1149–61), chief of the dominant Shansabanid clan, sacked and burned Ghazni, the capital of the Ghaznavid sultanate. Formerly subject to both the Seljuqs and Ghaznavids, over the following decades the Ghurids rapidly expanded the territories under their control. The apogee of their dominion was reached during the reign of the brothers Ghiyath al-Din (r. 1163–1203) and Mu'izz al-Din (r. 1173–1206), the former overseeing the westward expansion of the sultanate from Firuzkuh in west-central Afghanistan and the latter expanding its dominion eastward from Ghazni. A third line, based in Bamiyan, was celebrated for its patronage of Persian literati. This unusual arrangement reflects clan-based structures within which rights of succession were horizontal rather than strictly vertical, fostering a system of appanages consolidated by intermarriage and affinal ties.

By the end of the 12th century, the Ghurids and their agents ruled over an area extending from Khurasan and eastern Iran in the west to the Ganges in the east. The changing fortunes of the sultanate are reflected in the construction of an elaborate genealogy linking the Shansabanids both to the heroic past of pre-Islamic Iran and to the early caliphs. Shifts in the names (laqabs) of the sultans and their adoption of increasingly bombastic titles, including those formerly held by the Seljuq and Ghaznavid sultans, also reflect the transition from a rural emirate to a transregional sultanate.

The dynamic self-fashioning of the Ghurids extended to their pietistic affiliations and patronage. During their rise, the Ghurids patronized the Karramis, a Sunni pietistic sect whose founder, Muhammad b. Karram (d. 869), helped convert the recalcitrant Ghur from paganism to Islam. A spectacular four-volume leather-bound Qur'an produced for sultan Ghiyath al-Din in 1189, the sole manuscript that can be associated with Ghurid patronage, may have been commissioned as a bequest to a Karrami madrasa. In addition, it seems likely that the complex epigraphic program of the most spectacular example of Ghurid architectural patronage, the roughly 220-foot-high brick minaret at Jam in central Afghanistan, was chosen to rebut contemporary criticisms that the Karramis were anthropomorphists. Dated 1174 to 1175 according to recent research, the minaret is generally believed to mark the site of Firuzkuh, sultan Ghiyath al-Din's summer capital.

In 1199, at the zenith of their political power, the Ghurid sultans broke with the Karramis, aligning themselves with the more transregional Hanafi and Shafi'i law schools of Islam instead. The realignment can be correlated with increased cultural and diplomatic contacts with the Baghdad caliphate, especially during the lengthy reign of the Abbasid caliph Nasir (r. 1180–1225). This "international turn" was also reflected in the introduction of new coin types in the Ghazni mint in 1200, which linked the Ghurids more directly with their Sunni contemporaries in the wider Islamic world.

Architecture was equally instrumental to these developments, and the last decade of the 12th century saw a major architectural program undertaken in the name of the Ghurid elite (male and female) in both Afghanistan and India. In 1201, for example, the Friday Mosque of Herat was rebuilt, some of the funds deriving from Ghiyath al-Din's share of the golden booty taken from Ajmir, the capital of the Chawhan rulers of Rajasthan. The Indian victories were useful for bolstering the orthodox credentials of the Ghurid sultans in the wider Islamic world. Yet, despite the rhetoric of idolatry and orthodoxy by which they were framed, in several cases, scions of defeated Rajput dynasties were reinstated as tributary subjects of the Ghurids, a practice that conforms (perhaps serendipitously) to the normative ideals of Indic kingship. In addition, the administrative iqtā', a type of land or revenue assignment that carried with it military or financial obligations to the state, was introduced to India, with administration devolving to the sultan's mamluks or manumitted Turkic soldiery. The last decade of the 12th century thus saw sultan Mu'izz al-Din ruling over an eclectic combination of subordinate Turks and vassal Hindu princelings, resulting in what the historian Khaliq Ahmad Nizami memorably called "a type of polity, half-Ghurid, half-Indian."

After Ghiyath al-Din's death in 1203, Mu'izz al-Din assumed the role of paramount sovereign; his demise three years later effectively marked the end of Ghurid sovereignty. In its aftermath, the neighboring Khwarazmshahs of Central Asia incorporated the western Ghurid territories into their domains, while in the east, the Turkish slave generals on whom the Ghurids had relied during their Indian campaigns vied for power, creating the conditions for the emergence of an independent sultanate based in Delhi.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Delhi Sultanate (1206–1526); Ghaznavids (977–1086); Seljuqs (1055–1194)

Further Reading

C. E. Bosworth, "The Early Islamic History of Ghur," in The Medieval History of Iran, Afghanistan, and Central Asia, 1977; Finbar Barry Flood, Objects of Translation: Material Culture and Medieval "Hindu-Muslim" Encounter, 2009; K. A. Nizami, On History and Historians of Medieval India, 1983; J. Sourdel-Thomine, Le Minaret Ghouride de Jam: Un chef d'oeuvre du XIIe siècle, 2004.

FINBARR BARRY FLOOD

globalization

Globalization is the process of formation of multiple interdependent ties among various locales in the world, facilitated by the emerging common vision of one interconnected world. Historical literature notes earlier processes of globalization, but contemporary globalization is primarily centered on the continual opening of national economies and their mutual integration via free trade agreements and domestic reform policies.

The vision of "one world" is largely the inheritance from a European hegemony imposed on the world at the highest stage of colonial domination, achieved prior to World War I. A convergent dimension of the present-day globalization is therefore geopolitical, since the program of economic integration often reflects Western priorities of supporting pro-Western governments, resulting in the erosion of welfare regimes and, more generally, weakening the autonomy of the states and the sovereignty of their jurisdictions within industrial and developing countries.

Islamic politics has been deeply enmeshed in this global dynamic, both in the colonial and the postcolonial eras. Islamic movements and groups that oppose pro-Western governments within Muslim majority societies often hold these governments responsible for disregarding the needs of their populations, particularly those of the middle classes, and for neglecting the basic tenets of the "common good" (al-maṣlaha al-'āmma in Islamic jurisprudential parlance). Another close affinity of Islamic politics to globalization rests on the fact that the premodern configuration of Islamic civilization reflects a form of globalization sui generis, occurring prior to the current wave of Western-centered globalization and building on extensive transnational connections. In Islamic history, notably in the epoch that Marshall Hodgson called the Middle Periods (between the 10th and the 15th centuries, roughly corresponding to the European Low Middle Ages), such ties encompassed traders and scholars, Sufis and pilgrims alike. Islamic civilization was located, geographically and socially, at the center of a medieval world system that did not require centralized governance, either nationally or transnationally based, but fostered long-distance exchange, connectedness, and solidarity while keeping fluid the distinction between insiders and outsiders. This type of transnational and civilizational solidarity and governance was further cultivated in early modern Muslim empires, like the Ottoman and Mughal (rather more than in the Safavid, with its sectarian Shi'i identity). Contemporary sociopolitical movements with an Islamic orientation integrate subnational locales into transnational networks of solidarity and mobilization that can create new bonds or confirm old divides, as between Sunnis and Shi'is. From this perspective, globalization relativizes the centrality of any rooting of human communities in territorially and corporately defined communities, like nation-states. It therefore resonates with a historic Islamic approach privileging ties between locales, groups, and cities more than stressing the autonomy of cities or the sovereignty of national and corporate communities. This affinity is strengthened by the erosion of the legitimacy and institutional ossification of postindependence states within Muslim majority societies.

This specifically Islamic articulation of a global vision is also nurtured by the evolving cultural and communicative dimensions of globalization. It is particularly well supported by the growth, since the late 1990s, of satellite channels and websites with an explicitly Islamic orientation (e.g., Iqraa and islamonline.net). Such new media are often linked to intellectual authorities, opinion leaders, and "directors of consciences" whose activities are qualified as global, like in the case of Yusuf al-Qaradawi and 'Amr Khalid. Here the movement aspect of globalization meets and sometimes clashes with the fact that the investments necessary to support such global media enterprises, be they public or private, tie them closely to sectors of the establishment, be they financially strong states (like those of the Gulf) or corporate investors.

A hybrid, emerging character of Islamic globalism, trying to bring a common denominator to the movement aspect and the interests and support of the establishment, is the figure of the "new dā'iya," in other words, practitioner of da'wa (the call to Islamic belief and practice). Often devoid of the scholarly credentials traditionally ascribed to the 'ulama', this character aggregates audiences and creates potential constituencies across national borders, often via a combined use of satellite television, websites, and even cooperation with international organizations. This is the case with 'Amr Khalid, for instance, who, banned from Egypt in 2003, resettled in England and intensified his presence on a variety of Arab satellite channels while also working with the World Health Organization on an antismoking campaign, which he saw as part of his larger efforts to promote a moral conduct—oriented both to individual success and to the pursuit of the common good—among the Muslim youth in Muslim majority countries and in Western diasporas alike.

The latest manifestations of this type of Islamic globalism highlight the prevalence of common standards of globalization especially at the level of culture and communication. Yet this standardization is matched by a pluralization of the political signifiers legitimizing the various messages, which the international state system is no longer able to contain within conventional views of participation, citizenship, and rights. For example, while the human rights framework has gained ground in tandem with globalization, its articulation according to particular civilizational perspectives (like the campaign for "Islamic human rights") has become widely accepted, if not fully legitimate. Islamic politics in this sense reflects the search for a balance between universal globalism and civilizational particularism. At a deeper level, easily traced in the message of emerging media leaders, the juridification of economic and political ties, which is part of the inheritance of the international state system, is often matched by a growing awareness of the centrality of lifestyles and modes of expression. These are influenced by global standards but rearticulate specific identities (e.g., Muslim hip-hop).

It is uncertain whether this emerging Islamic globalism (also dubbed "Islamic transnationalism" or even "cosmopolitanism," terms that accentuate different aspects of the global connectedness) is more of a challenge to the international state system and in particular to the postcolonial states in the Muslim majority world itself than it is to the hegemonic forms of Western-centered globalization. Generally speaking, and in the long term, "integrationist" tendencies seem to prevail within Islamic movements and groups over "isolationist" temptations (a contrast exemplified by the urban puritan versus tribal articulation of the movements). Yet even within the integrationist approach, the idea of an integration of Muslim interests and lifestyles into the wider dynamics of the world system is subordinated to the possibility of preserving the autonomy of key Islamic notions of solidarity and good life vis-à-vis the process of global standardization linked to consumerist models. Therefore, voicing fears of globalization in an Islamic idiom is often the expression of a will to negotiate a fair insertion into the world system in ways that avoid a civilizational sellout. It also reflects a will to support the subinstitutional impetus of globalization processes without accepting rootlessness and homogenization.

Even if Islamic approaches to globalization do not easily fit into standardized forms of political and cultural expressions, they often work as a catalyst of their growing differentiation and complexity. They enhance the importance of voluntary interventions within more informal communicative forms and political spaces than those anchored within conventional—and increasingly weakened—state jurisdictions. Such spaces and practices appear to be strongly connected both to larger civilizational programs and to methodical approaches to personal conduct. A certain primacy of moral self-steering is one notable result of their convergence, with its increasing avoidance of institutional power rituals and strategies. A leader like Qaradawi has become since the 1980s the representative of such a convergence by generating a public attention whose intensity can be compared to the popularity of postcolonial leaders of the 1950s and 1960s, like the Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser.

See also international relations; modernity; Nasser, Gamal Abdel (1918–70)

Further Reading

Mohammed A. Bamyeh, The Ends of Globalization, 2000; Miriam Cooke and Bruce B. Lawrence, eds., Muslim Networks from Hajj to Hip Hop, 2005; Heba Raouf Ezzat, "Beyond Methodological Modernism: Towards a Multicultural Paradigm Shift in the Social Sciences," in Global Civil Society 2004/5, edited by Helmut Anheier, Marlies Glasius, and Mary Kaldor, 2004; Armando Salvatore, "Qaradawi's Maslaha: From Ideologue of the Islamic Awakening to Sponsor of Transnational Public Islam," in Global Mufti: The Phenomenon of Yusuf al-Qaradawi, edited by Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen and Bettina Gräf, 2009; Jakob Skovgaard-Petersen, "In Defense of Muhammad: 'Ulama', Da'iya and the New Islamic Internationalism," in Guardians of Faith in Modern Times: 'Ulama' in the Middle East, edited by Meir Hatina, 2009.

ARMANDO SALVATORE

God

The Arabic word Allāh, probably a contraction of al-ilāh (the god), is used in the Qur'an and Islamic tradition to refer to the biblical God, the same God who spoke to Moses from the burning bush and caused Mary to conceive and bear Jesus Christ without the intervention of a human father. The god Allah already existed as a high god in the pagan pantheon of the pre-Islamic period and was held to have daughter goddesses (al-Lat, al-'Uzza, and Manat), but the Prophet Muhammad's mission reinterpreted the deity Allah within the framework of biblical history and theology, decidedly rejecting the pagan view.

The Qur'an uses a number of metaphorical frames, all of which can be found in the Hebrew Bible, to describe God. In one set of descriptions, God is a master or lord (rabb). Every human is God's servant or slave ('abd) and owes God service or worship ('ibāda) as well as gratitude for his favor (ni'ma). Each is rewarded for obedience (tā'a) and punished for disobedience ('iṣyān, ma'ṣiya). God is also portrayed as a king. God watches over the heavens and the Earth from His throne. He is attended by a council (mala'). He resides in a fortress equipped with magnificent ascending staircases and defended by ramparts and towers. Guards on the ramparts fire projectiles at invasive genies, who attempt to eavesdrop on the celestial court, the attack of which produces shooting stars. God will also judge all people on the Day of Judgment after they have been physically resurrected and gathered together. The accused will be confronted in His presence with the records of their deeds, which they will receive in their right hands if the record is good but in their left hands if it is not. On the basis of this trial, God will issue a verdict, sending the innocent to paradise and the guilty to hell.

Several categories of signs (āyāt) convey important messages about God to those who are observant of the world around them. Islam is thus the religion of innate human understanding (fiṭra), being inscribed in nature, and one understands from the Qur'an that someone who grows up in isolation should be able to derive the main precepts of the faith independently from careful observation. The wonders of the natural world, including the sky, mountains, seas, and those things that are evidently impossible for humans to produce point to the existence of a divine power. The regularities of the natural world, such as the rotations of the planets, the alternation of night and day, and the rotation of the seasons, indicate the unity of the divine power. One knows that there is one God and not multiple gods because the universe is regular and not chaotic. The sustenance provided in the world for humankind, including rain, vegetation, crops, livestock, shelter, and so on, form another category of signs, and these show humans that they owe gratitude to God, on whose providence they depend utterly. Yet another class of signs are the ruins and relics of earlier civilizations, including Noah's ark; Iram, the great city or temple of the 'Ad tribe; the deserted dwellings of Thamud, which are carved into the rock walls of their valley; the pyramids of the pharaohs; and the ruins of "the Overturned Cities" (al-Mu'tafikāt) of Sodom and Gomorrah. Examination of such ruins conveys to the observer that God has destroyed earlier peoples and nations, despite their strength, prosperity, and accomplishments, presumably for disobedience and the rejection of earlier prophetic missions. The final category of signs—miracles that accompany prophetic missions, such as that of Moses' staff, which turned into a snake before Pharaoh—attests to the validity of the messages of God's prophets.

The Qur'an and Islam emphasize God's transcendence. The Qur'an pointedly alters several biblical portrayals, such as the statement that God rested on the seventh day after creating the universe in six, instead reporting that God settled on the throne to direct the universe. The point is obviously to avoid the implication that God gets tired or needs to rest and is thus subject to an anthropomorphic imperfection. No equivalent of the biblical statement that God created man in His own image appears in the Qur'an. Other passages argue against the Holy Trinity on the grounds that God has no need of a son, since He can create whatever He wishes simply by uttering a command. Nevertheless, some passages in the Qur'an and the hadith describe God in anthropomorphic terms, referring, for example, to God's hand or face, and these passages became the subject of much controversy. On the one hand, the Mu'tazilis generally held that such anthropomorphic descriptions should be interpreted in a figurative sense, so that God's hand should not be understood as a hand but as a reference to His power. On the other hand, Hanbalis and other traditionalist theologians argued for a literal interpretation. If the text of the Qur'an refers to God's hand, then the divinity has an actual hand. The intermediate Ash'ari position, which came to dominate Islamic discourse, states that one is supposed to accept these descriptive statements as fact but without probing into their particular implications—succinctly characterized as the bi-lā kayf ("without 'how'") position.

God has divine epithets, termed al-asmā' al-husnā (the very beautiful names) in the Qur'an and in later Islamic tradition. They are generally single adjectives, such as al-Karīm (the Generous), al-Mu'īn (the Helping), al-Ghafūr (the Forgiving), and so on, and appear frequently in Islamic theophoric names with the masculine 'abd and the feminine ama (both translate to "servant"), such as 'Abd al-Karim (Servant of the Generous One) or Amat al-Rahman (Servant of the Beneficent). The divine epithets are used primarily in the context of prayer, and they stress particular aspects of his power. As a category of speech, these epithets probably predate the Qur'an, and they were presumably used for other pagan gods in the pre-Islamic period. Islamic tradition came to stress that there are 99 such names, and the tradition includes a number of lists that are based primarily on the Qur'an but do not entirely agree. God also has, it is said, the exceedingly powerful "Greatest Name" (al-ism al-a'ẓam), which remains a secret.

Related to the divine epithets are God's attributes, the seven essential qualities of action, volition, knowledge, life, speech, sight, and hearing. These attributes created a problem of interpretation for theologians because admitting a plurality of attributes risked describing God as composite or possessed of a plural nature. The Ash'ari solution to this was to affirm that God knows through His knowledge, is able to act through His power, and sees through His sight, but they argue that explaining exactly how this is so is beyond human capacity.

God is the supreme ruler, legislator, and guarantor of social order. Sovereignty belongs, theoretically, to God, and both political and religious authorities are dependent on Him. According to the Qur'an, He appointed Adam, David, and other early nations' khalīfas (successors or viceroys) on Earth, signifying that He has delegated dominion over the world, of sorts, to them. In Islamic history, this status was extended first to the caliphs or successors of the Prophet and then to other rulers, such as sultan and kings. Muslim rulers thus claimed to rule by divine right—otherwise, God, who is omnipotent, would not have allowed them to gain power—and were styled ẓill Allāh 'alā al-ard (the shadow of God on Earth). God is also the ultimate source of law, and through prophecy He has imposed successive legal regimes on human communities, including those associated with Judaism, Christianity, and Islam. God is also the architect of political and social order and the guarantor of public morality, for moral behavior is presumably promoted by the fear of God above all. The biblical prohibition of using God's name in vain has not been stressed in Islamic cultures, where frequent invocation of God permeates all levels of discourse. God is understood to control all contingent matters, and one scarcely ever utters a statement in the future tense without the expression in shā' allāh ("if God wills"). God is invoked in many formulas of politeness, suggesting that the regular exchanges of social life occur under divine sanction and control. The word "God" is also used in a metonymic sense for the community, so that an expression such as 'aduww allāh (the enemy of God), used to refer to a dangerous heretic, has the sense of "public enemy number one." Similarly, khayl allāh (the army of God) denotes the army of the Muslim state, and so on.

See also caliph, caliphate; faith; prophecy

Further Reading

Toshihiko Izutsu, God and Man in the Qur'an, 1980; Josef van Ess, The Flowering of Muslim Theology, 2006; W. Montgomery Watt, Islamic Philosophy and Theology, 1985; Idem, Islamic Political Thought: The Basic Concepts, 1968.

DEVIN J. STEWART

governance

Governance (al-siyāsa al-shar'iyya) refers to political and administrative policies regulating matters of public law and the public interest (maṣlaḥa) in classical Islamic thought. The term siyāsa refers broadly to executive matters associated with governance and statecraft. Shar'iyya is the adjectival form for divine law (shari'a), articulated by the jurists in a body of legal doctrine, called fiqh, which are rules resulting from applying particular methodologies for interpreting Islamic legal texts. For this reason, the phrase al-siyāsa al-shar'iyya has been translated as "governance in accordance with the shari'a." It may also be viewed as the exposition of classical Islamic political theory, as jurists systematized doctrines of politico-legal theory primarily through writings on this topic.

After Muhammad's death, the fledgling Muslim community needed a new leader. A portion of the community supported the leadership of the first four caliphs—Abu Bakr, 'Umar b. al-Khattab, 'Uthman b. 'Affan, and 'Ali b. Abi Talib. Later, Sunnis argued that this order reflected the caliph's rank in excellence, for which the entire Muslim community owed them respect and reverence. (The argument was clearly in response to the Shi'i refrain that 'Ali was the best and most excellent candidate to assume leadership over the community immediately after the Prophet.) For support of their position, Sunnis pointed to the Qur'an's instructions for Muslims to "obey God and his Messenger and those in authority over you" (4:59). A separate portion of the community maintained that Muhammad had designated his first cousin and son-in-law 'Ali to lead the community, to be followed by a series of his descendants (called imams). This group came to be known as the Shi'is, who argued that only the imams were divinely guided and thus qualified to lead the community in religious affairs. Both groups argued early on that community leaders were necessary—indeed divinely sanctioned—to carry out God's will on behalf of the entire community. The important questions were, Who was authorized to guide the community, and what was their scope of political and religious authority?

An initially wide scope of authority narrowed over time. The first four caliphs asserted broad political and religious authority, issuing decrees on matters of governance as well as Islamic law. But this stance did not go unchallenged during the reigns of the first two dynasties, the Umayyads (661–750) and Abbasids (750–1258). From the start, the proto-Shi'is challenged Umayyad political legitimacy and law-making authority. Many retreated to the scholarly circles of Muhammad's family members and Companions, who increasingly taught and issued legal decisions quite independently of the circles close to the reigning caliph. Discussions in these circles intensified, and political developments fostered an enduring split between the agents of government and these scholars, who dissociated themselves from government ties, forming a "pious opposition" to Umayyad and early Abbasid rule. The scholars resisted a proposal by the Abbasid litterateur 'Abd Allah b. al-Muqaffa' to permit the ruler to exercise unlimited political and legal authority. This proposal failed, and the scholars ('ulama') gradually formed the class of jurists (fuqahā') that came to enjoy virtually exclusive interpretive authority over matters of law. In this context, al-siyāsa al-shar'iyya meant political governance in accordance with Islamic law, which could not always be determined by the ruler. The ruler therefore was to consult with the jurists on many matters.

Mawardi (d. 1058) is credited as the first to propound a developed theory of al-siyāsa al-shar'iyya in his book Al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (which means roughly "Ordinances of governance"). In his conception, only jurists who had received the requisite training were qualified to interpret Islamic law. However, the ruler enjoys considerable discretion over ostensibly legal issues by virtue of his duties to uphold and execute the law, ensure the continued existence of the Muslim community, and preserve the sanctity of the public sphere. Mawardi discussed these duties in terms of a ruler's overarching obligation to vindicate "God's claims" (huqūq Allāh), which were public duties involving the public sphere. In contrast, private claims (huqūq al-nās or huqūq al-'ibād) were readily pursued by individuals in courts or before private jurists. Mawardi outlined ten public duties for which the ruler was responsible; these included such matters as providing for public works through tax collection, ensuring public safety through policing and imposing criminal sanctions, and making appointments to public offices. In this context, the term siyāsa was used synonymously with criminal law and tax-collecting jurisdiction, among other areas of public duties.

Most jurists including Mawardi had maintained the supremacy of shari'a by insisting that the operation and scope of political governance were restricted to the appropriate confines of government administration, as designated by the jurists. In other words, these jurists maintained that the ruler had authority only over areas that fell under the legal doctrine permitting expedient decisions in the public interest. However, jurists of the various legal schools differed regarding the definition of the public interest and its relation to shari'a. The Maliki jurist Qarafi (d. 1285), for example, maintained that expedience is an essential part of Islamic law in line with its broad aims to ensure the well-being of the community, avert corruption, and upbold the public interest. Thus law was not to be suspended when a ruler acted expediently, giving the ruler significant discretion, nor was the ruler bound to juristic definitions of expedience. Moreover, jurists of various legal schools also differed about the qualifications of the ruler. While some, such as Juwayni (d. 1078), argued that the ruler should ideally be an expert in Islamic law (mujtahid), others, such as Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), rejected that requirement, insisting that it was enough that the ruler cooperate with the jurists. Ibn Khaldun (d. 1406) noted that such cooperation between the ruler and the jurists was necessary only in religious matters, not in political or economic matters. In sum, all maintained that political legitimacy extended from the shari'a, which came from God, and some, such as Abu Bakr al-Baqillani (d. 1013), suggested that legitimacy also extended from the Muslim community at large through electors or "those who loosen and bind" (ahl al-hall wa-l-'aqd) the ties between the community and their leaders. These electors were respected leaders and elders who pledged allegiance to the rulers on behalf of their local communities. This, along with the Qur'anic verse 4:59, set up arguments that modern-day jurists would use to find bases in the Islamic historical traditions of governance for democracy.

See also Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); jurisprudence; Mawardi (974–1058); shari'a

Further Reading

L. Carl Brown, Religion and State: The Muslim Approach to Politics, 2000; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; H.A.R. Gibb, "Constitutional Organization," in Law in the Middle East, edited by M. Khadduri and H. Liebesny, 1955; A.K.S. Lambton, State and Government in Islam—An Introduction to the Study of Islamic Political Theory, 1981; Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government, translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 1995; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, Religion and Politics under the Early 'Abbasids, 1997.

INTISAR A. RABB

government

The term commonly used to refer to "government" in Arabic is ḥukūma; the term in Turkish is hükümet; and the term in Persian is ḥukūmat. They all refer to the holders of authority, the members of the cabinet, and more generally to the authoritative structures of the state. These specific meanings were acquired only in the 19th century. Traditionally, Muslim jurists used a variety of terms, sometimes interchangeably, to refer to the acts of government in Islam, including amr, imāra, wilāya, khilāfa, imāma, dawla, mulk, ḥukm, tadbīr, siyāsa, and sulṭān. The historian Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406) considered al-khilāfa, al-imāma, al-ri'āsa, and al-sulṭān to mean the same thing: the succession to the political authority of the Prophet. Following the same tradition, a prominent 20th-century Muslim scholar, Muhammad Rashid Rida (1865–1935), used al-khilāfa, al-imāma al-'uzmā, and imārat al-mu'minīn as synonymous terms that refer to the leadership of the Islamic government in religious and worldly matters. The Egyptian constitutional jurist 'Abd al-Razzaq al-Sanhuri (1895–1971) used al-khilāfa and "Islamic government" interchangeably.

The traditional usage of the term ḥukūma refers to the act of arbitration between disputing parties and of deterring others from transgression. The word ḥukūma derives from the root ḥ-k-m, which in classical Arabic generally means "judgment, knowledge, and wisdom." Ḥukm is an ancient Arabic word and is mentioned in the Qur'an, as a root or its derivatives, 192 times with a wide range of meanings, including wisdom, judgment, perfection, deterrence, knowledge, and arbitration. Traditionally associated with the acts of adjudication and arbitration, the word gradually acquired broader meanings and entered into a variety of fields such as jurisprudence, logic, philosophy, linguistics, literature, and politics. In politics, ḥukūma denotes a binding authority that dispenses justice, deters people from wrongdoing, and directs them to fulfilling their welfare (maṣlaha).

In Islamic history, the word ḥukm has had a critical association with authority and justice. The Qur'an 4:59 commands believers to "obey Allah and obey the Messenger and those in authority (ulū al-amr) from among you; then if you quarrel about anything, refer it to Allah and the Messenger." The term ulū al-amr was interpreted in various ways and covered different groups that include political authority. 'Abdallah b. al-'Abbas (619–87), a prominent interpreter of the Qur'an, explained "those in authority" as referring to the learned scholars. It also denotes "those who unbind and bind" in society. The term was then commonly used to refer to the "rulers." Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111) used the term for those with military authority (aṣḥāb al-shawka). The Egyptian reformer Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905) expanded the meaning of the term to include the rulers, the scholars, the army commanders, and all the heads and leaders to whom the people refer for their needs and public interests.

The question of who rules, or the qualities of the head of the Islamic government, has been critical in Islamic history. The first political conflict between the members of the early Muslim community took place immediately after the death of the Prophet (632) over the issue of ḥukm, or rule. The disagreement was not over the necessity of the establishment and continuation of political authority after the death of the Prophet but instead over who should succeed the Prophet as ruler of the Muslim community. Early Muslims also believed in the necessity of establishing one government under a single leader. This was indeed the source of the second conflict that took place between the fourth caliph, 'Ali b. Abi Talib, and Mu'awiya b. Abi Sufyan, the governor of Damascus, over who had the right to select the caliph and the source of the political legitimacy of the head of state.

Constitutional Theory of Government

Classical Muslim writings on government were drawn from the fundamental sources of Islam: the Qur'an and the sunna of the Prophet and the practices and consensus of the members of the early Muslim community, particularly of the Companions of the Prophet and the Rightly Guided Caliphate. The early views on government and rule were often dispersed along the various sections of the classical jurisprudential sources. The classical manuals of Islamic jurisprudence included discussions of government and administration as separate sections of imāra or wilāya or under sections dealing with zakat (alms giving), jihad, kharāj (revenues), and obedience. In the Muslim worldview, politics was viewed primarily in terms of welfare (ṣalāh), justice, avoiding corruption, and leading people to fulfill their religious obligations. Several prominent jurists discussed issues of government and administration, such as Ibn al-Muqaffa' (ca. 720–56), Abu Yusuf (ca. 731–98), Ibn Abi al-Rabi' (d. 864), Jahiz (d. 868), Baqillani (d. 1013), and Baghdadi (d. 1037). However, it was not before the 11th century that a comprehensive and systematic juridical theory of government and administration developed. This was marked by the writing of Mawardi's (974–1058) influential book al-Ahkam al-Sultaniyya (The ordinances of government), which laid down many of the tenets of the classical political theory of government and became an influential reference for later generations of political theorists.

The classical constitutional theory of government revolved around six essential principles: (1) the establishment of authority is a religious and rational necessity; (2) the leader of the community is selected by ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd (those who unbind and bind, i.e., the influential elites in the community) or by testamentary designation; (3) the leader combines political and religious functions and has jurisdiction over the legislature (in cases where there is no ruling from the Qur'an or the traditions of the Prophet [sunna] or preexisting consensus) and the judiciary; (4) the leader is a successor to the Prophet and is obliged to implement the rules of Islam; (5) the leader has authority over the entire Muslim territories; and (6) as long as the ruler performs his functions, he is entitled to the obedience and support of the umma.

The Principles of Government

Muslim jurists, classical and modern, agree that the Qur'an does not stipulate a specific form or system of government. The Prophet died without designating a successor or delineating certain structures of government. Shi'is differ on this issue and believe that 'Ali was designated as a successor. Juwayni (1028–1105) asserts that there is no point trying to find a text in the Qur'an that addresses the details of the imamate. The Prophet's act has been interpreted to mean that as a primarily worldly issue he wanted the Muslims to devise the form of government they found suitable for the needs of the time and circumstances. The jurists concur, however, that the Qur'an sets forth several guiding principles for government. These principles are open to a variety of interpretations. Modern Muslim thinkers expand the scope of these principles to include up to 12 social and political values that guide the government of Islam, of which the most common in classical and modern writings on government are justice, equality, and shūrā (consultation).

Justice

The value of justice is a central principle in Islam and an essential source for legitimizing the government. The Qur'an contains about 300 verses that directly relate to justice and a similar number dealing with injustice, attesting to the centrality of this concept. The injunctions to adhere to justice take a variety of forms ranging from establishing justice—in the best of ways—to pursuing this value with those one disagrees with or even hates. The Qur'an sets a universal rule: "God enjoins justice, doing good, and giving to kinsfolk, whilst He forbids indecent conduct, disreputable deeds, and insolence. He admonishes you so that you may be reminded" (Q. 16:90). According to Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (1149–1209), a prominent commentator on the Qur'an, the entire Qur'an is an elucidation of this principle. With those that may hold different, even hostile positions, the Qur'an urges Muslims, "O you who believe, be steadfast for God, bearing witness with equity. Let not the hatred of any people induce you to act injustly. Act justly—that is nearer to fear of God—and fear God" (Q. 5:8). The impartial delivery of justice is a fundamental value for government in Islam.

The traditions of the Prophet list the "just" imam among those whom God protects in His shade on the Day of Judgment. It is part of the Islamic tradition that justice is the basis of rule and government and that God supports the just state even if it is not Muslim. The jurists have considered justice as one of the qualities of the imam and a requisite for his selection. According to Ghazali, the true sultan was he who acted with justice and refrained from tyranny and corruption. This condition is also required for the appointment of judges, the people (ahl al-ikhtiyār) who have the right to select the ruler, and government officials. Justice as a value is central in defining the relationship among the members of the community as well as between them and other communities.

Equality

The concept of equality rests on the belief in One Creator and in the equal nature of all human beings: men and women, Muslims and non-Muslims. Human beings have rights and responsibilities regardless of their color, religion, or social status. Of course, Islam considers the inevitability of distinctions between people based on knowledge, reason, faith, and functions. However, the Qur'an asserts the principle of the equal nature of humanity, "O people, fear your Lord, who created you from a single soul and who created from it its fellow and who spread many men and women from the two of them; and fear God, through whom you seek rights from one another and from the ties of relationship. God is a watcher over you" (Q. 4:1). No one could lay claim to superiority over others, for all people are equal in origin and in creation or nature. In his farewell address, the Prophet emphasized the equality of all people and the criteria for distinction: "O people, your Lord is One, and your father is one: all of you are from Adam, and Adam was from the ground. The noblest of you in Allah's sight is the most god-fearing: Arab has no merit over non-Arab other than god-fearingness." The concept of equality was perhaps one of the reasons for the appeal of Islam among the poor and slaves, as it stressed the human equality of everyone, regardless of wealth or status.

The confirmation of the principle of equality has clear and direct implications for government. The equal membership of the community necessitates equality of rights and duties and the supremacy of the shari'a over everyone. As equals, Muslims have the same political rights in assuming public positions, running for an office, and voting. Muslim political theorists often refer to the incidents of Muslims rulers, particularly some of the Rightly Guided Caliphate, who were subject to the rule of law and obligated to carry out judgments made against them.

Shūrā

Muslim political theorists agree on the principle of shūrā (consultation) as an essential component of government in Islam. Modern thinkers consider the shūrā the most important constitutional principle of the Islamic system of government. The Qur'an refers to this principle of shūrā twice. In verses 3:159 and 42:38, shūrā is associated with two important pillars of Islam, ritual praying and almsgiving, or salat and zakat, attesting to the fundamental significance of the concept. The sunna of the Prophet stresses the value of shūrā. It is reported that the Prophet frequently consulted with his Companions on various important issues that pertained to the affairs of the community. The Maliki scholar Abu 'Abdallah al-Qurtubi (1214–73) asserts, "When [a ruler] does not consult with the learned scholars, then it becomes necessary to depose him. There is no disagreement among the scholars on this [issue]." 'Abduh argues for the necessity of the shūrā on the basis of a third verse that states, "Let there be [one] community from you, summoning [people] to good and enjoining what is reputable and forbidding what is disreputable. Those will be the ones who prosper" (Q. 3:104). He relates this verse to the need for a group of people with the authority to encourage the rulers to do good and forbid them from wrongdoing. 'Abduh equates good with justice and wrongdoing with tyranny.

While acknowledging the importance of shūrā as a fundamental concept of government, scholars debated its nature and implementation. They differed on whether the shūrā was of an obligatory or advisory nature; whether or not it was binding; its scope; and which people (ahl al-shūrā) the ruler ought to consult. Classical scholars did not devise a structure or an institution for regulating the practice of the shūrā; such developments arose only many centuries later. The conventional views and practice established that while the rulers needed to consult with advisors and experts, the shūrā was neither compulsory nor binding. Highlighting the importance of shūrā, some jurists reduced the whole issue of government to an imam and his council of advisors (imām wa-ahl mashūrātihi).

The Islamic views of government are anchored in the premise that God has revealed the necessary principles, laws, and rules and has obligated Muslims to follow them in their relations with Him, among themselves, and with others. These principles, laws, and rules are contained explicitly or implicitly in the shari'a, which should be the guiding frame of reference and the source of legitimacy for an Islamic government. It is exactly this point that captures the essence of an Islamic government and distinguishes it from other types of government. The Islamic government draws its principles, laws, and practices from the shari'a. Classical jurists realized fully the implications of this orientation and placed the shari'a and God as the sovereign supermen, not the government, the state, or the people. Many attribute the development of this concept to the contemporary Muslim thinkers Mawdudi and Sayyid Qutb, but, in fact, classical jurists underscored this principle as well. Ghazali stated, "Ḥukm (rule, judgment, or sovereignty) belongs only to Allah; there is no sovereignty for the Messenger, or for a master over his slave, or a creature over another. All of that falls under God's jurisdiction and his stipulations; there is no ruler except him." Sayf al-Din al-Amidi (d. 1233) made a similar argument: "Know that there is no ruler except Allah and that there is no law except what he has revealed." Based on this concept, the classical scholars understood, first, that the shari'a preceded the government and the state. Second, God and the shari'a have legislative sovereignty in the Islamic government. Third, the shari'a, or the legislature, is independent of the authority of the government. Fourth, the government and the ruler are not above the law, but their main function is to uphold the shari'a and implement the law.

The classical theory of government has had a formative and lasting impact on the formulations of political theory in Islam. The early writings on government concentrated on several fundamental issues: the necessity of establishing a government, the qualities and source of the authority of the right imam (i.e., the qualifications of the head of the state), those who have the right to select the imam (ahl al-ikhtiyār), the qualifications of the people who unbind and bind (ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd), the transfer of rule or succession, obedience and rebellion, the unity of the authority, and usurpation of power. The jurists tried to devise the legal frameworks that would preserve the general order and unity of the Muslims. In many cases, they had to extend the juridical principles to accommodate the changes in the forms and practices of government. In these early formulations, the caliphate was central to the discussion of the ordinances of government among Sunni theorists, and the imamate was central to the Shi'i jurists. A major concern was to provide juridical arguments for accepting the existing institutions and the continuation of the religious and social life of the community as preferable to anarchy or civil disorder.

The Necessity of Government

Muslim political theorists considered government or the caliphate or imamate a necessary institution for fulfilling certain religious and temporal functions. They differed, however, on the justification for this principle and whether it was provided by divine law (shar'), reason ('aql), or both. Sunni theorists base the necessity of an authoritative entity on the concept of ijmā', the consensus of the Prophet's Companions, who realized the need for political authority to continue managing the affairs of the Muslims after the death of the Prophet. The consensus of the early community of learned scholars is one of the fundamental sources of legislation, and, accordingly, the establishment of government becomes obligatory. Ayatollah Murtada al-'Askari (d. 2007) explains that the amr has always been understood as the issue of the imamate and government for the Muslims, Shi'i and Sunni alike. The Qur'an refers to the necessity of obeying those with authority. It also mentions that the Prophet stressed the need for the establishment of a ruling authority: "People are bound to have a just or unjust authority (imāra). They also need a ruler (imam)." According to another hadith, "The imam is a shield behind which people fight and defend themselves." The law therefore requires the establishment of an authority.

The Mu'tazilis and the philosophers justify the necessity of government based primarily on reason. Government is necessary for the welfare of the community, which consists of individuals who need to interact in an orderly fashion to ensure their welfare and prosperity. Government therefore is a natural form of social association, because individuals are incapable of living alone and tend to transgress against each other. An authority is necessary to keep order and promote the well-being of the members of the community.

Shi'is consider the imamate, the leadership of the Muslim community, a fundamental pillar of religion that should not be left to the discretion of the umma but instead must be designated by God and the Prophet. According to the Shi'i jurist Nasir al-Din al-Tusi (1201–74), the imam is lutf (divine bounty) and therefore should be designated by God. In Shi'i political theory, the Prophet has designated an imam, 'Ali b. Abi Talib, who in turn has designated a successor. Therefore, government for Shi'is is necessary because of the naṣṣ (or designation) and is a farḍ 'ayn (an obligation on every Muslim).

The Kharijis, particularly the Najadat sect, and some Mu'tazilis do not consider government to be necessary. For them, the main purpose of government is to establish justice and implement the rules of the shari'a. If the people can achieve these objectives on their own, then an established authority or government becomes unnecessary. A few contemporary thinkers like 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq (1887–1966) and other secular Muslim intellectuals hold similar views and do not consider the government a fundamental part of Islam.

The Prophet's Model

Muslim political theorists believe that Islam, unlike Christianity, was born to develop a state and a government. They concur that the Prophet established a form of political authority that reflected the basic components of a government. The state of Medina included a territory, a community, and a form of authority and sovereignty entrusted with managing the affairs of that community. The Prophet maintained dual functions and exercised both religious and temporal authority. He performed many of the functions of a government. He acted as a ruler, judge, and military commander and appointed 'ummāl (officials) to represent him to the far regions under his control. This model represented a clear intertwining of religious and political authorities.

The Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61)

Following the footsteps of the Prophet, the government of the Rightly Guided Caliphate continued, in the eyes of many Muslims, to merge the ideals with the practices. This government, however, was viewed as civic and not divine. The caliphs had religious functions, but they did not rule by divine authority or assume the religious nature of the Prophet. The members of the community were the main source for the selection of the caliph, the leadership of the community was based on a contract and consensus, the supremacy of the shari'a was closely observed, and the members of the community had the right to depose the rulers if they violated the essential principles of Islam. This "ideal" or idealized form of government lasted for about 30 years and was followed by a dynastic or imperial model that shaped the forms and functions of government in Islam for centuries to come.

The Dynastic or Imperial Model

Government in the imperial or dynastic model during the reigns of the Umayyad caliphate (661–750) and Abbasid caliphate (750–1258) rested on different principles and practices. This model reflected a clear separation between the Islamic ideals of government and the actual practices. It witnessed significant political developments such as the rise of the political sects or parties, increasing political rivalries and disputes, the formulations of systematic and comprehensive writings on political jurisprudence, and the establishment of elaborate administrative and legal institutions. The classical political writings tended to perceive the government as a functional post. The most important of its functions were to protect and defend religion, to establish an organized authority, and to maintain order to enable people to fulfill their religious and social life. As long as the government was able to achieve these objectives, it was considered legitimate, or at least acceptable. To consolidate power and prevent the disintegration of political authority, the dynastic model instituted the practice of the designation of a successor that presumably possessed the qualities of leadership. As usurpers and less-deserving rulers took over power, however, these qualities were overlooked and the theory allowed for the rule of the less competent (imāmat al-mafḍūl) as long as they possessed the requirements of leadership (i.e., controlling and maintaining order). The prominent jurist Shafi'i (767–820) was the first to sanction the leadership of the less competent. This became known historically as the "imamate of necessity."

The imamate of necessity became an accepted form, though viewed as irregular, and eventually replaced the rightful government. It was sanctioned by the jurists who were concerned for the continuation of the religious and social life of the community. In the 11th to 12th centuries Ghazali admits to this development and necessity: "There are those who hold the imamate is dead, lacking as it does the required qualifications. But no substitute can be found for it. What then? Are we to give up obeying the law? Shall we dismiss the qadis, declare all authority to be valueless, cease marrying and pronounce the acts of those in high places to be invalid at all points, leaving the population to live in sinfulness? Or shall we continue as we are, recognizing that the imamate really exists and that all acts of the administration are valid, given the circumstances of the case and the necessities of the actual moment? The concessions made by us are not spontaneous, but necessity makes lawful what is forbidden." The imperial model disintegrated in the tenth century and was replaced with empire states, the last of which was the Ottoman caliphate that was abolished in 1924.

Institutions and Structures of Government

The traditional theories of government centered on the institution of the caliphate and on the caliph. The issue of the caliphate of the Prophet is critical in Islamic history. It was a main cause for the emergence of political parties. Shi'is and Kharijis had different views on who should rule and on the authorities of the leader of the Muslim community. They often questioned the legitimacy of the existing authority. Sunni jurists formulated their theories on government largely in response to these views and in an attempt to accommodate the growing disparity between the Islamic ideals of government and the actual practices. They were concerned about maintaining the unity of government and the existing political institutions. Their discussions of the sources of legitimacy and political authority focused on the qualities of the ruler, the qualities of those who select him, and the main functions of government.

The Caliphate and the Caliph

Muslim jurists have provided various definitions for the caliphate, all focused on the nature and functions of this institution or on the position and the caliph himself, his qualities, and jurisdictions. Mawardi refers to the caliphate as the succession of the Prophet in the protection of religion and the management of earthly affairs. Ibn Khaldun considers the caliphate to be associated not with kingship but with religion and prophethood, as the Islamic government is a vicegerent to the Prophet in protecting religion and managing worldly affairs on its basis (hirāsat al-dīn wa-siyāsat al-dunyā bihī). Ibn Khaldun's definition qualified Mawardi's by stressing the role of religion in government. Both, however, rejected the notion that the caliph was the successor of God on Earth, a title that was used during the later days of the Abbasid caliphate. Stressing the importance of this post, Ghazali contends that the "shari'a is the basis of rule and authority (mulk) is its guardian. Whatever has no basis is bound to collapse and whatever has no guard is bound to disappear."

Based on the example of the Prophet and the Rightly Guided Caliphate, political theorists drew an idealistic image of the caliph and required certain qualifications that gradually became difficult to uphold. Mawardi specified seven qualifications: justice or moral probity, knowledge and the ability to exercise independent legal reasoning (ijtihād), the soundness of the senses, physical soundness, prudence, bravery, and descent from the Prophet's tribe of Quraysh. As less-competent or even unqualified rulers assumed power, however, the conditions of knowledge and ijtihād, prudence, or even moral probity were overlooked under the argument that the ruler could use the ijtihād and the knowledge of expert advisors. Similarly, as non-Qurashi and even non-Arab usurpers assumed actual control of the caliphate, the condition of lineage was reinterpreted primarily as an issue of solidarity and the capacity to exercise influence and power. The Kharijis rejected the condition of descent and reasserted the right of every Muslim to assume the caliphate.

The issue of the election or selection of the caliph and those who exercised this privilege was problematic. The caliph could not be duly invested and his authority could not be legitimate until he secured an oath of allegiance (bay'a) from the umma through its representatives, ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd (those who unbind and bind), or the elites who exercised influence over their constituencies and who also had to possess certain qualities, such as moral probity, knowledge, and prudence. With the changes in actual practices, the number of the people who could make the selection was reduced to less than five, thus depriving the umma from a true voice in the selection process. At some point, the actual seizure of power became a sufficient condition for the existence and acceptance of authority. Ibn Taymiya tried to redress this and considered the selection of ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd an act of nomination that did not replace the general bay'a of the members of the community, the decisive process for the election of the caliph.

Another process for the investiture of the caliph was by testamentary designation, or istikhlāf. The jurists used the precedent of the first caliph, Abu Bakr, and his designation of 'Umar as his successor to sanction the later practice of hereditary rule as incumbent imams designated their heirs as successors. Shi'is acknowledged designation and not selection as the proper process for the selection of the imam. They bestowed on the imam innate and extraordinary qualities.

Jurists did not set limits for the term of the caliph. He could stay in power as long as he was capable of carrying out his functions and did not commit a violation that required his removal from power. Practically, however, the term of the caliph ended with his death, abdication, or an usurpation of his power. The classical political writings do not elaborate on the means by which the caliph could be removed peacefully from power, and in fact removals often involved armed takeovers (istīlā' or taghallub), which were then sanctioned as de facto situations that ensured the continuation of authority and order. The seizure of power gave de facto authority to the government.

When the caliphs were strong, they exercised expansive powers. The early writings on the caliphate did not refer to any separation of powers and gave the head of the government expansive authorities. The caliph by definition was the successor of the Prophet in defending religion and managing the earthly affairs of Muslims. As the head of the Islamic state, the caliph was expected to perform religious and political functions. He had to defend religion, launch jihad, uphold the main pillars of Islam, collect and distribute the revenues, manage public affairs, defend the state, maintain public order, dispense justice, and appoint the governors and officials. The caliph was not expected to perform all of these functions personally. He could appoint whomever he wished to help him carry out these tasks. The caliph had the right to appoint (and dismiss) governors (*wālī*s), officials ('ummāl), ministers, and judges. As long as the caliph performed his functions and did not commit clear infractions, he was entitled to the obedience and assistance of the members of the community. While enjoying broad executive powers, the head of the government was in theory subordinate to the shari'a and was not free to contravene its rules.

The Legislative Functions of Government

Legislation in Islam is divided into two types: divine and human. The divine legislation is revealed in the Qur'an as general principles or explicit rulings and is stipulated in the sunna of the Prophet. The human legislation is driven from the understanding of the fundamental sources of Islam (the Qur'an and sunna) and through the independent reasoning (ijtihād) of the scholars and jurists to come up with rulings to address new issues. During the time of the Prophet and the Rightly Guided Caliphate, the Prophet, his Companions, and learned scholars performed the legislative functions. As a messenger and ruler, the Prophet combined the executive and legislative functions. The Rightly Guided Caliphate addressed worldly issues based on the Qur'an, the sunna, and their own judgment. As mentioned earlier, it is reported that the Prophet and the Rightly Guided Caliphate consulted regularly with learned Companions on developments for which the Qur'an had not provided a specific stipulation.

With the flourishing of the sciences of jurisprudence over the first three centuries of Islam, the functions of legislation were performed by the jurists (learned scholars) who were not elected or appointed by rulers but recognized in society for their knowledge of the fundamental sources of Islam, their integrity, and their capacity to deduce new rulings to address societal changes. The caliphs, governors, and political elites exercised legislative authorities for administrative and temporal matters. The gap between the two authorities, scholars and rulers, increasingly widened. Another significant development in the legislative process was the limited exercise of ijtihād by the tenth century and the stagnation of legislation in general. Scholars tended to follow the footsteps of preceding jurists, and the gap between legislation and reality grew. Most contemporary Muslim countries adopted modern, Western-inspired structures of government and established legislative institutions (elected or appointed parliaments, assemblies, or consultative councils) to carry out the legislative functions. With the adoption of foreign-inspired laws, many of these parliaments did not fully follow a system of codified shari'a laws and even contradicted the shari'a in their legislation, thus creating a state of tension and a problem of legitimacy.

The Judicial Functions

Islam has required the establishment of justice, equity, and fair adjudication among people. The early Islamic system of government did not distinguish between the structures of authority. The rulers combined executive and judicial functions. The Prophet assumed the judicial functions and also appointed judges to the far regions under his jurisdiction. The early caliphs followed this practice. With the expansion of the Islamic state and the responsibilities of the rulers, the position of judge was created. The second caliph, 'Umar, appointed judges to the different provinces to represent him in his judicial authority. Later, governors delegated by the caliph had the authority to appoint judges to look into legal and civic issues. The implementation of rulings and penalties (ḥudūd and qiyās), however, remained the responsibility of the executive authority (the caliphs and governors). During the Abbasid caliphate, the judicial system became more elaborate. The caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809) established the position of the head judge (qāḍī al-quḍāt), who was given the authority to appoint other judges. The first to assume this position was the famous jurist Abu Yusuf, the student of Abu Hanifa (699–767). The appointed judges assumed their judicial responsibilities in or outside the mosques or in specially designated places, like dār al-qaḍā' (court). Though the jurists produced elaborate literature on the judiciary, the judges, their qualification, and best practices, the rulings and the judicial process at large were left up to the judge and often went unrecorded. In fact, the Islamic law was known as "the judges' law." The judges based their sentences on the shari'a, when applicable, and on customary laws. This created inconsistencies and contradictory rulings in many cases. The failure to delineate the judicial and the political establishment (rulers) created problems with regard to the jurisdictions of each and the implementation of sentences, which were left up to the authorities to carry out. The courts' structure was simple and did not allow for an appeal process.

Two institutions were associated with judicial functions: the ḥisba and the Court of Grievances. The system of ḥisba is directly drawn from the principle of enjoining good and forbidding wrongdoing. As a concept, the main purpose of the ḥisba was to safeguard the implementation of Islamic principles and protect society against their violations. The ḥisba official's, or muḥtasib's, main functions combined those of a qadi and a policeman. The muḥtasib was expected to maintain public order and prevent public acts of immorality. In many cases, judges assumed this function, which focused on preserving public virtues and upright social standards; overseeing the marketplaces; inspecting the scales and commodities; making sure roads were open; forcing people to make house repairs; and protecting Muslims from fraud, extortion, and exploitation.

The Umayyad caliph 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwan (r. 685–705) established the Court of the Redress of Grievances as a separate institution. It resembled an administrative court and fell directly under the jurisdiction of the caliph, who appointed deputies or judges to address grievances against state officials (e.g., governors and tax collectors) and to arbitrate administrative disputes. In some cases, the caliph assumed this task himself. The jurisdictions of the Court of Grievances addressed the use of public funds, endowments, and complaints from public or state employees. This system continues to exist in several Muslim states.

The Administrative System

With the expansion of the Islamic state and functions of government, rulers needed to expand their administrative machinery. They appointed governors and officials to help them in the administration of the provinces. The administrative unit in the Islamic state was the wilāya or iqlīm, which was governed by a walī or amir. 'Umar organized the territories under his control into 8 main provinces. These were expanded into 14 under the Umayyad caliphate and 24 under the Abbasid caliphate. The governor of the province performed administrative, judicial, military, and religious functions on behalf of the caliph. The Umayyad and Abbasid caliphates followed a centralized system of government, and as the caliphate began to weaken, some provinces became practically autonomous or pledged nominal allegiance to the caliph. The revenues that were collected from the provinces were spent first to meet the needs of the province, and then any surplus was sent over to the central authority.

The system of government adopted some Sasanid and Byzantine administrative structures. The dīwan system was among the first to be adopted. The dīwāns were administrative departments with specialized tasks for facilitating government business and transactions. Their functions covered the collection of revenues and taxes and the distribution of financial benefits. They evolved from a main dīwān for the revenues during the reign of 'Umar to many other dīwāns for the military, correspondences, records and archives, postal service, grievances, and the police during the Umayyad and Abbasid dynasties. To manage the vast Islamic state, the central dīwāns had branches in the various provinces of the empire.

The wizāra, or ministry, was the second most important structure after the caliphate. The term "vizier" (wazīr) was mentioned in the Qur'an to mean supporter or assistant. The Arabs considered Abu Bakr as Prophet Muhammad's wazīr. As an institution, however, the position of the minister became important during the Abbasid caliphate. Gradually, some wazīrs assumed extensive powers as they took charge of the administrative structures, the dīwāns, and even the army. In some cases, the position became hereditary and was monopolized by certain families. The early political writings focused on the wizāra, its different types, the qualities and functions of the wazīr, and efficient administration. To keep up with the actual developments of the position, Mawardi and others classified the ministry into execution and delegation. The functions of the former were mainly to carry out the directives of the caliph, while the minister of delegation exercised almost similar executive and administrative authorities as the caliph, except for designating a successor, resigning without the consent of the caliph, or deposing the caliph. The power and authority of the wazīr vis-à-vis the caliph fluctuated depending on the qualifications and skills of either. Some wazīrs became more influential than the caliphs and exercised full control over the government.

Additional institutions of significance for the management of the state affairs included the ḥājib (court chamberlain) and the kātib (scribe, secretary, or counselor). All of these institutions, including that of the caliphate, were historical and administrative institutions for government that had no stipulations in the fundamental texts. They were adopted out of the need for expediency in order to govern and administer the rapidly growing Muslim state. The caliphate, however, acquired a symbolic significance. It was the product of the consensus of the early Muslim community and was a uniquely Islamic institution. The caliphate represented for centuries the symbolic unity of the vast Muslim umma and combined both religious and political functions, which made the position more in tune with the Islamic frameworks and set it apart from the modern positions and titles of heads of state.

Modern Formulations of Government

The early jurists addressed the issues that concerned their time and circumstances. They concentrated on the functions of the government and on the fulfillment of specific functions that were necessary for considering a government legitimate, even if it committed injustice. These formulations preserved the continuation of the institutions of Islamic government for centuries. In retrospect, several elements were clearly absent in the classical formulations of government: the mechanism for exercising the principles of shūrā (consensus) or ḥisba (enjoining good and forbidding evil), the mechanisms necessary to rectify the government when it abuses its authority or deviates from the fundamental principles of Islam, and the practical role of the members of the umma in the political process. All of these issues became significant in the modern formulations of government.

Rida raised these concerns. He attributed the gradual disintegration of the system of government in Islam to the practice of hereditary rule, the failure of Muslims to devise a system of accountability to obligate the government to work for the welfare of the community and in accordance with the principles of Islam, and the ability of despots to undermine the control of ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd. He also lamented the deterioration of the qualifications of the caliphs—namely, knowledge, moral probity, and shūrā—that led to the weakness of both the state and the Muslim umma.

The formulations of the modern theory of government were influenced to a large extent by classical theory, modern Western political theory, and developments in Muslim societies. The collapse of the Ottoman caliphate in 1924 caused vigorous debate among Muslim thinkers. Secularist intellectuals, like the Egyptian 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq and the Kemalists in Turkey, denied that government and political authority were an integral part of Islam. Abd al-Raziq maintained that the essence of the Prophet's message was religious and spiritual and that Islam, understood properly, never intended to establish a state and a political authority. Therefore, the restoration of the caliphate or the establishment of an Islamic government was neither necessary nor a religious obligation. Abd al-Raziq's views stirred up heated debates. Scores of books on the caliphate and government in Islam were produced during the 1920s and 1930s to refute his ideas.

A few political writings on government followed the classical theory and continued to focus on the head of the state, his qualifications, and his functions. They discussed the requirement of the Qurashi descent as a condition for the imamate or gave the head of the state the same idealized status and extraordinary powers. Certain intellectuals and parties proposed modern Islamic constitutions that gave the head of the Islamic state and the executive extraordinary powers at the expense of the umma and the modern principles of an accountable and representative government.

Several Muslim reformers, on the other hand, tried to reconstruct a modern theoretical basis for government in Islam. The modern reformulations often concentrated on the sovereignty of the people and the assertion that the people were the source of the government's authority. They also focused on restricting the power of the government either by the constitutional checks of the shari'a or by the people. They revisited the classical Islamic principles of government and early political theory through the prism of the modern Western structures of government (the executive, legislative, and judiciary) and deduced "Islamic stands" on the separation of powers and the system of checks and balances. Many modern thinkers stressed the civic nature of the government and authority (in response to Western criticisms and to a fresh reading of the principles) and advocated term limits for the ruler. In their view, the Islamic government rested on three main constitutional principles: shūrā, accountability of the rulers, and the general will of the people (expressed in the bay'a) as the source of authority. They reinterpreted the Qur'anic verse "Obey Allah, obey the Messenger, and those in authority from among you" as ahl al-ḥall wa-l-'aqd, who derive their authority from the umma and act as its representatives. They referred to the hadith "my community does not concur on error" and to the concept of consensus to reassert the authority—and, for some, the sovereignty—of the people. The reformist intellectuals expanded the principles of government to include, in addition to justice, equality, and shūrā, such principles as freedom, the accountability of the ruler, and the monitoring right of the umma. In most cases, they remained vague on the specifics and instruments of a modern Islamic government.

Rida attempted to synthesize the Islamic and modern principles of government. He described the Islamic government as the government of the caliphate and at the same time a civic government. In this government, the authority lies in the hands of the umma, the management of the state affairs is conducted by consultation, and the ruler assumes power through election or the bay'a of the representatives of the umma. Acknowledging the difficulty of restoring the traditional type of government, Rida accepted "the caliphate of necessity" as a temporary phase that, after serious preparations, would eventually lead to the establishment of a legitimate caliphate. In this temporary caliphate, the caliph would not assume actual responsibilities but would act as a symbolic figure and represent some sort of a religious legitimacy for an assembly of local Muslim governments.

Writing during the collapse of the caliphate and almost at the same time as Abd al-Raziq, the Egyptian legalist 'Abd al-Razzaq al-Sanhuri (1895–1971) considered the restoration of a proper Islamic government necessary to the unity of Muslims and the preservation of the law. He proposed a systematic and practical framework for a modern government in Islam. Sanhuri drew on the standard sources of Islam (Qur'an, sunna, and ijmā' of the members of early the community) to formulate a constitutional theory of government. He considered ijmā' as the basis of a parliamentary and representative system in Islam. Sanhuri listed several fundamental principles for the Islamic government that included popular sovereignty, the necessity of the shūrā, and the accountability of the rulers. For him, the democratic republican system was the closest to the Islamic type of government. He considered the abuse of power as an act of fisq (transgression) that led to the removal of the ruler. He also viewed foreign domination and influence as signs that the leader must end his wilāya (authority) and remove himself from power. The true Islamic government for Sanhuri performed three main functions: it combined religious and temporal authorities, defended the unity of the Muslim people, and adhered to the shari'a. Sanhuri advocated the establishment of a league of Muslim governments to replace the abolished caliphate until the Muslims were able to establish a rightful and proper one.

The Algerian Muslim reformer 'Abd al-Hamid b. Badis (1889–1940) welcomed the collapse of the Ottoman caliphate, which for him had deviated from the true Islamic principles of government. He used the accession speech of Abu Bakr and reformulated a modernist perspective of government. Written in 1938, these principles emphasized the consensual nature of government, equality before the law, the shared responsibility of state and society, the accountability of the government, conditional obedience and loyalty, and public participation in policy making. While considering these principles as intrinsic to Islam, Ibn Badis recognized the West for enabling contemporary Muslims to reformulate these principles and read them along modern perspectives.

In his formulations of the government in Islam, the influential Pakistani Muslim thinker Mawdudi emphasized the concept of hākimiyya as the main criterion for the legitimacy of an Islamic government. For him, society and state should be subordinate to the authority of Islamic law as revealed in the Qur'an and the sunna of the Prophet. If a government discarded the revealed laws, it became illegitimate, and its authority ceased to be binding. He defined the proper Islamic government as a "theo-democracy" or a "democratic caliphate," which was based on the sovereignty of God and the vicegerency of men (i.e., man as God's caliph). This government conducts the affairs of its citizens on the basis of consultation. Many criticize Mawdudi for his adoption of contradictory terms inspired by a particular Western political experience—namely, theocracy and democracy. But his formulation demonstrates the reformers' struggle to synthesize modern and Islamic principles.

Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89) is credited with infusing the doctrine of wilāyat al-faqīh, or the guardianship of the jurist, into modern Islamic government in Iran. In a series of lectures delivered in Najaf in 1969, under the title of "The Guardianship of the Jurists: The Islamic Government," Khomeini presented the main tenets of his thoughts on government. According to him, Islam necessitated the establishment of a government to uphold the principles and laws of the shari'a and implement its injunctions. In this government, the jurists should play a major role as the most knowledgeable about Islamic law and as representatives of the imam. Since the faqīh is the source of emulation and represents the imam in religious matters, he can assume his "worldly authority" and preside over an Islamic government. Following the success of the revolution in Iran, the 1979 Constitution of the Islamic Republic carved a prominent role for the faqīh and entrusted Khomeini with overseeing the general policies of the republic. The new constitution adopted the modern structures of government and the system of checks and balances, but it also ensured the control of religious authorities over political processes.

The contemporary Iranian Islamic scholar Abdolkarim Soroush (b. 1945) has written against this tendency to "ideologize" religion. Such views have put him in disfavor with the Iranian government. Soroush is critical of the monopoly of the clergy over the interpretation of religious texts and the institutions of government. He stands against an a priori right of rule and the imposition of the government's will on the people. While the government may draw on religious values, it should be based on rational methods and the recognition of pluralism in society and the freedom of the individual.

The prominent Sudanese Islamic thinker and politician Hasan al-Turabi (b. 1932) bases his views on government on both the doctrine of tawhīd (monotheism) and the consent of the people. This makes the government accountable to the higher authority of the shari'a in the first place. However, the government for Turabi is not an absolute or sovereign entity because it is subjected to the constitutional checks of the shari'a and to popular consent. It is a form of a representative democracy. Though the Islamic government is a government of the shari'a, it is in a substantial sense a popular government since the shari'a represents the dominant value system of the people. Turabi advocates limited government. He considers the umma the primary institution in the state and claims that not every aspect of Islam is entrusted to the government to enforce.

In his book Public Freedoms in the Islamic State, Rachid al-Gannouchi (b. 1941) elaborates on the specific structures and the institutions of the Islamic government. He acknowledges that several political concepts in Islam, such as shūrā and political parties, have not been turned successfully into stable institutions for administering differences in society. The West, by contrast, established various mechanisms for popular representation and controlled government. This realization affects Gannouchi's perception of the Islamic government as he attempts to devise a systematic and institutionalized design. Gannouchi underscores the centrality of the human being as the basis of government and highlights the concept of freedom. He considers political authority necessary to achieve justice and uphold religion. The nature of this authority is civic, however, not divine; its source of authority is not God but the people. The shūrā, which represents for Gannouchi the real empowerment of the members of society, can take place at various levels: a direct form (referendum and public elections), through parliamentary representation, and through councils of scholars and experts specialized in their fields.

With regard to the modern institutions, form, or specifics of government, modern Muslim intellectuals tend to adopt an instrumentalist approach that allows for the emulation of modern Western political institutions while preserving the fundamental Islamic principles of government. They justify this position on the basis of necessity and historical precedent. In their view, the efficient running of government requires the adoption of modern institutions that the West had already developed, such as constitutions, parliaments, separate structures for government, political parties, and a free press. This requirement makes the adoption of these institutions an obligation (mā lā yatimm al-wājib illā bihi fa-huwa wājib). They also argue that historically the early Muslims did not shy away from adopting Sasanid and Byzantine institutions of government to manage the affairs of the Muslim state. Therefore, the adoption of modern political institutions is beneficial to Muslims as long as they do not infringe on the general principles of the shari'a. Hasan al-Banna, the founder of the Egyptian Muslim Brotherhood, accepted the parliamentary/constitutional form of government as the closest to an Islamic system, which stands on the accountability of the ruler, the unity of the umma, and the respect of its will.

Government as a concept, a set of principles, and a structure is an evolving notion within modern Islamic political thought. Contemporary Muslim intellectuals struggle to devise a coherent and systematic modern theory of Islamic government, a modern and at the same time indigenous framework of government that enjoys wide acceptance.

See also 'Abduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); authority; al-Banna, Hasan (1906–49); caliph, caliphate; consensus; consultation; democracy; guardianship of the jurist; imamate; leadership; Mawardi (974–1058); Mawdudi, Abu al-A'la (1903–79); obedience; parliament; public interest; Rida, Muhammad Rashid (1865–1935); Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); shari'a; Shi'ism; sovereignty; succession; sultan; Sunnism; taxation; al-Turabi, Hasan (b. 1932); usurper

Further Reading

Charles Butterworth, "State and Authority in Arabic Political Thought," in The Foundations of the Arab State, edited by Ghassan Salame, 1987; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Rashid al-Ghannoushi, Al-Huriyat al-Amma fi al-Dawala al-Islamiya, 1993; Ruhollah Khomeini, Islam and Revolution, translated by Hamid Algar, 1981; Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam: An Introduction to the Study of Islamic Political Theory: The Jurists, 1981; Bernard Lewis, The Political Language of Islam, 1988; Idem, Political Words and Ideas in Islam, 2008; Ali b. Muhammad al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government, translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 2006; Muhammad Rashid Rida, Al-Khilafa aw al-Imama al-'Uzma, 1922; Abd al-Razzaq al-Sanhuri, Fiqh al-Khilafa wa-Tatawwuruha li-Tasbah 'Usbat Umam Sharqiyya, 1993; Hasan al-Turabi, Al-Siyasa wa-l-Hukm: Al-Nuzum al-Sultaniyya Bayna al-Usul wa-Sunan al-Waqi', 2003.

EMAD EL-DIN SHAHIN

grievance

A grievance is a wrong or hardship, real or supposed, that is considered legitimate grounds for complaint or dispute, possibly expressed through formal legal action by the state or one of its citizens. In Islamic traditions, this concept generally has been rendered by the Arabic noun mazlima (pl. mazālim), meaning an unjust or oppressive action. In early Islamic history, dīwān al-mazālim (board of grievances) came to denote a court through which governing authorities took direct responsibility for the dispensation of justice; it was an extrajudicial tribunal that accepted claims on behalf of the caliph, presumably for the purpose of correcting wrongs committed by state officials. More generally, however, grievance corresponds with the term da'wā (claim, lawsuit), which signifies the action by which a person claims his right against another person and which may be submitted to an official court of Islamic law, to a board of grievances, or through the institution that inspects markets and monitors public morality (hisba).

According to Islamic law, anyone who is sane and rational can bring a lawsuit against another in four types of cases. The first of these is a claim for the application of the law of retaliation equivalent to an offense (qisās) or the payment of compensation (diyya) by a victim or his kin. The second is a case of prosecution for offenses sanctioned by criminal penalties (hudūd) when brought in the exclusive or partial interest of a victim, such as for theft or fornication (zinā). The third category includes official criminal prosecutions in which the victim intervenes as plaintiff, as well as in every case of the exercise of hisba. Finally, the fourth includes actions brought in accordance with the extraordinary procedure of the mazālim court.

Islamic law distinguishes between individual and collective rights, the latter arising from legal acts and instruments involving a class of persons, not an individual or a number of specific persons. A collective suit may be brought by any person or persons, since the claimant or plaintiff represents the class of beneficiaries or community at large. This is known as da'wa al-hisba, and it is related to the position of the muhtasib (market inspector and censor of morals). Historically, in matters of public interest, the judge (qadi) and the muhtasib fulfilled some of the functions associated in modern law with public prosecution.

To be sound, a suit must be issued from a concerned party who is consistent in his or her claims; these must specify the characteristics and location of the matter or object under dispute and the identity of the parties involved. In dealing with any valid, sound suit, the judge must first determine who the plaintiff is in order to apply the correct evidential procedure; burden of proof falls on the plaintiff, and the defendant's innocence is presumed. The method of establishing legal proof is oral, in the form of acknowledgment or confession, oath, legal presumptions, and testimony, which is the quintessential proof. Writing is a valid mode of proof only insofar as it is orally confirmed by a duly qualified witness.

Once proof has been established according to the dictates of law and it is in conformity with the facts alleged, it binds the judge, regardless of his own inner conviction. Advocacy was rejected in theory and discouraged in historical practice; the task of legal specialists (fuqahā, muftis) is to aid the judge, providing him with scholarly council, although voluntary resort to a learned arbitrator (hakam) may initially be chosen by the plaintiff in lieu of a trial. The trial terminates with the judge's verdict, which is not subject to appeal before a superior jurisdiction. Once pronounced, a judgment cannot be changed by the same judge, and another judge can only repeal it if there was an egregious fault in the law. However, the suit may be determined anew before another judge, and in periods or areas where there exists an organized procedure of mazālim, any person who feels he or she is a victim of public services may demand redress by petitioning the sovereign authority.

Scholars agree that the mazālim court was theoretically sanctioned by Islamic law but that in reality it sometimes represented the rulers' absolutist governance and interference in the shari'a. Debate exists, however, as to the exact nature and extent of this jurisdiction in Islamic history. Earlier works assert the wide scope of mazālim justice and its "secular" characteristics, while recent revisionist scholarship claims its limited and sporadic jurisdiction, the predominance of shari'a courts, and the essentially supplemental and overlapping role of the mazālim.

The institution of hisba is explicitly characterized in juristic sources as supplementing the jurisdiction of the judge's court, sanctioning intervention without complaint for violations of the shari'a based on obvious and incontestable facts. On the one hand, it represents the individual duty of "commanding right and forbidding wrong," which is incumbent upon all Muslims. On the other hand, the majority of scholars simultaneously classify it as a collective duty, with a state-sanctioned officer assuming control over admonition by force; the muḥtasib supervised public moral behavior, particularly with respect to the markets.

Since the 19th-century legal reforms of the Ottoman Empire, the system of bringing a lawsuit has undergone far-reaching changes. The intrinsic probative value of writing was recognized, the principle of res judicata accepted, and procedure in default of appearance was introduced, along with representation by lawyers. These innovations ran parallel to the emergence of the nation-state and the modernization of judicial systems in accordance with European models of law. This resulted in the radical transformation or disappearance of shari'a courts, mazālim courts, and hisba in most Muslim countries, with a few exceptions, such as the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia. The controversy over the jurisdictional relationship between mazālim and shari'a is reflected in the disagreement over the nature of modernization, either as an expression of the evolution of an ever-present "secular" jurisdiction or as drastically uncharacteristic of Islamic law.

See also governance; justice; punishment; shari'a

Further Reading

Wael B. Hallaq, Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, 2005; Idem, Shari'a: Theory, Practice, Transformations, 2009; Jørgen S. Nielsen, Secular Justice in an Islamic State: Mazālim under the Baḥrī Mamlūks, 1985; Émile Tyan, Histoire de l'organisation judiciare en pays d'Islam, 1960.

GREGORY MACK

guardianship of the jurist

The Twelver Shi'i legal doctrine known as "the guardianship of the jurist" (wilāyat al-faqīh; in Persian, vilāyat-i faqīh) is best known from the works of Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89), who formulated his views on the topic around 1970. The doctrine is relatively recent and seems to date to no earlier than the writings of Mulla Ahmad al-Naraqi (d. 1829). One may view the guardianship of the jurist as the culmination of a trend to concentrate the prerogatives of the imam in the hands of jurists as a group, and the leading jurist in particular, that began in the 10th century and proceeded by stages until the 20th century.

Wilāya refers to the authority of a religious leader or official, and the term has been used to describe the religious authority of the Prophet Muhammad. Shi'i Muslims rallied around the argument that the Prophet's wilāya devolved on their imams, who were the Prophet's descendants. According to the Twelver, or Imami, Shi'is, the first imam was 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661), the Prophet's paternal first cousin and then son-in-law. The Twelfth Imam, Muhammad al-Mahdi, born around 870 and a direct descendant of 'Ali through his son Husayn, is believed to have gone into concealment in the year 873 or 874 upon God's instruction. This Hidden Imam's return will occur prior to the end of time, but until then, his incognito existence apparently deprives the faithful of the only figure entitled to legitimate rule. Since wilāya is such a critical prerogative, and since it was believed to reside in the imams, the occultation (ghayba) of the Twelfth Imam created a crisis of religious authority: the question was whether that authority had devolved, or could devolve, on others. Eventually, by the 16th century at the latest, the Twelver jurists concluded that a relative form of it had devolved on them collectively as the "general representatives" of the imams.

The concept of the guardianship of the jurist is to a large degree implicit in Naraqi's writings. The expression appears explicitly, however, in the writings of two of his illustrious successors, Muhammad Hasan al-Najafi (d. 1849) and especially Murtada al-Ansari (d. 1864). However, Ansari's doctrine of wilāyat al-faqīh was firmly ensconced within the tradition that interpreted the authority that the jurists could exercise in the name of the imams to lie within the narrow compass of relative (i'tibārī) wilāya. In other words, their authority was limited to taking over a limited number of the prerogatives of the imam, a small subset of the whole. This wilāya of the jurists, Ansari stressed, was limited to the authority to make decisions on behalf of persons who, for various reasons, were either incapable of making their own decisions or incompetent to do so. Among those who fell under this category were widows, orphans, the mentally infirm, children, and the like.

In a series of lectures given in Najaf, Iraq, in January 1970, Khomeini altered the scope of the jurists' wilāya by expanding it to include political rule—indeed, nearly all the general functions of the imam. This was a drastic change from the classical understanding of the concept, though Khomeini did not present it as such, instead claiming that it was a widely held view. It is not surprising that most Twelver jurists rejected his interpretation. He sanctioned the idea that a single jurist, rather than the collectivity of the jurists, might be identified who could exercise this greatly broadened understanding of the concept, being careful to try to vindicate this expanded version by seeking scriptural justifications for it. Khomeini's role in the Iranian Revolution of 1978–79 and its aftermath was so critical that his interpretation of the doctrine became the official line of the Islamic Republic of Iran, established in 1979. His sobriquet of walī al-faqīh—the supreme jurist—indicated that indeed it was he who would exercise political rule.

Shortly before his death in June 1989, Khomeini again broadened the conceptualization of this doctrine in a fatwa (legal opinion) that he issued in early January 1988 that made the wilāya of the jurist absolute. It now became wilāyat al-faqīh al-mutlaqa. He argued that not only did the top jurist have the right to exercise political rule but he also had the power to suspend some of the secondary ordinances of the faith if he believed that such suspension was essential to rescue "Islam" from destruction. Among the secondary ordinances that he specifically mentioned were ritual prayer and the hajj (annual pilgrimage to Mecca). He apparently saw fit to elevate the already robust version of the doctrine to this even more categorical form because he believed that the Islamic Republic of Iran was the true warden of Islam and that enemies were conspiring to bring about its collapse, which would be tantamount to the collapse of Islam itself.

Khomeini's interpretations of 1970 and 1988 remained heterodox in the world of Shi'i Islam. However, his interpretations have become part of the discourse of high-ranking Shi'i legal authorities and cannot easily be dismissed. Yet it seems unlikely that his view of wilāyat al-faqīh will triumph altogether. Withal, Khomeini's death in 1989 left no one of his stature to champion the doctrine; the next faqīh (jurist) and "leader" (rahbar) of the Islamic Republic, 'Ali Khamene'i, was considered, by most top-ranking Shi'i clerics in Iraq, Lebanon, and even in Iran itself, too inferior to inherit Khomeini's mantle. Under such circumstances, most observers feel that the majority of Twelver jurists will revert to the pre-1970 interpretation of Ansari, especially if the Islamic Republic of Iran continues to experience normalization of relations with the outside world.

See also Iran; Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89); Shi'ism

Further Reading

Shahrough Akhavi, "Contending Discourses in Shi'ite Law on the Doctrine of Wilayat al-Faqih," Iranian Studies 29, nos. 3–4 (1996); Norman Calder, "Accommodation and Revolution in Imami Shi'i Jurisprudence: Khomeini and the Classical Tradition," Middle Eastern Studies 18, no. 1 (1982); Ruhollah Khomeini, Hukūmat-i Islāmī [Islamic Government], translated by Hamid Algar, 1981; Hossein Modarressi, "The Just Ruler or the Guardian Jurist: An Attempt to Link Two Different Shi'ite Concepts," Journal of the American Oriental Society 111, no. 3 (1991); Abdulaziz Abdulhossein Sachedina, The Just Ruler in Shi'ite Islam: The Comprehensive Authority of the Jurist in Imamite Jurisprudence, 1988.

SHAHROUGH AKHAVI

guilds

Guilds were so widespread in premodern Islamic societies that most of the urban population, including women who were connected to these informally, belonged to at least one. Although crafts and craftspeople existed during the late classical period of Islam, guilds (ṭā'ifa) began to appear as professionally organized and socially identifiable groups in the 16th century in the Ottoman lands and its Arab provinces. There were structural, ceremonial, and ritualistic continuities between the guilds that appeared during this time and the 13th and 14th century trade guilds known as Akhis of Anatolia. For example, the futuwwa literature (javānmardī in Persian, meaning a code of conduct for the members of a guild) of the Akhis was widely translated and incorporated into the guild systems and employed as a constitution for these guilds. The futuwwa's moral code demanded from the members of the professional group the virtuous characteristics of a perfect youth (fatā). The virtues consisted of honor, courage, generosity, and loyal brotherhood. The Sufi influence and association of Akhis is widely known. They borrowed the hierarchical structure of the Sufi orders and brotherhoods, called their meeting places zāwiya (usually a gathering place of Sufi members of an order), and had initiation practices akin to those of Sufis, going back to the initiation of the Abbasid caliph Nasir (d. 1225) by the famous Sufi master Shaykh Abu Hafs 'Umar al-Suhrawardi (d. 1234). Furthermore, the strong cult of 'Ali b. Abi Talib, whom futuwwa literature presents as the artisans' patron saint, suggests Shi'i influence that bypassed the Sunni-Shi'i divide. These practices, hierarchies, and moral codes remained central to the institutional structure of the guilds down to the 20th century. The membership of these guilds generally cut across religious and ethnic boundaries: in Syria, for example, Jewish, Christian, and Muslim artisans and craftsmen worked alongside one another and held important positions in the guild hierarchy. However, the ceremonial rites were conducted according to the religious beliefs of the apprentices involved. From the beginning, guilds had a complex relationship with the ruling authorities. In his failed attempts to consolidate and restore the Abbasid power in the 13th century, Nasir, for example, conjoined urban guilds with Sufism, introducing organizational hierarchies and ritual practices that mirrored those of Sufi orders. Also, where close to the seat of the empire, guilds' hierarchical structure ensured more direct influence and control by the state. For example, through price regulation, court officials, and judges Ottoman rulers, employed their services for its ongoing military campaigns. In distant provinces, the state's control was relatively minimal and insignificant, allowing guilds to exercise great social and political influence. Overall, the guilds' economic activity reflected a careful accommodation of the demands imposed by the state, the interests of the guild masters, and the interests of their customers. Guild members showed ambivalence toward the state: they needed the state's help to resolve internal disputes but also resisted state intervention in their affairs. In the early modern period, changing market circumstances such as the appearance of local industries, mass migration of nonskilled villagers to urban centers, and pressures of the capitalist European economy led to the marginalization of the guilds, forcing them to adopt stricter measures to ensure their survival, such as seeking legal and hereditary rights to exercise a craft. Sometimes their marginalization led to public riots (e.g., 1850 in Aleppo and 1860 in Damascus) and revolts within the guild's hierarchy due to decreases in wages or loss of jobs. Merchants and guildsmen also played an active role in the 1906 Iranian Constitutional Revolution. Though they have not disappeared entirely, guilds diminished in numbers and in sociopolitical significance during the 20th century.

See also Sufism; trade and commerce

Further Reading

Gabriel Baer, Fellah and Townsman in the Middle East, 1982; Suraiya Faroqhi, Artisans of Empire: Crafts and Craftspeople under the Ottomans, 2009; Willem M. Floor, Guilds, Merchants, & Ulama in Nineteenth-Century Iran, 2009.

SYED RIZWAN ZAMIR

hadith

A hadith (pl. aḥādīth) is a report of the words and deeds of the Prophet Muhammad. These reports include commands or legal edicts given by the Prophet, descriptions of his behavior, actions that took place in his presence and of which he implicitly approved, and his predictions of future events. Hadiths have served as the main sources for Muslim scholars studying the teachings and precedent (sunna) of the Prophet. As such, hadiths have been central to understanding the message of the Qur'an and providing Muslims with supplemental material on the legal, dogmatic, ethical, and political issues dealt with in Islamic thought but not found explicitly in the Qur'an.

Each hadith consists of two components: the matn and the isnād. The matn is the text of the report (e.g., the Prophet said, "Deeds are judged by their intentions"), and the isnād is the chain of transmitters who narrated the report from the Prophet to the scholar who wrote the hadith in a book or transmitted it to others (e.g., "Malik reported from Nafi', who reported from Ibn 'Umar, that the Prophet said . . .").

The Sunni Hadith Tradition

During the lifetime of the Prophet, his followers (known as Companions) preserved his teachings either by recounting orally what they had heard him say or by recording their observations in primitive notebooks composed of papyrus, parchment, or even more basic materials. An early private collection like this was known as a ṣaḥīfa.

There was a great deal of debate during the Prophet's life and after his death over whether it was appropriate to preserve his words in writing, with some Muslims insisting that he had forbidden the recording of any words except the Qur'an and others stating that he had permitted his followers to record his teachings and even ordered the compilation of his rulings on taxation issues. This debate reflects a tension in the Islamic intellectual tradition, which values highly the oral transmission of knowledge, encourages the reading aloud of a written text, and is suspicious of reading books privately without having their contents explained by one's teacher. This focus on orality was due partly to the primitive nature of the Arabic alphabet and the real possibility for misreading a written text, as well as to the importance of oral recitation in Islamic religious culture.

Under the Umayyad dynasty, leading Muslim scholars like Ibn Shihab al-Zuhri (d. 742) compiled collections of hadiths on specific topics, with the state encouraging the collection of ṣaḥīfas into more comprehensive forms on issues such as taxation and administrative law. Soon, senior scholars like Malik b. Anas (d. 795) in Medina collected hadiths from the Prophet, the rulings of Companions, and the opinions of other early scholars into topically organized books of law known as muṣannafs, the most famous of which is Malik's The Well-Trodden Path (al-Muwatta').

Within a few decades of the compilation of muṣannafs, Sunni scholars limiting their collections to hadiths from the Prophet instead of a variety of reports from later scholars organized their material according to isnāds—that is, they ordered them according to the Companion who narrated the hadith from the Prophet. Such works were called musnads, the most famous of which is the Musnad of Ibn Hanbal (d. 855). The organization of such works allowed hadith scholars to engage in criticism of the authenticity of hadiths more easily. By this time, inexpensive paper had replaced rare papyrus in the Middle East, and scholars could afford to record many different transmissions of the same hadith in a musnad.

Musnads were limited to hadiths from the Prophet, but they were difficult to use as reference works. Soon scholars began producing books known as sunan, which were organized like muṣannafs but included only reports from the Prophet. Five sunan works in particular became widely read: those of Bukhari (d. 870), Muslim (d. 875), Abu Dawud (d. 889), Nasa'i (d. 915), and Tirmidhi (d. 892). By the mid-11th century, these hadith collections had become the heart of the Sunni hadith corpus. Although the last three included some hadiths that Muslims considered unreliable, these five books were taken as an acceptable representation of the body of hadiths commonly used by Sunnis. Some scholars included the Sunan of Ibn Majah (d. 887) as well, and together this canon became known as the "Six Books." Bukhari's and Muslim's works were specifically limited to hadiths that the two authors felt were the authentic sayings of Muhammad and are thus called the "Two Authentic Collections" (al-Sahihayn). They are the most revered books in Sunni Islam after the Qur'an.

Muslim Hadith Criticism

The religious and political authority of the Prophet was peerless in the community he founded. This meant that even within Muhammad's lifetime, people abused his authority by misquoting or misrepresenting his words for their own purposes. The widespread forgery of hadiths emerged in the decades after the Prophet's death as a major challenge to Muslim scholars seeking to understand Muhammad's authentic legacy. The major engines for the forgery of hadiths were as follows.

The production of political propaganda. During the Sunni and Shi'i split, supporters of the Umayyads circulated hadiths equating Mu'awiya with a prophetic figure, while supporters of 'Ali circulated hadiths such as "If you see Mu'awiya mount my pulpit, then kill him." One hadith forged during the Abbasid revolution (749–50) relates that 'Abbas's descendants would be as numerous as the Pleiades and would rule the world. Fewer hadiths were forged in later political contests.

Theological and legal debates. Proponents of Sunnism, for example, forged hadiths supporting predestinarian beliefs, while Muslim rationalists forged hadiths advocating free will and the ultimate authority of reason.

Pietistic concerns. Pietistic concerns led Muslim preachers of all varieties to forge hadiths predicting the imminent end of the world and the Day of Judgment or providing graphic descriptions of the punishments inflicted on sinners in hell and the ample rewards provided to the righteous in paradise.

Chauvinisms. Chauvinisms such as racism, local pride, or partisanship prompted the forgery of hadiths characterizing black Africans as lascivious, Turks as warlike, or certain cities as particularly pleasing to God.

In an attempt to distinguish between authentic and forged hadiths, Sunni scholars of the eighth and ninth centuries developed a method of criticism based on three steps. First, any report attributed to the Prophet required a chain of transmission (isnād). Second, the individuals making up the isnād were examined to determine their accuracy in transmission, their character, and whether they realistically could have heard the hadith from their supposed source. Accuracy in transmission was determined by collecting all the hadiths transmitted by a person and checking for corroboration. Character examination centered primarily on determining whether a person was known to have lied or forged hadiths. Although many Sunni hadith critics sought to exclude transmitters belonging to other sects, non-Sunnis played an important role in transmitting the hadiths found in the canonical Six Books. Third, a transmission attributed to the Prophet was checked for corroboration against other reports.

This intense focus on the isnād as opposed to the contents of supposed hadiths was designed to prevent bias and personal opinion from influencing the preservation of the Prophet's sunna. In reality, however, if Sunni hadith critics came across reports whose contents they found suspicious or contrary to their worldview, they would assume that this error was due to a flawed isnād and reject the hadith.

Hadiths that had a reliable chain of transmission and were corroborated were considered "sound" (ṣaḥīḥ), while those that had minor flaws in the isnād but were nonetheless corroborated were deemed "fair" (ḥasan). Hadiths with unreliable isnāds and no corroboration were considered "weak" (ḍa'īf). Both ṣaḥīḥ and ḥasan hadiths were considered admissible as evidence in deriving Islamic law, with some Sunni scholars resorting to ḍa'īf hadiths as well when no other evidence was available.

In addition to these three categories established by Sunni hadith critics of the ninth century, later Sunni legal theorists of the 11th century also divided hadiths into mutawātir reports (those so massively transmitted that they could not possibly be forged) and āḥād reports (anything less than the level of mutawātir). Because these categories were so vague, however, Muslim scholars cannot agree on exactly which hadiths are in fact mutawātir. The term is thus regularly manipulated by scholars hoping to bolster hadiths useful to their legal or doctrinal arguments.

Western Academic Criticism of Hadiths

As a result of the serious problem of forgery, Muslim scholars from the early period of Islam onward adopted a critical stance toward hadiths. However, if there was no reason to doubt the reliability of a hadith, Muslim scholars treated it as a reliable saying of the Prophet. The default stance of Muslim scholars toward hadiths was not skepticism. More important, as believers in Muhammad's prophethood, Muslim scholars did not think it unusual for hadiths to predict future events or describe things that a typical person could not know.

Western scholars who began to evaluate the historical reliability of the hadith corpus in the 19th century did not share these assumptions. Because there are no surviving records of hadiths from the actual time of the Prophet, Western scholars reasoned that the hadith tradition was elaborated as part of the growth of Islam and not as its original foundation. Western scholars assumed as a matter of historical criticism that any report attributed to Muhammad that tells the future was naturally a later forgery concocted by Muslims involved in the events that the hadith describes. Moreover, Western scholars held that hadiths that seemed to uphold Sunni orthodoxy were almost certainly forged for that purpose. Scholars like William Muir (d. 1905) concluded that many hadiths that Muslims considered authentic were forged by Muslims to glorify the Prophet. Based on his study of the contents of hadiths, the Hungarian Ignaz Goldziher (d. 1921) introduced the theory that hadiths were generally forged by different Muslim groups to meet their needs as the Muslim community matured: the Umayyads forged hadiths supporting their rule, Shi'is forged hadiths glorifying 'Ali, and Sunni jurists forged hadiths to provide the raw material for elaborating Islamic law and dogma. The German scholar Joseph Schacht (d. 1969) and his disciples explored the isnāds of hadiths and concluded that many hadiths that appear in the canonical Sunni collections were originally the rulings of early Muslim scholars to which later Muslim scholars in the eighth and ninth centuries had added false isnāds leading all the way back to the Prophet so that these sayings would enjoy more authority. Some Western scholars have argued that no hadiths are reliable and that, in fact, the entire narrative of the Prophet's life and the early Muslim community was crafted a century later by Muslims eager to provide a stable basis for their faith.

Since the 1990s, some Western scholars have revaluated this radical skepticism, arguing that it would have been impossible for the decentralized and deeply divided Muslim community of the eighth and ninth centuries to weave a conspiracy in which the whole hadith tradition was concocted. In addition, many hadiths have so many chains of transmission from so many diverse regions and individuals that they must date back to at least the generation of the Prophet's Companions. Some scholars in the United States and Europe have set aside the study of the historical reliability of hadiths in the early Islamic period, a time when a scarcity of historical sources makes speculation inevitable, and instead study the role of hadiths in the expression of authority and the shaping of communal identity in later Islamic civilization.

The Imami Shi'i Hadith Tradition

Unlike Sunni Islam, Imami Shi'i Islam considers the religious and political authority of the Prophet to have been passed on through a line of 12 imams descended from him. As a result, Imami Shi'is defined hadiths as both reports transmitted from the Prophet, usually by the imams, and the reports of the imams themselves. The imams who served as both the most active transmitters of Prophetic hadiths and the largest source of "imam" hadiths are the sixth imam Ja'far al-Sadiq (d. 765) and his son Musa al-Kazim (d. 799). Students collected the teachings of the imams into notebooks called uṣūl (sing. aṣl).

At approximately the same time that Sunni Muslims were composing muṣannafs in the late eighth century, Shi'i scholars began arranging the hadiths in these uṣūl into topical collection as well, known as mubawwabs. In the early tenth century, the Imami Shi'i community lost contact with the last of its imams, and its scholars produced comprehensive hadith references designed to provide all the information that pious Muslims needed to live according to the imams' teachings. Two of these books, the Usul al-Kafi (The sufficient foundations) of Muhammad al-Kulayni (d. 939) and Man la Yahduruhu al-Faqih (He who has no legal scholar at hand) of Ibn Babuya (d. 991), became the most famous Imami Shi'i hadith collections and the basis for the Imami Shi'i hadith canon. The later scholar Muhammad b. Hasan al-Tusi (d. 1067) wrote two works on hadiths as well: Tahdhib al-Ahkam (Refining the legal rulings) and al-Istibsar fi ma Ikhtalaf min al-Akhbar (Clarifying the differences in the prophetic traditions), which constituted the remaining two books of the four-book Imami Shi'i hadith canon.

Imami Shi'i hadith criticism strongly resembled the Sunni method of hadith criticism discussed previously. Imami Shi'is composed books of criticism identifying reliable narrators of hadiths who espoused the correct Shi'i beliefs. With the Imami Shi'i adoption of the rationalist (Mu'tazili) approach to legal theory and theology in the late tenth century, however, the criticism of the contents of hadiths became much more prominent in Imami Shi'ism than in Sunnism.

The hadith tradition of Zaydi (Fiver) Shi'ism closely resembles the Sunni tradition, with the exception of the Zaydis' rationalist leanings. Zaydis produced few of their own hadith collections, drawing instead on Sunni or Imami Shi'i hadiths that they considered appropriate and reliable.

The Role of Hadith in Sunni Political Thought

Hadiths have played two important roles in Islamic political history. First, as discussed previously, they have served as a major medium for propaganda. Second, as the Qur'an does not provide extensive discussions of ideal Islamic governance or the appropriate rulers of the Muslim community, important components of Islamic political thought have been drawn from the hadith corpus.

A core principle of Sunni political thought, the preeminence of the Prophet's tribe (the Quraysh) and the restriction of the caliphate to a member of that family, was derived from ṣaḥīḥ hadiths such as "This matter [of rule] will remain in the hands of the Quraysh as long as there are two people in this world."

The proper conduct of rulers and the relationship between ruler and ruled is also laid out in hadiths, which go beyond the Qur'anic injunction to "obey those in charge amongst you" (Q. 4:59). One ṣaḥīḥ hadith, which applies to husbands and fathers as well as to rulers, establishes the responsibility of authority: "Each of you is a shepherd, and each of you is responsible for his herd." Muslims are told in clear terms to obey their rulers and not to rebel regardless of unjust treatment or the ruler's impiety in ṣaḥīḥ hadiths such as "Whoever obeys me obeys God, and whoever disobeys me disobeys God, and whoever obeys the ruler [amir] obeys me, and whoever disobeys the ruler disobeys me." Hadiths also place limitations on this submission, however: "Listen and obey in hardship and ease, in that which you are willing and unwilling, even if you are treated unfairly . . . do not contest those in power unless you see evident proof from God of their obvious disbelief [in Islam]," and "No obedience to the ruler in disobeying God." Such hadiths are the basis for the widely held Sunni tenet that rebellion is never justified unless the ruler renounces Islam or stops implementing the basic elements of Islamic rule, such as establishing the practice of daily prayer.

Other hadiths universally accepted by Sunni scholars affirm the collective infallibility of the Muslim community and the absolute necessity of solidarity: "God will never bring my community together on an error, so stay with the collective, for whoever strays from it strays into error."

The Qur'an states repeatedly that "fighting in God's path" is a righteous act and a duty expected of Muslims, but hadiths elaborate on the duties and rewards of jihad. "Indeed the gates of Paradise are beneath the shade of swords," states one ṣaḥīḥ hadith. Another clarifies that "fighting in God's path" is to struggle "so that the word of God might be supreme." Many hadiths testify to the rewards given a martyr in the afterlife, while others add that a martyr is not just one who dies in battle but also a Muslim who dies of disease, from drowning, in a fire, during a robbery, in a building collapse, or (in the case of women) in childbirth.

Hadiths also chart the general political trajectory of Muslim and world history: after the reign of the Prophet's four "Rightly Guided" successors (Abu Bakr, 'Umar, 'Uthman, and 'Ali), there will be a time of "intransigent kings." Hadiths tell that "there will not come upon you an age except that the age after it will be worse." As the world slides into moral entropy, "knowledge will be snatched up" and "holding on to one's faith will be like holding on to a hot coal." One famous hadith, however, assures Muslims that "there will remain a party from amongst my community, standing by the truth, not harmed by those who forsake them until the command of God comes"—a group that Sunnis have understood to be themselves. Finally, hadiths provide the only scriptural source for the coming of an Antichrist (dajjāl), who will be defeated by the combined forces of a messianic figure descended from the Prophet (mahdī) and the returned Jesus.

The Role of Hadiths in Shi'i Political Thought

Since the Qur'an makes no explicit mention of the centrality of 'Ali or Muhammad's descendents in the rule of the Muslim community, in Imami Shi'i political thought the hadiths of the Prophet and the imams have been essential as evidence. Imami Shi'i hadiths make it clear that 'Ali was both the foremost Companion and the chosen successor of Muhammad: "'Ali b. Abi Talib is the earliest to embrace Islam in my community, the most knowledgeable of them, the most correct in his religion, the most virtuous in his certainty, the most prudent, generous and brave of heart, and he is the imam and caliph after me." Other hadiths of Imam Ja'far clarify that the evident lack of mention of the Prophet's family in the Qur'an is not representative of the Prophet's teachings, for "hardly anything of the Qur'an was revealed without the Prophet explaining how it concerned the Family of the [Prophet's] House." Finally, hadiths from the Prophet and the imams specify each of the 12 imams as successors of one another and the impending occultation of the Hidden Imam and his eventual return as the messiah.

See also Muhammad (570–632) Shi'ism; Sunnism; theology

Further Reading

Shah 'Abd al-'Aziz, The Gardens of Hadith Scholars, translated by Aisha Bewley, 2007; Malik b. Anas, Al-Muwatta of Imam Malik ibn Anas, translated by Aisha Bewley, 1989; Jonathan Brown, Hadith: Muhammad's Legacy in the Medieval and Modern World, 2009; 'Abd al-Hadi al-Fadli and al-Shahid al-Thani, Introduction to Hadith, Including Dirāyat al-Hadith, 2002; William Graham, "Traditionalism in Islam: An Essay in Interpretation," Journal of Interdisciplinary History 23, no. 3 (1993); Ibn al-Salah, An Introduction to the Science of Hadith, translated by Eerik Dickinson, 2005; Scott Lucas, Constructive Critics: Hadith Literature and the Articulation of Sunni Islam, 2004; Al-Nawawi, Forty Hadith, translated by Ezzeddin Ibrahim and Denys Johnson-Davies, 1997; Andrew Newman, The Formative Period of Twelver Shi'ism: Hadith as Discourse between Qum and Baghdad, 2000.

JONATHAN A. C. BROWN

Hakim bi-Amr Allah (985–1021)

Born in Cairo in 985, Hakim bi-Amr Allah ascended to the Fatimid caliphate at the age of 11 after the early death of his father in 996. He was then under the watchful supervision of Barjawan, a palace eunuch with unusual power and political skill. Soon enough, however, Hakim resolved to rid himself of his guardian by assassination and to rule alone. Thereafter, until the end of his reign, he governed his empire with an unusually resolute hand, acting both as caliph for a widely diverse population of Muslim and non-Muslim religious communities and as imam—the supreme authority—for the Isma'ilis, who were devoted to him with total and unreserved allegiance. His position therefore resembled a combination of king and pope. The Fatimids then governed a vast domain, comprising the vassal states of North Africa, Sicily, the Islamic holy cities of Mecca and Medina, Syria, plus Egypt and Palestine. In addition, missions (da'was) of his adherents reached clandestinely deep into the realm of the other Islamic lands. Significantly, the Fatimid state lost none of its territory or its status under him.

Nevertheless, in marked contrast to his father, who had become well known for tolerance and clemency, Hakim applied harsh and uncompromising policies that resulted in a large number of executions, particularly of members of the bureaucracy and the elite. Commencing about 1005, he issued a series of laws designed to closely regulate the habits, practices, and morals of the people in his domain. One edict ordered the public denouncing of those of the Prophet's Companions who had failed to support the direct succession of 'Ali b. Abi Talib. Others forbade the sale and consumption of foods such as turmus (lupine), jirjir (rocket, or arugula), scaleless fish, and malūkhiyya (jute, whose leaves were used to make soup), as well as all kinds of intoxicating beverages, among them various beers, wine, and zabīb (raisin liquor). He likewise severely restricted the movements of women, eventually decreeing that shoemakers not produce footwear for them to ensure that they could not venture outside their homes. He also sought to control his Christian and Jewish subjects in an increasingly onerous fashion, commanding them to wear distinctive badges and clothing and to observe restrictions on interactions with Muslims and finally instituting a deliberate policy of destroying houses of worship, including, most notably, the destruction of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher in Jerusalem.

Of these measures, the denouncing of the Prophet's Companions lasted barely two years and was replaced by a decidedly tolerant policy. Consequently, the fomenting of religious strife, including speaking ill of those connected to the Prophet, became anathema. The other initiatives, however, not only persisted but were often strengthened, becoming more of a burden on the people. Yet after a decade, Hakim began to relent by granting Christians and Jews who wanted to leave his lands permission to do so. Near the end of his reign, he also permitted those who had converted to Islam as a response to his repressive policies to reclaim their original religions and allowed the rebuilding of many of the churches and synagogues he had destroyed.

Despite his reputation for cruelty and repression and for an unpredictable and paradoxical style of rule, he remained uncommonly popular. Until the day of his disappearance in 1021, by that time having ruled for 25 years, he could ride through the streets and districts of the capital unaccompanied by an armed guard. His supporters boasted that he was courageous to appear regularly in public and that his seemingly untouchable, almost hallowed persona miraculously protected him from the harmful designs of his many enemies. A small group of especially fervent followers, who were later to be called the Druze, carried their enthusiasm for him further. They insisted that he was not really human but divine and that he was in fact an incarnation of God, come to instill in mankind a new and truer religion that superseded all others, including Islam.

See also Druze; Fatimids (909–1171); Isma'ilis

Further Reading

H. Halm, Die Kalifen von Kairo: Die Fatimiden in Ägypten, 973–1074, 2003; Paul E. Walker, Caliph of Cairo: Al-Hakim bi-Amr Allah 996–1021, 2009.

PAUL E. WALKER

Hamas

Hamas (zeal) is the acronym for Harakat al-Muqawama al-Islamiyya, the Palestinian Islamic Resistance Movement. Founded weeks after the start of the Intifada, the "uprising" of 1987–93, Hamas quickly emerged as the institutional and ideological anchor of al-tayyār al-islāmī, "the Islamic tendency," a phrase referring to all political movements bearing an Islamist orientation. The Intifada began as a spontaneous outbreak of protest and street violence following an incident occuring on December 6, 1987, in which an Israeli truck driver crashed into and killed four Palestinian laborers. Secular-nationalist political organizations quickly asserted control over the protests, issuing weekly leaflets in the name of the United National Command (UNC) of the Intifada. The goal of the UNC was to end Israel's 20-year-old military rule over the Gaza Strip, West Bank, East Jerusalem, and Golan Heights. Israel initiated its occupation, which entailed massive land expropriations and settlement building, following its defeat of Egyptian, Jordanian, and Syrian forces during the Six Day War in June 1967. Responding quickly to the UNC's assertion of leadership, the Muslim Brotherhood, at the behest largely of younger Islamist activists, announced the establishment of Hamas. Combining strategic use of violence, including devastating suicide bombings in Israeli cities, with pragmatic participation within existing political processes, such as local and national elections, the movement eventually became the main challenger of Fatah, the secular-nationalist faction that had dominated Palestinian nationalism since the late 1960s. In June 2007, 18 months after it won Palestinian Legislative Council elections, Hamas, seeking to consolidate its power, forcibly expelled Fatah-associated militias from the Gaza Strip. The Palestinian political field thereafter cleaved geographically and institutionally between the Islamists in Gaza and the Fatah-controlled Palestinian National Authority in the West Bank.

The origins of Hamas lie in the Islamic Collective (al-Mujamma' al-Islami). Founded by Shaykh Ahmad Yasin in 1973, the collective sought to revive moribund Muslim Brotherhood groups in the aftermath of the Six Day War. Ironically, the Israeli occupation that ensued provided circumstances favorable to Islamist mobilization. Perceiving a chance to divide Palestinians politically, Israel initially provided Yasin and the collective space to organize. For its part, the collective strategically avoided Israeli repression by choosing to make the spread of secularism among Palestinians, not the occupation, its primary enemy. Reorient Palestinian hearts and minds toward Islam first, so the thinking went, and all else would follow. To achieve its objective, the movement engaged in da'wa (calling to the straight path), charity work, network formation, and assertion of control over associational life (such as unions, universities, mosques, and professional societies). It also clandestinely collected weapons in anticipation of an eventual transition to an armed struggle. These initiatives brought the collective into violent conflict with Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO) factions throughout the period leading up to the first Intifada.

At the heart of the alternative offered by the collective was a political theodicy that explained Palestinian suffering as a direct result of the failure of Muslims to uphold taqwā (the "fear of God" evidenced through acts of personal piety as prescribed in the Qur'an and sunna). This failure had led God to favor other nations, principally "the Jews." Israel's success, then, was a sign of God's displeasure with the Arabs and Muslims and with the Palestinians in particular. Implicit in this formulation was the idea that rectification of the current state of inverted affairs required a turning away from error (e.g., secularist ideologies) and a return to piety. The Islamic Collective justified its apolitical "culturalist" activism precisely in these terms: Palestine would return to the Muslims only after Muslims had returned to Islam. An authentic jihad demanded this type of deep individual and collective conversion. The explosion of the Intifada forced a reevaluation, however, of the sequence envisioned by the collective. Confronted by the demands of a younger generation of activists to engage the occupation directly, Islamic Collective leaders revised their ideology, stressing the immediate necessity of jihad. Through jihad the nation would return to taqwā, and thereby Israel would be overcome and an Islamic state would arise in Palestine. The return of Palestine would mark the first stage in the revival of the global Islamic religiopolitical community (umma). Palestine, indeed, was the key to an Islamic awakening (sahwa). In this move, Hamas essentially articulated an Islamic analogue of the PLO's vision that saw the liberation of Palestine as the first step toward uniting the transnational Arab nation.

The ideological flexibility shown by the collective in adapting to the new realities of the Intifada by creating Hamas has remained a defining characteristic of Islamist politics in Palestine. Hamas has repeatedly shown itself capable of adapting its ideological positions to new political realities in the interest of survival. Perhaps the best example of its flexibility is its proposal to agree to an indefinite "truce" with Israel, an idea that effectively recognizes the reality of Israel and provides a path toward achieving some form of peaceful coexistence even if the movement continues to assert its commitment to achieving an Islamic state within the entirety of pre-1948 Palestine. At the same time, however, Hamas has maintained its armed wing as well as its control over the police forces in the Gaza Strip. It has also allowed proxies, such as Islamic Jihad units, to fire rockets across the boundary fence into Israel proper or has initiated such actions on its own, directly, in response to the continuing Israeli blockade. In a bid to crush Hamas's military capacity, Israel launched a three-week armed invasion of Gaza in the winter of 2008–9. Named "Operation Cast Lead," the invasion inflicted heavy damage to infrastructure and, according to an Amnesty International report, caused more than 1,400 civilian deaths and 5,000 civilian injuries. Hamas, however, remained intact, organizationally, and arguably strengthened its control in the Gaza Strip in the aftermath of Israel's tactical withdrawal. Hamas continues to confront a total Israeli blockade and refusal by the United States, European Union, United Nations, and Arab states to accord it any official diplomatic recognition. Syria and Iran, however, provide financial and political support for the movement, and Islamist movements globally have maintained solidarity with it. Attempts to restart Palestinian-Israeli peace negotiations have repeatedly floundered due not only to Israel's continuing efforts to expropriate land and build settlements but also to the persisting Palestinian political disunity and Hamas's undeniable capacity to use violence to counter its diplomatic isolation.

See also Islamic Jihad; Muslim Brotherhood; Palestine; Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO)

Further Reading

Amnesty International, Israel/Gaza: Operation "Cast Lead": 22 days of death and destruction, 2009; Jeroen Gunning, Hamas in Politics: Democracy, Religion, Violence, 2008; Khaled Hroub, Hamas: Political Thought and Practice, 2000; Loren D. Lybarger, Identity and Religion in Palestine: The Struggle between Islamism and Secularism in the Occupied Territories, 2007; Shaul Mishal and Avraham Sela, The Palestinian Hamas: Vision, Violence, and Coexistence, 2006; Sara Roy, Hamas and Civil Society in Gaza: Engaging the Islamist Social Sector, 2011; Azzam Tamimi, Hamas: A History from Within, 2007.

LOREN D. LYBARGER

Hasan b. ʿAli (ca. 624–70)

Revered as the eldest surviving grandson of the Prophet and the second imam by Shiʿis, Hasan b. ʿAli was unexpectedly thrust into political life by the assassination of his father, ʿAli b. Abi Talib, in 661 at the hands of the Khariji ʿAbd al-Rahman b. Muljam. Before this event, Hasan's political activity had not been significant (he was present but not prominent at the battles of the Camel in 656 and Siffin in 657), though he is credited with views at variance with those of his father (e.g., in his refusal of ʿAli's command to flog an alcohol-drinking governor of Kufa, his defense of ʿUthman b. ʿAffan's home from rebels, and his criticism of ʿAli's inaction during the affair). Although ʿAli himself had not designated Hasan as his political successor, the fact that he was his eldest son, and thus the eldest grandson of the Prophet, and that ʿAli bequeathed to him his land endowments (sadaqāt) in Arabia made him the natural candidate for leadership.

Hasan is depicted as modifying ʿAli's bellicose policy toward the Syrians, then under the leadership of Muʿawiya b. Abi Sufyan (r. 661–80). In the oath of allegiance (bayʿa) that he required of his followers, he not only included the words "make war against those he is at war with" but also "make peace with those he is at peace with," which displeased those unwilling to embrace peace with Muʿawiya. When Muʿawiya rejected his invitation to submit to his leadership and invited Hasan to submit to his authority instead, citing his superior experience, Hasan withheld his reply, apparently wishing to avoid further bloodshed. Hasan eventually consented to suspend his political rights until Muʿawiya's death in return for a handsome sum (a reported million dirhams per annum). Thereafter, Hasan retired to Medina and refused further political involvement, preferring quietist opposition to Muʿawiya's leadership. Hasan's hopes to succeed Muʿawiya as caliph were never realized, for on April 2, 670, he died (numerous accounts claim he was poisoned by one of his wives at Muʿawiya's instigation), thus freeing the line of succession for Muʿawiya's own son Yazid I.

Many of Hasan's followers perceived his first declaration of his pacifist inclinations as a betrayal of his father's legacy and reviled Hasan as "the humiliator of the believers" (mudhill al-muʾminīn). Hostile accusations after his abdication claim that during his time in Medina, he maintained a harem of 300 concubines and earned the title "the divorcer" (al-miṭlāq) for marrying and divorcing as many as 70 to 90 women. But both Sunnis and Shiʿis classically cast his abdication as a noble rather than self-serving deed. Sunnis see him as abdicating to restore peace for the divided community: as a widely disseminated Prophetic hadith claims, "Perhaps through [Hasan] God will cause peace to arise between two mighty factions of Muslims" (laʿalla Allāha an yuṣliḥa bihi bayna fiʾatayni ʿaẓīmatayni min al-muslimīn). Sunnis also often count the period after ʿAli's murder and before Hasan's apparent abdication as completing the Rightly Guided Caliphate. Shi'is, revering Hasan as the second imam, see his abdication as rooted in the imam's denunciation of worldly ambition and a model of Shi'i noninvolvement in politics.

Although the Imamis eventually focused their loyalties on the descendents of his younger brother Husayn, the Zaydis also recognized imams to have descended from Hasan. The last two major revolts to be led by descendents of 'Ali during the Abbasid period in the Muslim heartlands were both led by descendents of the Hasanid line: Muhammad al-Nafs al-Zakiya (d. 762) and al-Husayn Sahib al-Fakhkh (d. 786). In Morocco, the Idrisid dynasty (eighth to tenth century) and the Sharifs of Morocco (1510 to present day; represented since 1999 by King Muhammad VI of Morocco) both legitimized their rule by appealing to Hasanid descent.

See also 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); Husayn b. 'Ali (626–80); imamate; Mu'awiya (602–80); Rightly Guided Caliphate (632–61); Shi'ism

Further Reading

Dwight M. Donaldson, The Shi'ite Religion, 1933; S. Husain M. Jafri, Origins and Early Development of Shi'a Islam, 1979; Wilferd Madelung, The Succession of Muhammad, 1997; Michael G. Morony, Between Civil Wars: The Caliphate of Mu'awiyah (The History of al-Tabari, vol. 7), 1987.

SEAN W. ANTHONY

heresiography

"Heresiography" is the term used in Islamic studies for a body of literature classifying, in a highly schematic way, religious sects, parties, and heresies. The genre was well established in early Christianity; it is also attested in both Karaite and Rabbinic Judaism, although lightly so and only after the tenth century, when it may have developed under Islamic influence. The earliest Muslim books seem to have been composed in the second half of the eighth century to support the practice of rationalizing theology (kalām), whose polemical purposes it served by identifying and categorizing doctrinal error. All Muslim groups that produced theologians also produced heresiography. Mu'tazilis, Ash'aris, Maturidis, Imami and Isma'ili Shi'is, and Ibadis all at one time or another used heresiography to defend their exclusive claims to the "true" Islam. Examples can also be found in Traditionalist circles unfriendly to theology.

As a rule, heresiographers take a schematic and ahistorical approach to the doctrines they describe. They do not see their particular versions of "orthodoxy" as, at base, historically contingent; instead, they understand themselves to represent an unchanging, original orthodoxy from which rival ("heterodox") groups have broken away. Accordingly, an Imami Shi'i writer will portray his own line of imams as having been the only legitimate one from the start and will treat the teachings of eighth-century Gnostic groups that surrounded some of those imams as heretical departures from—or exaggerations of (ghulāw)—an original Shi'i orthodoxy. An Ibadi writer, similarly, will present Kharijism as an originally moderate teaching perverted by extremists who called for an immediate and total break with non-Khariji Muslims. In neither case does the writer allow for the possibility of historical development but instead projects his own teachings back into the earliest period. Sunni writers will do the same thing in order to establish the priority of their own orthodoxy. This ahistorical perspective is embodied in a famous hadith cited by many heresiographers, in which the Prophet refers to the fragmentation of the Jews and Christians into 71 and 72 sects, respectively, and predicts that his own community will divide into 73 sects, one of which—the saved sect, or firqa nājiya—will be in paradise while the rest will end up in hell. Although the report appears in slightly different versions (including one in which 72 are in paradise and only one in hell), it always takes for granted orthodoxy's temporal priority over heresy. The teachings of the saved sect are not seen to have evolved over time from a pool of doctrines only later deemed heterodox but instead are understood to have been in place from the very beginning.

Although the categories of "orthodoxy" and "heresy" are frequently employed by scholars, some have questioned their aptness in an Islamic context. Islamic history has seen moments where rulers sought to impose or proscribe certain religious teachings (the latter especially when they were seen as linked to a political threat), but premodern Muslim societies did not possess the machinery for regularly delineating and enforcing correct doctrine, and in any case Islam itself has generally emphasized legal practice over doctrinal beliefs. Accordingly, Islamic heresiographical literature may be best seen as representing the efforts of Muslims of every stripe to depict their own particular teachings as normative while acknowledging the diverse array of doctrines and groups that possessed some claim to legitimacy within their societies.

See also Ibadis; Isma'ilis; Karramis; Kharijis; Qarmatians; theology

Further Reading

John Henderson, The Construction of Orthodoxy and Heresy, 1998; Keith Lewinstein, "Notes on Eastern Hanafite Heresiography," Journal of the American Oriental Society 114, no. 4 (1994); Wilferd Madelung, "Bemerkungen zur imamitischen Firaq-Literatur," Der Islam 43 (1967); Wilferd Madelung and Paul Walker, An Ismaili Heresiography, 1998; 'Abd al-Karim al-Shahrastani, Livre des religions et des sects, vol. 1, translated by Daniel Gimaret and Guy Monnot, 1986; J. van Ess, Der Eine und das Andere, 2011; W. Montgomery Watt, The Formative Period of Islamic Thought, 1973.

KEITH LEWINSTEIN

heresy and innovation

In Islamic texts, innovation (bid'a) refers to practices or doctrines considered to lack a precedent in the Qur'an and the sunna of the Prophet. A prophetic hadith (tradition) states that every novelty is an innovation and every innovation is an erroneous deviation (dalāl) leading to hell. According to the hadith, innovations are both the product and the cause of the progressive corruption of the community after the Prophet's death (fasād al-zamān); they are brought about by Jewish and Christian influences, by uncontrolled and inappropriately trained preachers and storytellers (quṣṣāṣ), by women, and more generally by those who are led by their passions (ahwā'). The spread of innovations can be halted by their condemnation by properly trained religious scholars ('ulama') and by the social isolation and physical punishment of innovators. (However, physical punishment usually falls short of the death penalty, as innovators are still considered by many to be believers, even if sinful and misled.)

Nonetheless, some scholars held certain innovations to be not only acceptable but also obligatory, such as the celebration of the Prophet's birthday (mawlid) and the establishment of Muslim schools (madrasas) and hospitals. The possibility of "good innovations" was backed by Shafi'i (d. 820), who stated that not every novelty (muḥdath) was a reprehensible bid'a, thus opening the way for the eventual incorporation of the concept of bid'a into the five legal categories (obligatory, recommended, indifferent, reprehensible, forbidden), which was effected by the Shafi'i Ibn 'Abd al-Salam (d. 1262) and the Maliki Qarafi (d. 1285).

Treatises against bid'a usually concentrated on innovations introduced in the field of ritual practices ('ibādāt), such as the celebration of non-Muslim festivals, the visiting of saints' graves, the performance of certain prayers at certain times or places, and certain funerary customs. These were practices subject to intense debates in the Islamic community, and the scholars were divided into two extremes: those who were afraid of widening the scope of Muslim ritual beyond the contents of the Five Pillars (e.g., by allowing the celebration of 'Arafat outside Mecca) and those willing to accommodate local practices and customs often followed by a majority of Muslims. Many such practices are still discussed in the early 21st century, with the Wahhabis the most vociferous opponents of innovations.

Deviants from correct belief are often labeled "those who indulge in innovations and follow their passions" (ahl al-bida', wa-l-ahwā') and condemned as such in Sunni heresiographical treatises (al-firaq, al-milal wa-l-nihal) dealing with the sectarian doctrines of, among others, the Kharijis, the Qadaris and Mu'tazilis, and the Shi'is. The emergence and consolidation of the doctrines and practices that came to constitute Sunnism—with its internal varieties—constituted a process that lasted more than three centuries and that cannot be considered closed. Alexander Knysh, in his article "Orthodoxy and Heresy in Medieval Islam: An Essay in Reassessment," has shown how the construction of orthodoxy in Islamic societies involves "a perpetual collision of individual opinions over an invariant set of theological problems that eventually leads to a transient consensus that already contains the seeds of future disagreement."

Intellectual criticism and social disapproval could be accompanied by persecution and repression when rulers concluded that those who supported certain beliefs or practices (such as some activist Sufis) constituted a threat to their power or when the fight against "heresy" could provide legitimacy to their rule (such as the fight of Almoravids and Almohads against the Barghawata). Even so, the wars of religion that counted so many victims in Latin Christendom have largely been absent from Islamic societies. The nonexistence of persecuting institutions such as the inquisition went together with a prevalent Sunni pattern of coexistence with "deviant" groups, even in the case of such centralized states as the Ottoman Empire, where sectarians such as the Alevis—in spite of periods of persecution—were able to survive through the centuries.

In the early centuries of Islam, dualists were subject to repression and persecution to such an extent that the name given to them (zindīq, pl. zanādiqa) became the technical legal term for the heretic considered to be a "hidden apostate"—in other words, someone who claimed to be a Muslim while holding views that put him outside the Islamic community. The zindīq had to be sentenced to death because of his hidden apostasy (ridda). The Hanafis thought the zindīq should be granted the possibility of repentance (istitāba), whereas the Malikis rejected this possibility because they felt a zindīq could not be trusted. Accusations of zandaqa became a common resource for discrediting certain views or individuals, and many examples can be found in the biographies of 'ulama'. Those accusations seldom led to a trial. Scholars who had accused others of religious deviation (zandaqa, ilhād, zaygh) often attended the funeral of the accused and even pronounced the death's prayer over him or her, thereby attesting to the general Sunni reluctance categorically to stigmatize others as unbelievers (takfīr).

See also Kharijis; Mu'tazilis; al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820); sunna

Further Reading

N. Calder, "The Limits of Islamic Orthodoxy," in Intellectual Traditions in Islam, edited by F. Daftary, 2000; M. Chamberlain, Knowledge and Social Practice in Medieval Damascus, 1190–1350, 1994; M. Chokr, Zandaqa et zindiqs en Islam au second siècle de l'hégire, 1993; M. Fierro, "The Treatises against Innovations (kutub al-bida')," Der Islam 69 (1992); J. Karolewski, "What Is Heterodox about Alevism? The Development of Anti-Alevi Discrimination and Resentment," Die Welt des Islams 48, nos. 3–4 (2008); A. Knysh, "Orthodoxy and Heresy in Medieval Islam: An Essay in Reassessment," The Muslim World 83, no. 1 (1993); H. Laoust, Les schismes dans l'Islam, 1977; B. Lewis, "Some Observations on the Significance of Heresy in the History of Islam," Studia Islamica 1 (1953); G. Makdisi, "Tabaqat-Biography: Law and Orthodoxy in Classical Islam," Islamic Studies 32 (1993); V. Rispler-Chaim, "Toward a New Understanding of the Term Bid'a," Der Islam 68 (1992); A. El-Shamsy, "The Social Construction of Orthodoxy," in The Cambridge Companion to Classical Islamic Theology, 2008; D. Stewart, Islamic Legal Orthodoxy: Twelver Shiite Responses to the Sunni Legal System, 1998; J. van Ess, Theologie und Gesellschaft im 2. und 3. Jahrhundert Hidschra. Eine Geschichte des religiösen Denkens im frühen Islam, 6 vols., 1991–98.

MARIBEL FIERRO

hijra

The Arabic term hijra, Latinized as hegira, refers primarily to the Prophet Muhammad's emigration from Mecca to Medina in 622 (the Hijra) and secondarily to an Islamic doctrinal obligation (hijra).

Establishment of the Community

When Muhammad began to preach publicly in about 613, he encountered strong opposition from Mecca's ruling tribe, the Quraysh. Although the earliest Muslims were few in number, they represented a challenge to the prevailing order; Arab identity was rooted in kinship rather than religion, and Mecca's prosperity was linked to its polytheist shrines. In 615, Muhammad responded to mounting persecution of Muslims by sending a group of his followers to seek refuge in Christian Abyssinia. The Prophet remained in Mecca but began to seek a more hospitable base of operations in 619 after the deaths of his wife Khadija and his uncle and primary guarantor of protection, Abu Talib.

In 620, Muhammad gained several converts from Yathrib, the agricultural oasis north of Mecca that would later be known as Medina. The following year, 12 representatives from Medina's two feuding tribes, the Aws and the Khazraj, converted to Islam and swore allegiance to Muhammad. In 622, over 70 members of Medina's Arab clans negotiated with Muhammad, pledging to protect him and his followers if he settled in Medina; this is known as the Pledge of War (bay'at al-ḥarb). That year, Muhammad sent most of his followers ahead to Medina in small groups. He and his Companion Abu Bakr (ca. 573–634) made the journey together in secret, arriving in Medina in September 622.

This emigration, the hijra, is one of the most significant events in early Islamic history. The event marks the establishment of the Muslim community (umma) as an autonomous religious and political entity, with Muhammad as both Prophet and political leader. The Islamic calendar dates from the beginning of the lunar year in which the hijra took place, and Islamic dates are indicated by "AH" (Anno Hegirae, in the year of the hijra).

Those Muslims who left Mecca for Medina are known as the muhājirūn, or emigrants, while the earliest Medinan converts who aided the community's establishment are known as the anṣār, or helpers. Although hijra is often translated as "flight," the Arabic root h-j-r primarily signifies a severing of friendly relations, withdrawal, or emigration. For many of the muhājirūn, emigration meant relinquishing their property, livelihoods, and association with polytheist friends and family; Muslims were expected to make a complete break with Mecca's jāhilīyya (pre-Islamic, "ignorant") society.

The Obligation to Emigrate

After the hijra, emigration became an essential Islamic obligation for all but the most vulnerable Meccan Muslims. By joining the Prophet in Medina, these emigrants strengthened the nascent Islamic polity, weakened polytheist Mecca, resolutely affirmed their faith, and refused persecution. Those who failed to migrate compromised their religious commitment and risked aiding Meccan enemies. Several Qur'anic injunctions address hijra, and two of these passages are frequently cited in legal discussions of this obligation. Qur'an 4:97–100 warns of divine punishment for those who suffer oppression rather than emigrate, unless they are truly too weak to do so, and promises both worldly refuge and divine rewards for those who emigrate. Qur'an 8:72 designates believers who emigrate and fight (perform jihad) in the path of God, along with those who offer them aid, as the allies and protectors of each other; these allies are not obligated to protect nonemigrant believers until they too perform hijra. These verses are interpreted as referring to the muhājirūn, the anṣār, and the state of enmity between Medina and Mecca that made the continued presence of Muslims in Mecca problematic. Although Bedouin converts to Islam were permitted to remain with their tribes, Meccan Muslims who failed to emigrate were initially disinherited from their emigrant relatives.

Medina's Muslims conquered Mecca in 630, after which hijra out of that city ceased to be obligatory. According to an oft-cited hadith, Muhammad declared there to be no hijra after the fatḥ, taken to mean the conquest of Mecca. However, other hadiths characterize emigration as an obligation that will continue until the Day of Judgment or as long as infidels are fought. Later Muslim jurists reconciled these traditions by concluding that although the obligation to emigrate to Medina lapsed in 630, hijra from dār al-ḥarb (the abode of war, non-Muslim territory) to dār al-islām (the abode of Islam; Muslim territory) remained obligatory.

Early Islam

During the first Islamic century, the significance of hijra shifted in two ways. First, the connection between hijra and jihad was strengthened as the expanding Islamic state conscripted Arab soldiers willing to emigrate to garrison towns in Egypt, Syria, and Iraq. These soldiers, often referred to as muhājirūn, fulfilled the communal religious duty of jihad through the defense and expansion of dār al-islām.

Second, hijra began to play a role in sectarian disputes. The Kharijis (or khawārij), which formed under 'Ali b. Abi Talib (r. 656–61) and became a prominent opposition group in the Umayyad period (661–750), considered all other Muslims to be infidels and their territory to be dār al-kufr, the land of unbelief. Members were required to perform hijra to Khariji camps in order to conduct jihad against the caliphate.

Later Interpretations

Interpretations of hijra in the medieval through contemporary periods have also reinforced religiopolitical divisions between Muslims and non-Muslims as well as among Muslims. Following the reconquest of Spain, jurists required Spanish Muslims who found themselves under Christian rule to emigrate to dār al-islām. Leaders resisting colonial rule in French Algeria and British India similarly declared these territories dār al-ḥarb and urged hijra as a means of weakening foreign control.

In the 18th and 19th centuries, several West African jihadist leaders, most notably Usman dan Fodio (1754–1817), paired hijra with jihad in the service of their reformist campaigns against nominally Muslim rulers. The Khariji pattern of takfīr (declaring Muslims to be infidels) and hijra in preparation for jihad against illegitimate rulers has also been reformulated by several Islamist movements, particularly in Egypt. One such group that arose in the 1970s was referred to by outsiders as al-Takfir wa-l-Hijra (Excommunication and Withdrawal) for its violent condemnation of Egyptian society as a new jāhiliyya.

The obligation to emigrate from non-Muslim to Muslim territory has also been the subject of renewed debate in the 20th and 21st centuries, as an increasing number of Muslims has settled or converted to Islam in the West and other regions with non-Muslim majorities. There is a wide spectrum of Islamic scholarly opinions, ranging from prohibition to obligation, regarding citizenship in non-Muslim countries and hijra in pursuit of work, education, religious freedom, or other goals.

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; Dan Fodio, Usman (1754–1817); excommunication; jāhiliyya; jihad; Kharijis; Khilafat movement (1919–24); minorities; Muhammad (570–632)

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, "Islamic Law and Muslim Minorities: The Juristic Discourse on Muslim Minorities from the Second/Eighth to the Eleventh/Seventeenth Centuries," Islamic Law and Society 1, no. 2 (1994); Gilles Kepel, Muslim Extremism in Egypt: The Prophet and Pharaoh, 2nd ed., 2003; Ira M. Lapidus, A History of Islamic Societies, 2nd ed., 2002; Muhammad Khalid Masud, "The Obligation to Migrate: The Doctrine of Hijra in Islamic Law," in Muslim Travellers: Pilgrimage, Migration, and the Religious Imagination, edited by Dale F. Eickelman and James Piscatori, 1990.

JOCELYN HENDRICKSON

Hizbullah

Hizbullah (Party of God) is a Lebanese Shi'i political party that incorporates not only a political wing, including members of the parliament and the Lebanese cabinet, but also a military resistance wing and a broad social welfare apparatus. The party's complex and multifaceted organization has emerged gradually since its formation in the mid-1980s.

The 1970s saw a number of political, social, and economic changes in the Lebanese Shi'i community. Factors contributing to the origins of Hizbullah include the 1978 disappearance of Shi'i leader Musa al-Sadr while on a visit to Libya and the subsequent disaffection of many Amal members with the organization, the 1979 Islamic Revolution in Iran, and the 1982 Israeli invasion of Lebanon and siege of Beirut. In the wake of these events, and especially the Israeli invasion—during which tens of thousands of Lebanese were killed and nearly half a million people displaced—small, armed groups of young men organized under the banner of Islam and emerged in the south, the Beqaa Valley, and the suburbs of Beirut. Dedicated to fighting the Israeli occupation troops and trained by Iran, over time these groups coalesced into Hizbullah.

Although anti-occupation resistance operations began in 1982, it was not until February 16, 1985, that the formal existence of Hizbullah and its armed wing, the Islamic Resistance, was announced in an "Open Letter to the Downtrodden in Lebanon and the World." It is this initial statement that many point to as evidence of the party's Islamic ideology. The nature of that ideology, however, must be understood in light of the party's pragmatic actions and political program as well as changes in its relationship to Lebanon and its constituency. For example, while the "Open Letter" states, "We recognize no treaty with [Israel], no ceasefire and no peace agreements, whether separate or consolidated," the party's practices have indicated otherwise. This language reflects a time when the Israeli invasion of Lebanon had just given rise to the Islamic Resistance. As Augustus R. Norton notes, "While Hizballah's enmity for Israel is not to be dismissed, the simple fact is that it has been tacitly negotiating with Israel for years."

The party's ideological platform includes a commitment to Shi'i Islam and the imamate; support for the doctrine of wilāyat al-faqīh (guardianship of the jurist) as articulated by Ayatollah Khomeini during and following the Islamic Revolution in Iran; jihad in the spiritual and social as well as military senses; solidarity with oppressed peoples and support for resistance to oppression; and opposition to the Israeli occupation of Lebanon, Zionism, and U.S. imperialism. The party draws on Islamic history and especially the Battle of Karbala in 680 and the martyrdom of the Prophet Muhammad's grandson Imam Husayn at that battle, as models for resistance against oppression. It also draws on Islam by way of asserting moral claims in its anticorruption stances on Lebanese politics.

The 1985 "Open Letter" notes the party's desire to establish an Islamic state, but only through the will of the people, stating explicitly, "We do not want Islam to reign in Lebanon by force." While the party continues to be led by a seven-member religious council of prominent leaders first established in the 1980s Majlis al-Shura, two other decision-making bodies—an executive council and a politburo—were established as Hizbullah began to enter Lebanese politics toward the end of the civil war. In addition, by deciding to participate first in Lebanese elections in 1992 and later in the government itself in 2005, the party signaled its commitment to working within the existing structures of the state. In keeping with this, since 1992 Hizbullah leaders have frequently acknowledged the contingencies of Lebanon's multiconfessional society of 18 officially recognized religious and ethnic groups and the importance of sectarian coexistence and pluralism within the country. And indeed, in November 2009, Hizbullah released a new "manifesto" (the English translation the party itself used for the "Wathiqa Siyasiyya" [literally, political document]), which highlighted coexistence within the Lebanese state and working toward the abolition of sectarianism within that state system.

Hizbullah and its Majlis al-Shura initially followed the teachings of Ayatollah Khomeini and since his death officially follows his successor Ayatollah 'Ali Khamene'i, the supreme leader of the Islamic Republic of Iran. However, individual supporters or party members are free to choose their source of emulation (marja' al-taqlīd) in personal and religious matters. Many Hizbullah supporters or party members have chosen to follow the late and prominent Lebanese marja' Muhammad Hussein Fadlallah since the late 1990s, and some have chosen to follow the Iraqi Ayatollah 'Ali Sistani in Iraq.

Fadlallah is often described as "the spiritual leader" of Hizbullah. Both Fadlallah and the party have always denied that relationship. For a time, there was a rift between them over the nature of the Shi'i Islamic institution of emulation. Fadlallah believed that religious scholars should work through multiple institutions and should not affiliate with a single political party or be involved in the affairs of a worldly government. In these views, he was closer to traditional Shi'i jurisprudence and to the schools of Najaf, Iraq, where he studied, and more distant from the concept of wilāyat al-faqīh promulgated by Khomeini. Fadlallah's own writings evolved over time, paralleling the changing contingencies of war and politics in Lebanon. Calls for developing Islamism in Lebanon in the 1980s gave way to calls for dialogue among and coexistence of multiple religious confessional groups in Lebanon in the 1990s. Fadlallah was also known for his relatively progressive teachings on gender, which sometimes contrast with those of Khomeini and Khamene'i. As of 1992, the political leader of Hizbullah is Sayyid Hasan Nasrallah. While he is also a religious scholar, he does not rank highly enough to be a marja' and instead remains a follower of Khamene'i and his powerful deputy in Lebanon.

See also Amal; Lebanon; Palestinian Liberation Organization (PLO); Shi'ism

Further Reading

Joseph Elie Alagha, The Shifts in Hizbullah's Ideology: Religious Ideology, Political Ideology, and Political Program, 2006; Augustus Richard Norton, Hezbollah: A Short History, 2007; Naim Qassem, Hizbullah: The Story from Within, translated by Dalia Khalil, 2005.

LARA DEEB

holy places

Holy places, as sites of pilgrimage and the loci of sacred narrative and prestige, are important to political concerns and discourses in Islamic traditions. The holy city of Mecca, located in the Hijaz region of the Arabian Peninsula, plays a central role in Islamic sacred geography and ritual practice; other sites considered holy include the cities of Medina, Jerusalem, and Karbala, the last of particular importance to Shi'i Muslims. Mecca is the site of the annual hajj, an extensive pilgrimage to a cluster of holy places in Mecca and the surrounding area, that is counted among the Five Pillars of Islam. Its performance is required of all Muslims at least once in a person's life if that person is not otherwise impeded by extenuating circumstances, such as finances or health. According to Islamic tradition, pilgrims follow the actions of earlier prophets and events in their lives during the pilgrimage procedures. Probably the most widely known of these rituals is the circumambulation of the Ka'ba, the Meccan sanctuary believed to have been constructed by Abraham. The pilgrimage and its rituals in the holy city of Mecca constitute a powerful expression of the sacred narrative of the religion of Islam as well as its basic principles.

Because of their ritual importance, the holy cities of Mecca and Medina and in particular the shrine of the Ka'ba have formed an important locus of political prestige throughout Islamic history. Many rulers have considered possession of the holy places to be both a sacred duty and a crucial component of their political legitimacy. Early caliphs such as 'Umar b. al-Khattab and 'Uthman b. 'Affan made improvements to the sacred area surrounding the Ka'ba, recognizing the site's sacred status early in the history of Islam. Whether their capital existed in Istanbul or Cairo, Sunni dynasts who ruled over the Hijaz drew enormous political prestige from their custodianship of Islam's holiest sites. Throughout the medieval period, the Umayyads, Abbasids, Fatimids, Ayyubids, Mamluks, and Ottomans invested heavily in maintaining the pilgrimage and building charitable foundations and amenities at its holy destinations. The production of the kiswa, for example, the ornamental cloth that covers the Ka'ba, was considered an important marker of caliphal authority and right of guardianship over the holy sites.

In the 19th century, the Ottoman sultans also claimed the title of caliph, their sovereignty over the Hijaz and its holy places forming a crucial component of their right to claim this religious authority. The Ottomans favored the region with light taxation and a low level of regulation and oversight by the central government in Istanbul, while at the same time supporting the annual pilgrimage to Mecca. Despite the relative poverty and small size of Mecca and Medina, their political fortunes under the Ottomans were determined largely by their status as holy sites. In the modern and contemporary periods, this relationship became an international issue with the rise of the Organization of the Islamic Conference, an organization that provided Saudi Arabia the opportunity to reform its regulation of pilgrims during the hajj. The system of national quotas implemented by the Saudi government has given considerable power to national pilgrimage agencies that oversee the sending of pilgrims from nations across the Islamic world. As a consequence, the local agencies managing the annual hajj expeditions have had to interact with local politics in nations such as Indonesia, Malaysia, Nigeria, Pakistan, and Turkey.

As an undeniable religious obligation of great importance, the pilgrimage has given political dissidents, defectors, and scholars unhappy with their current royal patrons a good excuse to leave. Permission to perform the pilgrimage allowed such figures as Ghazali (d. 1111) and others to exit what may have been difficult political situations and seek their fortunes elsewhere. In addition, the tradition of pious residence (jiwār) in Mecca and the international networks to which the city was tied made Mecca a suitable place to spend time while contemplating a change in career or avoiding the wrath of a distant ruler.

As symbols of sacred ideals in Islam, holy cities have also played an important role in political discourse throughout Islamic history. Mecca's association in classical Arabic discourse with the construction of human civilization after expulsion from the Garden of Eden implies the necessity of the caliphal state as the rightful guardian and patron of human civilization. In this discourse, control over the holy sites and associated relics reinforces the caliphal state's claim to the patronage of both religious law and secular political authority.

Possibly the most notable example of the intersection of political discourse and discourse on the holy places is the use of Karbala's sacred narrative in Iranian politics in the late 20th century. According to Kamran Scot Aghaie's analysis, the traditional narrative of the death of Husayn b. 'Ali at Karbala in 680 was reinterpreted in different ways to express revolutionary political agendas in the 1960s and 1970s in Iran. While the Qajars in Iran, for example, had used the sacred narrative of Karbala to legitimize their own political authority, Iranian political thinkers in the 1960s and 1970s such as 'Ali Shari'ati manipulated its traditional elements to construct a narrative of resistance to the tyranny of the Shah and the Western imperialism his government represented. The sacred narrative at Karbala became the prototype of heroic resistance to tyranny and political injustice.

Finally, these political discourses on holy places have also interacted with other concerns in Islamic societies such as gender. In the Iranian context discussed earlier, for example, the female figures in the Karbala narrative were used to define the proper role of women in opposing the Shah's government. According to these dissident narratives of Karbala, women were expected to resist the political tyranny of the Shah's government by resisting the changes in gender roles it propagated. Within this framework, women were expected to emulate the "traditional" female roles exemplified by such figures as Fatima and Zaynab. Here, the discourse on Islamic sacred space becomes not only a medium for political protest but for formulations of gender as well.

See also Jerusalem; Karbala; Mecca and Medina; pilgrimage

Further Reading

Kamran Scot Aghaie, The Martyrs of Karbala: Shi'i Symbols and Rituals in Modern Iran, 2004; Robert R. Bianchi, Guests of God: Pilgrimage and Politics in the Islamic World, 2004; Michael Dumper, The Politics of Sacred Space: The Old City of Jerusalem in the Middle East Conflict, 2002; William Ochsenwald, Religion, Society and the State in Arabia: The Hijaz under Ottoman Control, 1840–1908, 1984; F. E. Peters, Mecca: A Literary History of the Muslim Holy Land, 1994; Brannon Wheeler, Mecca and Eden: Ritual, Relics, and Territory in Islam, 2006.

PHIL DORROLL

honor

The Middle East is often considered to be part of a circum-Mediterranean "honor-shame" cultural complex in which a desire for respect and a fear of humiliation guide public behavior. However, unlike the pursuit of personal honor and the avoidance of personal disgrace that prevails in Europe, Middle Eastern honor is collective and inheres in a group of close patrilineal kin. Under this system, all members of a kin group are tainted by the dishonor of any one of them. For example, if a man of the kin group has been murdered all male members of the group are responsible for cleansing the stain of dishonor. Conversely, all members equally share liability for tarnishing the honor of another group. Thus, if a man of another group has been murdered and compensation must be paid, all the kinsmen of the murderer should contribute. When blood revenge is taken by the murdered man's patrilineal clan, the victim can be anyone in the murderer's group, not necessarily the guilty party. This kinship-based honor system extends far beyond the Mediterranean basin into Iraq, Iran, Afghanistan, Pakistan, Morocco, and Somalia—in other words, precisely into those regions historically influenced by conquering Arabs and their Bedouin values.

Among the Bedouin, honor ('ird—often conjoined with wajh, or face) can be impugned in a number of ways. The primary and archetypical insult against 'ird is a sexual offense against a woman of the lineage. This affront usually calls for blood revenge—not only against the offender but also sometimes against the woman as well, if she is thought to have been at fault. Another attack on 'ird is the killing or injuring of a member of one's lineage or an attack on one's property, such as stealing one's cattle or appropriating one's land. These offenses can generally be wiped clean by payment of a fine and symbolic acts of contrition mediated by a manshad, or a judge who specifically decides such cases. A third, less direct affront is blackening a man's reputation by publicly accusing him of acting dishonorably or failing to meet an obligation. Thus, while robbery is not in itself dishonorable (it may well be a very honorable act of aggression against one's traditional enemies), it is dishonorable to steal goods that are held in trust. Other dishonorable acts include neglecting one's duties as guardian and failing to give hospitality to guests or to provide safe refuge to those who are under one's protection. Cowardly acts also can lead to a loss of honor, as can breaches in etiquette and decorum. In fact, to maintain his honor, a man must display his upright personality in all his public presentations. In contrast to the unreliable man who hesitates or rushes heedlessly, the steady gait of the man of honor visibly demonstrates that he knows where he is going and that he will arrive on time. The honorable man stands straight and looks at others directly; he is alert and lets nothing escape him, unlike those who foolishly gaze at the clouds or stare at the ground. The women of the collective must also live up to the contrasting female standards of honor by showing proper restraint and diffidence in dress and demeanor.

The pursuit of what Pierre Bourdieu has called the "symbolic capital" of honor is the daily mode of political action in the Middle East. At stake is a man's ability to inspire respect and mobilize his allies in a world where his most important resources are his kin, networks, alliances, and other relationships. The accumulation of honor is the most valuable means of maintaining the web of personal ties necessary for success in a severe and competitive environment. The game of honor itself consists of the serious and continuous improvisation of challenges and counterattacks among equals who are constantly competing for public approval. Those who refuse to play are unworthy of respect. As a common proverb states, "A man without enemies is a donkey." Contestants can follow many strategies to achieve victory (or, more likely, a stalemate), but they must be careful not to accept challenges from the weak and shameless (which lead only to humiliation), not to delay a response to a challenge for too long (which demonstrates fear or indecision), and not to press advantages too far (which reveals immoderation).

Throughout the Middle East, when a man fails in the game, no punishment is meted out to him. A casual observer will notice no evident difference between the treatment of a dishonored man and one who is respected. But in fact a man without honor has become a nonperson, still living in the community but only as a shadow. He will not be asked to offer guarantees, his word is disregarded, his lineage is disgraced, and his children are shamed. Not respected by others, he can have no respect for himself. No wonder, then, that a man will sacrifice a great deal to avoid such a fate.

While everyone has at least the potential of possessing 'ird, in classical Arabic, 'ird and sharaf (nobility) are often used interchangeably, indicating the ancient association of honor with rank, an association marked by the contrasting but overlapping categories of nasab (pedigree) and hasab (honor acquired through deeds). Within the genealogically oriented value system of the Middle East, those of good pedigree are assumed to have inherited an honorable character from their ancestors. Furthermore, different professions and populations are thought to have varying degrees of honor inherent in them. Rural tribesmen claim the highest degree for themselves, whereas tradesmen, workers, and dependent farmers rank lower, since they lack autonomy and cannot live up to the highly valued warrior ethic of the tribal world. The elderly also deserve honor, as do descendants of the Prophet or members of the Quraysh (the Prophet's clan). Individual piety is also affirmed by the devout as the only lasting hasab.

The priority of lineage in the assignment of honor means that men who wish to be accepted as leaders often point to their genealogies as proof of their present virtues. The supposed correlation between hasab and nasab allows others to guess at the capacities of their fellows in fluid situations where leadership is never secure and where character is crucial. However, dishonorable behavior in the present can offset the credit established in the past, while honorable behavior today can raise the status of the lowly. As one poor Arab famously responded after being taunted by one of his betters, "My nasab begins with me, while yours ends with you." The notion that a man can become honorable by his own efforts reflects the deep traditions of individualism and the active pursuit of status that is characteristic of the Middle East throughout history. In principle, this open ideology of achievement permits upward mobility through the expression of character and punishes those who lack honorable qualities. Ideally, the great value placed on honorable behavior inspires leaders to give alms to the poor, protect the weak, and act with rectitude for the sake of their own self-respect and the reputation of their lineage. The pursuit and display of honor therefore serves as a mechanism for maintaining a degree of social order and equity in a highly egalitarian and competitive society.

See also chivalry; Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406); kinship; solidarity; tribalism

Further Reading

Pierre Bourdieu, Outline of a Theory of Practice, 1977; Ibn Khaldun, The Muqaddimah, 1967; Roy Mottahedeh, Loyalty and Leadership in an Early Islamic Society, 1980; Frank Henderson Stewart, Honor, 1994.

CHARLES LINDHOLM

household

In the Middle East, the military-administrative household may be defined as a conglomeration of kinship and patron-client ties in which administrative functions have been concentrated. Such households date at least to the Neo-Assyrian Empire (ca. 911–612 BCE), in which the ruler's palace was referred to as "our house" (bitenu), with the monumental palace gate (babenu, or "our doorway") demarcating the boundary between the household and the outside world. This basic paradigm informed later administrative households, up to and including those of the major Islamic empires. In such a structure, household membership and concomitant loyalty to the ruler who headed the household determined one's position. The more trusted a household member was, the higher he rose in the hierarchy, and the more likely he was to have access to the inner sanctum where the ruler and his family resided.

Among Islamic regimes, the first well-documented example of a household-based administration is that of the Abbasid caliphate (750–1258). In the Abbasid capital of Baghdad, constructed in 762, the caliph's palace was surrounded by the residences of his sons and his African eunuchs, as well as the offices of the still-modest government, which was itself conceived as part of the caliph's household. Indeed, the office of vizier (wazīr), first documented under the Abbasids, originated within the caliph's household, since the original viziers were his trusted clients. In the ninth century, the Abbasids began systematically to recruit elite slaves, or mamluks, from among the Turkic and Iranian peoples of Central Asia, removing them from their homelands so as to ensure their exclusive loyalty to the caliph. In the Abbasid and all subsequent Islamic empires, mamluks were a key component of the ruler's household and armies. Eunuchs, who were also imported from outside the Islamic domains, achieved the closest proximity to the ruler and his immediate family, for they had no family ties that might divide their loyalty. The ruler was not the only household head in a given Islamic society, however; viziers, provincial governors, and even religious scholar officials ('ulama') founded their own households, modeled to varying degrees on that of the ruler.

Women played a pivotal role in these households, as they had in households of the ancient Near East. The wife or favorite concubine of a household head presided over what amounted to a parallel female household, usually based in the harem of the palace or mansion and consisting largely of the wife's or concubine's slaves or former slaves. In a ruler's palace, the "female household" was the site of dynastic reproduction. In the households of ministers and provincial notables, wives and concubines helped to generate and preserve household wealth since, under Islamic law, a woman retained her property after marriage and could acquire more in her own right.

As the most recent empire to dominate the Islamic heartland, the Ottoman Empire has left the most extensive record of how a regime based on administrative households functioned. A hierarchy extended from the sultan's household in Istanbul's Topkapi Palace through the households of the highest-ranking government ministers to those of provincial governors and provincial grandees. Though often based in palatial mansions, lower-ranking households might take shape in military barracks or ordinary houses. They could have an impact on the cities and neighborhoods where they were located if, for example, the household head established charitable works in the vicinity. A key turning point occurred late in the 17th century, when the grand vizier moved his household permanently out of the palace. This century also saw the rise of households led by provincial governors that were independent of, and occasionally antagonistic toward, the imperial palace; they relied on private armies of mercenaries and mamluks. During the following century, notables in the Ottoman provinces were able to parlay control of life-tenure tax farms into formidable households that dominated the provincial administration and proved indispensable to Ottoman military efforts. The Tanzimat reforms, undertaken between 1839 and 1876, aimed in part to reduce the influence of these provincial households.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); clients; family; Mamluks (1250–1517); tribalism

Further Reading

Jane Hathaway, The Politics of Households in Ottoman Egypt: The Rise of the Qazdağlı, 1997; Albert Hourani, "Ottoman Reform and the Politics of Notables," in The Modern Middle East: A Reader, edited by Albert Hourani, Philip S. Khoury, and Mary C. Wilson, 1993; Hugh Kennedy, The Early Abbasid Caliphate, 1981; Metin Kunt, The Sultan's Servants: The Transformation of Ottoman Provincial Government, 1550–1650, 1983; Leslie Peirce, The Imperial Harem: Women and Sovereignty in the Ottoman Empire, 1993; John Malcolm Russell, Sennacherib's Palace without Rival at Nineveh, 1991.

JANE HATHAWAY

human nature

In the history of Islamic thought, there are two main approaches to the question of human nature and the self: moralistic and ontological. The moralistic approach was based on the ethical discourse of the Qur'an, especially in connection with the problems of defining evil, self-purification, and the true experience of monotheism. The framework for the ontological approach was furnished by Aristotelian, Neoplatonic, and Hermetic psychology, but Muslim thinkers used it to address key questions evident in the Qur'an and the tradition of Prophet Muhammad, in discussions that parallel those of St. Augustine and other Christian theologians. The two approaches were often combined, especially in the works of mystics and philosophers, a development that arguably reaches its apex in the existential concept of "the perfect human" (al-insān al-kāmil) proposed by the Andalusian mystic and philosopher Ibn al-'Arabi (d. 1240).

The Qur'an argues that the human being has a natural inclination toward good; however, while the notion of original sin does not exist in Islam, it asserts that the human self or psyche tempts a person to do evil. In this respect, the Qur'an defines three levels of the human self or three existential modes. The lowest of these levels or modes is al-nafs al-ammāra bi-l-sū', or "the self that tempts to evil." This self, as the famous theologian Ghazali (d. 1111) argues in Ma'arij al-Quds fi Madarij Ma'rifat al-Nafs (The ladder to God in the plains of knowing one's soul), describes the state in which a person completely gives in to animalistic, sensual drives. The second level or existential mode is al-nafs al-lawwāma, or the "blaming self." This mode describes the state of the person who is torn between sensual lusts and attaining peace through mental and spiritual education. The third and highest level or existential mode is al-nafs al-muṭma'inna, or the "tranquil or peaceful self." According to Ghazali, this self describes the state when a person reaches tranquility and peace by aligning with reason and rejecting the turbulence caused by sensual drives. Ghazali's interpretation of the three levels of the self in the Qur'an resembles Plato's tripartite division of the soul in the Republic into appetitive, desiring, and rational parts. Like Plato, Ghazali argues that desires must be aligned with reason in order to reach the level of tranquility and peace; otherwise, if sensual appetites and drives dominate desires, the human being could descend to an animal level.

This struggle to achieve tranquility was addressed differently in Sufism, Islam's mystical tradition. Many Sufi treatises, like those of Junayd (d. 910), hold that the primordial covenant (mīthāq) between humankind and God mentioned in Qur'an 7:172 represents the essence of human existence: according to this covenant, all humans attested to the unity of God before being created. However, through societal associations and distractions with the material world, humans become oblivious to this perennial truth. The retrieval of this essence and thus the achievement of the ultimate form of monotheistic experience is the telos or purpose of human life. Such retrieval is possible through a process of intellectual abstraction (tajrīd), as Junayd and his teacher Muhasibi (d. 857) argued, guided by existential and spiritual exercises. This process aims at achieving the annihilation (fanā') of the false ego that is constructed through societal influence, false reasoning, and the blind pursuit of sensual desires.

The physical and metaphysical framework of the classical Islamic view of human nature was inspired by Platonic, Aristotelian, and Neoplatonic philosophy, along with the Hermetic tradition. This is easily discernible in the work of the philosophers Farabi (d. 950), Ibn Sina (d. 1037), Ibn Rushd (d. 1198), and the Brethren of Purity (fl. tenth century). It is also evident in the work of theologians like Ghazali, mystical philosophers like Ibn al-'Arabi, and Hermetic mystics like Ibn Sab'in (d. 1269). Following the Aristotelian line of argument in the De Anima, Ibn Sina argues in his psychological work Compendium on the Faculties of the Soul (Mabhath 'an al-Quwwa al-Nafsaniyya) that the soul is the essence or form of living substances or beings that are capable of moving themselves, including plants, animals, and humans. The powers of the soul are accordingly divided into the vegetative, sensitive or animal, and rational powers. Following books II and III of the De Anima, Ibn Sina argues that the rational soul (al-nafs al-nāṭiqa), which is the highest power of the soul humans possess and therefore defines the human species, is separate from the body. Thinking, or the life of contemplation, is what allows humans to become Godlike and thus realize Him as the essence of everything. This view is Neoplatonic as much as it is Aristotelian. Since everything proceeds from God, the soul can return to Him through the life of contemplation. Because they adopted this Greek model, most Muslim philosophers faced the same challenges that Plato, Aristotle, Plotinus, and the long tradition of their commentators did, including the relation between the potential and active intellects and the eternity of the soul. However, Muslim philosophers, particularly Ibn Sina and Ibn Rushd, in contrast with the Greeks, placed more emphasis on the inner senses, especially imagination, and their role in mediating between rational, universal ideas and sense-perceived, substantial forms. This is particularly evident in the later works of Ibn Sina where he criticized Aristotle's theories and embraced a more mystical and Gnostic view, gravitating toward Platonism and Neoplatonism.

Despite his criticism of Ibn Sina's metaphysics in general, Ghazali presents an almost identical theory of the self in Ma'arij al-Quds fi Madarij Ma'rifat al-Nafs. He continues to analyze the self from an essentialist perspective as a substance that is fully actualized through thinking. However, he maps his analysis against the Qur'an. For instance, Ghazali argues that since several discourses in the Qur'an address the self directly, the self must be a substance that exists. He also adduces a number of traditions attributed to Muhammad to demonstrate that the intellect or the rational soul is the highest and most Godlike power of the soul. In other words, as a theologian, Ghazali uses dialectical arguments based on the Qur'an and the tradition of the Prophet alongside the demonstrative rational proofs Ibn Sina and other philosophers deployed. These proofs were ultimately intended to reconcile the psychological system of the Greeks with the main statements about the self and human nature in Islam's scriptural sources: the Qur'an and the tradition of Muhammad.

Ibn al-'Arabi is arguably the first thinker who combined the moralistic approach to human nature and Ibn Sina's Aristotelian psychology and metaphysics to form a creative vision of human nature focused on the human-divine relationship. In The Bezels of Wisdom (Fusus al-Hikam), Ibn al-'Arabi argued that the human and the divine are essentially connected because the divinity of God cannot be recognized without a being who willfully recognizes it, and this is the human being. The human being has two epistemological and ontological dimensions. The first is a rational, transcendent dimension that allows it to recognize the fixed essences (al-a'yān al-thābita), Platonic forms, or the realm of universal ideas. These ideas are the rational manifestation of the divine names that underlie and characterize the essences of all beings and the entire range of possible relations among them. The human being is also embedded in the physical world of spatial–temporal experience ('ālam al-shahāda), to which he or she has access through sense perception. Between these two dimensions exists the imaginal world ('ālam al-mithāl). Imagination functions to interpret the world of sense perception teleologically in terms of the forms or names of God. The more a human being is capable of interpreting worldly phenomena in terms of the universal ideas representing the divine names, the more perfectly he or she actualizes his or her humanity. Ibn al-'Arabi thus calls the perfect human (al-insān al-kāmil) the all-embracing cosmos (al-kawn al-jāmi'), because only through the capacity of his imagination to recognize the manifestation (tajallī) of God in every worldly phenomenon does God see a mirror image of Himself. The full actualization of the human being is thus achieved through the faculty of imagination and not reason, in contrast with the view found in Aristotelian philosophy. Moreover, the hermeneutical aspect of imagination allows for a more existentially fluid view of human nature than the essentialist perspective underlying Aristotle's theory in the De Anima.

See also Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); Ibn Rushd (1126–98); Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (ca. 980–1037); philosophy; Sufism

Further Reading

Abu al-'Ila Afifi, The Mystical Philosophy of Muhyid-Din Ibnul-'Arabi, 1974; Muhyi al-Din b. al-'Arabi, Bezels of Wisdom, translated by R.W.J. Austin, 1980; William Chittick, The Sufi Path of Knowledge: Ibn al-'Arabi's Metaphysics of Imagination, 1989; Herbert Davidson, Alfarabi, Avicenna, and Averroes on Intellect: Their Cosmologies, Theories of the Active Intellect, and Theories of Human Intellect, 1992; Ibn Rushd, Middle Commentary on Aristotle's De Anima, translated by Alfred L. Ivry, 1994; Ibn Sina, Avicenna's De Anima, Being the Psychological Part of Kitāb al-Shifā', translated by Fazlur Rahman, 1959; Idem, A Compendium on the Soul, translated by Edward Abbott Van Dyck, 1906.

AHMED ABDEL MEGUID

human rights

As a contemporary political issue related to Islam, human rights is often invoked as an international legal yardstick to which some states with Muslim majorities, particularly in the Middle East, are seen, particularly by Westerners, to fall short. Related to this, some Muslims and their governments argue that aspects of contemporary human rights law reflect a Western neoimperialist political slant. Tensions along these lines usually center on political liberties, religious freedom, and women's rights.

Looking mostly at real or alleged shortfalls in Middle Eastern governments' enforcement of contemporary rights law, however, obscures both the fact that perceived violations may have little to do with Islam per se and the historical importance of Islam's role in bringing varied issues of equality and justice to the fore of many premodern societies. Given Islam's strong foundational and doctrinal strains of social and economic justice, religion has been and can be linked with providing greater equality or addressing severe poverty in Muslim-majority societies.

Early Muslim texts and legal scholars did not use the modern Western political term "human rights" (huqūq al-insān), nor did they envision current core concepts of human rights, which generally are specific privileges that individuals enjoy in relation to nation-states in which they are citizens or residents. In classical Islam, individual rights came about as the duty of a divinely sanctioned ruler of a transnational community of Muslims, and of protected non-Muslims, to realize God's will through justice, fairness, and enhanced economic equality.

Islam, as a social system that has combined belief, political order, and flexible mechanisms for growth and evolution, represented a progressive social force in its early history for its ability to enhance women's status, institutionalize charity, and allow for separate, if unequal, privileges for some religious minority communities within its midst; these are all also central issues in contemporary human rights discourse. Indeed, believers assert that the shari'a need not enact specific provisions that institutionalize injustice, as justice is at the very core of Islam and its sociopolitical system.

Of course, such a principle could often produce idealized discourse among legal scholars based on the assumption that rulers would not needlessly do injustice to their subjects. Moreover, the rationalist, individualist foundations of contemporary rights language were not an obvious centerpiece of Islamic jurisprudence, or any other premodern religious system for that matter. In addition, the basic governing norms of the diverse historical empires ruling in the name of Islam, such as the Abbasids, Ottomans, Mughals, and Safavids, varied with respect to individual rights. Thus historical context and changes in the connection of human rights to Islam must be part of any analysis of this subject.

In the contemporary era of postcolonial states, the implementation of codified international legal standards of universal human rights is affected by four primary factors. First, many states with Muslim majority populations have explicitly endorsed, in their constitutions or otherwise, Islam as the prime source of legislation, including in regard to laws that involve rights. Ironically, however, this endorsement has been accompanied in most Islamic countries by the relegation of actual shari'a to the sphere of family law, if even there. Yet, Islam as a source of legal ideals and a tradition of diverse thinking about rights and justice is perhaps even more significant and potent in spurring debate on these issues because it typically lacks substantive realization in many areas of contemporary legal practice.

A second factor affecting human rights is dominant social customs that are often associated with Islam by native Muslims and outsiders but that generally are not required by the religion. Issues surrounding women's status are the most frequent way in which this factor plays out with respect to contemporary rights. Oftentimes, creative solutions within Islamic legal traditions and methods allow for social practices prevalent in Islamic history, especially issues surrounding the status of women, such as polygyny and unequal divorce rights, to be reformulated in relative conformity to human rights law.

Third, global tensions around the politics of Islamic states or social movements, particularly between the West and Arab and other Southwest Asian Islamic areas, encourages miscommunication and exaggeration with respect to human rights standards. Such tensions include concerns about the rights of Muslims in Western states around issues such as national security law in the United States or women's headscarves in Europe.

Fourth, and perhaps of greatest importance, the relatively unaccountable and frequently repressive political systems of many Arab and some other Muslim states, which affect and constrain the rule of law more broadly, are often the real reason for human rights violations and impoverished rights discourse rather than anything connected to Islam. Taken together, these four factors help make sense of the general and specific political disputes around human rights and Islam and also amplify that Islam as a broad, global religion is not per se in clear tension with international rights. This helps make sense of the importance of rights claims as part of the discourse of Muslim Arabs who took to the streets in 2011 to challenge repressive political systems.

This is not to deny real tensions between the interpretation or textual formulations of some human rights law and contemporary Islam. If areas of alleged Islamic difficulty with women's rights are often, in fact, contestable and broadly reconcilable within Islam's emphasis on social justice and equality, some particular provisions of international rights law with respect to religious freedom are more problematic. Specifically, Islamic law has not allowed conversion out of Islam or for Muslim women to marry non-Muslim men, both of which are recognized as freedoms individuals enjoy under human rights law (e.g., Universal Declaration of Human Rights articles 16 and 18 and International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights articles 18 and 27). More generally, and given the four factors previously noted, tensions between Islam and contemporary international rights law may exist based on questions about the moral or pragmatic authority of a nonreligious, non-Islamic positivist legal process to determine rights. Additionally, it may seem inappropriate to ground rights in politics and institutions rather than as a consequence of religious obligation. Of course, such broad tensions are scarcely unique to Islam.

Thus, navigating the terrain of Islam and contemporary international human rights challenges Muslims themselves to negotiate the specific relation of global rights law standards to particular local contexts and practices and also challenges non-Muslims and Muslims alike to recognize how domestic, regional, and global politics can magnify or create disputes and misunderstandings that are not inherent in Islam's diverse historical experiences of seeking fairness and justice for individuals. The increasing diversification of Muslim societies and communities throughout traditional Islamic heartlands and the West increases opportunities for lively, sophisticated, and varied debates about the rapport between Islam and human rights.

See also modernity; shari'a

Further Reading

Abdullahi An-Na'im and Mashood A. Baderin, eds., Islam and Human Rights: Selected Essays of Abdullahi An-Na'im, 2010; Jack Donnelly, International Human Rights, 2006; Chibli Mallat, Introduction to Middle Eastern Law, 2007; Ann Mayer, Islam and Human Rights: Tradition and Politics, 2006; Irene Oh, The Rights of God: Islam, Human Rights, and Comparative Ethics, 2007; "Universal Declaration of Human Rights," http://www.un.org/en/documents/udhr.

DAVID MEDNICOFF

Husayn b. 'Ali (626–80)

Husayn b. 'Ali was the Prophet Muhammad's grandson through his daughter Fatima and his cousin 'Ali b. Abi Talib. Considered imam by Shi'is after his father 'Ali and his brother Hasan, Husayn is loved and remembered as the martyr of Karbala, the righteous man who sacrificed his life and family "in the path of God." Husayn's death, the ensuing deep mourning of his sympathizers, and their rallying around the call for retribution for his killing became the nexus for emotions and identity in Shi'ism.

Husayn was born in Medina in 626. He was six when his grandfather Muhammad and then his mother Fatima died. Historical works chronicle several anecdotes about his birth and childhood, most of them related to his grandfather Muhammad's affectionate regard. Hadith compilations record the Prophet's extolling of the two brothers, such as "Hasan and Husayn are the leaders of the youth of Paradise." The wide dissemination of this and other similar hadith indicates Husayn's high standing among the early Muslim community at large; Shi'is interpret them as proof of his imamate.

When 'Ali became caliph in 656 and left Medina for Iraq to put down the rebellion that resulted in the Battle of the Camel, Hasan and Husayn accompanied him. Shortly after 'Ali's death in 661, Hasan ceded the caliphate to Mu'awiya, and the family returned to Medina. When Hasan died in 670, Husayn became the Hashimi patriarch, and he continued (like Hasan before him) to live quietly as a Qurashi elder in Medina.

In April 680, the Umayyad caliph Mu'awiya died after having appointed his son Yazid as his successor. Husayn (along with another Qurashi, 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr) refused to pledge allegiance to Yazid and left Medina for the safe haven of Mecca. In Mecca, he received repeated missives from Kufan leaders, imploring him to assert his own legitimate leadership and promising support if he did; as 'Ali's former capital, Kufa was home to widespread 'Alid sympathies. Despite misgivings expressed by some of his Qurashi well-wishers unsure of Kufan support, Husayn sent his cousin Muslim b. 'Aqil to receive the Kufans' pledge of allegiance on his behalf and shortly thereafter himself set out toward Iraq.

On October 2, 680, Umayyad forces (which ironically included many of Husayn's former Kufan supporters) surrounded Husayn's small band on the desert plain of Karbala. On the 7th, they posted military units to block his access to water. On the 10th, the day named 'Ashura,' the Umayyads killed the 72 men from his company, including his sons and brothers, and finally killed Husayn himself. Husayn's son 'Ali Zayn al-'Abidin was the only adult 'Alid male who survived; according to the Twelver and Isma'ili traditions, he became the next Shi'i imam. The Umayyads imprisoned him and the women of the family and carried them to Kufa and then Damascus, releasing them after some months to return home to Medina.

The killing of Husayn at Karbala shocked the Muslim community, especially the Kufan Shi'is, who were roused to grief for their role in his death. Four thousand Kufans came together as the "Penitents" to pledge "revenge for the blood of Husayn." En masse, they mourned at Husayn's tomb in Karbala, then advanced toward Damascus. The Umayyads engaged them with a large force at 'Ayn Warda near the Syrian border and killed all but a few. Soon thereafter, another Kufan leader named Mukhtar al-Thaqafi (who claimed to represent Husayn's half-brother Muhammad b. al-Hanafiyya) constructed a domed mausoleum over Husayn's grave and built a mosque at the site. He reportedly executed thousands of men implicated in the Karbala incident before he himself was besieged and killed. These early mobilizations and collective lamentations in Husayn's name were the catalyst for the crystallization of formal Shi'ism, which had developed nebulously up to that time.

Retribution for Husayn's killing continued to be cited in religiopolitical uprisings of the next few centuries, as in revolts of the Abbasids and the Fatimids. But after the occultation of the Twelver Shi'i imam and the concealment of the Fatimid-Tayyibi imam, it was reconstituted as a pledge that would be fulfilled at the hands of the Mahdi at the end of time.

Through the centuries, Husayn's legacy—his name, his shrine, and the commemoration of his martyrdom—became a keystone of Shi'i piety. Husayn's shrine in Karbala developed into an important geographical locus of Shi'i religious sentiment; successive Shi'i rulers, including the Buyids in the 10th century and the Safavids in the 17th century, expanded it on a magnificent scale, and devotees flocked there, considering a visit to Karbala second only to the pilgrimage to Mecca. The Buyids also built the city of Karbala around the site, and in time along with Najaf (the site of 'Ali's shrine), Karbala became a major center of Shi'i scholarship and activism in Iraq. Husayn's death anniversary at 'Ashura' became a significant temporal locus of Shi'i devotion, as a time for the performance of stirring lamentations and moving sermons. The Fatimids in the 10th and 11th centuries sponsored such assemblies of mourning in Egypt, and later the Safavids instituted in Persia rites such as passion plays (ta'ziya), breast-beating, and flagellation. The memorials for Husayn continue to play a key role in the manifestation of Shi'i identity in 21st-century Iran, Iraq, and Lebanon, as well as countries in South and Central Asia and other places where Shi'i Muslims reside in large numbers. Husayn's memory as the "Grandson of the Prophet," the imam who "courageously endured oppression at Karbala," and the "Prince of Martyrs" continues to permeate Shi'i consciousness and to underpin their outlook on life and death.

See also 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); Hasan b. 'Ali (ca. 624–70); imamate; Karbala; martyrdom; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Kamran Aghaie, The Martyrs of Karbala: Shi'i Symbols and Rituals in Modern Iran, 2004; Mahmoud Ayoub, Redemptive Suffering in Islām, 1978; Heinz Halm, Shi'a Islam: From Religion to Revolution, translated by Allison Brown, 1997; Syed Akbar Hyder, Reliving Karbala: Martyrdom in South Asian Memory, 2006; Yitzhak Nakash, The Shi'is of Iraq, 1994; Abu Ja'far Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari, The History of al-Ṭabarī, vol. 19, The Caliphate of Yazīd b. Mu'āwiyah, translated by I.K.A. Howard, 1990; Idem, The History of al-Ṭabarī, vol. 20, The Collapse of Sufyānid Authority, translated by G. R. Hawting, 1989.

TAHERA QUTBUDDIN

hypocrisy

Hypocrisy (nifāq) and hypocrites (munāfiqūn) are referred to repeatedly in the Qur'an. In the early days of Islam, the hypocrites were people in Muhammad's community who were held to be insufficiently committed to his message, and they were depicted as reluctant to support him financially or to join his fight against his enemies (e.g., Q. 33:12–21 and 57:13–17). A typical example reports "that the hypocrites too may know. For it had been said to them: 'Come and fight in the cause of God, or else pay.' They had answered: 'Had we known fighting was to occur we would have followed you'"; the Qur'an adds, "that day they were nearer to unbelief than they were to belief" and "they would utter with their mouths what was not in their hearts—and God knows best what they conceal" (Q. 3:167). An entire chapter in the Qur'an is named after the hypocrites (63, al-Munafiqun), and Muhammad is ordered to fight them: "O Prophet, exert yourself against the unbelievers and hypocrites, and deal harshly with them" (Q. 9:73 and 66:9). They would end up "in the lowest reaches of the Fire" (Q. 4:145).

The Qur'an does not identify these hypocrites, but the Islamic tradition, especially the narratives of the life of Muhammad, has much to say about them. Ibn Ishaq (d. 767), the celebrated authority on Muhammad, identifies the Medinan notable 'Abdallah b. Ubayy (d. 631) as the leader of the hypocrites. 'Abdallah b. Ubayy is said to have accepted Islam grudgingly and with ill intent and to have deserted the Prophet when the Muslims marched to meet the army of the Meccans at Uhud. Ibn Ishaq also lists as hypocrites a number of Jews from Medina who accepted Islam but then recanted.

The concept of hypocrisy played a major role in early Islamic history because it supplied a rubric under which one could accept people with opposing views as coreligionists. For example, moderate Kharijis such as the Ibadis legitimated peaceful coexistence with non-Khariji Muslims (whom they did not recognize as Muslims) at times when revolt was impossible by classifying the latter as hypocrites as opposed to outright idolaters and polytheists: all were infidels, but the Prophet had accepted hypocrites as members of the Muslim community on the basis of their external conformance. Likewise, the Zaydis held their opponents to be guilty of grave sins, which they counted as unbelief in the sense of hypocrisy. In the same vein, several early Sunni exegetes are cited by the scholar Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923) as having interpreted the order to "exert yourself against the unbelievers and hypocrites, and deal harshly with them" in Q. 9:73 to mean that infidels should be fought with the sword, but hypocrites only with the tongue (i.e., by reprimands and preaching). Tabari himself held in the interpretation that infidels and hypocrites should be fought in the same way, but the "fighting" he recommended for both is that of "commanding right and forbidding wrong," with the hand when one can—that is, by forcibly correcting open wrongdoing. This interpretation also rests on the assumption that the hypocrites were coreligionists (the duty to command right and forbid wrong pertained only to coreligionists). The Prophet, Tabari explained, had accepted people as members of the Muslim community on the basis of what they said and did, not on the basis of their inner convictions, even when he knew their inner beliefs to be at odds with their external conformance, since God had prohibited people from speculating about others' inner convictions. The jurist Shafi'i (d. 820) said that Muslim rulers must heed the example of Muhammad in dealing with hypocrites and judge them by what they publicly profess, not what they conceal. What God says about them in the Qur'an is irrelevant, for that foretells their fate rather than ordains how they are to be treated in this world. By contrast, Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) deemed the threat of the hypocrites to Islam and Muslims to surpass the threat of the infidels and so recommended that they be put to the sword.

Ibn Taymiyya's position has become popular among some Muslims in modern times, as the loss of Islam's hegemonic position has forced many into a position of defensive intransigence. Sayyid Qutb (1906–66), author of the influential exegesis of the Qur'an In the Shadow of the Qur'an, argued that hypocrites must be fought as harshly as infidels, meaning that violent action had to be taken against the secularist regimes that dominated the Middle East, including his own Egypt. Several militant Muslim groups have adopted such harsh views to justify attacks on Muslim coreligionists.

See also commanding right and forbidding wrong; Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); jihad; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)

Further Reading

M. Cook, Forbidding Wrong in Islam, 2003; P. Crone and F. W. Zimmermann, The Epistle of Salim b. Dhakwan, 2000; Gilles Kepel, Jihad: The Trail of Political Islam, 2002; Rudolph Peters, Jihad in Classical and Modern Islam, 1996; Sayyid Qutb, Social Justice in Islam, translated by John B. Hardie, 2000.

SULEIMAN ALI MOURAD

Ibadis

The only Khariji sect to survive into the modern period, in Oman and North Africa, the Ibadis (Ibadiyya) first emerged as a distinct sectarian group in the late Umayyad Basra. At that time, the broader Khariji movement was split between those favoring immediate separation from other Muslims (hijra) and open hostilities against the state and those looking for at least a tactical accommodation with the political authorities until the time was ripe for open rebellion. What would come to be called the Ibadi sect emerged from the latter group. Having begun to systematize their principles and quietly organize themselves in the early eighth century, they sent out teams of missionaries known as "bearers of knowledge" to propagate Ibadi teachings and organize rebellions in distant regions. By the end of the Umayyad period, they could appeal to disaffected groups in several provinces—in particular, Berber tribesmen in North Africa and Arab tribesmen in the Arabian Peninsula, more specifically Oman and South Arabia. Imamates were established in both areas, beginning with the short-lived state founded in the Hadhramawt region during the 740s by the Ibadi rebel known as Talib al-Haqq, who for a short time also extended his control to the holy cities of Mecca and Medina. In Oman and the Hadhramawt, there were imamates on and off over the course of several centuries, a pattern that lasted (in highland Oman, at least) into the 1950s. In North Africa, a dynasty of imams (the Rustamids) held sway from Tahert (central Algeria) between 778 and 909, when they were overthrown by the Fatimids.

This history is reflected in Ibadi political thought. The literature of the sect describes several different ideal types of imamates clearly intended to rationalize different stages in its history and changing political fortunes. Unlike the extremist Kharijis, the Ibadis distinguished between a state of secrecy (kitmān), when weakness forced the true believers to live quietly under the rule of their oppressors, as in Basra, and the open proclamation of an imamate (ẓahūr), such as what occured in North Africa and Oman. The state of secrecy could be modified in various ways, including by the rebellion of at least 40 men who decide to fight to the death in order to establish proper Muslim (Ibadi) rule, even absent realistic hope of proclaiming an effective imamate. This last category, the activist or heroic imamate known as shirā' (selling oneself to God), appears to reflect an effort by the later Ibadis to maintain an association with venerated Khariji martyrs (shurāt) from the earliest days; at the same time, restrictions such as the 40-man requirement (modeled on the rebellion of the early Khariji figure Abu Bilal Mirdas b. Udayya [d. ca. 680]) were clearly intended to put limits around militant activity. Although the Ibadis grew increasingly uncomfortable with the label "Khariji" (ultimately reserving it in their own literature for the extremists while adopting for themselves labels such as "the people of rectitude"), their literary heritage shows that they shared the basic Khariji tenets. Merit (understood as piety and knowledge) rather than descent was deemed to be the principal qualification for the imamate (though the imamate in North Africa was dynastic and the imams in ninth-century Oman were drawn exclusively from one tribal grouping). The legitimacy of the first two caliphs is accepted in Ibadi thought, but both 'Uthman b. 'Affan and 'Ali b. Abi Talib are regarded as having been rightfully deposed after proving themselves unworthy of the office. Ordinary Muslims are deemed to be infidels from whom dissociation (barā'a) is required. What distinguished the Ibadis from their now extinct extremist brethren was a willingness to regard non-Khariji Muslims as infidels of a special, limited sort: in the earliest terminology, they were "hypocrites" (munāfiqūn) such as those in the Prophet's own day; later, they were "those ungrateful for God's blessings" (kuffār ni'ma). Because such people were not classed as outright idolaters, practical coexistence with them was deemed possible even while a posture of internal or spiritual dissociation was maintained. Intermarriage and mutual inheritance were permissible; emigration (hijra)—signifying a complete rupture with non-Khariji Muslims—was not. Rebellion itself was permitted when circumstances allowed, but in no way was it to involve the permanent and devastating break with the ordinary Muslims demanded by the extremists. Accordingly, indiscriminate killing of such people (isti'rād) was out of the question, nor could they be enslaved or their property taken as booty.

Unlike Shi'is, the Ibadis do not seem to have adjusted their doctrines for political use in the modern world, and circumstances have not compelled Ibadi thinkers to produce a distinctive vision of a modern Ibadi state. At the same time, Ibadi thought has never been immune to broader currents within the Muslim world, including 20th-century Salafism.

See also heresiography; Kharijis; theology

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Patricia Crone and F. W. Zimmerman, The Epistle of Sālim ibn Dhakwān, 2001; 'Amr K. Ennami, Studies in Ibāḍism, 1972; Adam Gaiser, Muslims, Scholars, Soldiers: The Origin and Elaboration of the Ibāḍī Imāmate

Traditions, 2010; Wilferd Madelung, "ʿAbd Allāh b. Ibāḍ and the Origins of the Ibāḍiyya," in Authority, Privacy, and Public Order in Islam, edited by B. Michalak-Pikulska and A. Pikulski, 2004; Idem, Religious Trends in Early Islamic Iran, 1988; W. Schwartz, Die Anfänge der Ibaditen in Nordafrika, 1983; John Wilkinson, Ibadism: Origins and Early Development in Oman, 2010.

KEITH LEWINSTEIN

Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, Muhammad (1703–92)

Founder of a revivalist and reformist religious movement centered in Najd in central Arabia and commonly referred to as the Wahhabiyya or Wahhabis, Muhammad b. ʿAbd al-Wahhab belonged to a prominent family of Hanbali scholars, the Al Musharraf of Ushayqir. He studied in his birthplace, al-ʿUyayna, as well as in Medina, al-Ahsaʾ, and Basra before settling back in Najd, where he began to preach an uncompromising message of strict monotheism that shunned many popular religious practices. The core of Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab's teachings and writings center on the theological doctrine of divine unity (tawḥīd), which he declared, like Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328) before him, to consist of three elements of belief and action: the unity of lordship (tawḥīd al-rubūbiyya), the unity of godship (tawḥīd al-ulūhiyya), and the unity of the divine names and attributes (tawḥīd al-asmāʾ wa-l-ṣifāt). In accordance with this, to associate with any being or thing a power that is God's exclusively or to direct any form of worship to any being other than God constitutes unbelief.

Other than the Qurʾan and the hadith, his principal sources of inspiration were the writings of Ibn Taymiyya and Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 1350). Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, by his own admission, was not a highly trained or qualified theologian or jurist with a noted pedigree of teachers, and he was criticized by his many opponents for this deficiency. He is best considered a missionary and leader of a revivalist and purificatory religious movement. In terms of the law, Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab and most Wahhabis remained loyal followers of the Hanbali school and not advocates of a radical form of independent judgment (ijtihād) that would deny the authority of the established madhhabs (schools of law), as some of their opponents claimed they were.

Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab's writings have no discernible political vision or template nor a specific political end. He was concerned with eradicating what he deemed to be reprehensible innovations (bidaʿ) and returning the community of Muslims to the original teachings of the Prophet Muhammad and his Companions, collectively known as the pious ancestors (al-salaf al-ṣālih). He wished to institute what might be termed a regime of godliness, but not the historical caliphate nor a particular political formation.

Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab wrote more than 20 short works and many epistles, of which the most famous books are Kitab al-Tawhid (The book of divine unity) and Kashf al-Shubuhat ʿan al-Tawhid (Dispelling doubts about divine unity). None of his writings evinces a high degree of scholarship or originality; rather, they were written as primers and have since been extensively commented on and widely read and distributed. Their popularity owes more to the political success of his movement and the promotion of these works by its adepts and by the Saudi state than to any intrinsic quality in the writing or the organization of the information therein.

In one of his letters, Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab asserted that he became known for four positions: (1) the clear exposition of the affirmation of Divine Unity, (2) the elucidation of the concept of polytheism (shirk) and associated practices, (3) the declaration that those who derogate from monotheism are unbelievers (takfīr), and (4) the engagement in the divine commandment to fight the unbelievers. According to Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, to be considered a Muslim, it is not sufficient to declare oneself a believer by, for instance, uttering the creedal statement (shahāda); one must also actively deny, in both speech and acts, all beliefs and forms of polytheistic worship. Not to share activist Wahhabi beliefs and praxis or to plead ignorance of the requirements of the faith will result in one being considered an infidel. Furthermore, Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, as well as a number of his descendants, such as Sulayman b. ʿAbdallah (d. 1818), insisted that a Muslim show loyalty and friendship to fellow believers and evince animosity and hatred toward unbelievers. This doctrine, known as al-walāʾ wa-l-barāʾ, has embedded in it the potential for political activism, even violence, against individuals or a political order that is deemed un-Islamic. The Wahhabis are noted for not recognizing the Ottoman state as Islamic and therefore legitimate; instead, they considered it and the lands it controlled the abode of unbelief. The Wahhabi practice of takfīr and waging war (qitāl) on other self-described Muslims led many scholars, including some Hanbalis and members of Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab's immediate family, to condemn the movement and its teachings. These same muscular doctrines and practices, however, enabled Wahhabism to galvanize the military potential of the settled and Bedouin tribes of central Arabia and allowed its mission to spread alongside the expansion of the political entity to which it gave its allegiance.

The Wahhabi mission received considerable impetus when Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab received the support and protection of Muhammad b. Saʿud (d. 1765), the amir of the small town of al-Dirʿiyya, near present-day Riyadh. The relationship between the Saʿud family and Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab and his descendants, otherwise known as the Al al-Shaykh, endured and centered on a compact forged around 1744. Its terms, in effect, stated that the Saudi royal family would promote and defend Wahhabi doctrines and, in return, the Al al-Shaykh, with their students and followers, would accord legitimacy to Saudi rule.

There have been three successive Saudi states, the last being the Kingdom of Saudi Arabia (est. 1932), all of which have promoted Wahhabi teachings. In each of these states, the religious establishment was dominated, although not always exclusively, by the scholarly descendants of Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab. In the early 21st century, the grand mufti of Saudi Arabia is a scion of the Al al-Shaykh. These religious leaders have invariably proffered their loyalty to the Al Sa'ud, although there have been periods of tension in the relationship, especially when the political leadership has sought to compromise or even undermine Wahhabi doctrines for reasons of realpolitik. The Al al-Shaykh have invariably accommodated the Al Sa'ud by restricting the application of Wahhabi teachings, and this has drawn criticism from a segment of the religious scholars and activists within and outside Saudi Arabia. These critics, among whom are the ideologues of al-Qaeda, invariably hark back to the more radical and militant elements of the movement's doctrines and accuse the accommodationists of betrayal. As such, the legacy of Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab remains hotly contested and subject to constant reformulation.

See also fundamentalism; Salafis; Saudi Arabia

Further Reading

David Commins, The Wahhabi Mission and Saudi Arabia, 2006; Michael Cook, "On the Origins of Wahhabism," Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society, 3rd series, 2 (1992); Mohammed Nabil Mouline, Les Clercs de l'islam, 2011; Esther Peskes, Muḥammad b. 'Abdalwahhāb im Widerstreit, 1993; Abd Allah Salih al-'Uthaymin, Muhammad ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab, 2009.

BERNARD HAYKEL

Ibn al-Muqaffa' (ca. 720–56)

Born in Fars, 'Abdallah b. al-Muqaffa' served as secretary to Umayyad officials in Kirman and, after the coming of the Abbasids (750–1258), to 'Isa b. 'Ali, uncle of the caliph Mansur (r. 754–75). He converted to Islam during this latter period of his life. A master of Arabic, he made essential contributions to the new Islamic culture as a writer and translator from the Middle Persian.

While several of his works, such as Kalila wa-Dimna (Kalila and Dimna) or the Kitab al-Adab al-Kabir (roughly, The greater essay on right conduct), aim to instruct rulers and courtiers on matters ranging from shrewdness to wisdom (e.g., how to guard against slander, when is it smart to make common cause with an enemy, how to control the passions), his Risala fi al-Sahaba (Epistle on the caliph's entourage), addressed to Mansur after 754, contains his thinking about issues particular to the Islamic state and his advice to the head of that state on how to best deal with them.

Ibn al-Muqaffa' draws attention to the divergence among judicial rulings, even in the same city, in important legal cases of various kinds (involving bloodshed as well as sexual and financial matters). He argues that the caliph should collect and examine these judgments and dispositions, along with arguments from tradition or analogy offered in their support, and then issue his personal determination through the use of reason (ra'y), thereby producing a code from which judges would not be allowed to deviate. Successive caliphs would do likewise. According to Ibn al-Muqaffa', judges' claims of support from tradition are often unreliable and analogy can be perilously subjective. Had the caliphs followed Ibn al-Muqaffa''s advice, the history of the Islamic world might have taken a different course.

Concerning the role of religion in stabilizing the state, Ibn al-Muqaffa' echoes Sasanian ideas in the Kitab al-Adab al-Kabir: "If a ruler enforces correct religion among his people [aqāma li-ahlihi dīnahum], and it is their religion that authorizes their expectations from him and imposes on them their obligations towards him, the people will be content; even the disaffected among them will be like the contented in their acquiescence in word and deed." In the Risala fi al-Sahaba, he offers similar counsel to the Abbasids, a dynasty whose ascension had been aided by religious enthusiasts. According to Ibn al-Muqaffa', the Khurasanian army should be sent a handbook of correct religious belief as fixed by the caliph because its chiefs hold extravagant notions and their subordinates are muddled, resulting in dangerous discord.

Ibn al-Muqaffa' proposed a certain policing of thought as salutary for the entire state: loyal men, experts in religion and law, must be sent to each city, military district, and border region to draw people's attention to error, prevent harmful innovation, and warn against sedition. These cultural commissars were to scrutinize the affairs of the people among whom they lived, noting deviant individual opinion when it first appeared and rooting it out before it gained a hold on people's minds. He also emphasized the importance of surveillance by trusted agents so that "if anyone makes a move in a matter that concerns the commonalty of the people a loyal eye will be watching him."

The question of whether there are limits to the obedience owed to the ruler is also raised in the Risala fi al-Sahaba. Misinterpretation of the maxim "No obedience [is due] to a creature who rebels against the creator" has led some men, Ibn al-Muqaffa' writes, to the false idea that anyone can decide what it means to obey the creator. But the view that the ruler is owed absolute obedience is, according to Ibn al-Muqaffa', also incorrect. The ruler has no discretionary power over the religious duties and punishments laid down in the Qur'an, but his word is supreme in such matters of state as war, the collection and allocation of revenues, the appointment and dismissal of government servants, and the issuance of legal rulings based on personal opinion in cases where there is no precedent from the practice of the Prophet or (probably) previous caliphs approved by the Abbasids.

To improve the administration of the empire, Ibn al-Muqaffa' argued for a predictable land tax that did not penalize increased production, for keeping soldiers out of the financial administration, and for a bureaucracy of competent, well-educated men.

See also Abbasids (750–1258)

Further Reading

Ihsan 'Abbas, "Nazra jadīda fī al-kutub al-mansūba ilā ibn al-Muqaffa'," Bulletin of the Arab Academy of Damascus 52 (1977);

M. Cassarino, L'aspetto morale e religioso nell'opera di ibn al-Muqaffa', 2000; P. Crone and M. Hinds, God's Caliph, 1986; S. D. Goitein, "A Turning Point in the History of the Muslim State," in Studies in Islamic History and Institutions, 1968; J. D. Latham, "Ibn al-Muqaffa' and Early 'Abbasid Prose," in 'Abbasid Belles-Lettres, edited by J. Ashtiany et al., 1990; Ibn al-Muqaffa', Conseilleur du calife (edition and French translation of the Risala fi al-Sahaba by C. Pellat), 1976.

ANDRAS HAMORI

Ibn Bajja (d. 1139)

Abu Bakr Muhammad b. Bajja joins Ibn Rushd (1126–98) in the West and Farabi (ca. 878–950) and Ibn Sina (980–1037) in the East as one of the most renowned philosophers within the classical Islamic tradition. Although he left his mark on Islamic civilization as a philosopher, Ibn Bajja was also well known throughout Spain and North Africa for his accomplishments in medicine, poetry, music, and astronomy. Owing to his talents and acclaim, he was quick to impress those in power and rose to a high office in their courts. At the same time, however, Ibn Bajja was just as quick to acquire enemies and provoke rivals, which twice resulted in his imprisonment (first for treason, then for heresy) and possibly in his being poisoned at the beckoning of a rival courtier.

His political philosophy comes primarily from his Governance of the Solitary. In this work, Ibn Bajja makes explicit references to Plato, Aristotle, and Farabi, and the influence of these thinkers comes through clearly in his argumentation. Like Plato, Ibn Bajja contends that the city is properly called "virtuous and perfect" when it is ruled by the philosopher. Ibn Bajja's conception of the faculties through which the philosopher rules follows Farabi's treatment of the active intellect, which, in turn, has its origin in Aristotle's remarks on the soul. The active intellect is an intermediary between God and humanity often associated within the Islamic tradition with the angel Gabriel or the "faithful spirit" of the Qur'an. At times, it is described along the lines of the Platonic realm of forms as a kind of unified constellation of paradigmatic spiritual realities from which all things in the material world receive their being. At other times, it is depicted as supplying rational agents with principles of reason. It is also the means by which the philosopher receives prophetic and revelatory visions from God. Through earnest philosophical investigation and training, the accomplished philosopher is united with the active intellect. At this stage, the philosopher realizes his "universal spiritual form," which entails unsurpassed understanding of the cosmos and the workings of the terrestrial realm. When the philosopher takes his rightful place as ruler, he puts his theoretical knowledge into practice and governs in such a way that the character of each citizen is maximized according to its capacity. There is no false opinion in his city. All citizens are united in friendship so there are no disputes, making the office of judge irrelevant. Nor is there a need for physicians, since each citizen maintains a good state of health by eating proper foods and exercising regularly.

The philosopher's perfect city stands in contrast to four types of corrupt governance that Ibn Bajja characterizes in accordance with divisions established by Plato in the Republic: the timocratic, oligarchic, democratic, and despotic. The unique and defining feature of Ibn Bajja's political philosophy is inspired by the idea that the perfect city has not been realized and that the philosopher is forced to live in one of the four types of corrupt cities or a mixture thereof. Ibn Bajja's prescription for a healthy philosophic life, therefore, is withdrawal from sociopolitical affairs. In order to maintain his own spiritual health and union with the active intellect, the philosopher must isolate himself, shunning the affairs of the imperfect city and thereby protecting himself from its corrupting influences. This is not ideal, for Ibn Bajja recognizes with Aristotle that the human being is a political animal and concedes that there is something rather unnatural about withdrawing from political life. Nevertheless, the prescription of withdrawal is a necessary evil in the context of the corrupt state. Ibn Bajja likens it to opium, which is harmful to the healthy body yet beneficial to the diseased. In this regard, Ibn Bajja writes of the philosopher's sociopolitical isolation as "medicine for the soul."

Questions have been raised regarding the consistency of Ibn Bajja's prescription of withdrawal with his self-professed fidelity to Plato, Aristotle, and Farabi. Such withdrawal is out of the question for Aristotle, and although there is a seminal notion of withdrawal from the corrupt city in the work of Plato and Farabi, it is not clear that their political philosophies accommodate the radical isolation that Ibn Bajja recommends. Concern has also been voiced about Ibn Bajja's attitude toward the shari'a, which seems to be made obsolete in the life of the socially isolated philosopher and in the context of the perfect state, where the right action of its citizens is interpreted as an outgrowth of their well-formed character and true opinion rather than as obedience to religious law.

See also Almoravids (1056–1147); al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); government; Ibn Rushd (1126–98); individualism; North Africa; philosopher-king; philosophy; Spain and Portugal (Andalus)

Further Reading

Lenn E. Goodman, "Ibn Bajjah," in History of Islamic Philosophy, edited by Seyyed Hossein Nasr and Oliver Leaman, 1996; Ibn Bajja, "Governance of the Solitary," in Medieval Political Philosophy: A Sourcebook, edited by Ralph Lerner and Mushin Mahdi, translated by Lawrence Berman, 1963; Oliver Leaman, "Ibn Bajja on Society and Philosophy," Der Islam Zeitchrit für Geschichte und Kultur des islamischen Orients 57, no. 1 (1980); E.I.J. Rosenthal, "Ibn Bajja: The Individualist Deviation," in Political Thought in Medieval Islam, 1962.

W. CRAIG STREETMAN

monopolized its Islamic learning system and judicial administration. The Banu Jama'a were originally an obscure Shafi'i family from Hamat (in northern Syria) who traced their descent to the Arab tribe of Kinana. They became the dominant Shafi'i family in the Mamluk state within a relatively short time. They were active in Damascus, Cairo, and Jerusalem between 1291 and 1383, during which three generations of the Ibn Jama'a family intermittently held the position of chief judge (qaḍī al-quḍāt) in Egypt and occasionally also in Damascus. The rise of the Banu Jama'a as one of the wealthy and leading religious families was due mainly to the achievement of one member of the family, Badr al-Din Muhammad b. Jama'a, the grandson of a provincial jurist, Burhan al-Din Sa'd Allah b. Jama'a (1200–1277).

Badr al-Din Muhammad was born in Hamat in 1241 and was educated in the traditional branches of Islamic learning. The early public positions he held were of professor (mudarris) in Damascus and preacher (khaṭīb) and prayer leader (imam) of the al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem. In 1288, he was appointed as the Shafi'i judge of Jerusalem, and in 1291 he was summoned to Cairo by the Mamluk sultan Ashraf Khalil to serve as the Shafi'i chief judge in Egypt. In the wake of Ashraf Khalil's assassination, he was dismissed and transferred to Damascus, where he served as head of the Sufi orders (shaykh al-shuyūkh), chief judge, and professor. He was reinstated as the Shafi'i qāḍī al-quḍāt in Egypt in 1302. In 1310, he was dismissed by Sultan al-Nasir Muhammad, who disliked him, but his appointment was renewed the following year. He served in this position and in teaching positions in prestigious madrasas, or colleges, in Cairo until 1327, when he retired. He devoted himself to writing and teaching until he died in Cairo in 1333.

The Banu Jama'a maintained their position of distinction in Cairo after Badr al-Din Muhammad's death, thanks to the careers of his son 'Izz al-Din 'Abd al-'Aziz (1294–1366) and his nephew Burhan al-Din Ibrahim b. 'Abd al-Rahim (1325–88). The family enjoyed an established position in Jerusalem until the Ottoman conquest, probably because of the remoteness of the city from the political centers of the Mamluk state.

Badr al-Din Muhammad b. Jama'a was one of the most erudite and prolific scholars of his age. His 33 known works deal with a wide range of topics of Islamic traditional sciences, such as Qur'an commentary, hadith, jurisprudence, education, and Arabic language and literature. Ibn Jama'a left his mark on Islamic political thought mainly through his book Tahrir al-Ahkam fi Tadbir Ahl al-Islam (Summary of the rules to govern the people of Islam), which reflects the political circumstances of his time. After the destruction of the Abbasid caliphate by the Mongols in 1258, a new political order was created in the Muslim world: the Mamluk regime emerged as a great power and became the new guardian of orthodox Islam. The Mamluk sultan Zahir Baybars set up an Abbasid shadow caliphate in Cairo in 1261. Devoid of any ruling power, the caliph nevertheless played an important ceremonial role in legitimizing Mamluk rule by delegating his authority to the sultan. Much like their predecessors during the Buyid and Seljuq eras, the jurists of the time had to define the sultans' political and religious authority. Ibn Jama'a's restatement of the theory of rulership, which in general mirrors the prevailing view at the time, is that the seizure of government itself accords authority and that oppressive power is preferable to anarchy and therefore must be obeyed. This view justified the assumption of caliphal powers by sultans and laid the theoretical basis for their acceptance by the orthodox 'ulama'. The legitimacy of usurpation of power had already been addressed in the Islamic constitutional theories worked out by earlier jurists. Mawardi (d. 1058) had recognized the de facto provincial rulers (imārat al-istīlā') who attained power by military force, and the caliph was under obligation to delegate authority to them in the interests of peace and order. Ghazali (d. 1111) viewed the sultanate, normally supported by military power, as a necessary element in the caliphate itself. Like his contemporary Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), Ibn Jama'a took a further step and avoided the distinction between the sultanate and the imamate. That is, he acknowledged the possibility that the caliphate is absorbed by the sultanate and that the functions formerly ascribed to the caliph (or imam) are performed by the sultan. In the absence of an imam, Ibn Jama'a also permitted the rule of an unqualified person who usurped power and ruled by force without pledging an oath of allegiance (bay'a) and held that it is in the interest of Muslims to obey him for the sake of unity and general well-being. For the same reasons, he argued, sins committed by the imam or sultan should be forgiven and should not lead to their removal.

Ibn Jama'a's theory is in line with classical Islamic political thought. He affirms that the appointment of an imam or sultan is necessary to protect religion (to "command the right and forbid the wrong"), to defend Islam from its enemies (jihad), and to conduct the affairs of the community with justice. He emphasizes the sultan's need to consult with the 'ulama' and their obligation not to withhold advice from him. In fulfilling his duties the ruler has the right to expect obedience from his subjects.

See also Mamluks (1250–1517)

Further Reading

Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought, 2001; Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam, 1981; K. S. Salibi, "The Banū Jamā'a, a Dynasty of Shafiite Jurists in the Mamlūk Period," Studia Islamica 9 (1958).

AMALIA LEVANONI

Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406)

Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406) was a historian, philosopher, sociologist, and official during a period that scholars sometimes refer to as the decline of the Muslim Arab regimes of North Africa and the Middle East. Born in Tunis to a family of Andalusian Muslim politicians and scholars, his youth was spent learning the traditional Islamic

Ibn Hazm (994–1064)

The life of the man of letters and religious scholar Abu Muhammad ʿAli b. Hazm coincided with one of the most traumatic periods in the history of Andalus (Islamic Iberia). The Western branch of the Umayyad dynasty had lost its splendor with the death of Caliph Hakam II al-Mustansir in 976, in which time his young son Hisham II al-Muʾayyad fell under the influence of his chamberlain Muhammad b. Abi ʿAmir al-Mansur, who claimed to rule in his name. Ibn Hazm's father had served Mansur as vizier, and Ibn Hazm himself briefly acted as vizier to at least two of the Umayyad caliphs that followed each other in rapid succession and with much bloodshed after the demise of Mansur's second son in 1009. The ensuing civil war between different Muslim factions profoundly affected Ibn Hazm, as is clear from autobiographical passages in his best-known work, Tawq al-Hamama (The Ring of the Dove). After twice suffering imprisonment for his political activities, Ibn Hazm turned to scholarship, producing an immense oeuvre spanning numerous disciplines.

His political views are expressed in several works, most notably al-Fasl fi al-Milal wa-l-Ahwaʾ wa-l-Nihal (The decision concerning religions, heresies, and sects), al-Muhalla bi-l-Athar (The book adorned with traditions), and al-Radd ʿala Ibn al-Naghrila al-Yahudi (The refutation of Ibn al-Naghrila the Jew), which reflect his literalist (ẓahiri) reading of the Qurʾan and the hadith and his opposition to the state-sponsored Maliki school of law. They can be summarized as follows: the Muslim community is in need of a supreme leader (imam or caliph) to whom obedience is owed; there can only be one imam at any given time; he must be an adult male from the tribe of Quraysh, though not necessarily closely related to the Prophet Muhammad; and he must be in possession of his full mental faculties on his accession. Physical defects do not constitute an impediment, nor need he be the most virtuous person available. The imam should be pious, promote the application of God's law, and see to it that justice is done. The imam is to show himself regularly to the public. He should refrain from openly committing major sins, and he should hide any minor ones.

An imam may legitimately come to power in one of the following ways: (1) the ruling imam himself appoints his successor, not necessarily his own son or relative; (2) if the imam dies without having appointed a successor, someone may stake a claim, which was how ʿAli b. Abi Talib obtained the leadership of the Muslim community; or (3) the incumbent imam appoints a person or a number of persons to elect the new leader, as was done by the second caliph, ʿUmar b. al-Khattab. The first option is preferable to Ibn Hazm. His predilection for the Umayyad house, to which he claimed to be linked by clientage, is reflected in his statement that Muʿawiya b. Abi Sufyan was not guilty of bidʿa (un-Islamic innovations) when he designated his son Yazid as his successor, for it was similar to the way that the Prophet Muhammad chose Abu Bakr, who in turn designated ʿUmar as his successor. Although the Andalusian Umayyads were ruling an increasingly shrinking part of the Muslim world, they were the sole legitimate heirs of the first Umayyad caliphate for Ibn Hazm, not the Persianate Abbasids and certainly not the Shiʿi Fatimids (whom he dismissively calls "Banu ʿUbayd") or the Hammudids, an ʿAlid dynasty that briefly supplanted the Umayyads in Andalus.

The imam will delegate several of his original functions, but he must be personally involved in the selection of his representatives, making sure they are pious as well as capable. He will surround himself with advisors, such as judges and military commanders, who are experts in their respective fields and with whom he meets regularly. Governors in remote provinces, especially rich and strategically important ones, are to be appointed for brief periods only so that they cannot create a power base; by moving them about, other areas, too, get to benefit from their skills. Soldiers are to be paid well, so as to minimize the danger of rebellions. By the time Ibn Hazm wrote these lines, it was already too late for Andalus.

In the absence of an imam—which was practically the case in the Iberian Peninsula under the so-called party-kings, who ruled the petty states created after the final collapse of the caliphate in 1031—the believers should follow the person who takes the initiative to promote God's law and fight the unbelievers. In Ibn Hazm's view, none of the new, self-styled kings qualified. With characteristic bluntness he scolds them for flouting the laws of the shariʿa, relying on non-Muslim functionaries and soldiers, raising illegitimate taxes, and otherwise oppressing the believers, all of which constitute acceptable grounds for deposing the ruler, whether he is the imam or someone of minor stature. It is no surprise, then, that Ibn Hazm became persona non grata at several local courts and that the king of Seville ordered the public burning of his books.

See also caliph, caliphate; Spain and Portugal (Andalus); Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Ibn Hazm, The Ring of the Dove, translated by A. J. Arberry, 1994; Janina M. Safran, The Second Umayyad Caliphate: The Articulation of Caliphal Legitimacy in al-Andalus, 2000; Abdel Magid Turki, "L'engagement politique et la théorie du califat d'Ibn Hazm (384/994–456/1064)," Bulletin d'études orientales 30, no. 2 (1978); David J. Wasserstein, The Caliphate in the West: An Islamic Political Institution in the Iberian Peninsula, 1993; Idem, The Rise and Fall of the Party Kings: Politics and Society in Islamic Spain, 1002–1086, 1985.

CAMILLA ADANG

Ibn Jamaʿa (1241–1333)

The Banu Jamaʿa were one of the native Arab families that formed the new judicial and religious aristocracy that rose with the establishment of Mamluk rule in Egypt in 1250 and virtually monopolized its Islamic learning system and judicial administration. The Banu Jama'a were originally an obscure Shafi'i family from Hamat (in northern Syria) who traced their descent to the Arab tribe of Kinana. They became the dominant Shafi'i family in the Mamluk state within a relatively short time. They were active in Damascus, Cairo, and Jerusalem between 1291 and 1383, during which three generations of the Ibn Jama'a family intermittently held the position of chief judge (qadi al-quḍat) in Egypt and occasionally also in Damascus. The rise of the Banu Jama'a as one of the wealthy and leading religious families was due mainly to the achievement of one member of the family, Badr al-Din Muhammad b. Jama'a, the grandson of a provincial jurist, Burhan al-Din Sa'd Allah b. Jama'a (1200–1277).

Badr al-Din Muhammad was born in Hamat in 1241 and was educated in the traditional branches of Islamic learning. The early public positions he held were of professor (mudarris) in Damascus and preacher (khaṭib) and prayer leader (imam) of the al-Aqsa Mosque in Jerusalem. In 1288, he was appointed as the Shafi'i judge of Jerusalem, and in 1291 he was summoned to Cairo by the Mamluk sultan Ashraf Khalil to serve as the Shafi'i chief judge in Egypt. In the wake of Ashraf Khalil's assassination, he was dismissed and transferred to Damascus, where he served as head of the Sufi orders (shaykh al-shuyūkh), chief judge, and professor. He was reinstated as the Shafi'i qāḍī al-quḍāt in Egypt in 1302. In 1310, he was dismissed by Sultan al-Nasir Muhammad, who disliked him, but his appointment was renewed the following year. He served in this position and in teaching positions in prestigious madrasas, or colleges, in Cairo until 1327, when he retired. He devoted himself to writing and teaching until he died in Cairo in 1333.

The Banu Jama'a maintained their position of distinction in Cairo after Badr al-Din Muhammad's death, thanks to the careers of his son 'Izz al-Din 'Abd al-'Aziz (1294–1366) and his nephew Burhan al-Din Ibrahim b. 'Abd al-Rahim (1325–88). The family enjoyed an established position in Jerusalem until the Ottoman conquest, probably because of the remoteness of the city from the political centers of the Mamluk state.

Badr al-Din Muhammad b. Jama'a was one of the most erudite and prolific scholars of his age. His 33 known works deal with a wide range of topics of Islamic traditional sciences, such as Qur'an commentary, hadith, jurisprudence, education, and Arabic language and literature. Ibn Jama'a left his mark on Islamic political thought mainly through his book Tahrir al-Ahkam fi Tadbir Ahl al-Islam (Summary of the rules to govern the people of Islam), which reflects the political circumstances of his time. After the destruction of the Abbasid caliphate by the Mongols in 1258, a new political order was created in the Muslim world: the Mamluk regime emerged as a great power and became the new guardian of orthodox Islam. The Mamluk sultan Zahir Baybars set up an Abbasid shadow caliphate in Cairo in 1261. Devoid of any ruling power, the caliph nevertheless played an important ceremonial role in legitimizing Mamluk rule by delegating his authority to the sultan. Much like their predecessors during the Buyid and Seljuq eras, the jurists of the time had to define the sultans' political and religious authority. Ibn Jama'a's restatement of the theory of rulership, which in general mirrors the prevailing view at the time, is that the seizure of government itself accords authority and that oppressive power is preferable to anarchy and therefore must be obeyed. This view justified the assumption of caliphal powers by sultans and laid the theoretical basis for their acceptance by the orthodox 'ulama'. The legitimacy of usurpation of power had already been addressed in the Islamic constitutional theories worked out by earlier jurists. Mawardi (d. 1058) had recognized the de facto provincial rulers (imārat al-istīlā') who attained power by military force, and the caliph was under obligation to delegate authority to them in the interests of peace and order. Ghazali (d. 1111) viewed the sultanate, normally supported by military power, as a necessary element in the caliphate itself. Like his contemporary Ibn Taymiyya (d. 1328), Ibn Jama'a took a further step and avoided the distinction between the sultanate and the imamate. That is, he acknowledged the possibility that the caliphate is absorbed by the sultanate and that the functions formerly ascribed to the caliph (or imam) are performed by the sultan. In the absence of an imam, Ibn Jama'a also permitted the rule of an unqualified person who usurped power and ruled by force without pledging an oath of allegiance (bay'a) and held that it is in the interest of Muslims to obey him for the sake of unity and general well-being. For the same reasons, he argued, sins committed by the imam or sultan should be forgiven and should not lead to their removal.

Ibn Jama'a's theory is in line with classical Islamic political thought. He affirms that the appointment of an imam or sultan is necessary to protect religion (to "command the right and forbid the wrong"), to defend Islam from its enemies (jihad), and to conduct the affairs of the community with justice. He emphasizes the sultan's need to consult with the 'ulama' and their obligation not to withhold advice from him. In fulfilling his duties the ruler has the right to expect obedience from his subjects.

See also Mamluks (1250–1517)

Further Reading

Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought, 2001; Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam, 1981; K. S. Salibi, "The Banū Jamā'a, a Dynasty of Shafiite Jurists in the Mamlūk Period," Studia Islamica 9 (1958).

AMALIA LEVANONI

Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406)

Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406) was a historian, philosopher, sociologist, and official during a period that scholars sometimes refer to as the decline of the Muslim Arab regimes of North Africa and the Middle East. Born in Tunis to a family of Andalusian Muslim politicians and scholars, his youth was spent learning the traditional Islamic sciences of Qur'an, hadith, Arabic, and law (fiqh). During the first 20 years of his life, he remained in Tunisia, where he witnessed political upheavals and experienced the intellectual stagnation beginning to affect North Africa. A plague also swept through the region, and his parents were among the many lives it claimed. These events greatly influenced his thinking and understanding of the world, as his later writings would demonstrate.

Ibn Khaldun spent the next 30 years of his life moving from place to place, balancing his interest in politics with teaching and writing. He spent years roaming before settling in Fez, Morocco, where he remained for eight years, occupying various government positions. He then spent many years traveling back and forth across North Africa, including visits to Bougie and Biskra, and going to Muslim-controlled areas of Spain, particularly Granada. All the while, he strove to dedicate himself to scholarship, but in all instances he could not resist the lure of government work. The constant shifting in his allegiance that his lifestyle dictated is what many scholars believe was the cause of his dismissal from official positions, as well as the catalyst for his engagement in constant traveling. He did succeed in settling in Algeria for a number of years at the castle of Salama. It was there that he began to write his magnum opus, the Muqaddima (Prolegomena).

In the remaining 20 years of his life, Ibn Khaldun curtailed his political career and focused on scholarly activities. He took up residence in Cairo and was appointed to a number of positions, including those of teacher and judge (qadi) of Maliki fiqh, an Islamic legal school (madhhab) based on the legal interpretations of Imam Malik, at one point becoming the head judge of Maliki rite in Egypt. In 1401, he was appointed an envoy and sent on a special mission to Damascus, which placed him in contact with the Mongol leader Timur (Tamerlane). Ibn Khaldun took part in the negotiations with Timur, an incident about which he wrote in detail. He spent the remaining years of his life teaching and compiling his works.

Ibn Khaldun did not produce a large number of books, but the Muqaddima, the introduction he wrote to his universal history, Kitab al-'Ibar (The book on important events), would have an impact on social scientists in an array of fields the world over. In this work, he defines history as the study of the entire human past, including its social, economic, and cultural facets. His primary emphasis is on social events. This concern led him to develop an innovative sociological concept he termed 'asabiyya, which he defined as the bond that all humans share and that leads human beings to establish communities with one another. The Muqaddima, praised as a historical and sociological masterpiece, laid the foundation for other social sciences, such as economics and psychology.

See also Berbers; North Africa; Tamerlane (1336–1405)

Further Reading

Ibn Khaldun, The Muqaddimah: An Introduction to History, translated by Franz Rosenthal, 1967; Yves Lacoste, Ibn Khaldun: The Birth of History and the Past of the Third World, 1984; Bruce Lawrence, ed., Ibn Khaldun and Islamic Ideology, 1984; Nathaniel Schmidt, Ibn Khaldun: Historian, Sociologist, and Philosopher, 1967; Róbert Simon, Ibn Khaldun: History as Science and the Patrimonial Empire, translated by Klara Pogatsa, 2002.

MATTHEW LONG

Ibn Rushd (1126–98)

Abu al-Walid Muhammad b. Ahmad b. Rushd, whose name was Latinized to Averroes, was born in Córdoba into a politically active family of prominent religious jurists of the Maliki school. He studied Arabic grammar and literature, Qur'anic sciences, hadith, jurisprudence, theology, philosophy, natural sciences, and medicine. Following in the footsteps of his father and grandfather, he served as a judge, first in Seville (1169–72) and then as a chief judge in Córdoba (1172–82), a position that presumably was the highest civil authority in the city. After that, he became chief physician at the court of the Almohads in Marrakesh. Ibn Tufayl introduced him to the prince Abu Ya'qub Yusuf b. Tashufin, who asked him to comment on the books of Aristotle. He wrote short commentaries (jawami'), middle commentaries (mukhtasar), and long commentaries (tafsir) on them in Arabic, some of which have survived only in Hebrew or Latin translations. It was due to their influence in Latin Europe that Ibn Rushd was called "The Commentator." Ibn Rushd also wrote important theological-philosophical, juridical, and medical books. He enjoyed the favor of the caliph Ya'qub al-Mansur until 1195, when he was tried and banished to Lucena, near Córdoba, and his philosophical books were burned. Biographers give different reasons for his fall from favor, all of which are of a political nature. Although Ibn Rushd was brought back to honor, he did not live long after those degrading events.

Ibn Rushd surpasses other Muslim philosophers in his awareness of the political character of religious law. Arguing against Muslim theologians, he states that prophecy is not to be proved by performing miracles but by its rational character, which consists of the empowerment of the sociopolitical function of religion in order to create and maintain order. The laws established by the prophets are essential for man's well-being, and they are derived from both reason and revelation. Their rational character is a commonality between them, and they surpass civil laws by being revealed. According to Ibn Rushd, philosophers acknowledge that religion aims at addressing the general public by using methods other than philosophical demonstration. Religious prescriptions that enhance virtuous conduct are, therefore, indispensable for a political community so that individuals can attain a life of virtue in this world and eternal happiness in the next.

Based on his belief in the unity of truth equally borne by religion and philosophy, Ibn Rushd argued, drawing on the Qur'an, that Qur'anic statements that apparently contradict reason should be interpreted allegorically by the philosophers. However, he also argued that the true meaning of the ambiguous verses should not be announced to the masses in order to protect the community from friction and division. Aware of the political dimensions of Qur'anic exegesis, he considers the harmony of philosophy and religion to correspond to the harmony within the community. Some of his attitudes reflect his agreement with the Almohad doctrine established by Ibn Tumart.

Ibn Rushd summarized Plato's Republic instead of Aristotle's Politics, which was not available to him. Drawing on his knowledge of Aristotle and Islam, he used the Republic to display his ideas on the best governance. In essence, he considered the ideal Islamic state, which is basically led by the revealed law, as one that reflects Plato's ideal city. He applied Plato's political ideas as generally valid principles to Muslim concepts and institutions in past and present. However, he read Plato's political philosophy with the eyes of an orthodox Muslim who acknowledges the supremacy of the revealed and comprehensive shari'a.

Following Aristotle, Ibn Rushd considers politics to be, along with ethics, the second part of the practical science, which differs from the theoretical sciences in that its subject is the deeds people commit willfully and out of choice. Ethics addresses individuals; it deals with dispositions, volitional actions, and habits in general, explaining how they are related and how they affect each other. Politics addresses the community, examining how dispositions can be established in the souls and enhanced to become perfect.

Like Plato, Ibn Rushd saw an analogy between the just order of the soul and the just order of the city. The inhabitants of the virtuous city do the work assigned to them according to their natural capabilities. The rulers and the state can implant virtue in the souls of citizens by persuasion and coercion; persuasion takes place by means of rhetoric, coercion by war. Ibn Rushd observes that both ways have been practiced in Islam.

In liberal statements that are not in agreement with traditional Islamic teaching and practice, Ibn Rushd assigns to women an equal share in the management of state affairs as well as in warfare. Indeed, according to him, women could become philosophers and rulers. Furthermore, the fact that women, in his society, are confined to the rearing of children and not allowed to work other than a few lower jobs like spinning and weaving is for him one cause of the poverty of Andalusian society. However, when dealing with delicate matters that involved the community of women and children, he reports Plato's opinion in a narrative fashion and refrains from adopting it.

Like Farabi, Ibn Rushd states that the ruler of the virtuous city has to be a philosopher, lawgiver, king, and imam, giving a linguistic explanation of the last word as "he who is followed in his actions." As a political realist, he declares prophetic revelation to be useful but not necessary for virtuous governance, which is primarily based on reason and aims ultimately at bringing about happiness and providing the conditions necessary for people to pursue the good life. Ibn Rushd acknowledges the possibility that persons who are qualified to be virtuous rulers could exist in his time and under Islam, and if they rule for a long, uninterrupted period, the virtuous city could come into being. He states in a pragmatic way that, although Plato gave the best manner for its emergence, the virtuous city could emerge in a different manner and that already existing states could achieve the ideal status. This takes a long time to happen and is accomplished through both the beliefs and the deeds of virtuous rulers.

Considering the ideal Platonic state and the early Islamic state under Muhammad and the Rightly Guided Caliphate to be two paradigms for perfect governance, Ibn Rushd compares them with later Muslim states, giving examples from Islamic history that show the degeneration of virtuous governance. Evaluating the contemporary political situation in general, he pessimistically states that the rulers who remain virtuous according to the prescriptions of the Qur'an are rare. He criticizes the dynasties of many of the Muslim kings in his day for preserving the laws merely to keep their family privileges and usurp public property.

Ibn Rushd's teachings on the separation of reason and faith as well as the autonomy and universality of the intellect contributed widely to the development of European political thought, especially concerning the separation of church and state and the establishment of political rule on the basis of reason instead of religious authority. These secular ideas were adopted by several intellectuals in the 20th century, who strove to modernize the religious discourse in Islam and establish freedom of thought and expression in the Arab world. Despite their different political colors, their secularism is uniquely linked to Ibn Rushd.

See also al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); Ghazali (ca.1058–1111); Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (980–1037); philosophy

Further Reading

Averroes, On the Harmony of Religion and Philosophy, translated by George F. Hourani, 1976; Charles Butterworth, Philosophy, Ethics and Virtuous Rule: A Study of Averroes' Commentary on Plato's "Republic," 1986; Majid Fakhry, Averroes (Ibn Rushd): His Life, Works and Influence, 2001; Ibn Rushd, The Incoherence of the Incoherence, translated by Simon van den Bergh, 1954; Oliver Leaman, Averroes and His Philosophy, 1988; Ralph Lerner, trans., Averroes on Plato's Republic, 1974; E.I.J. Rosenthal, ed., Averroes' Commentary on Plato's Republic, 1956; Dominique Urvoy, Ibn Rushd (Averroes), 1991.

GEORGES TAMER

Ibn Sina, Abu 'Ali (980–1037)

Known as Avicenna in the Christian West, Abu 'Ali b. Sina is probably the most influential Muslim philosopher and the key figure of Islamic Aristotelianism. Political philosophy as part of practical wisdom (al-hikma al-'amaliyya) appears to be a minor constituent of his thought, which is dominated by metaphysical issues. The final chapters (10:2–5) of his Kitab al-Shifa' (The book of the cure) provide a summary account of his political teaching.

According to Ibn Sina, a human being cannot exist without companions and helpers who assist him in satisfying his needs. Human beings thus need to establish cities and live in communities. Companionship, in turn, leads to transactions (mu'āmalāt), which must be conducted in accordance with the tradition of justice (sunnat al-'adl). Such a tradition can be established only by a prophet, who is recognized through his miracles. The inhabitants of cities comprise three groups: governors (mudabbirūn), artisans (sunnā'), and guardians (hafaẓa). Each group has its own hierarchy. Every man occupies a specific station and brings some particular benefit to the city. No one should exploit another or receive his subsistence without labor, except the sick and weak, who should be placed together with an appointed guardian.

The city should have at its disposal public funds raised by collecting a certain portion of the profit made through transactions and by confiscating the property of those who desert the tradition. These funds should be used for the common good and maintenance of guardians. Occupations that imply a transfer of property without mutual benefit (such as gambling), harm somebody (such as theft and solicitation), or intrude on public benefit (such as usury) should be forbidden. Likewise, pursuing objectives that contradict the fundamental principles of the city is forbidden. Examples are fornication and sodomy: they undermine the principle of marriage and family, upon which the survival of humankind depends.

The prophet, who founds the tradition, is succeeded by a vicegerent (khalīfa). Direct appointment of the vicegerent by his predecessor is preferable to his appointment by the unanimous decision of a group of elders, because such an appointment will prevent disagreement, division, and dissent among citizens. The vicegerent must be independent in his decisions; possess an innate intellect and noble character traits, such as courage and purity in act and thought; and have proper governing skills. Hence whoever has a more powerful intellect and nobler character traits and is better at governing is more deserving to be a vicegerent. The vicegerent also must know the law (shari'a) better than anyone else. However, people must obey the vicegerent even if he has only some of the required qualifications (namely, if he does not possess an exceptionally powerful intellect, or if he possesses only few—but not all—noble character traits); in this case, he can be regarded as vicegerent only in some aspects. Those who refuse to recognize the vicegerent should be persuaded to do so by force or wealth (i.e., gifts). If this does not work, other citizens should fight and kill them; if they can fight these renegades but do not, they disobey God. After faith in the Prophet, allegiance to the victorious vicegerent by defending his right by every possible means is the next best way to be close to God.

The vicegerent's duty is to perform the acts of worship ('ibādāt), such as public prayers and festivals; perform transactions that support the pillars of the city; and create and lead public enterprises that prevent injustice and treachery (e.g., public executions of criminals). He also must prevent dangerous or risky transactions, thus defending the inhabitants of the city and their property. The vicegerent must be moderate in his appetites, temperament, and the way he governs, choosing the golden mean (the medium between extremes) whenever possible. He must achieve happiness by theoretical wisdom. If he possesses the aforementioned qualities and habits, then he truly can be regarded as the human lord (rabb insānī), the ruler of the Earth, and God's vicegerent.

Ibn Sina's political teaching, evidently influenced by Plato's Republic and the Shi'i doctrine of the imamate, has come down to us as a set of brief remarks on three interconnected issues: government of the city, prophecy, and vicegerency. Although Ibn Sina was deeply involved in practical politics, he never developed his seminal political ideas into an elaborate system, or if he did, he never put it into writing.

See also city (philosophical); al-Farabi, Abu Nasr (ca. 878–950); philosophy

Further Reading

Charles E. Butterworth, The Political Aspects of Islamic Philosophy, 1992; Dimitri Gutas, Avicenna and the Aristotelian Tradition, 1988; Abu Ali Ibn Sina, The Metaphysics of Avicenna, edited and translated by Michael Marmura, 2004; Tony Street, Avicenna, 2005.

YANIS ESHOTS

Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328)

The writings of this major independent Sunni mufti, theologian, and activist of the Mamluk period influenced various reformist and puritanical developments in later Muslim societies. Often misinterpreted, they remain central in modern Islamist ideology and Muslim recourse to violence.

Taqi al-Din Ahmad b. 'Abd al-Halim b. Taymiyya was born in Harran (in present-day southeastern Turkey) on January 22, 1263, to a family of Hanbali scholars and, fleeing the Mongol threat, settled in Damascus in 1269. He spent his life in the Mamluk sultanate—Syria, Egypt, Palestine, and the Hijaz—and died in prison in Damascus on September 26, 1328.

Autobiographical statements and abundant contemporaneous corroboration by witnesses and historians make Ibn Taymiyya one of the most widely documented figures of classical Islam. Many sources nevertheless remain to be systematically examined to further shed light on his ideas and life, keeping in mind that Taymiyyan studies often suffer from uncritical editions, poor translations, and the absence of a precise chronology and proper contextualization.

Ibn Taymiyya's education and lifelong quest for knowledge made him a formidable champion of Prophetic tradition (hadith) and an expert not only in traditional religious sciences—Qur'anic exegesis, jurisprudence, theology (kalām), and heresiography—but also in Sufism, comparative religion, logic, and philosophy (falsafa). He already was considered qualified to give fatwas at the age of 17 (1279) and actually began to teach hadith in Damascus in 1284 and Qur'anic exegesis one year later at the Umayyad Mosque. He would remain a teacher and a mufti until his death, working sometimes under very difficult circumstances. A prolific writer, Ibn Taymiyya authored, besides innumerable fatwas, various creeds ('aqīda) and treatises on the most diverse religious questions, long works that have become seminal references in their fields: in theology, Dar' al-Ta'arrud (Rejecting contradictions between reason and tradition); in Shi'itology, Minhaj al-Sunna (The way of the Prophet's Sunna) refuting Minhaj al-Karama (The way of charisma) by the Imami theologian Mutahhar al-Hilli (d. 1325); in polemics against Christians, al-Jawab al-Sahih (The correct response); in philosophy, al-Radd 'ala al-Mantiqiyyin (The refutation of the logicians); in economics, al-Hisba fi al-Islam (The Hisba in Islam); and in politics, al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya (The book of governance according to the shari'a).

Ibn Taymiyya was often involved in public affairs. He had his first problems with the authorities in 1294, when he publicly demanded the death penalty for a Christian accused of insulting the Prophet. Actively taking it upon himself to implement the religious duty to command right and forbid wrong, he is said to have, among other things, shaved children's heads, led an antidebauchery campaign in brothels and taverns, struck an atheist with his hand before his public execution, destroyed a supposedly sacred rock in a mosque, conducted attacks on astrologers, and obliged deviant Sufi shaykhs to make public acts of contrition and to adhere to the sunna. He not only exhorted to jihad on various occasions but also personally took part in some expeditions and battles. During the Mongol invasion of Syria in 1299–1300, he was one of the leaders of the resistance in Damascus and, through direct discussions with the Ilkhan Mahmud Ghazan, his vizier Rashid al-Din Fadl Allah, and Tatar commanders, obtained the release of a number of Syrian prisoners, both Muslim and dhimmī.

Ghazan's defeat at Shaqhab in 1303, after that of Kitbuga at 'Ayn Jalut in 1260 and the fall of Acre, the last stronghold of the crusaders in Palestine in 1290, confirmed Ibn Taymiyya in his conviction that the Mamluks were the champions of Islam, although the internal stability of the sultanate was often mired in rivalries between the great amirs, which he sometimes personally experienced. In 1306–7, for example, when a theological controversy led to his trial and imprisonment in Cairo, the amir Baybars al-Jashnikir sided with his opponents and had him detained in a dungeon, whereas the amir Salar strived for his release and eventually obtained it. The young sultan al-Nasir Muhammad b. Qalawun himself was forced to contend with such powerful amirs. He was deposed twice and did not really rule before his third reign started in 1310. Ibn Taymiyya was nevertheless loyal to Nasir Muhammad, to the point of calling him the promised renewer of the religion for his age. In 1310, as a sort of éminence grise, or minister without portfolio, he advised the sultan on various religious affairs and policies and composed his al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya with him in mind.

Ibn Taymiyya's sometimes close relations with the highest powers in the Mamluk sultanate did not protect him from detention on six different occasions, for a total of more than six years, between 1306 and 1328. The pretexts invoked related mainly to his theological views on the divine attributes and the oneness of existence, and later on to his jurisprudential positions on repudiation and on the visitation of graves. The real reasons were more trivial and had to do with his noncompliance with doctrines and practices prevalent among powerful religious and Sufi establishments of his time, an overly outspoken personality, the jealousy of his peers, the risks to public order due to his popular appeal, and political intrigues. He was supported both materially and spiritually until the end by his brothers, a group of companions and disciples like Ibn Qayyim al-Jawziyya (d. 1350). In fact, he called prison "a divine blessing" and he had "no motive to be afraid of people: no school (madrasa), no land grant (iqtā'), no wealth, no leading position (ri'āsa), nothing!" In another, clearly autobiographical text, probably written during his last detention, he explains that "when a scholar forsakes what he knows of the Book of God and of the sunna of His Messenger, and follows the ruling of a ruler which contravenes a ruling of God and His Messenger, he is a renegade, an unbeliever who deserves to be punished in this world and in the hereafter."

Ibn Taymiyya's political thought is generally derived from his two books, al-Siyasa al-Shar'iyya and the Hisba, and even more so from his anti-Mongol fatwas. Many modern scholars and activists alike trace three central Islamist theses back to him: a clear-cut division of the world into the abode of Islam (dār al-islām) and the abode of unbelief (dār al-kufr) or war (dār al-harb); the anathematization (takfīr) of any Muslim who disobeys religion; and the duty to oppose and kill Muslim rulers who do not implement the revealed Law (shari'a). He has thus become a sort of forefather of al-Qaeda. The Taymiyyan paternity of these three theses, however, can be disputed. Asked, for example, about Mardin—in his time, a little Mongol protectorate with a Muslim ruler and a religiously mixed population—Ibn Taymiyya places it neither in dār al-islām nor dār al-kufr, but rather gives it a third, "composite" (murakkab) status. In a fatwa on the Qalandars, he sees faith as a quality defined by God and the Prophet, which people are not allowed to question according to their whims, and it is not enough to have reasons to anathematize someone: all the objections against doing so must also be refuted. Rather than being condemned, ignorant sinners, such as new converts, should be educated into the religion. Finally, it is in his anti-Mongol fatwas that Ibn Taymiyya used the application of alien laws in lieu of the shari'a as a stepping stone to declare Muslim rulers to be apostates and thus justify the duty to fight them. It was an argument aiming at mobilizing Syria's resistance against an invader, especially when the Ilkhan Oljaytu, Ghazan's successor, threatened once again to invade it, after converting to Shi'ism in 1313. It was a theology of war against an external enemy, not merely a call to, or the legitimation of, rebellion against the political power in place. Ibn Taymiyya's relations to his own rulers, the Mamluks, whose digressions from the revealed law must also have been manifest to him, were a via media between passive quietism and insurrection. They were determined by three fundamentals modeled on the commitments undertaken by the Companions when they pledged allegiance to the Prophet: "to obey within obedience to God, even if the one giving the order is unjust; to abstain from disputing the authority of those who exert it; and to speak out the Truth—or take up its cause—without fear, in respect of God, of blame from anyone."

For Ibn Taymiyya, the type of submission imposed by the Tatars—absolute obedience—is of a pre-Islamic, ignorant (jāhilī) nature. Although there is in the Great Law (Yasa) of Chingiz Khan followed by the Ilkhans a paradigmatic type of "rational" ('aqlī) "royal regime" (siyāsa malakiyya), neither Pharaoh, nor the Mongol conquerer, nor any other human power deserves unconditional obedience. Rather than being compatible with Islam and providing an acceptable alternative to Mamluk rule as claimed by some of its advocates, Mongol absolutism is an abomination. As for the political ideas of Muslim philosophers, Ibn Taymiyya ridicules the Platonizing utopia of a philosopher-king propounded by Farabi but appreciates the praise that Ibn Sina heaps on the shari'a as an ideal law (nāmūs).

Both faith and reason, as represented by Ibn Sina and his like, concur in convincing Ibn Taymiyya of the value of Islam as a model for the governance of society. This model was implemented perfectly under Muhammad and the first generations of Muslims, before innovations started creeping in. After the sealing of prophethood, the community (umma) of believers, in its consensus (ijmā'), became the "guardian of the Law" and is divinely invested with prophetic infallibility ('iṣma). Indeed, as asserted in the hadiths, "the hand of God is with the communion (jamā'a) [of the believers]" and "there will be no consensus of the community on something that would lead it astray." For Ibn Taymiyya, "what the Muslims agree on is [the equivalent of] a truth brought by the Prophet." This empowerment of the community relieves it from all kinds of central, self-imposing authority, be it a Shi'i imamate or a Christian church. In this popular theocracy where God's sovereignty, as known from the Qur'an and the Prophetic tradition, is now exerted through the Muslims themselves, the norms are the equality of all, the respect of diversity in unity, tolerance, moderation, and ponderation. Justice ('adl) is, of course, also essential: "the Law (shar') is justice and justice is the Law." As explained by Ibn al-Qayyim, this means that societal guidance (siyāsa) should not be based exclusively on scriptural sources; rather, "whatever the ways by which justice and equity (qisṭ) obtain, they are a part of the religion and do not go against it." As for commanding right and forbidding wrong, it is the responsibility of everyone, each in accordance with his capacity and place in society, and it is achieved through mutual consultation (shūrā), sincere advice (naṣīḥa), and mutual support (ta'āwun). Rather than delegation, direct involvement is encouraged, as everyone is always, in some way, a shepherd (rā'in) entrusted with a flock.

Ibn Taymiyya, thus, feels no nostalgia for the caliphate suppressed by the Mongols in 1258, especially for its autocratic type exemplified by Ma'mun's reign with its inquisition (miḥna), and can easily accommodate the political reality of his age in his vision of the Muslim commonwealth. A religion without the power (sulṭān) to assert itself, unable or unwilling to wage jihad, and devoid of resources (māl) would be threatened in its existence and remains imperfect, hence the usefulness of the Mamluks. On the other hand, the pursuit of power, wealth, and war for any purpose other than establishing the religion (iqāmat al-dīn) is obviously to be condemned—hence the necessity for 'ulama' to educate not only the people but also their rulers. Amirs and other authorities should notably learn to "render the trusts to those to whom they are due," as commanded in Qur'an 4:58. This means that they must share power and appoint the most qualified in the appropriate offices (wilāya) at all administrative levels, be they military or civil, religious or judicial. Those in command (ulū al-amr) have the right to be obeyed but must consult advisers and have no authority over people's consciences. Just as they are obliged to protect *dhimmī*s from injustice and forced conversion, they have the duty to preserve doctrinal diversity within the Muslim community. All the more certainly, in debated matters, they are prohibited from abusing their power to compel anyone to follow specific opinions. It is indeed not up to them nor to 'ulama' or other scholars, dead or alive, but up to "the entire community of Muhammad . . . to speak out about this." An empowerment of individual consciences with pure intentions goes hand in hand with Ibn Taymiyya's magisterial empowerment of the community and doctrinal disempowerment of its rulers. When no decision can be derived from the Qur'an and the sunna, "Muslims must be allowed to hold to their opinions, each of them worshipping God according to his ijtihād, and no judge can force anyone to accept the sayings of another." "When a mufti, a soldier (jundī), or a commoner ('āmmī), speaks of something, by ijtihād or taqlīd, with the aim of following the Messenger, each in accordance with his level of knowledge, they do not deserve chastisement . . . even if they make mistakes."

Ibn Taymiyya is as much a Sunni radical liberal as he is a populist puritan. Influenced by circumstances, the opinions of a mufti are not to be expected to constitute a comprehensive, integrated system of thought—all the more certainly a political philosophy—and many more elements will surely have to be added to the picture drawn here. Much work also remains to be done to understand the rationale behind some of Ibn Taymiyya's toughest actions in relation to his commitment to a religion of the middle way. What is certain at this stage, however, is that the Taymiyyan siyāsa shar'iyya has little in common with modern political Islam, with its Westernized insistence on the necessity of a strong state, indiscriminate use of violence, or recourse to terror. It can, in fact, be seen as an antiextremist approach to societal self-governance with a strong emphasis on ethics, both communitarian and individual, rather than on politics.

Ibn Taymiyya's influence has not yet been systematically explored. That his views were often caricatured or misused during the 20th century is obvious. To quote his anti-Mongol fatwas in order to anathematize, fight, or kill Anwar Sadat, the Algerian junta, or other Muslims leaders, for example, is to forget that Ibn Taymiyya wrote these fatwas against an invader and that he always remained loyal to the Mamluk sultan Nasir. Moreover, to use these same fatwas to question the Islamic status of a country following laws other than the shari'a is to ignore that, for Ibn Taymiyya, the status of a country varies according to "the states of the hearts of its inhabitants," not according to the nature of its regime, and that every law contributing to more justice, whatever its origin, scriptural or not, is per se a part of the shari'a. Before the 20th century, Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Wahhab (d. 1792) is generally considered as the greatest and most faithful disciple of Ibn Taymiyya since Ibn al-Qayyim. Such a view shall almost certainly have to be revised, once the confirmed influence of the Mamluk theologian on Ottoman puritanical reformists like Birgivi Mehmed Efendi (d. 1573), Ahmad al-Rumi al-Aqhisari (d. ca. 1631), and Kadızade Mehmed (d. 1635) has been properly investigated.

See also Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855); governance; Mamluks (1250–1517)

Further Reading

'Umar A. Farrukh, Ibn Taymiyya on Public and Private Law in Islam, 1966; Y. Michot, Ibn Taymiyya: Against Extremisms, 2011; Idem, Muslims under Non-Muslim Rule: Ibn Taymiyya on Fleeing from Sin, Kinds of Emigration, the Status of Mardin (Domain of Peace/War, Domain Composite), the Conditions for Challenging Power, 2006; Y. Rapoport and S. Ahmed, eds., Ibn Taymiyya and His Times, 2010.

YAHYA M. MICHOT

Ibn Tufayl (ca. 1105–85)

Abu Bakr Muhammad b. 'Abd al-Malik b. Muhammad b. Tufayl was born in Wadi Ash/Guadix, northeast of Granada, sometime at the beginning of the 12th century. His writings reveal that he had an extensive education in jurisprudence, surgery and medicine, and astronomy. He was also widely read in poetry and philosophy and knew the works of Hallaj, Ibn Sina, Farabi, Ibn Bajja, and Ghazali. Two centuries after Ibn Tufayl's death, Ibn al-Khatib wrote that he was "versatile in many arts."

In 1148, the Almohad dynasty seized control of the Maghrib and Andalusia, and six years later, Ibn Tufayl became secretary and physician to the governor of Granada. Upon the accession of Abu Ya'qub Yusuf to the Almohad caliphate (r. 1163–84), Ibn Tufayl joined his court in Cordoba as his physician and dearly cherished confidant. In 1182, he retired and was replaced by Ibn Rushd (d. 1198), whom he had earlier introduced to the intellectually inquisitive and learned caliph. Ibn Tufayl died in Marrakesh in 1185, having become so admired that Abu Ya'qub's son and successor presided at his funeral.

It was under the aegis of Abu Ya'qub that Ibn Rushd produced some of his greatest philosophical works, at the same time that Ibn Tufayl wrote on astronomy, medicine, and philosophy. Ibn Tufayl's writings on astronomy have not survived, but after his death, he was praised by Nur al-Din al-Bitruji (d. ca. 1204) in his Principles of Astronomy for having developed a cosmological theory that ran counter to Ptolemy's. As a physician, Ibn Tufayl was remembered by Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad b. al-Abbar (d. 1260), Ibn al-Khatib (d. 1374), and as late as Maqqari (d. 1631), although only his long poem on medicine (Urjuza fi al-Tibb) summarizing his findings survived; the manuscript was preserved at the Qarawiyyin Library in Fez, Morocco. Ibn Tufayl was also one of the great "philosophers of the Muslims" (falāsifat al-Muslimīn) according to 'Abd al-Wahid al-Marrakushi (1185–ca. 1262). He wrote extensively on physics and metaphysics, ever seeking to harmonize philosophy (hikma) and theology (shari'a) and Greek thought with Islamic law. Chiefly ascetical, a few samples of his poetry have survived in biographical accounts about him.

Marrakushi and Ibn al-Khatib, along with Maqqari, mentioned specifically Risalat Hayy ibn Yaqzan (Epistle of Hayy b. Yaqzan), on which Ibn Tufayl's reputation rests. This short novella was probably written between 1177 and 1182 in response to a query by a "dear brother" or friend about the nature of the mystical experience that characterized "Eastern Wisdom." Aimed against the formidable jurist Ghazali (d. 1111) and using a storyline from the Persian philosopher-physician Ibn Sina (d. 1037), Ibn Tufayl demonstrated that the human mind—represented by his protagonist Hayy b. Yaqzan, "Alive son of Awake"—without any theological or intellectual instruction, can attain the truth of enlightenment. At the same time, Ibn Tufayl emphasized that the same truth was available to those who sought it by religious revelation, either through interpretation (bāṭin) or through obedience to its apparent (ẓāhir) laws. Importantly for Ibn Tufayl, the mystical truth of enlightenment was similar in its origin and destination to the Qur'anic experience, thus explaining the harmony between "wisdom and the Islamic sciences," as Marrakushi wrote.

Judging by the number of manuscripts of Hayy ibn Yaqzan that have survived, it was widely read throughout the medieval and early modern periods, not only in Arabic but also in various translations: in Hebrew (13th and 15th centuries), Latin (15th century), English (17th and 18th centuries), Dutch (17th century), and German (18th century). Other translations followed in the modern period. It was thanks to its Latin translation and publication in Oxford in 1671 by the English Orientalist Edward Pococke the Younger that it entered into Western thought—most famously through Daniel Defoe's Robinson Crusoe. From regions extending from Spain to New England, and from Oxford to Florence to Aleppo, Hayy ibn Yaqzan was the first literary Arabic text to leave its mark on early modern non-Muslim thinkers. By the beginning of the 21st century, it had been translated frequently into English and into various European and Asiatic languages.

See also Ibn Rushd (1126–98); philosophy; Spain and Portugal (Andalus)

Further Reading

Ibrahim al-Abyari, ed., Al-Muqtadab Min Kitab Tuhfat al-Qadim, 1957; Muhammad Sa'id al-'Aryan and Muhammad al-'Arabi al-'Alami, eds.,

Al-Mu'jib fi Talkhis Akhbar al-Maghrib, 1949; Avner Ben-Zaken, Reading Hayy ibn-Yaqzan, 2011; Lawrence I. Conrad, The World of Ibn Tufayl: Interdisciplinary Perspectives on Hayy ibn Yaqzan, 1996; Henri Corbin, Avicenna and the Visionary Recital, 1988; Amélie Marie Goichon, Le récit de Hayy b. Yaqẓân commenté par des textes d'Avicenne, 1959; Bernard R. Goldstein, ed., Al-Bitruji: On the Principles of Astronomy, 2 vols., 1971; Lisan al-Din b. al-Khatib, Al-Ihata fi Akhbar Gharnata, 2 vols., 1974; Ahmad b. Muhammad al-Maqqari, Nafh al-Tib Min Ghusn al-Andalus al-Ratib, 1968; A. I. Sabra, "The Andalusian Revolt against Ptolemaic Astronomy: Averroes and al-Bitruji," in Transformation and Tradition in the Sciences, edited by Everett Mendelsohn, 1984.

NABIL MATAR

Ibn Tumart (ca. 1080–1130)

The Masmuda Berber Ibn Tumart was the founder of the Almohad movement that led to the establishment of the Mu'minid dynasty in the Islamic West (1130–1248). He is representative of the charismatic reformer whose preaching among tribesmen leads to the emergence of an army and of a state. His status as "the impeccable religious and political leader and the well-known Rightly Guided one" (al-imām al-ma'sūm al-mahdī al-ma'lūm) influenced the way his biography was written such that it is difficult to disentangle legend from actual facts. What follows is a summary of his standard biography, in which his relationship with Ghazali (1058–1111) is generally considered by Western scholars to have been invented. Some Arabic sources tend to apply the Prophet Muhammad's biographical model to Ibn Tumart, even presenting him as the Prophet's descendant.

Ibn Tumart was born in Igilliz, a village in the mountainous area of the Sus (in Southern Morocco), between 1078 and 1081 within the Harga tribe. Around 1106, he started his travel in search of religious knowledge, first visiting Andalus in 1107 and then the East, where he studied in Baghdad with scholars connected with the Nizamiyya madrasa (an institution of higher learning). Ibn Tumart then started his journey back to the Maghrib. In Alexandria, he met the Andalusi scholar Muhammad b. al-Walid al-Turtushi (d. 1126) and was forced to leave town after his performance of the precept of commanding good and forbidding evil. He continued his censoring activities on the ship that brought him to Tripoli around 1116 or 1117. From there, he proceeded to Mahdiyya, Monastir, Tunis, Constantine, and Bougie, where he arrived in 1117. In Mallala, near Bougie, he met ʿAbd al-Mu'min b. ʿAli (r. 1133–63), a Zanata Berber of the Kumya tribe (in the region of Tlemcen), later to become the first Almohad caliph. Ibn Tumart, aware of ʿAbd al-Mu'min's destiny, called him "the lamp of the Almohads." For his part, ʿAbd al-Mu'min abandoned his intention to travel to the East, as he had already found in the West the religious knowledge ('ilm) he was looking for.

Ibn Tumart continued his journey in the company of ʿAbd al-Mu'min and other pupils of his from different origins and backgrounds, stopping at Tlemcen, Agarsif, Fez, Meknes, and Salé. He continued censoring reprehensible practices such as men dressing like women, the use of musical instruments, the consumption of wine, and the crucifixion of living persons. He also engaged in debates with local scholars. The same pattern repeated itself in Marrakesh, the capital of the Almoravid Empire, where Ibn Tumart arrived in 1120. He censored the Almoravid custom of men using veils to cover their faces while women appeared in public unveiled. Having started teaching theology in the mosque, he was brought to debate in the presence of the Almoravid amir. Local scholars advised the amir to kill him, but Ibn Tumart—always accompanied by his disciples—managed to escape, seeking refuge first in Aghmat and then in his native town in 1121. There he continued his preaching, using the Berber language, and after retreating into a cave, he announced the appearance of the Mahdi, the one responsible for the suppression of error and the maintenance of truth, with whom he was eventually identified and acknowledged as such. The Almoravids had to be fought, he believed, because of their departure from correct belief, which was manifested in their anthropomorphism. In 1123 or 1124, Ibn Tumart and some of his followers emigrated to Tinmal in the Great Atlas, where the original settlers were massacred. Local tribal leaders became his followers, among them Abu Hafs ʿUmar Inti from the Hintata Berbers, the forefather from which the later Hafsid dynasty (1229–1526) descended. A new political and military organization—grounded in Berber traditions—was developed to engage in the fight against the Almoravids and against those tribes, such as the Haskura, who refused to acknowledge the Almohad creed (tawḥīd). The close circle of the Mahdi's relatives and servants were called ahl al-dār. The Council of Ten (al-jamāʿa) consisted of Ibn Tumart's first followers. The shaykhs of the tribes incorporated into the movement (Harga, Hintata, Gadmiwa, Ganfisa) constituted the Council of Fifty. A purge (tamyīz) that eliminated disaffected tribal elements took place in 1128, and one of Ibn Tumart's first followers, Bashir al-Wansharisi, was placed in charge of distinguishing between sincere believers and hypocrites.

In 1130, the Almohads besieged Marrakesh for six weeks but were eventually defeated in the Battle of Buhayra. Marrakesh did not fall into Almohad hands until many years later, in 1147, after the Almohad conquest of the north of Morocco and part of Algeria. Three months after the Battle of Buhayra, Ibn Tumart died, but his death, about which almost nothing is known, was hidden for some three years. In 1132, ʿAbd al-Mu'min became the leader of the movement. Tinmal, the place where the Mahdi and the Almohad caliphs were buried, became a center of pilgrimage, and a mosque was built (which still stands).

Ibn Tumart was credited with several works, among them his creed (ʿaqīda) and his Kitab—also known by the title of the first treatise, "A'azz ma Yutlab" (The most precious that is sought after)—of which only a few copies are extant. Its contents still await a thorough analysis. Ibn Tumart's doctrine has been variously explained, usually pointing to an Ash'ari background close to Mu'tazilism in terms of divine attributes. Its connections to Sufism and philosophy have been explored by Dominique Urvoy and Tilman Nagel, among others.

See also Almohads (1130–1269); Almoravids (1056–1147); commanding right and forbidding wrong; Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); Mahdi; Spain and Portugal (Andalus)

Further Reading

R. Bourouiba, Ibn Tumart, 1974; M. Fierro, "Le mahdi Ibn Tumart et al-Andalus: l'élaboration de la légitimité almohade." Revue d'Etudes sur le Monde Musulman et la Méditerranée 91, no. 4 (2001); M. Fletcher, "The Almohad Tawhid: Theology Which Relies on Logic," Numen 38, no. 1 (1991); M. García Arenal, Messianism and Puritanical Reform: Mahdis of the Muslim West, translated by Martin Beagles, 2006; I. Goldziher, "Ibn Toumert et la théologie de l'Islam dans le Maghreb au XIe siécle," in Le Livre de Mohammed Ibn Toumert, edited by D. Luciani, 1903; M. Kisaichi, "The Almohad Social-Political System or Hierarchy in the Reign of Ibn Tumart," Memoirs of the Research Department of the Tokyo Bunko 48 (1990); E. Lévi-Provençal, "Ibn Toumert et 'Abd al-Mumin; le 'fakih du Sus' et le 'flambeau des Almohades,'" Memorial Henri Basset 2 (1928); H. Massé, "La profession de foi ('aqida) et les guides spirituels (morchida) du Mahdi iba Toumert," Mémorial Henri Basset 2 (1928); T. Nagel, Im Offenkundigen das Verborgene. Die Heilszusage des Sunnitischen Islams, 2002; D. Urvoy, "La pensée d' Ibn Tumart," Bulletin des Études Orientales 27 (1974).

MARIBEL FIERRO

ideology

An ideology may be defined as a system of ideas and convictions that seeks to stimulate and guide or to resist major social and political change. Muslim political thinking has always been ideological in some respect, but modern ideologies are more consciously and systematically elaborated. They also have a more this-worldly orientation and involve a greater expectation that fundamental social change can be wrought by human effort. Modern Muslim ideologies have arisen mainly in response to Western domination and have been facilitated by the modern, Western-derived education that makes people receptive to them. They may be broadly divided into secularist ideologies, which take their cue from some Western ideologies, and Islamist (or fundamentalist) ideologies, which call for the full implementation of the shari'a in society. Islamic modernism is an intermediate category.

The most extreme secularists have been the Marxists, who, though antireligious in principle, have usually made some effort to co-opt Islamic institutions and ideas. Far more popular has been nationalism, usually in combination with other ideologies, such as socialism, capitalism, liberalism, or statism. These combine the prestige of the West with, in the case of nationalism, a claim to local authenticity. In most nationalist thinking, sovereignty resides in the nation (not God); Islam may be the religion of state, but the shari'a is to be replaced by human laws except in matters of "personal status"; and religious institutions are to be brought under state control. Both Iran and Egypt in the 1920s adopted this model, while Turkey under Atatürk (d. 1938) was more radical. The book, Islam and the Principles of Governance, published in 1925 by the Egyptian scholar 'Ali Abd al-Raziq (1888–1966), was a controversial but influential effort to provide an Islamic justification for secularism. Most of the Muslim countries that became independent after World War II followed a similar line. Particularly notable is the radically nationalist Ba'th Party that came to power in Syria and Iraq in the 1960s. A more moderate secularism is that of Indonesia's Five Principles (Pancasila), which include belief in God but not specifically Islam. Secularists may be personally pious and usually give value to Islam as a part of their national heritage.

"Islamic modernists," the intermediary ideological group, want a society guided by the shari'a interpreted flexibly and consistently with Western ideas. This was the position of the reformers Afghani (1838–97) and Muhammad 'Abduh (1842–1905) and of many others since their time, including the poet-philosopher Muhammad Iqbal (1876–1938), though rarely of those in political power. The writings of Fazlur Rahman (1909–88) probably best articulate the theory behind modernist thinking. Islamic modernism is well illustrated by the Pakistani constitution of 1973, which affirms the sovereignty of God and "the principles of democracy, freedom, equality, tolerance and social justice as enunciated by Islam" (Preamble).

Islamists call for "the application of the shari'a" without the Westernizing interpretations of the modernists, but they manifest many characteristics of modern ideology, such as systematic thinking about society and a conscious desire to make fundamental changes, and so appeal to people who have been exposed to ideology. The first Islamist movement was the Muslim Brotherhood, founded in Egypt in 1928 by Hasan al-Banna (1906–49). The second group was the Jama'at-i Islami, founded in India in 1941 by Mawdudi (1903–79), whose writings spread Islamist ideas worldwide. The Egyptian Brotherhood came to be a mass movement that suffered repression from 1954 to 1970. Out of this repression came the radical writings of Sayyid Qutb (1906–66), which have had wide influence, particularly among the extremists of the following decades. Among other Islamist groups was the Islamic Liberation Party, founded in East Jerusalem in 1952 and influential among students worldwide into the early 21st century. The "resurgence of Islam," beginning about 1970, fueled by a perceived failure of secularism and a decrease in Western moral authority, included increased support for Islamism and the appearance of many Islamist groups. Islamists came to power by revolution in Iran (1979), with the distinctively Shi'i doctrine of wilâyat al-faqth (guardianship of the jurist), and by military coup in the Sudan (1989). Islamists along with others struggled against the Communists in Afghanistan and then were ousted by the Taliban, an extremely traditionalist group, in 1996, who in turn were removed by direct Western intervention in 2001. Elsewhere, secularist governments have resisted Islamist takeovers but have become more "Islamic" in the process. While groups such as the Muslim Brotherhood and the Jama'at-i Islami have sought to work within the existing system, often facing government pressure and restriction, others have responded with violence. Among these are offshoots of the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt, such as the al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya and the Egyptian Islamic Jihad. Particularly notorious are the "martyrdom operations" or "suicide attacks" mounted by al-Qaeda, by Hizbullah in Lebanon, by Hamas in Palestine, and by others (including some secularist groups), mainly against Western targets including Israel. An alternate direction, however, is suggested by the Justice and Development Party, which came to power in Turkey in 2002. Its background is Islamist, but it accepts the official secularism of Turkey while retaining some of its Islamic orientation. Those most prominent in the "Arab Spring" demonstrations for democracy in 2011 appear to have a similar ideological position, though some Islamists have supported these movements.

See also fundamentalism; liberalism; nationalism; Pan-Islamism; revival and reform; socialism; Westernization

Further Reading

Jason Burke, Al-Qaeda: Casting a Shadow of Terror, 2003; Hamid Enayat, Modern Islamic Political Thought, 1982; William E. Shepard, "The Diversity of Islamic Thought: Towards a Typology," in Islamic Thought in the Twentieth Century, edited by Suha Taji-Farouki and Basheer Nafi, 2004; John Obert Voll, Islam: Continuity and Change in the Modern World, 1994.

WILLIAM E. SHEPARD

ijtihād and taqlīd

In general, ijtihād means the exertion of effort, and in Islamic legal thought, it refers to the effort to determine God's will—the correct ruling—regarding a legal matter. One who practices ijtihād is termed a mujtahid. Taqlīd means "following, imitation." In Islamic legal discourse, taqlīd means adopting the opinion a mujtahid or other legal authority has reached, accepting it as authoritative. The one who adheres to such an authority is a muqallid, or performer of imitation. It is practically impossible to discuss ijtihād and taqlīd independently of each other.

Ijtihād is a process through which experts in the religious sciences explore and define the parameters of Islam. The sacred law of Islam establishes values, mores, and boundaries of Islamic society, and since not every Muslim is so situated that he can devote himself to religious and legal study, common sense dictates that such believers regularly practice taqlīd, following the guidance of a mujtahid. Some jurists associated ijtihād with ra'y, which in early Islamic legal literature meant a jurist's considered opinion. Ijtihād was the process through which ra'y was formed. If the considered opinion of a given jurist met widespread approval, it might come to be seen as properly authoritative, regardless of its basis in the Qur'an and sunna. Another concept often associated with ijtihād is qiyās, or reasoning by analogy. Qiyās, like ra'y, is a device one uses to answer questions that the Qur'an and sunna leave open. One uses ijtihād to apply qiyās to particular questions. Both ijtihād and taqlīd can take on negative senses: ijtihād can be taken to mean "interpreting law to fit one's individual needs," and taqlīd can be understood as "blind imitation."

Ijtihād is also used to mean the ability to found a new Islamic legal tradition. It has often been said that in Sunni Islam, the gate or door of ijtihād was closed in the distant past—ca. 900 or 1000—and remained so until the 19th century, at which time modernist, progressive thought provoked an intellectual reawakening and a return to a freer, more independent investigation of legal and other questions. Such statements must be understood as referring to the legal madhhabs—legal schools or traditions of legal study—which came to be limited to four Sunni schools in the 11th century, though the number had been somewhat larger in the previous century, including the Zahiri madhhab, founded by Dawud b. 'Ali b. Khalaf al-Isfahani (d. 884), and the Jariri madhhab, founded by Muhammad b. Jarir al-Tabari (d. 923). By the early tenth century, the nascent schools of law had coalesced around traditions of study that were claimed to represent the legacies of Abu Hanifa (d. 767), Malik b. Anas (d. 796), Muhammad b. Idris Shafi'i (d. 820), and Ahmad b. Hanbal (d. 855), as well as Dawud and Tabari. By the mid-tenth century, one may add the Twelver Shi'i, Zaydi Shi'i, and Ibadi Khariji madhhabs. After ca. 1000, it became recognized as unacceptable to begin a new tradition. It was already something of an embarrassment that the eponyms of the madhhabs, such as Shafi'i and Ibn Hanbal, were removed from the Companions of the Prophet by several generations, so it was difficult to argue that the legal system went back in an unbroken tradition to the Prophet himself. It was no longer possible to claim that the opinions one espoused could be connected with an authoritative tradition of opinions that had been passed down intact from the early generations of the pious forefathers, so establishing a new tradition became impossible. Muslim scholars did not stop practicing ijtihād at the end of the tenth century but rather changed their emphasis from examination of the Qur'an and sunna to further articulation of the shari'a as defined by the major schools of law. In this regard, the term taqlīd came to refer to adherence to one of these schools. That did not mean, however, that independent legal thought ceased in favor of the blind acceptance of traditional legal positions.

Recent scholarship has emphasized that, according to the works on legal theory and even according to the evidence of practice, ijtihād in the sense of the independent investigation of legal questions did not simply come to an end at any point in the premodern period. Ijtihād is required of a jurist who sets out to answer a legal question, and attainment of the rank of mujtahid is based on a thorough education in the law, legal interpretation, and the sciences that are ancillary to it, such as Arabic grammar and rhetoric. Manuals of uṣūl al-fiqh or legal hermeneutics consistently require of the mufti (one who is qualified to offer a religious opinion or fatwa) that he be a mujtahid before he can answer legal questions. Other evidence suggests that this was often not the case and that muftis merely reported the standard views of their legal tradition, the opinion of other jurists, or legal rulings recorded in standard legal compendia. Nevertheless, even muftis who did not claim to be fully qualified mujtahids treated new questions that had not arisen earlier in history and so, by definition, required new legal research and the proposal of new rulings. Obvious examples are fatwas (religious opinions) having to do with the legality of coffee, tobacco, the printing press, telegraphs, photography, and many other technical inventions and imports to the Islamic world.

Ijtihād has also been used to refer to the degree of freedom a jurist enjoyed in formulating and propagating his opinions. It is clear that while ijtihād in the sense of expending an exhaustive effort in order to answer a legal question did not come to a halt, it is evidently true that jurists in the 13th and later centuries understood that they were not as free. Later jurists such as Jalal al-Din al-Suyuti (d. 1505), who claimed to be a mujtahid on a level with the eponyms of the legal traditions and capable of reaching opinions at variance with those of Shafi'i, the founder of the legal tradition to which he belonged, were roundly rebuked. Even Suyuti stated that while he arrived at a number of opinions in which he disagreed with Shafi'i, he did not give fatwas according to these opinions but gave the opinion generally accepted within the madhhab. His polemical work arguing for his own attainment of the rank of mujtahid rebukes his contemporaries for claiming that the status is no longer possible. In addition, legal theorists including Hasuna al-Nawawi (d. 1277) and later authors developed ranked schemes of jurists, including mujtahid muṭlaq (mujtahid at large), mujtahid muntasib (mujtahid affiliated with a particular madhhab), and so on; such schemes were almost always predicated on the idea that one or more ranks at the top of the scale were empty in the present generation. Many sources from the later period reveal that lower-level jurists often gave legal opinions simply by consulting the standard works of their traditions, even though the works of legal theory generally rejected this as invalid.

In the modern period, ijtihād, along with the term tajdīd, or "renewal," has taken on the meaning of searching or sweeping reform (iṣlāḥ) of traditional religious doctrines and societal practices in the Islamic world, generally equated with a rejection of taqlīd, here the unthinking adherence to ossified, traditional opinions. Its opposite, taqlīd, here means blind adherence to tradition. This use of the two terms departs considerably from their technical usage in premodern Islamic legal scholarship. Ijtihād in this sense has been used by a large number of modern Islamic thinkers belonging to a variety of distinct trends, including modernist reformers like Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) and Rashid Rida (d. 1935), religious liberalists, utilitarians, and even fundamentalist thinkers. Ijtihād in this sense has been used as a means to reject certain traditional legal rules through rational arguments and appeals to utility, social benefits, or the necessity for legal change along with social transformations. A prominent example of the application of this type of ijtihād is a law made in Tunisia in 1956 that rejected polygyny on the grounds that the Qur'anic verse 4:3—which, ironically, had served as the legal basis for the practice—suggested that no husband would be able to treat cowives equally as required by the verse. Modern suggested reforms of Islamic legal hermeneutics have been quite varied, including the rejection of hadith (prophetic tradition) as foundational textual material for the derivation of law, the restriction of consideration to the principles found in the portion of the Qur'an revealed in Mecca, the rejection or restriction of the role of consensus in the law, the reevaluation of laws as conditioned by historical context, and the reinterpretation of ijtihād to include the opinions of scientists and scholars in fields other than jurisprudence. An important aspect of many of these reform efforts has been the emphasis on maṣlaḥa, or "public interest," as a central principle for the elaboration of the law.

Imami or Twelver Shi'is originally had no need for ijtihād because pressing questions could be referred to the present imam, whose opinions were infallible. Even when the Twelfth Imam went into the Greater Occultation in 941 (a period of concealment that continues to the present) and all ordinary contact with him was cut off, Twelver jurists traditionally rejected ijtihād on the grounds that it was based on personal opinion or legal analogy, neither of which was sufficient to answer legal questions. In their view, legal rules needed to have a scriptural basis in the Qur'an or the akhbār, the oral reports of the 12 imams. Nevertheless, in the 10th and 11th centuries, Twelver theorists admitted that the jurists of the community could in effect act as legal authorities, granting legal responses to petitioners, drawing in part on reason ('aql). By the 13th century, 'Allama al-Hilli (d. 1325) used the term ijtihād in his works on legal hermeneutics to describe the interpretive activity of Twelver jurists in a departure from earlier Twelver legal doctrine, and his view became standard. The application of ijtihād and the clear division of the believing populace into mujtahids and muqallids that it entailed were strongly challenged in the 17th century by Muhammad Amin al-Astarabadi (d. 1635), who argued that authority lay in the akhbār of the imams alone and not in the ratiocinations of the jurists. His work al-Fawa'id al-Madaniyya (Medinan moral lessons) touched off what would become known as the conflict between Akhbaris, who upheld Astarabadi's views, and Usulis, who held the view that an education in legal hermeneutics (uṣūl al-fiqh) was what granted one religious authority. The Akhbaris remained influential for over a century and a half but were defeated, for the most part, by Muhammad Baqir al-Bihbihani (d. 1791), whose work Risalat al-Akhbar wa-l-Ijtihad (Treatise on traditions and legal reasoning) was a major statement in justification of the Usuli position. Perhaps as a direct consequence of the Akhbari-Usuli conflict, the Twelvers stressed the necessity for all muftis to be endowed with ijtihād much more than contemporary Sunnis, and a diploma termed ijāzat al-ijtihād (diploma of ijtihād) recognizing the recipient's ability to derive legal opinions independently became a standard part of the Twelver system of legal education in the course of the 19th century. In the Sunni system, the parallel diploma, which had existed at least since the 13th century, was termed ijāzat al-iftā' wa-l-tadrīs, or "the license to grant legal opinions and teach law"; it did not mention ijtihād explicitly, and recipients were not automatically termed mujtahids. Also in the 19th century, beginning with Muhammad Hasan Najafi (d. 1849–50), a single high-ranking jurist held to be the most learned in the law was recognized as marja' al-taqlīd, or "the model of emulation." Shi'i laymen were obligated to follow the rulings of this greatest living authority or, if more than one were recognized, one of them. The hierarchical authority of the jurists was enhanced yet again with Ayatullah Khomeini's (d. 1989) theory of wilāyat al-faqīh (guardianship of the jurist), which claimed for the most learned jurist the right to carry out most of the functions of the imam, including those that had fallen into abeyance, such as the ability to govern and to organize jihad. After the Iranian Revolution (1978–79) and the establishment of the Islamic Republic in 1981, his principle was enshrined in the Islamic Republic's constitution, which assigned to the leading jurist the position of "leader" (rahbar) and granted him sweeping powers of control and oversight.

See also consensus; jurisprudence; al-Shafi'i, Muhammad b. Idris (767–820); shari'a

Further Reading

Norman Calder, "Doubt and Prerogative: The Emergence of an Imāmī Shī'ī Theory of Ijtihād," Studia Islamica 70 (1989); Robert Gleave, "Conceptions of Authority in Iraqi Shi'ism: Baqir al-Hakim, Ha'iri and Sistani on Ijtihād, Taqlīd and Marja'iyya," Theory, Culture, and Society 24, no. 2 (2007); Wael B. Hallaq, The Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, 2005; Idem, "Was the Gate of Ijtihād Closed?" International Journal of Middle East Studies 16, no. 1 (1984); Joseph Schacht, The Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, 1967; Devin J. Stewart, Islamic Legal Orthodoxy: Twelver Shiite Responses to the Sunni Legal System, 1998.

DEVIN J. STEWART

Ikhwan al-Safa'. See Brethren of Purity

Ilkhanids (1256–1336)

The descendants of Chingiz Khan, founder of the Mongol Empire (d. 1227), ruled in Iran as the Ilkhanid dynasty, the term "Il-khan" denoting "subject" or "subservient" khan—that is, acknowledging the sovereignty of the Great Qa'an (Khan). The first Il-Khan was Hulagu (r. 1256–65), grandson of Chingiz Khan and brother of the Great Qa'an, Mongke (r. 1251–59), who had dispatched Hulagu to complete the conquest of Iran in 1256. Mongke was the last Qa'an to rule from the Mongol capital at Qara Qorum, in the steppes; he was succeeded by another brother, Qubilay Khan (d. 1294), who established the imperial capital in China. The Ilkhanid dynasty was thus part of the Mongol Empire, which derived its legitimacy from the conquests and political dispensation of Chingizs Khan and owed nothing to Islamic political traditions. The chief aim of Hulagu's invasion was the subjugation of the Abbasid caliphate, and this was achieved by the conquest of Baghdad and the death of the caliph in 1258. Hulagu was a shamanist with a Christian wife; his successors in Iran maintained more or less close connections with their cousins in China and a sense of Mongol solidarity, as witnessed both by their coinage and also by their continuing rule according to Mongol tradition, the khan being served by a closely regulated household of loyal officers who acted both as bodyguards and government agents.

The political theorists of the Ilkhanid period, therefore, were confronted with the total collapse of Islamic norms and the need to dispense with the previous formulation of "usurped" coercive rule being exercised by authority delegated from the caliph. The establishment of a "shadow" Abbasid caliphate in Cairo allowed the jurists to maintain the fiction of caliphal authority in the Mamluk Sultanate for a time, but in Iran this theoretical construct was never to return, even once the Mongols officially converted to Islam under Ghazan Khan (r. 1295–1304). Instead, the political advisers of the Ilkhans, such as the philosopher Nasir al-Din al-Tusi, emphasized the practical aspects of good government, expressed largely in terms of encouraging sound economic and fiscal policies following the destruction of the Mongol conquests, and a glorification of the person of the monarch, modeled on the image of the legendary rulers of pre-Islamic Iran, particularly the Sasanians (224–642). Although the new vision of rule was both Iranian and secular, the Ilkhanate was still conceived as a dispensation sanctioned by God, and the promotion of Islamic ideals and the religious law was upheld as an important kingly virtue, especially under the Muslim Ilkhans. The most important royal quality, however, was justice. The ideal of just rule was not dependent on godliness but required the strength to maintain the stability of society and the protection of the weak from the tyranny of oppression. The exercise of justice was also assisted by the advice of wise counselors or the service of experienced ministers (especially the vizier), a formulation expressed in numerous historical works, including those written by prominent Persian bureaucrats such as 'Ata-Malik al-Juwayni (d. 1283) and Rashid al-Din al-Hamadani (d. 1318), whose chronicles sought to portray the Mongol rulers as conforming to the norms of Perso-Islamic political traditions. The didactic element of these works essentially provided a model of political thought close to the exemplary Mirrors for Princes, or handbooks of advice to kings, that had such a long history in Indo-Persian "wisdom literature." The fact that the acculturation of the Ilkhanid regime to Iranian conditions was still not achieved by the death of the last recognized ruler, Abu Sa'id (r. 1317–35), is shown by the events of the next 20 years, during which a series of would-be Ilkhans struggled unsuccessfully to win the throne in a manner reminiscent of the tribal politics of the Inner Asian steppe. The last Chingizid ruler was murdered in 1353, by which time descent from the conqueror was also devalued as a source of legitimacy, and the sword remained the ultimate sanction for political authority.

See also caliph, caliphate; household; Mamluks (1250–1517); al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)

Further Reading

Thomas T. Allsen, "Changing Forms of Legitimation in Mongol Iran," in Rulers from the Steppe: State Formation on the Eurasian Periphery, edited by Gary Seaman and Daniel Marks, 1991; Anne F. Broadbridge, Kingship and Ideology in the Islamic and Mongol Worlds, 2008; Charles Melville, "From Adam to Abaqa: Qāḍī Baiḍāwī's Re-arrangement of History," Studia Iranica 30, no. 1 (2001); Idem, "From Adam to Abaqa: Qāḍī Baiḍāwī's Re-arrangement of History (Part II)," Studia Iranica 36, no. 1 (2007); Idem, "The Keshig in Iran: The Survival of the Royal Mongol Household," in Beyond the Legacy of Genghis Khan, edited by Linda Komaroff, 2006; I. P. Petrushevsky, "Rashid al-Din's Conception of the State," Central Asiatic Journal 14, no. 1–3 (1970).

CHARLES MELVILLE

imamate

Although the word "imamate" may be used to denote leadership in prayer and prominence in a specific branch of knowledge or profession, it was more widely used in juristic, theological, and exegetical literature and hadith to describe a particular political, frequently religiopolitical, leadership and, in modern jargon, a government or state. The scholarly tradition across a wide Islamic spectrum referred to the imamate as supreme leadership (al-imāma al-'uẓmā). At the core of the idea of the imamate lay the assumption that the Muslim community must have a legitimate leader who would be responsible for, as Mawardi noted, "upholding the faith and managing the affairs of the world," including such duties as implementing laws, defending borders, leading the army, maintaining social peace, collecting and distributing revenues, and appointing administrators to undertake such responsibilities. Whether the imam also guides his subjects to salvation (as in the case of the Shi'i imam) was a highly controversial question among various Muslim sects. Medieval Muslims discussed the imamate as the best form of leadership, although it is unclear if this meant the imamate was the only legitimate form of government. The views this entry addresses represent a consciously "religious" take on politics. This is particularly true compared to not only ideas expounded by Muslim philosophers, secretaries, and belles lettres but also dynastic laws derived from non-Islamic traditions that flourished under various Muslim dynasties as laws governing political domain.

It is fair to state that the theory of the imamate owes its development in a substantial way to intellectual responses to the caliphate, especially the patriarchal caliphate; to competing sectarian positions on politics and other doctrinal questions; to the political views of secretaries and philosophers; and finally to the existing political customs and conventions in the Near East. A wealth of opinions about the imamate was put forth in the books of theology, jurisprudence, exegesis, and hadith. Opinions reflect variations not only across different sects (Shi'is, Sunnis, Kharijis, etc.) but also within a particular sect (e.g., Shi'ism) for a range of doctrinal and historical reasons.

The Emergence of the Debate on the Imamate

Like the Roman Empire, the caliphate shaped how people thought about politics and statecraft. The caliphate emerged with the election of Abu Bakr (r. 632–34), a senior Companion of the Prophet Muhammad (ca. 570–632), to lead the Muslim community after the Prophet's death. Having been elected the first caliph, Abu Bakr adopted the title "Successor of the Prophet of God." His successor, 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44), is said to have used the title "Successor of the Successor of the Prophet of God," but noticing how cumbersome this title would become in a few generations, he abbreviated the title to "caliph." He also adopted the apparently more mundane-sounding title of "Commander of the Faithful." The caliphs after 'Umar followed the usage he preferred, but many did not shy away from adopting pompous new titles such as "God's Caliph."

Although the first three caliphs were elected by peaceful means, the period afterward was anything but peaceful. The assassination of the third caliph, 'Uthman b. 'Affan (r. 644–56), and the controversial reign of 'Ali b. Abi Talib (r. 656–61) led to a civil war between the caliph and the governor of Damascus, the Umayyad Mu'awiya, a member of the Meccan nobility and a junior Companion of the Prophet. This civil war ended with the assassination of 'Ali (by a disillusioned supporter) and the transfer of the caliphate to Mu'awiya (r. 661–80) and the Umayyad family (661–750). The civil war of 656–61 split the Muslim community into factions (Kharijis, 'Uthmanis, and Shi'at 'Ali), which were the first to articulate views on the imamate. The supporters of 'Ali (Shi'at 'Ali) repudiated 'Uthman as illegitimate for having failed to uphold the laws and Mu'awiya as a usurper for contesting 'Ali. The supporters of 'Uthman and Mu'awiya repudiated 'Ali as illegitimate and incompetent. The Kharijis, who initially supported 'Ali against Mu'awiya, rejected 'Ali, Mu'awiya, and 'Uthman as illegitimate for various reasons. They withdrew from the broader society to establish their own righteous community. Growing controversies over the legitimacy of the successive Umayyad caliphs led to another civil war between 684 and 692. This civil war ended with the elimination of the non-Umayyad contenders, particularly the powerful 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr, and shifted the caliphate from the Sufyanid to the Marwanid branch of the Umayyad family.

Under the Umayyads, election gave way to succession, which became even more regular under the Abbasids (750–1258). Only a very few of the Abbasid caliphs had fathers who had not been caliphs. The procedure of ascending to the rule followed either some sort of election (e.g., under the first four caliphs), designation by the ruling caliph (the most common practice under the Umayyads and Abbasids), or simple force. The caliph was nonetheless expected to have certain qualifications, including Qurashi descent, intelligence, physical ability, military prowess, and moral standing, although there was no constitutional or institutional oversight to verify their fulfillment. Often, political expediency and circumstances on the ground dictated the appointment of a particular individual to the office. There was no duration to the caliph's rule. As long as he was able, he could rule for life. In the absence of constitutional law outlining his responsibilities and privileges clearly, cultural norms, customs, and religious law, along with the power of social and political forces, provided some guidance to and restrictions on his authority.

The initial debates on the imamate came in the wake of the civil war and involved the identity, familial and social affiliation, qualifications (in particular, individual merit and seniority in Islam, prominence in a particular house, even age), and legitimacy of the caliph. The Umayyad period witnessed, alongside a more complex factional development, substantial doctrinal elaborations on the imamate, particularly on questions concerning the legitimacy and the nature of caliph's authority. In the Umayyad period, competing groups debated such concepts as consultation versus succession and divine appointment versus communal choice. Theological arguments such as free will and predestination, nature and definition of faith, and the status of the sinner also acquired substantial political implications. During the Abbasid period, sectarian views expanded and matured thanks to the proliferating paper industry and the articulate and socially engaged scholars. By the 13th century, all major sects and groups had produced substantial literature on the subject of the imamate in a scope far wider than the initial debates.

Necessity of Imamate

Scholars made a great deal of effort to show why and for which reason the imamate was necessary. Except for a small but articulate and intellectually rigorous group of scholars among the Mu'tazilis and the Kharijis, the great majority of Muslim sects asserted that instituting an imam was necessary. According to those scholars, the imamate was neither rationally necessary nor religiously obligatory. They reasoned that an ultimately perfect imamate was not possible. Even if it were possible it might not always be practical, and a less-than-perfect imamate might not be conducive to peaceful life. It was better for the community to have either multiple imams or no imam at all. Those who saw the imamate as necessary could not agree if it was necessary rationally by virtue of a human being's need for social life, which requires political organization (this was the view of the Mu'tazilis), or by virtue of God's command. The Shi'i theorists saw the imamate as both rationally necessary and a grace of God. They argued that reason alone could arrive at its necessity since the welfare and salvation of human beings depended on it, but nevertheless its institution and maintenance was incumbent upon God and not human beings. God simply could not leave his creatures without guidance. By and large Sunni scholars argued for the necessity of the imamate from the perspective of divine command, but they saw it as a communal duty and denied the imam the privilege of being a guide to salvation. Many jurists and theologians also tried to explain the rational need for an imam and rationalize religious arguments.

Appointing the Imam

The Sunnis, Mu'tazilis, and Kharijis emphasized election as the sole medium of appointing the imam. They meant that the process of instituting the imam was a mundane and voluntary task that could be fulfilled only by the community's preference for one candidate or another. While the principle of election opposed the Shi'i concept of divine appointment (that the imam should be singled out by the previous imam upon specific and binding instructions from God), it also shaped how the non-Shi'is thought about the nature of the imam's authority in relation to the Muslim community. The idea of election manifested itself in the actual practice of choosing the caliph. The views about election varied widely and could range from popular consensus to nomination by a single well-qualified individual, as well as any number of practices in between: majority opinion and decision by a specific group of qualified electors, whose number fluctuated depending on circumstances. As stipulated by Ghazali (d. 1111) in the age of the sultanates, election could also take the form of acknowledgement by the holders of coercive power (i.e., sultans). The imam could also be appointed by his predecessor or could win the seat for himself through a successful military coup. In all cases, however, the consent and approval of the community was sought, even if it was merely symbolic. The Sunnis made the point that the imamate was by election and that the community was the source of legitimacy; the imamate was neither a dynastic right nor a divine appointment. Furthermore, election required a mechanism to function. The idea of an "electoral body" arose as a palpable way to represent the will of the community at large. The Sunnis therefore needed to seek certain qualifications from the members of the electoral body, such as probity, knowledge, prudence, and wisdom. It was also accepted that qualified individuals might be more available in the capital, although there was no requirement to reside in a particular region. Despite acknowledging the Umayyad and Abbasid dynastic succession practices as legitimate, the Sunnis made sure that, at least theoretically, elections remained a part of the succession process. For the Shi'is divine appointment rather than election was the rule.

Qualification of the Imam

Whether the imam must be the most excellent of his generation reveals a fascinating debate about the historical caliphate. By the tenth century, the Sunnis believed that the first four caliphs were the most excellent of their generations and the order of their caliphate reflected their order in merit. Part of this debate was, of course, about the legitimacy of the first four caliphs, but another part was about elaborating an ideal model to be pursued by the historical caliphate. The Sunnis required that the caliph should be the most excellent in the true imamate, but they allowed the inferior or the less excellent to be appointed to office under kingship. The Zaydis advocated the imamate of the most excellent from the family of the Prophet, while the Mu'tazilis, though arguing for the appointment of the most excellent, allowed the imamate of a less-qualified person for practical reasons (i.e., to prevent dissention). For the Imami (Twelver) Shi'is, no one could tell who was the most excellent except the current imam, who alone was entitled to identify and designate his successor. The Shi'is required family affiliation for the imam, the Imamis being more restrictive than the Zaydis. The Shi'is restricted the imamate to the descendants of 'Ali from the line of Husayn (Imamis) or to any meritorious and politically active member of the 'Alid house (Zaydis). Generally the Sunnis required that the candidate belong to the tribe of Quraysh, although there were strong voices (Ibn Khaldun, Ibn Jama'a) for opening the candidacy to individuals outside Quraysh, including non-Arabic speaking people. The majority of the Kharijis and the Mu'tazilis did not see tribal and ethnic affiliation as a condition for the imamate. They even rejected such an argument as unfair, biased, and entirely impractical.

The Sunnis added some qualifying conditions to Qurashi lineage: like the members of the electoral body, the candidate should have probity and knowledge. He should have sound vision, hearing, and speech as well as physical fitness. He should be prudent and courageous to undertake the task of governing and leading the military. Military juntas used some of these conditions as an excuse to depose the ruling caliphs in the late ninth and early tenth centuries: they blinded the caliph first, then asked the chief judge to declare him unfit for rule so that they could install another one of their liking.

One of the fundamental differences between Shi'i and non-Shi'i views on qualifications was the presence and absence of the imam. The Sunnis (as well as the Kharijis and the Mu'tazilis) required that the imam must be alive, present, in charge of affairs, and reachable, while the Shi'is allowed him to be absent and not ruling a state. In fact, only one of the Twelver Shi'i imams ruled ('Ali).

Religious Authority versus Temporal Authority

One of the fundamental questions about the imamate in political thought was whether the imam's authority extended over both religious and temporal matters. In general, Sunni, Khariji, and Mu'tazili views did not allow the imam any authority over doctrinal matters, while most of the Shi'is (except for the Zaydis) attributed religious authority (not only as a law giver but also as a guide to salvation) to the imam regardless of whether he held an actual political office. Many modern scholars have argued that the caliphs inherited only Muhammad's temporal authority, as prophecy ended with Muhammad while religious authority rested within the corporeal body of the community. The question of who would legitimately represent and articulate this authority led to a two-century-long competition between the caliphs (who adopted for themselves titles suggesting this prerogative, such as "God's Caliph") and scholars specializing in jurisprudence and hadith ('ulama'). Other arguments suggest that the caliphate was instituted from the beginning for leadership not only in temporal governance but also in matters of salvation: the caliph was both king and priest, so to speak, following the prophetic model exercised by Muhammad. It was only with the rise of the 'ulama' that the caliph's authority became a subject of contestation. In the ninth century, the caliphs had to recognize the power of the 'ulama' and relinquish their claims on religious authority.

True Imamate versus Kingship

Regardless of sectarian affiliation, medieval thinkers generally made a distinction between the true imamate and kingship. For the majority of the Imami Shi'is, the true imamate existed only during the reign of 'Ali. For the Zaydis, both the Umayyads and the Abbasids were certainly kings and, although legitimate, the first three caliphs after Muhammad were of lesser merit than 'Ali, the true imam. The true imamate afterward existed only in isolated regions where Zaydi imams ruled. The Kharijis rejected all the caliphs after 'Umar as illegitimate tyrants. For the Sunnis, the true imamate was the period of the first four caliphs, followed by kingship. They did not, however, mean by this that kingship was unlawful and that the Umayyads and Abbasids were illegitimate. On the one hand, the Sunni theorists wanted to make clear that the true imamate was possible and in fact existed under the first four caliphs, although it could not continue in perpetuity. On the other hand, the Umayyads and Abbasids were legitimate, though not ideal, caliphs since they complied with the minimum requirements of the law, keeping the Muslim community united, the transactions lawful, and the borders safe. Many of the Sunnis reasoned that, for the common good, working with the system was better than going against it. In medieval jargon, two fundamental concepts explained the Sunni attitude of acknowledging the legitimacy of the caliphate without fully endorsing it theoretically: welfare or utility and necessity.

One or Multiple Imams

Medieval scholars have generally argued for one imam at a time, except for some Mu'tazilis and anarchists, who allowed and even advocated the appointment of more than one imam. The singularity of the imam was true also for the majority of Sunni theologians and jurists, although after the demise of the Abbasid caliphate, this argument was no longer sustainable. Even before that, the community was ruled by three competing imamates despite theoretical rejection of multiple imams: the Abbasid caliphate, the Fatimid caliphate in North Africa and Egypt, and the Spanish Umayyad caliphate in Spain. The Sunni 'Abd al-Qahir al-Baghdadi (d. 1037) was one such theologian who read the situation pragmatically and accommodated the practice as legitimate. He stipulated that it was possible to have more than one imam if the imams ruled over regions separated from each other by a significant barrier, such as a large body of water. The Shi'is also argued for the singularity of the imam, although they allowed the imam to be hidden.

Duties of the Imam

Generally the Sunnis, the Mu'tazilis, and the Kharijis restricted the duties of the imam to the administration of mundane matters and to the promotion and protection of the faith. His duties comprised the guardianship of the faith, enforcing the laws, leading public acts of worship, protecting the community from outside and inside threats, dispensing legal criminal punishments, maintaining and leading the army in military activities, collecting revenues and distributing them to their appropriate places, building and maintaining public amenities and spaces, and appointing and overseeing lesser administrators. Sunni scholars guarded religious authority from the encroachment of the caliph, but they bestowed holiness on the caliph and advocated obedience to his authority as long as he did not confront the fundamental tenets of the faith. Another reason they advocated obedience was for the unity and welfare of the community. They feared that any dissention and violence would disturb order, prevent the application of law, lead to the demise of religion, and the loss of this world as well as the next. Yet the Sunnis were far from a pacifist crowd, as exemplified in a widespread norm that one should not obey anyone in matters against God's ordinances. They did emphasize the right to remove the caliph from office for reasons of apostasy, loss of freedom or sanity, and even consistent acts of injustice. Yet they did not elaborate on how the caliph would be removed from office, nor did they propose any institutional framework to assure peaceful removal. For the Kharijis and the Mu'tazilis, violation of the law by the caliph was a valid reason for removal by either peaceful means or force. They did not share the same sentiments with the Sunnis that one should endure injustice, oppression, and violation of the law for the sake of community's welfare. Such actions were crimes significant enough to disturb the order itself.

See also caliph, caliphate; leadership; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Antony Black, The History of Islamic Political Thought: From the Prophet to the Present, 2001; Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Ann K. S. Lambton, State and Government in Medieval Islam: An Introduction to the Study of Islamic Political Theory: The Jurists, 1981; Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government: Al-Ahkām al-Sulṭāniyya wa al-Wilāyāt al-Dīniyya, translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 1996; W. M. Watt, Islamic Political Thought, 1998.

HAYRETTIN YÜCESOY

imperialism

Imperialism refers to the varied practices associated with constructing and maintaining an empire. Found throughout the globe and in every period, empires are large, complex political entities that project power over heterogeneous populations and territories and rule them in ways that preserve hierarchies and distinctions among the various units that make up a given polity. Muslim societies have produced diverse imperial states from West Africa to Southeast Asia. Beginning with the era of Mongol conquests in the 13th century, Muslims have also been the subjects of empires ruled by non-Muslims. With the rise of European empires in the 15th century, even Muslim societies that did not come under direct imperial control began to confront the challenge of European expansion.

For Muslim political thinkers, this type of political form has posed varied dilemmas and opportunities. Most closely resembling empires elsewhere, the Ottoman, Safavid, and Mughal states were territorially sprawling, multiethnic, multilingual, and multiconfessional polities whose management involved an eclectic range of political ideas. The Ottomans interpreted their armies' capture of Constantinople in 1453 as confirmation that they had become the inheritors of an imperial tradition dating back to the Romans. Similarly, the Safavid dynasty would draw on pre-Islamic Iranian imperial institutions and ideas, while the Mughals would seek to enhance their legitimacy by highlighting their ties to Mongol imperial precedents. Each of these dynasties would act as patrons of an imperial aesthetic in architecture, painting, and poetry to dramatize the grandeur of their power and would devise various administrative and other mechanisms to incorporate a variety of constituencies. At the same time, imperial policies toward religious institutions as well as toward heterodox and non-Muslim groups frequently sparked controversies in learned circles about balancing pragmatic accommodation in the service of imperial stability with dynastic support for Islamic norms.

The problems of empire became far more pronounced for Muslim thinkers in the late 18th and early 19th centuries, when European armies began to gain the upper hand in confrontations with Muslim-led states, for example, in the Russian victory in the Russo-Ottoman War of 1768–74 and Napoleon's occupation of Egypt in 1798. European pressure may have had no direct impact on many of the revivalist movements in West and North Africa, the Arabian Peninsula, and South Asia during this period, but from Egypt to the North Caucasus and Southeast Asia, disparate Muslim thinkers began to appropriate European technologies and agitate for religious change as well as social, administrative, and military reform. Despite these measures, the British, Russians, French, and Dutch all expanded their territories at the expense of Muslim rulers.

The imposition of European rule, in turn, provoked widely divergent responses. Muslim scholars' debates centered on controversies surrounding the status of conquered lands. For a number of thinkers, conquest transformed the territory of Islam (dār al-islām) to one ruled by unbelievers (dār al-ḥarb), thereby obligating the faithful either to wage war (jihad) or, in the view of some, to migrate (hijra) in emulation of the Prophet Muhammad. Determining when a given territory became dār al-ḥarb proved contentious, however. Many jurists, especially Sunni Muslims who followed the Hanafi school of law, drew attention to various conditions, like possession of the means to migrate, that further qualified such judgments. Indeed, for the majority of Hanafis, including most of the vast Muslim populations of British India and the Russian Empire, such states merited the status of dār al-islām because Muslims were able to gather for Friday prayers and other rites and because many elements of Islamic law were integrated into their legal systems. Such an outlook often provided the basis for accommodation with imperial authorities and institutions, as in French West Africa, and imperial states tended to reciprocate by offering patronage to religious scholars and notables. These views were not unanimous, however, and in different political contexts, charismatic leaders rallied followers around calls for jihad against imperial authorities. In 1827, for instance, Sayyid Ahmad Barelwi (1785–1831) launched a war among the Pathans on the North-West frontier of India to purify the faith and expel the British, and in the following decade, ʿAbd al-Qadir (1808–83) led a Sufi-based resistance movement in Algeria against the French. As in the 19th-century jihads among the mountain peoples of the North Caucasus, many of these campaigns simultaneously aimed at effecting religious change and building institutions rooted in Islamic law. In 1857, by contrast, many Muslims joined other subjects of the British in India in a massive revolt that articulated the most heterogeneous visions. The actors involved in these movements were frequently tied together through Sufi or scholarly networks, but local conditions tended to determine their varied trajectories.

In the late 19th century, a small group of activists critical of the state of Muslim societies and outraged, in particular, by the French seizure of Tunisia in 1881 and the British occupation of Egypt in 1882, formed a transnational network committed to disseminating critiques of European imperialism and calling on Muslims to unite in liberating themselves from foreign rule. At the head of this movement, Afghani (1838–97), the itinerant thinker and agitator, called on Muslims to strengthen Islamic civilization against the European—especially British—threat by arriving at a proper understanding of the faith and by seeking unity. This vision inspired followers in Egypt, Iran, and elsewhere and briefly earned him the patronage of the Ottoman sultan Abdülhamid II (r. 1876–1909), who sought to bolster his own authority among Muslims in Ottoman lands as well as in rival European empires by adopting the title of caliph and acting as the defender of the faithful everywhere. In the first decades of the 20th century these Pan-Islamic ideas proved less attractive to critics of empire who increasingly elaborated visions of the future around the idea of the nation.

Yet just as empires have persisted despite waves of collapse during and after World War I and of decolonization following World War II, critiques of imperialism have endured, sustained in part by the anticolonial rhetoric of the Soviet Union and the United States, as well as by international organizations such as the United Nations. These criticisms have, in turn, influenced Islamist discourse. The restoration of sovereignty to the Muslim community was central to the program of the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood, Hasan al-Banna (1906–49); while in Iran, Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89) would repeatedly point to the dangers of American imperialism, mobilizing popular memory of 19th-century grievances as well as the U.S.-led coup of 1953. From the 1980s, wars in a number of theaters—Afghanistan, Lebanon, Palestine, Iraq, Bosnia, Chechnya, and Somalia—have focused Islamist thinkers on the problems of political sovereignty and military occupation. Although substantive ideological differences divide groups such as Hizbullah, the Taliban, al-Qaeda, and others, the global reach of American power in the early 21st century looms as the central preoccupation of their political thought.

See also colonialism; fundamentalism; modernity; revival and reform

Further Reading

Cemil Aydin, The Politics of Anti-Westernism in Asia: Visions of World Order in Pan-Islamic and Pan-Asian Thought, 2007; Jane Burbank and Frederick Cooper, Empires in World History: Power and the Politics of Difference, 2010; Stephen F. Dale, The Muslim Empires of the Ottomans, Safavids, and Mughals, 2010; Michael Francis Laffan, Islamic Nationhood and Colonial Indonesia: The Umma Below the Winds, 2003; Rudolph Peters, Islam and Colonialism: The Doctrine of Jihad in Modern History, 1979; David Robinson, Paths of Accommodation: Muslim Societies and French Colonial Authorities in Senegal and Mauritania, 1880–1920, 2000.

ROBERT D. CREWS

India

As in other parts of the Muslim world outside the Arabian Peninsula (but perhaps even more so because of its distinct socioreligious setting), Muslim political thought in the Indian subcontinent seems to have oscillated between uncompromisingly implementing the ordinances of the shariʿa and pragmatically adjusting Muslim politics to the social reality.

Little compromise was sought when in 705 the Umayyad commander Muhammad b. Qasim al-Thaqafi (d. 715) led a military expedition, identified as a jihad against the infidels, into Sindh and southern Punjab. Even the Arab Muslim traders who settled around the same time along the Indian coast appear to have maintained a sharp distinction from their Hindu neighbors, although pragmatics increasingly demanded social interaction.

It was not until 1206, however, that a more or less autonomous Muslim power was established in India. At its zenith in the 14th century, the so-called Delhi Sultanate, in reality a succession of various slave dynasties of mainly Turkish and Afghan descent, encompassed almost the entire subcontinent. Political theory during the Delhi Sultanate period clearly reveals the tension between an Arabic tradition revolving around the shari'a and a Persianized appropriation of kingship that left more room for pragmatic adjustments to the Indian conditions. Politically, this tension is epitomized by the fact that the sultans, although actually ruling independently, sought formal investiture by the Abbasid caliph who, by then, had been reduced to leading only a shadowy existence at the Mamluk court of Cairo. Intellectually, the two poles are represented by the 13th century Adab al-Harb wa-l-Shaja'a (The manners of war and of fortitude) of Muhammad b. Mansur "Fakhr-i Mudabbir" ("Glory of the State"), which echoes the uncompromising stand of the Arab conquerors, and the later Fatawa-yi Jahandari (The imperial fatwas) of Ziya' al-Din Barani (d. ca. 1357), which pleads for a compromise between religious normativeness (dīndārī) and worldly pragmatics (jahāndārī), including the incorporation of a limited number of non-Muslims into the administration of the sultanate. According to Barani, the implementation of the shari'a constituted the ideal of governance, but given the prevailing conditions, it could only be approximated by more secular state regulations (dawābiṭ).

The tendency evident in Barani's Fatawa gained strength during Mughal rule between the 16th and 19th centuries. Important in this respect was the reception of Iranian scientist-philosopher Nasir al-Din al-Tusi's (d. 1274) ethical thought as outlined in Akhlaq-i Nasiri (The Nasirean Ethics), which was repeatedly remodeled in later works, most importantly Akhlaq-i Humayuni (The Humayunian ethics) of Ikhtiyar al-Din al-Husayni (d. after 1556). The shift from politics to ethics is highly significant; political prudence became measured by the degree to which the ruler was able to promote and maintain social harmony instead of uncompromisingly enforcing the shari'a. The political maxim of checks and balances (sulh-i kull), vividly outlined in the A'in-i Akbari (The Akbarian institutions) of Abu al-Fadl "'Allami" ("the Learned One"; d. 1602), became the heart of Mughal political practice.

This rather liberal stance was adopted primarily because of the practical quest to govern a large and diverse polity effectively, but from the beginning it was fervently opposed by various influential 'ulama' and also shari'a-minded Sufis. The arguments invoked were almost exclusively derived from the authoritative texts of Islam, awarding the revelation of God's words in the Qur'an a higher degree of reality that overruled the need to adjust government to the circumstances of the moment. This growing opposition to rulers' acculturalistic politics was not unique to the Muslims, and it contributed to the disintegration of Mughal imperial organization and the emergence of increasingly autonomous rule in various parts of the empire. In this situation the Sufi scholar Shah Waliullah (d. 1762) proposed a reconciliation of ethics-based rational pragmatics and shari'a-based transmitted normativeness. But events had cast a shadow over such attempt: Persian and Afghan military interventions twice interrupted universalistic Mughal rule and paved the way for British colonial domination, which became direct in 1857 and lasted for almost a century.

The beginning of direct colonial rule forcibly confronted the Muslims with Western ideas and caused perhaps the most radical change in the history of Indo-Muslim political thought. It also drove a wedge between those who held firm to a hermetic understanding of Islam and those who borrowed creatively from Western thought to deal with the abolition of even nominal Muslim rule in the subcontinent.

The debate ignited the ideas of Sayyid Ahmad Khan (d. 1898), a descendant of a Mughal notable who had collaborated with the British colonial judiciary. Analyzing the reasons for the Sepoy uprising of 1857 in a treatise titled Asbab-i Baghawat-i Hind (The causes of the Indian revolt; 1858), Khan blamed both the British for suspecting general disloyalty on the part of the Muslims and the Muslims for rigidly maintaining a traditional and rather solipsistic outlook. As a way out of what was felt to be a social, political, and economic crisis, Khan strongly advocated a reform of Muslim education by incorporation of modern Western subjects, based on a new theology that aimed to prove there was no conflict between Western scientific thought and the Qur'anic revelation. Although Khan was vehemently refuted by more traditional Indian 'ulama' and accused of being a "materialist" by Afghani (1838–97), it was his religious thought that paved the way for later thinkers whose strong engagement with Western thought brought about radically new political ideas.

Important in this regard was Muhammad Shah Iqbal (d. 1938), whose studies of Western philosophy led ultimately to the formulation of an innovative anthropology "from a pragmatic point of view." It combined the Sufi idea of self-perfection with the dynamism of European life-philosophy and transferred this in a Hegelian way to the entire Muslim community as a collective subject. This seemingly abstract thinking had far-reaching practical consequences: it resulted in the idea of a distinct Indo-Muslim nation that would naturally require a distinct territory, epitomized in the idea of Pakistan.

Others, like Mawdudi (d. 1979), refused to accept the distinctiveness of the Indian Muslims or their demand for a separate state within the subcontinent. Mawdudi's systemic conception of Islam, culminating in an idealized Muslim polity, was clearly universalist in scope. At the core of this conception, which Mawdudi claimed to have solely deduced from the Qur'an, stood the distinction between God's absolute and unlimited sovereignty (ḥākimiyyat-i ilāhī) and man's limited power as God's trustee on Earth (khilāfat allāh). This "doctrine of the two kingdoms" led Mawdudi to his formulation of the Islamic state as a "theo-democracy" (jumhūriyyat-i ilāhī). The religiopolitical movement Jama'at-i Islami, founded in 1942 and long headed by Mawdudi himself, epitomizes the search for this idealized state.

Explicitly inspired by the works of Ernst Haeckel (d. 1919) and Herbert Spencer (d. 1903), the intellectual 'Inayatallah Khan "al-Mashriqi" (d. 1963) developed a biologistic reading of the Qur'an and reduced its message to the theme of constant warfare and survival of the fittest. Among the requirements for the survival of the Muslims, Mashriqi stressed the importance of bodily fitness and military training. His paramilitary organization Khaksar, founded in 1930, resembled to a large extent the Fascist and National Socialist storm troopers; Benito Mussolini and, to an even larger extent, Adolf Hitler were indeed explicit points of reference and inspirations for Mashriqi. While the movement played a considerable role in communalist encounters in the 1930s, it collapsed with the establishment of Pakistan in 1947.

While the thoughts of Iqbal, Mawdudi, Mashriqi, and others considerably dominated the political discourse in a young independent Pakistan, the Muslims who remained in India found themselves as a religious minority within a secularist constitutional framework. For a long time, this framework was positively perceived by Muslim leaders, as it was seen as an effective tool to prevent privileging the Hindu religious majority. Personalities such as Abu al-Kalam Azad (d. 1958) associated themselves with the Indian National Congress as the flag bearer of secularism. However, this attitude changed during the "patrimonial democracy" of Indira Gandhi (assassinated 1984) in the 1960s and even more during her second term as prime minister between 1980 and 1984, when communalism increasingly became part of the political rhetoric and practice. Muslims were forced to find a separate political lobby to advocate their interests. Due to internal disputes, such a lobby was never very successful within the parliamentary realm, but a number of religiopolitical issues helped transform the political factions of the Muslims into a variety of nonparliamentary pressure groups. The most important are the All-India Muslim Majlis-i Mushawarat, founded in 1964, and the All-India Muslim Personal Law Board, established in 1972. The debates fostered by these groups revolve around the primacy of revealed law over man-made law, which implies that whenever a conflict occurs between the two, a Muslim has no choice but to remain loyal to the divine ordinances.

See also Bangladesh; colonialism; Pakistan

Further Reading

Muzaffar Alam, The Languages of Political Islam: India, 1200–1800, 2004; Markus Daechsel, 'Scienticism and Its Discontent: The Indo-Muslim "Fascism" of Inayatullah Khan Mashriqi', Modern Intellectual History 3, no. 3 (2006); Jan-Peter Hartung, "The Land, the Mosque, the Temple: More than 145 Years of Dispute over Ayodhya," in Ayodhya 1992–2003: The Assertion of Cultural and Religious Hegemony, edited by Richard Bonney, 2003; Nikki R. Keddie, An Islamic Response to Imperialism: Political and Religious Writings of Sayyid Jamāl al-Dīn "al-Afghānī", 1968; Syed Ahmad Khan, The Causes of the Indian Revolt, edited by Francis Robinson, 2000; Seyyed Vali Reza Nasr, The Vanguard of the Islamic Revolution. The Jama'at-i Islami of Pakistan, 1994; Annemarie Schimmel, Gabriel's Wing: A Study into the Religious Ideas of Sir Muhammad Iqbal, 1963.

JAN-PETER HARTUNG

individualism

If individualism is understood narrowly as a component of liberal political theory, where the central concern is the protection of negative or positive liberties of individuals against the coercive powers of the state, the effort to mine the main genres of premodern Islamic political writing in Arabic, Persian, and Turkish for individualism will yield only slim pickings. After all, liberalism, like the modern scientific method, was a specifically early modern European development, and it would be naïve to look for its counterparts in earlier eras, in Europe itself, or in other cultures. If, however, individualism is viewed more generally as a cluster of ideas and social practices that collectively characterize Euro-American modernity, then one can find elements of individualistic thinking in premodern Islamic intellectual traditions.

Religious scholarship contained a robust notion of the individual. In kalām (theology), even though the metaphysical dimensions of individuality (namely, the issue of the nature of the human soul) remained contested, there was consensus on the personal nature of salvation/damnation. On the thorny question of human agency, however, the postclassical mainstream divided into the minimalist Ash'aris (nominal agency) and the maximalist Maturidis as well as Twelver Shi'is (real ownership of actions), with plenty of room for individual accountability for human actions. In fiqh (Islamic jurisprudence), the language of moral and legal obligation was regnant over any discourse of rights and liberties, but Muslim jurists built elaborate protections around "civil rights"—such as the rights to life, dignity, property, and personal relationships—that were often individual in nature. These protections were not conceptualized as "rights" of individuals against the state but as "claims" of private individuals against other private people; nevertheless, they did act as barriers against governmental encroachment on the private lives of individuals. The jurists displayed their individualist moral leanings also in the emphasis they placed on intention in ethical assessment of human actions, as well as on personal conviction in matters of faith. On balance, the edifice of fiqh was built on an assumption of personal accountability and entitlement, and in this connection, the refusal of jurists to recognize corporate bodies as legal entities was a natural consequence of the foundations of fiqh in human individuality. In Sufism (taṣawwuf), the early discovery of, and preoccupation with, the self led to intense scrutiny of inner motivations, emotions, and states as well as to development of such methods of cultivating the self as spiritual invocation (dhikr) and retreats (khalwa). Mystics debated the relative merits of inwardness and self-consciousness versus social action, which are all integral parts of modern discussions of subjectivity in the context of individualism. Regardless of many mystics' final assessment of the salvific worth of individuality, the emphasis they placed on "personal experiential verification" of religious truths was probably the most individualistic element of Sufism: godliness could only be "realized" (taḥqīq) through personal experience, which necessitated direct and sustained efforts of self-cultivation on the part of each human individual.

Outside the world of religious scholarship, views and approaches that placed a high premium on the individual also abounded. In falsafa (philosophy), the nature of the human soul was hotly debated early on, but after Ibn Sina, it became normal to accept the immortality of individual souls (pace Ibn Rushd, who believed that individual souls would be submerged into the world soul after physical death) and to render the happiness of individuals contingent on proper cultivation and care of the self through the exercise of the rational faculty. In the careers and intellectual output of natural philosophers and scientists, individualistic tendencies in the form of skepticism toward received truths and a predilection for personal verification of knowledge claims are palpable, albeit understudied from the perspective of cultural history. Other cultural elites, including secretaries, administrators, writers, poets, artists, and even secular rulers themselves, displayed even more striking forms of individualistic tendencies. The intensely personal nature of the poetic voices of practically all the major poets of the many Islamic literary traditions (from Abu Nuwas and Abu al-'Ala' al-Ma'arri in Arabic to Sa'di and Hafiz in Persian, from Baki and Galib in Ottoman Turkish to Ghalib and Mir Dard in Urdu), the highly developed genre of autobiographical narrative among Mughal emperors, the unmistakable personal virtuosity of Timurid and Safavid visual artists like Bihzad, the long career of the Ottoman architect Sinan, the independence of spirit shining through the works of Ibn Khaldun and Ibn Battuta, and the ever playful but uncompromisingly personal narrative of the maverick Ottoman traveler Evliya Çelebi stand as randomly listed yet meaningful testimony for the individualistic riches that can be mined on these fronts.

It is, therefore, no exaggeration to state that premodern Islamic cultures provided ample venues for expression and development of individualistic tendencies at the personal level, and awareness of one's own worth as affirmation of individuality was not uncommon among the cultural elites. Yet before the colonial era, such avenues for construction of individuality were not directed toward the formation of overtly political ideologies of individualism. It may be speculated that since religious authorities had succeeded early on in Islamic history in erecting relatively secure legal and moral foundations for the exercise of personal freedoms at the level of civil society, there was little acute need to defend individual liberties either against the government, whose regular breach of such civil claims were already viewed as illegitimate, or against any corporate entities like cities or business corporations, which did not exist. It is only in the colonial and postcolonial eras, with the rapid erosion of the vibrant civil societies of the premodern period in the face of the growing power of the modern interventionist state, that new calls are heard for individual liberties in the form of citizens' and human rights.

See also freedom; modernity; rights

Further Reading

Amin Banani and Speros Vryonis, eds., Individualism and Conformity in Classical Islam, 1977; Michael Cook, Commanding Right and Forbidding Wrong in Islamic Thought, 2000; Mohammad Hashim Kamali, Freedom of Expression in Islam, 1997; Bernd Radtke, "How Can Man Reach the Mystical Union: Ibn Ṭufayl and the Divine Spark," in The World of Ibn Ṭufayl, edited by Lawrence I. Conrad, 1996; Dwight F. Reynolds, ed., Interpreting the Self: Autobiography in the Arabic Literary Tradition, 2001; Tzvetan Teofanov, "Canon and Individuality in Old Arabic Poetry," Proceedings of the 17th-Congress of the UAAI, 1997, 256–71.

AHMET T. KARAMUSTAFA

Indonesia

With 240 million citizens, the Southeast Asian nation of Indonesia is the most populous Muslim-majority country in the world. As of 2005, some 88.7 percent of the population were Muslim, most of them Sunnis of the Shafi'i school of jurisprudence. With 300 ethnic groups dispersed over 12,000 islands, a central preoccupation of modern Indonesian political thought has been to devise a framework for holding the nation together.

Islam provided the symbols around which the first mass-based political organization took shape in the early 20th century. Founded in central Java in 1912, the Islamic Association (Sarikat Islam) used Islamic appeals to rally the population against Dutch colonialism and Chinese businesses. As the movement grew, it became polarized between proponents of an Islamic state and advocates of multiconfessional nationalism.

In the months leading up to the declaration of Indonesian independence in August 1945, Muslims and nationalists clashed over the role of Islam in the new constitution. The independence movement's main leaders, Sukarno and Mohammad Hatta (both nationalists committed to the establishment of a state based on equality among Indonesia's recognized religions), prevailed against Muslims under the leadership of Mohammed Natsir, who advocated what Natsir referred to as a "theocratic democracy." In a concession to the Muslim camp, the nationalists introduced a doctrine known as the "Five Principles" (Pancasila), the first of which affirms that the state is based on the belief in a unitary God. Sukarno invoked this principle to justify the deletion of an Islamist-supported preamble to the constitution known as the Jakarta charter, which would have obliged the government to implement shari'a for Muslim citizens.

Over the next half century, demands for the restoration of the Jakarta charter were a recurring theme of Islamist politics. The stronger current in Muslim political thought, however, remained a multiconfessional nationalism that combined nonsectarian citizenship with state support for Islam and four other religions (Hinduism, Buddhism, Protestantism, and Catholicism). Neither secular nor theocratic, this hybrid polity remained a pillar of Indonesian politics in part because it was supported by mass-based Muslim organizations like the traditionalist Nahdatul Ulama (established 1926, with about 35 million followers) and the reformist Muhammadiyah (established 1912, with about 20 million followers).

In the aftermath of a failed leftist coup, a military-dominated "New Order" government came to power in 1965–66. The regime placed strict limits on Muslim politics and promoted an authoritarian nationalism. Islamic learning nonetheless thrived under the New Order government, and the 1970s and 1980s saw a renaissance in Muslim thought. State-supported Islamic universities developed new curricula that were among the most forward-looking in the Muslim world. In the 1980s, prominent Muslim intellectuals like Nurcholish Madjid, Abdurrahman Wahid, and Syafi'i Maarif promoted the idea that pluralism and democracy were compatible with Muslim political ideals.

In the 1990s, Indonesia developed the largest Muslim-dominated prodemocracy movement in the world. Conservative Muslims in groups like the Saudi-funded Indonesian Council of Islamic Appeal (Dewan Dakwah Islamiyah Indonesia) condemned the democracy movement as anti-Islamic, but their views remained the minority. With the onset of the Asian economic crisis in late 1997, support for the New Order regime waned, and its leader, President Suharto, was forced from power in May 1998.

Elections held in 1999 and 2004 demonstrated that the majority of Muslims remained committed to the ideals of a democratic and multiconfessional Indonesia. Many Muslim intellectuals, however, as well as other citizens, also subscribed to the idea that Islam should play a role in public life. In 2001 and 2002, the National Assembly rebuffed efforts by Islamist legislators to require implementation of Islamic law. Islamist groups responded to the setback by successfully pressing for the implementation of portions of Islamic law in more than 50 districts and towns. The constitutional standing of these regional shari'a regulations remained unclear.

Although the post-Suharto period was marked by a conservative turn in matters of gender and public morality, the country continued to make progress toward the consolidation of a democratic electoral system. Survey data show that the majority of Muslims see democracy and human rights as compatible with Islam, even as a smaller but sizable minority support implementation of Islamic law. Efforts to balance democracy and shari'a are likely to remain a key feature of Muslim politics and thought in Indonesia for years to come.

See also Malaysia; Southeast Asia

Further Reading

Masykuri Abdillah, Responses of Indonesian Muslim Intellectuals to the Concept of Democracy (1966–1993), 1997; Robert W. Hefner, Civil Islam: Muslims and Democratization in Indonesia, 2000; M. B. Hooker, Indonesian Islam: Social Change through Contemporary Fatawa, 2003; Michael Francis Laffan, Islamic Nationhood and Colonial Indonesia: The Umma below the Winds, 2003; Fauzan Saleh, Modern Trends in Islamic Theological Discourse in Twentieth Century Indonesia: A Critical Survey, 2001; Arskal Salim and Azyumardi Azra, eds., Shari'a and Politics in Modern Indonesia, 2003; Martin van Bruinessen, "Genealogies of Islamic radicalism in post-Suharto Indonesia," South East Asia Research 10, no. 2 (2002).

ROBERT W. HEFNER

inquisition

Inquisition is the English rendering of the Arabic word mihna, literally trial or tribulation, which refers to a caliphal attempt to impose a theological doctrine in the first half of the ninth century. In 827, the seventh Abbasid caliph Ma'mun (r. 813–33) declared the doctrine of the createdness (giving the text a temporal aspect that is otherwise lacking in the opposite doctrine) of the Qur'an to be correct. Six years later, in 833, he ordered a number of governors to test judges on this issue, while at the same time arranging for the interrogation of notable jurists and other religious scholars in Baghdad. According to surviving documents that appear to be verbatim reports of this state-led investigation, written for the caliph (who was then leading an attack against the Byzantine Empire), the religious scholars who acquiesced to the doctrine were left alone. The few who opposed it, the most famous being Ahmad b. Hanbal, the well-known jurist and traditionist, eponym of the Hanbali school of law, were jailed and later flogged or even executed. The caliph who initiated these steps died suddenly four months later, still on the Byzantine front. His successors, Mu'tasim (r. 833–42) and Wathiq (r. 842–47), continued his policies, but the next incumbent of the caliphal seat, Mutawakkil (r. 847–61), abolished them shortly after his accession. After some 15 years, the caliphal institution gave in to the religious scholars and endorsed their doctrine—namely, that the Qur'an was eternal rather than created in time.

Three theories have been advanced to explain Ma'mun's policy. The oldest is that he was moved by his personal convictions, but this does not explain why it was maintained by his successors (the first of whom had no interest in theological issues). The second theory invokes personal convictions as well, Shi'i in this case, but it also postulates a political aim: Ma'mun was trying to overcome the rift between Sunnis and Shi'is. The third and most recent theory postulates that, whatever Ma'mun's rationalist and Shi'i leanings, what was really at stake was the issue of religious authority: does it belong to the state or to the religious scholars ('ulama')? According to this theory, the mihna was a defining moment in the religiopolitical development of Islam, since its failure meant that the caliphs conceded religious authority to their rivals, the religious scholars who remain the bearers of religious authority in Sunni Islam to the present day. They were to assume the same position in Shi'i Islam as well.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855); Ma'mun (786–833)

Further Reading

Patricia Crone and Martin Hinds, God's Caliph: Religious Authority in the First Centuries of Islam, 1983; Ira Lapidus, "The Separation of State and Religion in the Development of Early Islamic Society," International Journal of Middle East Studies 6 (1975); John Nawas, "A Reexamination of Three Current Explanations for al-Ma'mun's Introduction of the Mihna," International Journal of Middle East Studies 26 (1994); Dominique Sourdel, "La politique religieuse du calife 'abbaside al-Ma'mun," Revue des études islamiques 30 (1962); Muhammad Qasim Zaman, Religion and Politics under the Early 'Abbasids: The Emergence of the Proto-Sunni Elite, 1997.

JOHN A. NAWAS

intercession

Intercession (shafā'a) is pleading, petitioning, making requests, intervening, or mediating on behalf of others. In the Qur'an, deciding to grant intercession is God's prerogative alone. Only the righteous are permitted intercession at the final judgment because they have entered into a covenant ('ahd) with God (19:87). God also allows others to intercede if they "bear witness to the truth" (Q. 43:86). Later, Muhammad appears as intercessor before God on behalf of the believers, both in the hadith (prophetic tradition) and on a mosaic inscription inside the Dome of the Rock in Jerusalem dating to 691–92 that reads, "Muhammad is the messenger of God. May God bless him and accept his intercession on the day of resurrection on behalf of his community (umma)." Other hadith reports recognize the importance and praiseworthiness of intercession among human beings, as in the statement that "the best alms (sadaqa) is to use one's social prestige (jāh) to aid one who has no jāh." Intercession is also called "the alms of the tongue," according to the prophet a means of "freeing the prisoner, sparing lives, and bringing benefit to one's brother and protecting him from calamity."

For the Marwanid line of the Umayyads, the most direct path to salvation and justice led not through the prophet but through the caliph, and for the Shi'is, through the imam. Echoes of this attitude persist well into the Abbasid period. The implication is that ritual acts and the observance of Islamic law gained meaning only in relation to the caliphs and that the caliphs were the protectors of the community. In practice, then, intercession came to mean direct justice or setting things aright, not only divine or eschatological intervention, although both meanings persisted.

The implications of this in the sociopolitical realm were that those either permanently or temporarily lower in the hierarchy sought intercession from rulers or private patrons through written and oral petitions (qiṣaṣ), including subjects of the realm, paupers, prisoners, relatives of the missing and the deceased, courtiers fallen from grace, and anyone else considered to be in need of special protection. Both public and private petitions have survived, from the earliest Arabic papyri onward. Private petitions attest to the centrality of patronage as a social glue in rural and urban contexts alike. In petitions to rulers, the premise was that victims of injustices (mazālim) should have access to justice ('adl) as directly as possible. When direct access was impracticable, appeal to rulers via intermediaries became the norm, with increasing regimentation and ceremony associated with the process of appeal and mazālim justice in general, especially under the Mamluks.

The mazālim system of providing intercession introduced a realm of administrative justice that competed directly with the courts of ordinary judges. In the early Abbasid period, judges controlled the mazālim process, but by the late ninth century, it had come fully under the control of the viziers, with a brief reversal under the Buyids, when descendants of the Shi'i imams oversaw it. As a means of rule, the Fatimid caliphs relied heavily on the process of issuing rescripts in response to petitions, and the Ayyubids and Mamluks followed suit.

A curious feature of requests for intercession to both the state and private patrons is that petitions are generally written by others. Sometimes this had a practical reason, as when petitioners were illiterate. But even literate petitioners often had requests lodged by a friend, a supporter, a scribe, or some other professional versed in the writing of such documents. This feature seems to be central to the etiquette of shafā'a.

Some, though not all, chancery scribes took their role as intercessors seriously. Abu al-Qasim 'Ali b. al-Sayrafi, head of the Fatimid chancery in the mid-12th century, explains in his Description of Chancery Practice that "rescripts and decrees in response to petitions concerning grievances" are particularly important since they involve "a man obtaining his right from another and the establishment of justice in the realm. Also, most of those with a grievance are powerless people, paupers and retiring women, most of whom arrive from distant parts of the realm, believing that they are approaching someone who will help them and redress their grievances and assist them against their adversaries." At the same time, corruption, neglect, and sheer grudges could lead chancery officials to ignore petitions completely, as Ibn al-Sayrafi goes on to complain. In practice, connections to courtiers resulted in the prompt and effective handling of petitions, as is evident from documents preserved in the Geniza (storage chamber) of the Syro-Palestinian Rabbanite (now Ben Ezra) synagogue in Cairo.

See also patronage; vizier

Further Reading

Walther Björkman, Beiträge zur Geschichte der Staatskanzlei im islamischen Ägypten, 1928; A. Fu'ad Sayyid, ed., al-Qanun fi Diwan al-Rasa'il wa-al-Ishara ila man Nala al-Wizara, 1990; Christel Kessler, "'Abd al-Malik's Inscription in the Dome of the Rock: A Reconsideration," Journal of the Royal Asiatic Society of Great Britain and Ireland 1 (1970); Geoffrey Khan, Arabic Legal and Administrative Documents in the Cambridge Genizah Collections, 1993; Shaun E. Marmon, "The Quality of Mercy: Intercession in Mamluk Society," Studia Islamica 87 (1998); Jørgen Nielsen, Secular Justice in an Islamic State: Mazalim under the Bahri Mamluks, 662/1264–789/1387, 1985; Marina Rustow, "A Petition to a Woman at the Fatimid Court (413–414 A.H./1022–23 C.E.)," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 73 (2010); Samuel M. Stern, Fāṭimid Decrees: Original Documents from the Fāṭimid Chancery, 1964.

MARINA RUSTOW

international Islamic organizations

As of 2010, some 33 Islamic organizations were accredited as nongovernmental organizations by the United Nations (UN) Department for Economic and Social Affairs. Of these, five had general consultative status and seven had a narrow or technical focus. Most of them were accredited between 1995 and 2003. The most prominent organizations that had a general status were the World Muslim Congress, the Muslim World League (MWL), and the Islamic Call Society. The World Assembly of Muslim Youth, the Islamic Council of Europe, and 11 other Islamic organizations were, furthermore, associated with the UN Department of Public Information. Two Islamic organizations were considered by the UN as regional intergovernmental organizations according to the law of nations: the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC) and the Islamic Development Bank (IDB).

Most of these organizations claim international membership, scope, or presence. In part, they act as representatives of an Islamic identity in relation to a specific global objective (e.g., the environment, drugs, or relief work), and in part, they promote Islam. International Islamic organizations generally follow the pattern of international institutions that have emerged since the middle of the 19th century. In many ways, they look like Islamic versions of the UN; the United Nations Educational, Scientific, and Cultural Organization (UNESCO); the World Bank; the World Council of Churches; and the YMCA. They often emerged from congresses or assemblies modeled on the congregational practices of 19th- and 20th-century international politics.

The institutionalization of international Muslim "congregational" practice became notable after World War I. Wilfrid Scawen Blunt (1840–1922), the self-declared Byron of Arabia, is often portrayed as having given the decisive impetus for popularizing the idea of a nongovernmental congregation of Muslim public figures. Still, the congress idea was intrinsically tied to the question of the legitimacy of the Ottoman caliphate, which had become the subject of public debate since the early 1880s. It was in this context that, until 1924, various proposals for holding an Islamic congress were brought forward; they were sometimes criticized by Muslim reformers but at times they became part of the reformers' project. This early idea of a congress created a virtual framework for a transnational Islamic polity that Western observers linked to the notion of Pan-Islamism. In fact, the idea of the congress reflected the reformers' conception of a transnational Islamic umma (community of believers) that was to help transform local Islamic cultures according to the patterns of a universalistic system of Islamic norms and values and for which the reformers themselves were to act as political representatives. Consequently, they increasingly depersonalized the symbolic caliphal representation of the umma and substituted for the caliph a public normative discourse institutionalized by congresses or congregations. This tendency was further radicalized after the failure of the so-called Caliphate Congress of Cairo (May 1926), when the new king of Hijaz and amir of Najd, Ibn Sa'ud, convened the first congress of the Islamic world during the hajj (pilgrimage) season in June to July 1926. Though not yet established as a fixed organization, this congress became the progenitor of later congregations (Jerusalem 1931 and Karachi 1949, 1952), resulting in the formal foundation of the Islamic World Congress (IWC). Due to this history, the IWC regarded itself as an umbrella organization of many international organizations established after 1960.

Though Muslim elites who assembled as representatives of the Islamic umma tried to place their international activities within an Islamic public sphere independent of any government, the process of institutionalizing transnational Islamic discourses was mostly in alliance with local regimes. An exception is the General Islamic Congress of Jerusalem (founded in 1952), which was part of the Muslim Brotherhood's policy to transnationalize their claims to legitimacy. It continued to play a role until 1964. The IWC was attached to the new state of Pakistan, while the MWL, founded in 1962, was part of Saudi king Faisal's policy of transnational Islamic solidarity. The Egyptian High Council for Islamic Affairs was founded in 1954 as a transnational body to promote Islam in alliance with Gamal Abdel Nasser's (1918–70) regime. The tendency to seek international support for newly established regimes through the creation of international Islamic institutions also became apparent when the Libyan leader Mu'ammar Qaddafi (1942–2011) initiated the World Islamic Call Society in 1972 and when Iranian politicians formed an International Islamic Information Office in 1980.

In 1969, with the fading of the Egyptian-Saudi conflict that had influenced the foundation of the MWL, a new approach to intergovernmental Islamic organizations became possible. In several steps, the OIC was created with 25 states. Of these, 11 Arab states signed the OIC charter in 1972, and it was registered with the UN in 1974. Headquartered in Jeddah in Saudi Arabia, the OIC, with 57 member states as of 2010, considered itself to be the second largest intergovernmental organization after the UN. It consisted of four specialized institutions: the IDB (founded in 1975); the Islamic Educational, Scientific and Cultural Organization (founded in 1982); the Islamic Broadcasting Union (founded in 1975); and the International Islamic News Agency (founded in 1972), as well as other subsidiary and affiliated organizations and several standing committees. The internal power position among the member states may be deduced from the list of the main shareholders of the IDB, which are from Saudi Arabia, Libya, Iran, Egypt, Turkey, the United Arab Emirates, and Kuwait. The OIC and its framework adapted the UN structures to the regional context of the member states. In placing the regional intergovernmental cooperation in an Islamic frame of reference, they interpret Islam as a system of values, modifying those derived from the UN charter where appropriate.

Almost all international Islamic organizations have advocated for what may be called a moral world order. "Islamic unity" and "Islamic solidarity" legitimate the transnational claim of these organizations. In reality, they have essentially translated local expressions of Islamicity into an emerging transnational Islamic public sphere (da'wa). This common feature, however, has remained abstract, and when it comes to practical policy, national or regional interests have clearly dominated. In this respect, intergovernmental or international nongovernmental Islamic organizations have rarely acted as representative of an independent transnational Islamic public, which had been the original ideal of Muslim reformers of the early 20th century. In certain respects, these organizations still reflect a state-centered approach to Islamic internationalism, which echoes the ideas of a new world order while assuming the possibility of directing and controlling the globalization of Islam "from above." Yet international Islamic institutions have slowly accommodated themselves to the complex character of transnational Muslim politics, which has created a rather different normative global framework with Islamic points of reference.

See also globalization; Pan-Islamism

Further Reading

Martin Kramer, Islam Assembled: The Advent of the Muslim Congresses, 1986; Kelly-Kate S. Pease, International Organizations: Perspectives on Governance in the Twenty-First Century, 2008; Reinhard Schulze, Islamischer Internationalismus im 20. Jahrhundert. Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der Islamischen Weltliga, 1990.

REINHARD SCHULZE

international relations

Islamic views on the nature of relations between political communities have varied considerably throughout history. Well before the rise of the modern system of nation-states at the core of contemporary international relations, Muslim political thinkers engaged in debates on matters of sovereignty, diplomacy, war, and peace. Central to these discussions was a tension between the theoretical precept of the umma (world community of believers) as a universal polity under divine law (shari'a) and the considerable territorial pluralism that has constituted the historical reality of Muslim societies. Another focal point in these debates was an apparent conflict between classical doctrines that seem to urge the expansion of Islam—by war, if necessary—into non-Muslim lands and other Islamic teachings that stress the permissibility, even the desirability, of peaceful and mutually profitable relations with non-Muslim polities.

The Qur'an contains several references to key concepts and themes in international relations, among which can be found the observation that humankind has been made "into nations and tribes, so that you might come to know one another" (49:13). Elsewhere are passages that refer to practices of treaty making, some of which seem implicitly to accept and respect distinctions between sovereign communities (Q. 8:72). But the Qur'an and sunna are also replete with injunctions to fight against unbelievers and polytheists—albeit with special accommodations for fellow monotheists (e.g., Jews and Christians). The complexity of these issues crystallized in practice as Islam began its rapid expansion from the mid-seventh century and particularly with the fragmentation of the Muslim world into separate dynastic polities from the tenth century. While the office of the caliph continued to serve as the nominal religiopolitical center of the Muslim world, by this time it had lost all meaningful claims to centralized political authority. Muslim scholars and statesmen were forced to come to terms with the presence of sovereign cleavages within the umma itself, not to mention the presence of significant numbers of non-Muslim "protected peoples" (*dhimmi*s) in territories under the rule of Islam. Beginning with the Abbasid period (750–1258), Islamic political thought divided the world into two domains: dār al-islām (the abode of Islam), describing those lands under Islamic rule, and dār al-harb (the abode of war), referring to territories outside Muslim rule and potentially subject to conquest.

The apparent dualism at the heart of this worldview has, however, shifted considerably with history. Some schools of Islamic jurisprudence, for example, began to recognize a third category, that of dār al-'ahd (the abode of truce), to express tributary arrangements between states or even mutual recognition as sovereign equals. This latter category was frequently invoked by Ottoman jurists to describe that empire's relations with emerging European powers from the 16th century. The terminology of dār al-harb also should not be taken to imply that offensive expansion constituted the core imperative of Islamic international relations. Mainstream legal thinking on jihad continued to stress a primarily defensive conception of armed conflict in the name of religion, with decision making by Muslim statesmen in this arena continuing to be guided primarily by sovereign interest and the maṣlaha (public good) of the political community. Moreover, the ethics of jihad came to resemble a code bearing striking similarities to the Christian just war doctrine, with clear distinctions between combatants and noncombatants and a heavy emphasis on the proportionate use of force.

With the exception of an aborted effort in the latter part of the 19th century to establish an anticolonial movement centered on ideals of "Pan-Islamism," the international relations of the Muslim world after the dissolution of the Ottoman Empire and in the wake of 20th-century decolonization tended to embrace territorial sovereignty and the political form of the nation-state. Some reformers, such as Rashid Rida (1865–1935), regarded the abolition of the Ottoman caliphate in 1924 as a crisis for Islamic political thought and postulated the need for new forms of religious polity. Likewise, some early formulations of modern Islamism, such as that of Mawdudi (1903–79), founder of the Jama'at-i Islami in Pakistan, rejected the doctrine of nationalism as repugnant to Islamic teaching. Others, however, such as 'Ali 'Abd al-Raziq (1888–1966), a leading Egyptian religious scholar and judge, saw no intrinsic incompatibility between Islam and the modern system of nation-states. The world affairs of Muslim-majority countries in the contemporary period have hence generally proceeded in line with the norms of modern international relations. This does not mean, however, that Islamic considerations in foreign policy have disappeared altogether. Those countries claiming to be "Islamic states" (such as Saudi Arabia, Pakistan, and Iran) have, at various times, sought to define or explain their international affairs in terms of religion. In 1948, for example, Saudi Arabia registered concern with certain aspects of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, claiming that the document relied too heavily on Western liberal values. For the most part, however, the diplomatic activity of these states mirrors mainstream international political behavior, even when Islamic rhetoric is invoked in the pursuit of statecraft. An intergovernmental organization, the Organization of the Islamic Conference (OIC), was established in 1969 to foster greater unity among the peoples of Muslim countries. Deliberations within the OIC, however, tended to highlight the diverse national interests of member states rather than a unified Muslim worldview. The latter part of the 20th century saw the establishment of a number of very small but highly visible transnational nongovernmental Islamic groups—such as Hizb-ut-Tahrir and al-Qaeda—that rejected the legitimacy of the international state system and sought the reestablishment of the caliphate.

See also abodes of Islam, war, and truce; diplomacy; international Islamic organizations; jihad; Pan-Islamism

Further Reading

Sohail Hashmi, ed., Islamic Political Ethics, 2002; Majid Khadduri, War and Peace in the Law of Islam, 1955; James Piscatori, Islam in a World of Nation-States, 1986.

PETER MANDAVILLE

Iqbal, Muhammad (1877–1938)

Iqbal's political thought represents a significant development in both the history of Indian Muslim political thought and the history of Islamic political thought in general. In his prose and poetical writings, Iqbal offers analytical reflections on aspects of Islamic political history as well as proposals for reforming Islamic political institutions. His political thought was formed by his critical study of doctrinal and historical Islam, his close observation of European politics during his stay in England from 1905 to 1908, and the political developments in British India, especially those pertaining to Hindu-Muslim communal relations.

Religion and Politics

While highly critical of ecclesiastical political dominance in European history, Iqbal believed that the Western divorce of religion from politics in modern times had, by lifting all ethical constraints from politics, led to disastrous conflicts between narrowly conceived national interests. "Divorced from religion, politics becomes the savage conduct of Chingiz Khan," runs a famous line in Iqbal's poetry. At the same time, religion's program of societal reform—Iqbal had the egalitarian Islamic political ideals in mind—requires, for its implementation, the support of state power. "Without a rod, the mission of Moses lacks all substance," reads another famous line in Iqbal's poetry. Iqbal seems to make a distinction between a nationalism that begins and ends with sanctifying territory and a nationalism that uses territory only as an instrument in the pursuit of universally valid ethical and humanity-oriented objectives, which, in his view, are embodied in Islam. Iqbal believed that European territorial nationalism arose against a particular background. Christianity, initially monastic and completely otherworldly, became, without warrant, a church organization, against which Martin Luther rightly protested. In Islam, however, Iqbal argued that religion and politics are organically related; no "metaphysical dualism of spirit and matter" separates them, and any division between them is purely functional. In Islam, the state exists only to translate the spiritual and ethical ideals of "equality, solidarity, and freedom" into the temporal world. Only in this sense may Islam be called a theocracy, and not in the sense that a supposedly infallible human despot can rule in God's name.

Democracy

Some of Iqbal's poetry contains a scathing critique of democracy, which Iqbal, quoting the French writer Marie-Henri Beyle, known as Stendhal (d. 1842), calls a mode of government in which people are counted, not weighed. But while his grounds for criticizing democracy were both philosophical (democracy has some inherent limitations) and practical (the European practice of the system in the first decades of the 20th century did not generate much optimism), Iqbal was a strong supporter of the democratic principle and considered democracy an essential part of Islamic government. In Islam, sovereignty belongs to God, and "authority, except as an interpreter of the law, has no place in the social structure of Islam. Islam has a horror of personal authority." Nevertheless, he wrote, "Political Sovereignty de facto resides in the people." Sovereignty is best exercised through democracy, democracy being "the most important aspect of Islam regarded as a political ideal," and election being, in turn, the principal form of democracy.

Muslim Commonwealth

Iqbal admired the modern Muslim thinker-activist Afghani (d. 1897) for his efforts to unify Muslims, but Afghani's so-called Pan-Islamism was conceived as an anti-imperialist instrument. Iqbal's view of worldwide Muslim unity had a philosophical-religious basis but also allowed for the complexities of practical reality: "The political ideal of Islam consists in the creation of a people born of a free fusion of all races and nationalities." The spiritual basis of Muslim unity itself obviates the need for a universal Muslim state under a single caliph or ruler; in Iqbal's view, it is much more practical to have a Muslim commonwealth, of which each country, having developed its individual potential, would freely choose to become a member. With "the absolute equality of all Muslims in the eyes of the law" as its cornerstone, the Muslim commonwealth "is not incompatible with the sovereignty of individual States, since its structure will be determined not by physical force, but by the spiritual force of a common ideal." Iqbal's Pan-Islamism, if one must use the term to describe his thought, is fundamentally different from Afghani's.

Homeland for India's Muslims

Iqbal's reputation as the spiritual founder of Pakistan is based on his vision of a homeland for the Muslims of India. After suppressing the allegedly Muslim-led 1857 revolt against their formal occupation of the country, the British made a systematic attempt to eliminate or weaken the Muslim political, economic, religious, and intellectual centers of power and influence, at the same time extending and bolstering their control over the country by replacing indigenous institutional structures with British or European ones. The hardest hit in the British colonial dispensation were the Muslims, who had supplied the country's former ruling class. For a while, the Muslims sought refuge in traditionalism, rejecting the aggressively introduced European cultural norms and practices in society. They also sought to collaborate with the Hindus, the country's other large religious and cultural community, in an anticolonial struggle; but such cooperation, as Iqbal eventually realized and expressed eloquently, was well-nigh impossible in view of the sharply divergent religious and cultural identities of Hindus and Muslims. In his presidential address at the 1930 meeting of the Muslim League in Lahore, Iqbal outlined his conviction that India's Hindus and Muslims were two fundamentally distinct religious and cultural communities and that, in the particular situation of India, the Muslims' collective survival depended on the creation of an autonomous or independent Muslim region: "Self-government within the British Empire or without the British Empire, the formation of a consolidated North-West Indian Muslim state appears to me to be the final destiny of the Muslims, at least of North-West India." This statement, which Iqbal later amplified by including India's eastern Muslim-majority areas in his proposal for the creation of "a separate federation of Muslim provinces," became the basis for the later development of the "two-nation theory," which, in turn, propelled the movement for the creation of Pakistan.

Of all the Muslim political theorists of post-1857 India, Iqbal perceived most clearly the distinctive character of Indian Muslim religious and political identities and articulated most forcefully the final political destiny of the Muslims of India. But Iqbal was interested in and concerned about the political situation of Muslims worldwide. He commented on the intellectual and political developments taking place in modern Turkey after the abolition of the caliphate, wrote about Italy's 1912 invasion of Libya, and analyzed the causes of the 1930 Muslim rebellion, led by a young boy, in Chinese Turkestan. The many strands of Iqbal's political thought, however, all derive from a cohesive religious outlook. The relationship between Iqbal's religious vision and his political thought needs a more detailed study.

See also al-Afghani, Jamal al-Din (1838–97); India; Pakistan

Further Reading

Aziz Ahmad, Islamic Modernism in India and Pakistan 1857–1964, 1967; Muhammad Iqbal, The Reconstruction of Religious Thought in Islam, edited by Saeed Sheikh, 1996; Mustansir Mir, Iqbal, 2006; Syed Abdul Vahid, Studies in Iqbal, 1967; Syed Abdul Vahid, ed., Thoughts and Reflections of Iqbal, 1992.

MUSTANSIR MIR

Iran

The most notable concept to have entered the Iranian political discourse since 1979 has been the guardianship of the jurist (vilāyat-i faqīh, Ar. wilāyat al-faqīh). Enshrined in the 1979 Iranian Constitution, it stipulates broad supervision of the entire political process by an Islamic jurist of the highest rank. It has become the pivotal institution of the Islamic Republic's system of governance, in which theocratic and republican ideas have uneasily coexisted. Associated with Ayatollah Khomeini, who published a tract titled Vilayat-i Faqih in 1970, the idea was barely known before 1979. An "absolute" version of it was incorporated in a constitutional amendment in 1989, but emphasis regarding the definition of the jurist shifted from recognized preeminence in religious learning to political-administrative competence coupled with adequate juristic knowledge.

As the chief instrument for sustaining and legitimizing Islamic governance, the guardianship of the jurist implies that clerical rule represents the authoritative Shi'i vision of both governance and faith, connoting that overt dissent verges on unbelief. Yet the clerical state eventually failed to conflate the roles of the jurist-guardian and the marja' (source of emulation) and encountered opposition both from within the Shi'i religious establishment and from the broader public. The enduring democratic-republican impulses of the Iranian Revolution (1978–79), coupled with the Islamic republic's waning ideological power, gradually opened up the public sphere to competing interpretations of Islam, in which the clerics no longer exerted a monopolistic role. This involved broaching issues officially regarded as beyond discussion, including the officially sanctioned version of Shi'ism.

Combining modern analytical and exegetical approaches with indigenous intellectual traditions, thinkers embedded in Shi'i religious traditions who supported the emergence of an Islamic polity have engaged in reconstructing religious thought. Probing the genealogy of the ruling religious ideology, they have contested the official reading of Shi'i intellectual political traditions, emphasizing that other, historically more grounded readings are not only possible but also desirable.

Relying on hermeneutics, Mohammad Mojtahed-Shabestari (b. 1936), a professor of theology until his retirement in 2006, maintains that there is no single correct reading of the Qur'an and the sunna, and that the official version of Islam, purporting to be the only valid version, has been used to facilitate the state's control of society and culture. He argues that political legitimacy should rest on political rationality and the popular vote, and religious values and secular realities should be separated.

Similarly, for the influential lay thinker Abdolkarim Soroush (b. 1945), who sees himself as a neo-Mu'tazili, Islam lends itself to a variety of interpretations. Combining modern philosophical perspectives and Iranian-Islamic mysticism, he emphasizes the fallibility and historicity of religious knowledge and the contingency and historical specificity of prophetic revelation. For him, there is more than one approach to understanding scripture and therefore more than one path to salvation. Religious pluralism as advocated by Soroush requires the absence of an officially sanctioned interpretation and official interpreters; concomitantly, a pluralist society must be democratic and prioritize rights over duties.

Firmly basing his beliefs on Shi'i traditions of learning, the Islamic jurist Mohsen Kadivar (b. 1959) furnishes a wide-ranging critique of Khomeini's theory of governance and a forceful refutation of the theocratic cornerstone of Islamic rule in Iran. Kadivar maintains that rather than representing the only Shi'i view of governance, Khomeini provided one among many traditions. For Kadivar, the principle of the guardianship of the jurist is neither rationally necessary nor a requirement of faith or any of its cardinal principles.

The emphasis of critics on the absence of a single, authoritative interpretation of Shi'ism contrasts sharply with the official creed and its underlying premise. Hermeneutics and other historically grounded investigations have challenged the theocratic state and have helped transform the Shi'i modernist discourse. Criticisms of the official religious ideology have also been voiced by various ayatollahs, including Hosein-Ali Montazeri (1922–2009), Khomeini's successor designate, who was relieved of his position in 1989. Montazeri played an important role in developing the idea of the guardianship of the jurist but gradually turned against its prevailing form. Similar reservations have been expressed by many clerical and lay intellectuals and activists associated with the reform movement that culminated in the presidency of Mohammad Khatami in May 1997. Countering or containing religiously grounded arguments against a state that bases its legitimacy chiefly on religion proved difficult, and the ruling clerics were not able to mount intellectually vigorous counterarguments. Unlike the ranks of their critics, those in power were unable to produce outstanding intellectual exponents of the ruling ideology or to compensate for the desertion of its erstwhile exponents. The reformist segments of the Islamic Republic proposed specifically Islamic forms of democracy and civil society but did not furnish coherent blueprints or formulas for their realization.

See also guardianship of the jurist; Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89)

Further Reading

Behrooz Ghamari-Tabrizi, Islam and Dissent in Postrevolutionary Iran: Abdolkarim Soroush, Religious Politics and Democratic Reform, 2008; Yasuyuki Matsunaga, "Mohsen Kadivar, an Advocate of Postrevivalist Islam in Iran," British Journal of Middle Eastern Studies 34, no. 3 (2007); Ahmad Sadri and Mahmoud Sadri, Reason, Freedom, and Democracy in Islam: Essential Writings of Abdolkarim Soroush, 2002; Mahmoud Sadri, "Sacral Defense of Secularism: The Political Theologies of Soroush, Shabestari, and Kadivar," International Journal of Politics, Culture and Society 15, no. 2 (2001); Abdolkarim Soroush, The Expansion of Prophetic Experience: Essays on Historicity, Contingency and Plurality in Religion, translated by Nilou Mobasser and edited by Forough Jahanbakhsh, 2009; Farzin Vahdat, "Post-Revolutionary Islamic Modernity in Iran: The Intersubjective Hermeneutics of Mohamad Mojtahed Shabestari," in Modern Muslim Intellectuals and the Qur'an, edited by Suha Taji-Farouki, 2004.

FAKHREDDIN AZIMI

Iraq

Some of the central ideas in modern Islamic political thought—notably, constitutionalism, just government, and the role of clerics in politics—were conceived or elaborated in Iraq during the 20th century and in the years following the 2003 U.S. invasion of the country. Shi'i clerics have taken the lead in developing ideas, overshadowing their Sunni counterparts. This is not simply a reflection of the majority share of Shi'is within the population but rather a consequence of the financial and intellectual independence of Shi'i clerics in relation to the Sunni government. Also, until 2003, Sunni clerics were part of the bureaucracy of the state and therefore had little control over the curriculum of their religious schools and the content of sermons delivered in mosques.

The Iranian Constitutional Revolution of 1905 to 1911 and the Young Turk Constitutional Revolution of 1908 had an impact in Najaf and Karbala. Both revolutions, and the Ottoman removal of the ban on publications and political association, enabled Shi'i clerics to articulate their vision of constitutionalism and develop a political theory of a just government. Muhammad Husayn Na'ini's (d. 1936) Tanbih al-Umma wa-Tanzih al-Milla (The awakening of the community and the purification of religion) is the most famous theoretical and systematic work written by a Shi'i jurist in support of the Iranian constitution, defining government accountability in the eye of clerics and setting principles for their resistance to the ruler and their participation in state affairs.

Na'ini's work influenced later generations of Shi'i jurists and had an impact on the events surrounding the British establishment of Iraq. Thus, in the course of the 1919 plebiscite, Shi'i clerics and other religious functionaries in Karbala, inspired by the jurist Muhammad Taqi Shirazi (d. 1920), signed a petition calling for an Arab Islamic government in Iraq led by a king whose acts would be supervised by a national assembly elected by the people to enact the rules approved by the clerics.

The 1921 establishment of Iraq as a state dominated by a Sunni minority elite was a setback to Shi'i Islam, forcing Shi'i clerics to withdraw from politics in the country. While the revival of Islamic ideology may be traced to the late 1950s, it became pronounced only under the Ba'th Party (1968–2003) and following the 1978 to 1979 Iranian Islamic revolution. Muhammad Baqir al-Sadr was the moving figure behind Shi'i Islamic resurgence in Iraq and the establishment of the Da'wa Party in 1959. He gained reputation through his works Falsafatuna (Our philosophy), Iqtisaduna (Our economy), and al-Islam Yaqud al-Hayah (Islam leads life). Sadr developed a vision of Islamic government and distinguished between two types of religious leaders: the preeminent cleric who gains recognition by consensus, or a majority, among followers in the Shi'i world and the one who is not necessarily the most learned cleric but who springs from within his milieu and responds to the needs of his local constituency.

Sadr's activism was a threat to the Ba'th Party and led to his execution in 1980. Yet his legacy inspired followers, including Muhammad Sadiq al-Sadr (a cousin of Baqir al-Sadr and known as Sadr II). During the 1990s, Sadr II succeeded in reconnecting the Najaf world of clerics and seminaries with the rural communities of southern Iraq and the Shi'i urban poor in Baghdad. His strategy built on grassroots politics and on the function of the religious leader as a field commander. Sadr II's path to becoming a cleric commanding popular support was cut short, however, when gunmen shot him to death in 1999. His movement would reemerge under his son Muqtada al-Sadr following the collapse of the Ba'th Party.

The U.S. invasion reenergized Shi'i clerics and led Grand Ayatollah 'Ali al-Sistani (b. 1930) to adapt Islamic political thought to an Iraq led by Shi'is with significant Sunni and Kurdish minorities. From 2003 to 2009, Sistani insisted on direct elections to parliament, objected to the appointment of drafters to write the constitution, and advocated a government representing all social groups. Although Sistani had a vision of what an Islamic government should be, he was not inspired by Khomeini (d. 1989), who allowed the idea that clerics should rule to be implemented in the Islamic Republic of Iran. Sistani's ideas were more in tune with those of Na'ini and emphasized government accountability. Moreover, Sistani accepted the political reality of a modern nation-state led by lay politicians and tacitly acknowledged that there should be limits on clerical participation in state affairs.

Meanwhile, amid the collapse of the Ba'th Party, Sunni clerics emerged as community leaders. The period between 2003 and 2009 also saw the establishment of Sunni organizations such as the Association of Muslim Scholars (AMS), which attempted to position itself as a counter to the Shi'i religious leadership and sought to rethink the role of Sunni clerics and Sunni religious institutions in a Shi'i-led state—a novelty in the modern Arab world.

See also ayatollah; Ba'th Party; constitutionalism; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Faleh Jabar, The Shiite Movement in Iraq, 2003; Meir Litvak, Shi'i Scholars of Nineteenth-Century Iraq, 1998; Yitzhak Nakash, Reaching for Power: The Shi'a in the Modern Arab World, 2006; Linda Walbridge, ed., The Most Learned of the Shi'a: The Institution of the Marja' al-Taqlid, 2001.

EDITOR

Islamic Jihad

The organization known as Egyptian Islamic Jihad (Jihad al-Islami al-Misri, hereafter EIJ), also frequently referred to as the Jihad Organization (Tanzim al-Jihad), is a militant Islamist group. At least until 2007, its objective was to engage in offensive jihad (lit. struggle; here, military action) against the Egyptian state to weaken the regime and ultimately to initiate an Islamic revolution. The group draws its ideology from 'Abd al-Salam Faraj's work al-Farida al-Gha'iba (The Neglected Duty), which further develops ideas set out by Sayyid Qutb's Ma'alim fi al-Tariq (Milestones). EIJ was involved in the assassination of President Anwar Sadat in October 1981 and was a leading participant in the jihad in Afghanistan during the 1980s. It was also involved in several attempts on the life of high-ranking Egyptian politicians, among them an attempt against President Husni Mubarak in June 1995. EIJ carried out a series of bomb strikes on military and civilian installations in Egypt and abroad during the 1980s and 1990s. Throughout the 1990s, the group was affiliated with Ayman al-Zawahiri and subsequently constituted a subgroup of al-Qaeda.

The beginnings of the group go back to the late 1970s, when a number of loosely organized militant networks in Cairo came together under the leadership of Faraj. One of the networks feeding into the early EIJ was the circle of Zawahiri, which included his brother Muhammad al-Zawahiri, Ulwi Mustafa Ulaywah and his brother Muhammad Mustafa Ulaywah, 'Isam al-Qamari, and Sayyid Imam al-Sharif. The ranks of the early EIJ extended to the military; Qamari and Muhammad Ulaywah were members of the armed forces, and Lieutenant Colonel 'Abbud al-Zumur was a high-ranking officer who then organized the military wing of the group. In June 1980, Faraj managed to convince the Saidi (Upper Egyptian) network of Karam Zuhdi—which included smaller groups centered around Najih Ibrahim, 'Abdallah Sayyid, Muhammad al-Islambuli, and Hamdi 'Abd al-Rahman and which formed the nucleus of the later al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya (Islamic Group)—to coordinate their activities and join forces. The groups, which remained locally distinct, formed a shūrā (consultation) council of 12 and nominated 'Umar 'Abd al-Rahman as their mufti (interpreter of Islamic law).

On October 6, 1981, an EIJ military action unit under the command of Khalid al-Islambuli assassinated Sadat during a military parade in commemoration of the 1973 Arab-Israeli War. Following the event, a military trial sentenced Faraj, Khalid al-Islambuli, and the latter's three accomplices to death. The court cases against another 302 EIJ members resulted in 58 prison sentences and, except for a few senior members, most members of the organization were released within 3 years. The prison years revealed underlying tensions between the Saidi and the Cairene factions of the organization on questions of leadership, strategy, and the future of the organization. The differences led to the establishment of al-Gama'a al-Islamiyya under 'Abd al-Rahman as a group distinct from EIJ, which chose Zumur as its leader.

In order to escape prosecution in Egypt and because of the prospect of engaging in combat, many EIJ members left to participate in the Afghan jihad against Russian troops. Since Zumur remained imprisoned in Egypt, Sayyid Imam al-Sharif (also known as Dr. Fadl) took charge of EIJ's operations. Following 'Abdallah 'Azzam's call to join the jihad in Afghanistan, EIJ adhered to the concept of the "near enemy," which draws on traditional concepts of Muslim warfare to stress the obligation to directly confront a force occupying what is perceived to be Muslim land.

With the withdrawal of Russia from Afghanistan, EIJ members reviewed their strategy and ideology, particularly their definition of jihad. Zawahiri and the remaining EIJ combatants favored the concept of warfare against the "far enemy," stressing their view that it was obligatory to fight against the United States and its allies, which they perceived as enabling the continuance of governments such as the Egyptian regime under Mubarak. Zawahiri thus gradually increased his influence on the Egyptian mujahidin (fighters engaging in jihad) and, with the beginning of the Gulf War in 1991, took charge of EIJ. EIJ then effectively merged with al-Qaeda under Osama bin Laden. Evidence of the correlation between EIJ and al-Qaeda is the fact that six of nine seats of al-Qaeda's leadership council belong to former EIJ members. Furthermore, a number of terrorist attacks, such as the 1995 bombing of the Egyptian embassy in Islamabad and the 1995 attempts on President Mubarak's life, were financed, planned, and executed through al-Qaeda.

Zawahiri's leadership and the strategy of international terrorism did not go unchallenged. In the late 1990s, ideological disputes emerged on the question of engaging in combat on a national or an international level; however, a clear rift took place in 2007, when Sayyid Imam al-Sharif published a statement that called for a review of the idea of militant jihad. This revision led EIJ members to distance themselves from international terrorism, al-Qaeda, and Zawahiri. It is still too early to say whether EIJ thus reinvented itself as an organization separate from al-Qaeda and opted to give up its militant opposition to the Egyptian state.

See also Egypt; al-Qaeda; terrorism; al-Zawahiri, Ayman (b. 1951)

Further Reading

Omar Ashour, The De-Radicalization of Jihadists: Transforming Armed Islamist Movements, 2009; Lisa Blaydes and Rawrence Rubin, "Ideological Reorientation and Counterterrorism: Confronting Militant Islam in Egypt," Terrorism and Political Violence 20 (2008); Johannes J. G. Jansen, The Neglected Duty: The Creed of Sadat's Assassins and Islamic Resurgence in the Middle East, 1986; Laura Mansfield, His Own Words: A Translation of the Writings of Dr. Ayman al Zawahiri, 2006; Marc Sageman, Understanding Terror Networks, 2004; Montasser al-Zayyat, The Road to al-Qa'ida. The Story of Bin Laden's Right Hand Man, 2004.

BARBARA ZOLLNER

Islamization

Islamization is the process by which practices, laws, knowledge, meaning, or peoples convert, conform, or adapt to Islam. It can describe (1) the redefinition of various pagan, Abrahamic, or native practices against the backdrop of conversion and expansion and (2) the integration of cultural, political, legal, or scientific systems with Islamic doctrines, language, and ethics, or their production from an Islamic perspective. In addition to reassessing conversion itself, appreciation of Islamization as a process has allowed scholars to show formal and substantive continuities during and after conversion; to pursue synchronic comparisons of Islamic cultures; and to capture the specific transformations facilitated by the adaptation of social phenomena and categories into Islam's normative and semiotic structures. An example of the last is the transformation during early Islam of various literary genres such as the metered Arabic lyric poem, called the qaṣīda, through the introduction of Islamic terms and themes. The significance and extent to which Islam is the product of the Islamization of pagan, Hellenistic, Christian, and Jewish thought and practice remains contested. Scholars on one side assume that all similarities between early Islam and its predecessors indicate "borrowing" or "influence"; those on the other side see Islam as a complete and total break with the past. More recent scholarship has shown how non-Islamic knowledge, myths, and histories were adapted, reorganized, and elaborated in Islamic milieus in areas as diverse as history, theology, philosophy, and zoology. "Islamization" has some baggage, particularly where "Islam" is reified or where one assumes that the designation of something as Islamic or non-Islamic by nature is self-evident. Similarly, the term not infrequently carries polemical undertones. For example, self-described Islamizing agendas assert an authentic Islamic identity and cast their opposition or their objects of conversion as non- or un-Islamic, while non-Muslim descriptions of a place as "Islamizing" tend to cast the place as vulnerable and Islamization as a threat.

Scholarship on contemporary politics and society has drawn attention to the performative, spectacular, and relational dimensions of attempts to "Islamize" the public, public space, or oneself. For instance, Farha Ghannam, an anthropologist specializing in Egypt and Jordan, uses the term in her Remaking the Modern to describe Islamic groups' increasing displays of religious signs in homes, shops, and vehicles; the increasing numbers of educational and health services in their mosques; and their interactions with the general populace. Others have also highlighted the importance of visibility, where Islamization describes overtly religious practices and mosque construction projects. Finally, "Islamization of knowledge" describes a contemporary project to harmonize Islam with the modern sciences and anchor them in Islamic ethics. This enterprise can be traced to the writings of the Palestinian-American philosopher of Islam, Arabism, and comparative religion Isma'il al-Faruqi, starting in the 1960s. Organizations that grew out of this project include the International Institute of Islamic Thought. As the anthropologist of science Christopher Furlow suggests in his article "The Islamization of Knowledge: Philosophy, Legitimation, and Politics," such projects should be understood "within the broad context of decolonization and development and within the intellectual milieu of post-colonial negotiation between 'nativizing' cultural traditions and 'transnational' modernisms."

See also conversion; knowledge; political ritual

Further Reading

Devin DeWeese, Islamization and Native Religion in the Golden Horde, 1994; Isma'il al-Faruqi, "Science and Traditional Values in Islamic Society," Zygon 2, no. 1 (1967); Christopher A. Furlow, "The Islamization of Knowledge: Philosophy, Legitimation, and Politics," Social Epistemology 10, nos. 3–4 (1996); Farha Ghannam, Remaking the Modern, 2002.

MURAD IDRIS

Isma'il I (1487–1524)

Isma'il, born 1487, ruled as shah of the Safavid Empire between 1501 and 1524. He succeeded in conquering the lands of modern-day Iran, Iraq, and Afghanistan with his Qizilbash (Turkmen) disciples, who venerated him as God's incarnation on Earth. The first spiritual guide of the Safavid mystical order to assume temporal rule, Shah Isma'il claimed he was the reincarnation of Abrahamic prophets and heroic kings from Iran's cultural past. At a time marked by millenarian beliefs, Shah Isma'il appropriated the role of the long-awaited Mahdi (messiah), who intercedes with God on behalf of the common believers. To help validate this identity, he claimed membership, through 'Ali b. Abi Talib, to Muhammad's family, from which the messiah was expected to emerge at the end of time.

In his collection of poetry, the Diwan-i Khata'i (Book of the sinner), which is the closest historical depiction of his persona, Shah Isma'il represented himself as a penitent pilgrim, willing to sacrifice his soul for the benefit of all. He appropriated the conventional voice of the ghazal (love poem), depicting himself as a mournful sinner and the bedazzled lover of 'Ali, presenting a pious persona to the world while inaugurating a new era in the history of Iran and beyond and carving out his Shi'i dominion. His poetry announced his messianic mission both as an invitation to his followers and as a warning to those infidels who would resist his call. Believing that his personal path to salvation would be in the company of 'Ali, Isma'il imagined himself as a pilgrim circumambulating the Ka'ba, there confessing and publicly repenting in order to achieve his desired union with 'Ali, who not only disclosed universal mysteries to him but whose persona had actually been reincarnated in Isma'il. Recognizing 'Ali as the gate of Islam, in fact as God himself ("Know [him] to be God"), Isma'il invited the audience of his poetry to emulate him by converting to Islam and joining the Safavid cause. Within a decade, Isma'il had marshaled the support of Persian- and Turkish-speaking devotees who were ready to sacrifice their lives.

Isma'il's revolution could not have succeeded, however, without his corps of Turkmen devotees—that is, westward-moving Turks who his grandfather, Shaykh Junayd (d. 1460), had recruited from Ottoman domains in Asia Minor. Well before Isma'il's own revolution, Shaykh Junayd altered the character of the Safavid order from a Sufi brotherhood to a messianic movement with far-reaching political aspirations when he was banished to Anatolia and Syria in 1448. There he engaged in missionary activities and recruited Turkmen adepts known as Qizilbash, or Redheads (because of the color of their skull caps), who contributed military might and later aided Isma'il in conquering lands and amassing his empire. The Qizilbash Turkmen viewed Junayd as God's reincarnation—"the Living One, there is no God but he"—and his son Haydar as the son of God. In 1456 Junayd fought a holy war (ghaza) against the Byzantines at Trabezond, and he died in another battle in the Caucasus in 1460.

Isma'il not only merged divine justice and worldly kingship but also exercised their functions, as would be expected from a messiah-king. In his role of divinely just ruler, he shared war booty with his Qizilbash disciples and divided the conquered territories into appanages administered by governors and tutors of Safavid princes. This generosity confirmed his image as God on Earth to his subjects. Although some of Muhammad's descendants (sayyids) were awarded privileges, including some tax exemptions, a kind of overall social welfare was instituted: craftsmen and merchants were exempt from commercial taxes, and soup kitchens were set up for the poor and needy. Not surprisingly, Isma'il's treasuries were often empty.

The "Shi'ification" and "Iranization" of the Safavid Empire over a period of 100 years prepared the landscape for a regional split into distinct Sunni Ottoman and Shi'i Safavid dominions. Having publicly embraced Shi'ism, Shah Isma'il invited Arab Imami Shi'i scholars to emigrate from Ottoman to Safavid domains, including those in greater Syria. Many subjects, however, disapproving of his messianic claims, refused his patronage. The Ottoman-Safavid hostilities checked the fluidity that the Irano-Turkish world had known and created sectarian boundaries of religious identity, which remain strongly demarcated in the region's present-day rivalries.

Once Isma'il had conquered the Safavid domains, new regional groups, such as Persian bureaucrats and local notables, were incorporated into the system of rule and administration of the dominions, and they brought their own cultural ideas and attitudes. During Isma'il's lifetime, different historical versions of his rise to power and spiritual status as the Mahdi emerged, some circulated by the king himself and several by his court historians. But an official, master history of Isma'il's and the Safavids' ascendance was yet to be determined, reflecting the decentralized nature of power in this period. His son, Tahmasp, emerged from a 13-year civil war (1524–36) that had erupted over the issue of succession at Isma'il's death. These struggles over power eventually determined which version of Isma'il's story would be adopted as the Safavids' "official" history of ascendance. In the final, official version, Isma'il did not hold the messiah's role but was his humble precursor who, by establishing the "right order"—namely, Imami Shi'ism—would prepare the way for the advent of the messiah or Hidden Imam.

See also Mahdi; Ottomans (1299–1924); Safavids (1501–1722)

Further Reading

Aubin Jean, "L'Avenement des Safavides Reconsidere," Moyen Orient & Ocean Indien 5 (1988): 67–126; Fazl Allah b. Ruzbihan Kunji-Isfahani, Tarikh-i Alam Ara-yi Amini, edited and translated by John E. Woods, 1993; Michele Membré, Mission to the Lord Sophy of Persia, translated and introduced by A. H. Morton, 1993; Vladimir Minorsky, "The Poetry of Shah Ismail I," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies 10 (1942): 1006–53; Idem, Tazkirat al-Muluk: A Manual of Safavid Administration, translated and commentary by Vladimir Minorsky, reprint, 1989; Wheeler Thackston, "The Divan of Khata'i: Pictures for the Poetry of Shah Isma'il," Asian Art (Fall 1988): 37–63.

KATHRYN BABAYAN

Isma'ilis

Isma'ilism is a branch of Shi'ism best known for postulating a hidden, interior sense of the law and emphasizing it over the plain, exterior meaning. First attested in the late ninth century as a collection of cells spread throughout the Islamic lands and directed by leaders in Syria, the political thought of the first Isma'ilis was reduced to messianism. The last imam was to return from hiding as the Mahdi expected to usher in the end of days and abrogate the law (i.e., ritual worship). There would then be no need for conventional religion; believers would worship God directly, as Adam had done in paradise.

In 899, the leader in Syria had declared himself to be the Mahdi, thereby splitting the movement into two: Old Isma'ilis (often known as Qarmatis) and Fatimid Isma'ilis, so called because their leader fled to North Africa, where, in 909, he founded the Fatimid caliphate, which moved to Egypt in 969. In the writings of Isma'ili missionaries working for the Fatimid caliphs (r. 909–1171), the imam was no longer an absent figure expected to return to usher in the end of days but rather a religiopolitical leader in the here and now, as among non-Isma'ilis. The imam—that is, the Fatimid caliph—was God's representative on Earth, the political and religious leader for all humankind. As a political leader, his duties were identical to those that non-Isma'ilis ascribed to the imam: he was charged with executing the law, collecting and distributing alms and taxes, protecting the weak, defending the borders, and eventually bringing all humankind under God's rule. As a religious leader, he was divinely guided, sinless, and infallible; his example was a source for law. The imam alone possessed perfect knowledge necessary for salvation and was thus the supreme teacher, the gate of salvation for humankind. He alone was thought to know the true, inner sense of scripture and religion, and he disclosed these truths to high-ranking believers in his mission, who, in turn, distributed them to the community.

Just as the Fatimids transformed the role of the imam, so too did they modify his identity and devise explanations for the shifts. Early Isma'ilis believed the last imam and future Mahdi to be Muhammad b. Isma'il, a descendant of the Prophet's cousin 'Ali b. Abi Talib. In 899, the future Fatimid caliph announced to the missionary in Iraq that the awaited redeemer was not Muhammad b. Isma'il but himself. "Muhammad b. Isma'il" had been a cover name for a series of seven Hidden Imams. It was over this that the movement split. Fatimid missionaries explained that the end of days would unfold in stages. Now, with the rise of the Fatimid caliphs, the end of days had moved from a cycle of Hidden Imams to a "cycle of disclosure," in which the imams would fight their tyrannical enemies openly until the entire world was subdued.

Most Isma'ilis lived outside Egypt, where many of them remained faithful to the old doctrine. Some proceeded to prepare for the end of days, and in the 930s the so-called Qarmatis in Bahrain put an extreme form of antinomianism into practice. In 930, they attacked Mecca, slaughtered pilgrims, and abducted the black stone as a sign that conventional Islam had come to an end. In 931, they accepted a young Iranian captive as the Mahdi, apparently seeing him as a manifestation of God, and engaged in ritual violation of the law under his leadership. Non-Isma'ilis came invariably to associate Isma'ilism with the behavior seen in Bahrain, but in fact antinomianism is quite rare in Isma'ili history, and it never took so violent a form again.

Other Isma'ilis, including those in Iran and Transoxiana, taught that the present was an "interim" period—a period between imams. During such interims in which the imam was absent, the mission would be led by lieutenants of the imam. To appease these communities, the Fatimid caliph Mu'izz (r. 953–75) reinstated Muhammad b. Isma'il as the awaited redeemer and claimed that the Fatimid imams were his spiritual representatives who would rule until the final phase of the end of days.

Several authors unaffiliated with the Fatimids combined Isma'ili doctrine and Neoplatonic philosophy to develop highly original syntheses that would later be incorporated by Fatimid missionaries such as Hamid al-Din al-Kirmani (d. ca. 1021).

Fatimid-Isma'ili missionaries also debated with non-Isma'ilis over the identity of the imam. They claimed that their arguments rested on authoritative transmitted knowledge and logic. Proof from transmitted knowledge consisted of verses of the Qur'an that they believed referred to the authority of the family of the Prophet and traditions in which the Prophet explicitly designated 'Ali as his successor at a pond in Khumm. Proof from logic came, for example, in an attack on the Sunni notion that the first caliph, Abu Bakr, was nominated by "consultation" (shūrā) of the early Companions. How could the inferior have the capacity to identify and elect the superior? Through the Prophet, God Himself appointed 'Ali as His representative. Against the claims of the Twelver Shi'is, who argued that it was impossible for the imam Ja'far al-Sadiq's son Isma'il to be imam, since he had predeceased his father, Isma'ili missionaries produced traditions that showed that Ja'far had explicitly claimed Isma'il as his successor, claiming that he, in turn, had appointed his son Muhammad b. Isma'il. For the Fatimid missionary Abu al-Fawaris, the truth of all this was demonstrated by the fact that the current imam, the caliph Hakim (996–1021), was unparalleled in descent, knowledge, and generosity.

Expectations of the (spiritual) resurrection nonetheless resurfaced in the wake of the disappearance of Hakim in 1021, when a number of missionaries declared this caliph to have been a manifestation of God and the law to have been abolished, founding a community of breakaways in Syria known as the Druzes. In 1164 another breakaway community abolished ritual worship, this time at Alamut in northwestern Iran, but they restored it some 50 years later. After the fall of the Fatimids and the eclipse of small Isma'ili principalities in mountainous regions of Iran and Syria in the 13th century, Isma'ilism has persisted through quietist, minority subsects in Western China, South Asia, Syria, Yemen, and East Africa as well as Europe and North America.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Brethren of Purity; Buyids (945–1062); Druze; Fatimids (909–1171); imamate; Qarmatians; Shi'ism; al-Tusi, Nasir al-Din (1201–74)

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought (God's Rule), 2004; Farhad Daftary, The Ismā'īlīs: Their History and Doctrines, 1990; Heinz Halm, The Empire of the Mahdī: The Rise of the Fātimids, 1977; Sumaiya A. Hamdani, Between Revolution and State: The Path to Fatimid Statehood, 2006; Wilferd Madelung, "A Treatise on the Imamate of the Fatimid Caliph al-Manṣūr bi-Allāh," in Texts, Documents and Artefacts: Islamic Studies in Honour of D. S. Richards, edited by Chase F. Robinson, 1993; Paul Walker, Master of the Age: An Islamic Treatise on the Necessity of the Imamate, 2007.

DAVID HOLLENBERG

Istanbul

Istanbul is one of the oldest and most populated cities in Europe and the largest city in Turkey. Located on the Bosporus, spreading along the Sea of Marmara and connecting Thrace and Anatolia, Istanbul consists of four parts: the Golden Horn and Old Istanbul extending to the Eyyub district in the west; Galata to the north of Golden Horn; Üsküdar to the east on the Asian side; and Boğazıcı on the Black Sea side of the Bosporus, extending into Asia and Europe. The greater Istanbul region extends almost 30 miles east to west and 10 miles north to south. The Boğaz Bridge and the Fatih Bridge across the Bosporus connect the European and Asian parts. Its location at the meeting point of Asia and Europe has given it strategic importance, and placed it naturally on major modern and ancient trade routes.

The name Istanbul is from a Greek phrase that means "in the city." The ancient city was founded by Greek settlers in the seventh century BCE and called Byzantion. Later it fell under Persian rule, then reverted to Greek or independent rule, until in 73 it fell to the Romans. In 330, the emperor Constantine made it the eastern capital of the Roman Empire, calling it "New Rome" (Nea Roma), and it remained the capital of the Byzantine Empire under the name of Constantinople. The city withstood two sieges by the Arabs in late seventh and early eighth centuries. Other than the brief period when it was ruled by the Crusaders (1204–61), it stayed under Byzantine rule. But the expanding Ottoman principalities in Asia Minor gradually confined this empire to the Constantinople area. After several unsuccessful Ottoman attacks, the city fell to the Ottoman sultan Mehmed II the Conquerer in 1453. Under his rule, the city grew much bigger and was completely restructured as an Islamic city and the capital of the Muslim Ottoman Empire. The Hagia Sophia Cathedral was turned into a great mosque, today the Ayasofya, where the Friday prayer was held and the sultan received petitions, giving it a completely Islamic function. The sultan then started repopulating the city with Muslim, Christian, and Jewish immigrants from across his empire, with Muslims constituting the majority by design. The expansion and Islamization of Istanbul continued under Sultan Süleiman the Magnificent, making a full transformation from old Constantinople to the Islamic Istanbul, which was envisaged by the sultan as the true capital of the Muslim world, with the sultan as the rightful leader of the Islamic community in general. The sultan's claim as the legitimate successor to the original caliphate, and hence worthy of the title "Commander of the Faithful," was on firm ground after the 1517 Ottoman takeover of Egypt, ruled by the Mamluks, who themselves had laid claim to the title after some Abbasid princes took refuge in Egypt following the 1258 sack of Baghdad by the Mongols and the murder of the last Abbasid caliph. Hence, during the next few centuries, Istanbul remained the capital and the seat of the Ottoman sultan and grew considerably, despite the gradual decline of the Ottoman Empire.

In the late 19th century, European railways reached Istanbul, and the city started to modernize. In World War I, the Ottomans joined the axis powers, and in 1919 Istanbul was occupied by the British and remained under their control until 1923, when the Ottoman Empire was abolished and the modern state of Turkey was founded. In the early 21st century, Istanbul is a center of culture and commerce, although no longer the capital.

See also Ottomans (1299–1924); Süleiman the Magnificent (1494–1566); Turkey

Further Reading

S. Faroqhi, Geschichte des Osmanischen Reiches, 2006; J. Harris, Constantinople, Capital of Byzantium, 2007; H. İnalcık An Economic and Social History of the Ottoman Empire, 1997.

HADI JORATI

J

Ja'far al-Sadiq (702–65)

Ja'far al-Sadiq, more formally named al-Sadiq Ja'far b. Muhammad b. 'Ali b. al-Husayn and regarded by the Imami Shi'is as the sixth of their 12 imams, was born in Medina and spent virtually his entire life there. His father, Muhammad al-Baqir (d. 735), was a great-grandson of 'Ali b. Abi Talib (d. 661), descended from Husayn b. 'Ali (d. 680), while his mother was a descendant in the male line of the first caliph, Abu Bakr (d. 634). Ja'far took no part in the political upheavals of his day. When his paternal uncle Zayd b. 'Ali (d. 740) rose against the Umayyads in 740, Ja'far refused to join him, and when Ja'far was offered the leadership of the Muslim community at the time of the Abbasid victory, he reportedly declined. In 762, he refrained from participating in the revolt against the Abbasid caliph Abu Ja'far al-Mansur (d. 775) that was led by another prominent 'Alid, Muhammad al-Nafs al-Zakiyya (d. 762). Following the suppression of this revolt, Ja'far was summoned to the caliph's court but was not harmed. He died three years later in Medina. Reports that he had been poisoned by order of Mansur are probably false. Disagreements as to who was to succeed him led to splits among his followers and marked the beginning of the Isma'ili sect.

As a scholar and traditionalist, Ja'far in his own lifetime was already held in high esteem and not only by Shi'is; both Abu Hanifa (d. 767) and Malik b. Anas (d. 795), the eponymous founders of the Hanafi and Maliki legal schools respectively, are said to have studied with him, and he often appears in chains of transmission in Sunni works of hadith. Non-Shi'is do not, however, regard him as an imam, but only as a distinguished jurist and transmitter. Deeply learned in religious law, Ja'far also is said to have been well versed in occult sciences such as astrology and alchemy. Various writings are ascribed to him, including a commentary on the Qur'an, though they are of dubious authenticity. Many of his Shi'i followers were residents of the city of Kufa, who would visit him during the pilgrimage.

Ja'far is often portrayed as playing a leading role in the growth of Imami law, known as "the Ja'fari legal school (madhhab)." Much of Imami law is based on countless utterances, directives, and decisions attributed to him (and in part to his father). These were set down by his disciples in written form.

The major components of the Imami doctrine of the imamate are said to have been in place by Ja'far's time, and Ja'far (or some of his disciples) may well have been instrumental in giving them shape. At the center of the doctrine stands the principle of loyalty (walāya) to an imam who is a descendant of 'Ali and his wife Fatima (the Prophet's daughter). Adherence to this principle is considered a foundation of faith, and the Imami credo includes, in addition to the Sunni formula "There is no deity but God, and Muhammad is His messenger," the declaration "'Alī walī Allāh" ('Ali is the beloved of God). The universe cannot exist without an imam. He is the axis of creation and the gate to God; recognition of the imam is a prerequisite for salvation. At a given moment, there can only be one active imam, though his successor may be at his side as a silent (ṣāmit) imam. 'Ali's appointment as the Prophet's successor was announced on various occasions, most significantly at Ghadir Khumm, during Muhammad's return to Medina from his last pilgrimage. 'Ali's rights were usurped by the first three caliphs, who are therefore regarded as sinners; so too are those among the Prophet's companions who supported these caliphs. The imamate passed from 'Ali via his son Hasan to Hasan's younger brother Husayn and is handed down among descendants of the latter. The identity of the imams is divinely determined and is confirmed by both explicit designation (naṣṣ) and the testament (waṣiyya) of the previous imam (or, in 'Ali's case, of the Prophet). The imams' position of leadership is also based on their unique characteristics, notably their possession of special knowledge ('ilm). This knowledge derives from four major sources: oral transmission from one imam to the next, transmission by heredity, transmission by inspiration, and sacred books that are unknown to ordinary mortals. The sources offer differing descriptions of the nature and extent of the imam's knowledge: according to some accounts, the imam has perfect mastery of the Qur'an and hadith. Elsewhere, he is also said to be endowed with supernatural knowledge (such as knowledge of the future and of all languages) and an understanding of the esoteric meaning of the Prophet's teaching. There is general agreement that the imam is divinely protected against error (ma'ṣūm) and is thus an infallible guide to Islamic law and doctrine.

The belief that Muhammad was the seal (i.e., the last) of the prophets is common to Imamis and Sunnis; but in contrast to the latter, the Imamis in their law give the imam a status identical to that of the Prophet. In other words, while both Sunnis and Imamis regard the Prophet's utterances and actions as the second source of Islamic law (after the Qur'an), the Imamis add to this source the utterances and actions of the imams. In fact, the number of sayings in Imami literature attributed to the various imams, and especially to Ja'far, exceeds by far the number of sayings attributed to the Prophet.

In line with Ja'far's policy of quietism, he advocated the principle of taqiyya (concealment of one's beliefs in times of danger), making it an article of Imami faith. This principle helped to preserve the Imami community in a hostile environment. Ja'far kept in check the messianic aspirations of some of his adherents and reportedly dissociated from the religious beliefs of the extremist Shi'is (ghulāt), which included veneration of the imams to the point of deification. He is credited with a decisive role in transforming the figure of the imam from an activist political leader to an apolitical spiritual authority.

See also Abbasids (750–1258); Abu Hanifa (699–767); 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); dissimulation; hadith; imamate; Isma'ilis; quietism and activism; Shi'ism

Further Reading

Mohammad Ali Amir-Moezzi, The Divine Guide in Early Shi'ism, 1994; Patricia Crone, Medieval Islamic Political Thought, 2004; Farhad Daftary, The Ismā'īlīs: Their History and Doctrines, 2nd ed., 2007; Heinz Halm, Shi'a Islam: From Religion to Revolution, 1997; Etan Kohlberg, Belief and Law in Imāmī Shī'ism, 1991; Hossein Modarressi, Crisis and Consolidation in the Formative Period of Shi'ite Islam, 1993; Moojan Momen, An Introduction to Shi'i Islam, 1985; Muhammad Qasim Zaman, Religion and Politics under the Early 'Abbāsids, 1997.

ETAN KOHLBERG

jāhiliyya

The word jāhiliyya is commonly translated as "age of ignorance" and applied to the century or so in west-central Arabian history prior to the mission of the Prophet Muhammad. The primary meaning of the root j-h-l (from which jāhiliyya is derived) at that time, however, was not usually mere ignorance but the tendency to go to extremes of behavior, whether in violence, revenge, boasting, drinking, or even generosity, and was sometimes considered a virtue. In the Qur'an, the root j-h-l may mean either excessive behavior or simple ignorance, and it is never a virtue. The word jāhiliyya appears four times in the Qur'an and involves opposition to God arising apparently from moral excess. In Qur'an 48:26, we read of the "fierce arrogance of jāhiliyya" in contrast to the "self-restraint (taqwā)" imposed on the Muslims and in 3:154 of people "wrongly suspicious of God with a jāhiliyya suspicion," while 33:33 admonishes the wives of the Prophet not to "make a display of yourselves in the manner of the first jāhiliyya." In 5:50, we read, "Do they seek a jāhiliyya judgment but who can give better judgment than God?" Here the reference appears to be a refusal to follow God's commands.

These passages illustrate some of the main contrasts between the values of jāhiliyya and those of the Qur'an. Also, the jāhilī Arabs recognized Allah as a remote creator but usually turned to other deities closer at hand, something the Qur'an calls shirk, association of other beings with God, and treats as the worst of sins, since only God is to be obeyed and worshipped. The pagan Arabs were marked by a spirit of independence and self-sufficiency in relation both to gods and other humans, rejecting the idea of an afterlife and seeing themselves as subject only to a rather impersonal fate, while the Qur'an inculcates an attitude of submission to God and dependence on Him and promises a heavenly reward. The Qur'an calls for moderation and removes the excessive element from jāhilī values such as nobility, loyalty, courage, fortitude, revenge, and generosity, and it moderates discriminations relating to class and gender.

While the word jāhiliyya in the Qur'an refers primarily to a moral condition, it has come to refer to an epoch in history, probably because pagan Arab society soon ceased to exist although some of its traits persisted. In the hadith collection of Bukhari (d. 870), jāhiliyya is almost always a past epoch, as, for example, "The best people in the jāhiliyya are the best in Islam, if they have understanding." Jāhiliyya has sometimes been extended to include the time before earlier prophets or the period between the lives of Jesus and Muhammad.

In spite of this, Muslims have always been aware that jāhiliyya characteristics can be found among them, even after the coming of Islam. Muhammad in a hadith says to one his followers, "Within you is jāhiliyya." Even more forcefully in a Shi'i hadith, he says, "Whosoever of my community dies and does not have an imam from among my successors, has died the death of the jāhiliyya." Indeed, the early centuries of Islamic cultural history can be interpreted in terms of a struggle between the older jāhiliyya orientation, which did not disappear immediately, and the newer Islamic orientation.

In later times, Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) viewed, in effect, the pre-Islamic customs continuing among Muslims of his time as a kind of jāhiliyya. Ibn 'Abd al-Wahhab (1703–92) and his followers perceived many of their fellow Muslims as living in jāhiliyya.

In modern times, Muhammad 'Abduh (1849–1905) and Rashid Rida (1865–1935) have compared aspects of their societies with aspects of jāhilī society. Commenting on Qur'an 5:50, they state that some nominal Muslims of their time are "more corrupt in their religion and morals than those concerning whom these verses were revealed." A. Yusuf 'Ali (d. 1953), whose English translation of the Qur'an is one of the best known, says in his commentary on the same verse in his translation of the Qur'an, "The Days of Ignorance were the days of tribalism, feuds, and selfish accentuation of differences in man. Those days are not really yet over. It is the mission of Islam to take us away from that false mental attitude."

In a more forceful vein, Mawdudi (1903–79) in India and then Pakistan and Abul Hasan Nadwi (1914–99) in India have argued that jāhiliyya is found in the West and has infected Muslim societies, though without making them completely jāhilī. Mawdudi defined jāhiliyya as any conduct that goes against Islamic thinking, culture, or morality and claimed that Muslim society has long been a mixture of jāhiliyya and Islam.

Most radical has been the Egyptian Sayyid Qutb (1906–66) in some of his later writings. For him, a jāhilī society is any society that does not follow God's guidance in all areas of its life. Such societies worship human beings instead of God and are inevitably unjust, inhumane, and uncivilized. Jāhiliyya is not just a moral stance but a dynamic and organic power always fighting against Islam, as strong in modern times as in Muhammad's time, if not stronger. There is no room for compromise, and society cannot be partly jāhilī and partly Muslim. He considered all societies in the world at his time jāhilī, including all so-called Muslim societies. Given the violent nature of jāhiliyya and its all-encompassing hold on the world, it can only be replaced by revolutionary violence. These ideas contributed to his execution by the Egyptian government in 1966 and have inspired militants since his death, although for them the concept of takfīr (declaring someone an unbeliever and therefore liable to be killed) appears to have been more important than that of jāhiliyya.

In any case, Qutb and others have clearly updated the concept of jāhiliyya so that it now refers in the first instance less to the excessive behavior of the old pagan Arabs than to the materialism and secularism of modern societies.

See also ʿAbduh, Muhammad (1849–1905); fundamentalism; Ibn ʿAbd al-Wahhab, Muhammad (1703–92); Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328); Qur'an; revolutions; Salafis; Sayyid Qutb (1906–66)

Further Reading

Ignaz Goldziher, Muslim Studies, vol. 1. Halle 1889–90, trans. C. R. Barber and S. M. Stern, 1967; Toshihiko Izutsu, Ethico-Religious Concepts in the Quran, 1966; Reynold A. Nicholson, A Literary History of the Arabs, 1907 (repr. 1969); Sayyid Qutb, Milestones (Maʿalim fi al-Tariq), translated by S. Badrul Hasan, 1978; Idem, Milestones, translated by M. M. Siddiqui, 1990; William E. Shepard, "Sayyid Qutb's Doctrine of Jahiliyya," International Journal of Middle East Studies 35, no. 4 (2003).

WILLIAM E. SHEPARD

Jalal Al-i Ahmad (1923–69)

Jalal Al-i Ahmad is an intellectual and novelist famed for his pioneering role in the formulation of ideas that culminated in the Islamic Revolution in Iran. Born in Tehran into a clerical family and originally destined for a clerical career, he studied Persian literature but abandoned his studies to work for the Tudeh (communist) Party. After three or four years, he left the Tudeh Party because of its dependence on the Soviet Union and took to writing novels and short stories, translating French literature and philosophy into Persian, and creating ethnographic descriptions of the remote, rural regions of Iran. In the last years of his life, he developed a nativist ideology, which was influenced by the German philosopher Martin Heidegger, German romanticism, French existentialism, engagé literature (socially responsible or engaged writing), and anticolonialist writers such as Frantz Fanon. A reaction to government policies, which had weakened the clergy and traditional institutions, his nativism went hand in hand with a return to Islamic ideals, which were not so much religious as political and social.

Al-i Ahmad's most important book is Gharbzadagi (Weststruckness), a highly influential work in which he picks up an expression originally coined as a philosophical term by Ahmad Fardid, a follower of Heidegger, as a name for the destructive influence of the West, which has reduced the East to servitude and disorder by means of machines. Combative and rhetorical in tone, Gharbzadagi traces the roots of the West's attack and alleged conspiracies to the period of the Crusades and even earlier, claiming that the Christian West conspired with the Turks of Transoxiana and again with the Mongols to bring about their attack on the Islamic world. Gharbzadagi interprets the travels of Marco Polo and the visits of European travelers to the Safavid court in Isfahan in the same manner. He saw the West as having repeatedly broken up "the Islamic collectivity," most recently by the partition of the Ottoman state: Muslim/Eastern man would remain "West-struck" as long as he was a consumer of Western products and an imitator of Western culture and politics. According to Al-i Ahmad, the Muslims must try to build machines for themselves, adapting them to their indigenous, native circumstances, without becoming like the machine-dependent Westerners. Instead, they should pay attention to India, Japan, or Israel, which he briefly visited and saw as a good example of how tradition and religion could be used to build a new society. He changed his view in response to clerical criticism and the 1967 Six Day War.

Al-i Ahmad developed the same idea in On the Services and Treasons of the Intellectuals, in which he attacked Iranian and other Muslim intellectuals for their Western orientation and prepared the ground for the legitimization of Islamic discourse by charging them with estrangement from their own society. In Lost in the Crowd, an account of his pilgrimage, he also affirmed his connection with traditional Islamic religion.

Despite his emphasis on Islam, Al-i Ahmad's language and expressions have an intellectual and nonreligious character, and thus one cannot compare him with the modern Muslim reformists and renewers in the Islamic world. He was more critical of the West and Westernization but was himself influenced by the West and Western thinkers. His concern is with inauthenticity, identity, and autonomy; this was why he turned to tradition, the better part of which naturally had a religious character. In practice, he became a link between the secular and the religious intellectuals.

The expression gharbzādagī quickly caught on among opponents of the Iranian regime, and copies of the book, which had been outlawed, passed from hand to hand. Ayatollah Ruhollah Khomeini, whom Al-i Ahmad visited in Qum, had a copy of the book and used the expression gharbzādagī in the revolutionary and postrevolutionary phase to condemn the situation in Iran in the period of the shah. Al-i Ahmad also visited ʿAli Shariʿati in Mashhad, and Shariʿati mixed his ideas with Shi'i history and Islamic concepts after his death, turning them into a revolutionary ideology. Al-i Ahmad's premature death, which some of his friends wrongly pinned on the state by way of antigovernment propaganda, transformed him into the intellectual hero of Iran. After the victory of the Islamic Revolution, his popularity among secular intellectuals waned in proportion to the esteem he gained among the clerical leaders.

See also Iran; Shari'ati, 'Ali (1933–77)

Further Reading

M. Boroujerdi, Iranian Intellectuals and the West, 1996; H. Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundation of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, 2006; A. Gheissari, Iranian Intellectuals in the Twentieth Century, 1998; M. C. Hillman, trans., Iranian Society: An Anthology of Writings by Jalal Al-e Ahmad, 1982; Jalal Al-e Ahmad, Gharbzadegi: Weststruckness, translated by J. Green and A. Alizadeh, 1982; Idem, Lost in the Crowd, translated by J. Green et al., 1985; Idem, "The Mobilization of Iran," Literature, East and West 20 (1976); Idem, Occidentosis, translated by R. Campbell, 1984; A. Mirsepassi, Intellectual Discourse and the Politics of Modernization: Negotiating Modernity in Iran, 2000.

MASOUD JAFARI JAZI

Jama'at-i Islami

Jama'at-i Islami is a political party formed by Mawdudi in India in 1941. Mawdudi had outlined the need for "a pious party" (sālih jamā'at) in the context of the struggle for independence from British colonial rule in India. He made his move because he believed none of the existing parties in the prevailing political landscape were truly Islamic. For him, pure Islam entailed establishing a state based on the shari'a. The constitution of the Jama'at-i Islami (Islamic Party) described its objective as the establishment of hukūmat-i ilāhiyya (divine government). In the 1950s, the terminology was changed to iqāmat-i dīn (the establishment of religion). Mawdudi ruled that a person could become a member (rukn) of the Jama'at only if he understood the "full meaning" of tawhīd, the doctrine that there is only one God. Muslims would not be admitted into the party simply because they were born as Muslim. Mawdudi believed that the Jama'at was the only party to have grasped the full meaning of the Muslim profession of faith ("There is no god but God and Muhammad is His messenger"). He argued that a "proper Muslim" (aṣīl musalmān) had no option but to join the Jama'at or stand condemned as the Jews who had rejected Islam at the time of the Prophet Muhammad. In Mawdudi's view, there was no third way. Indeed, he argued that it would be akin to apostasy for someone to leave the Jama'at. The constitution of the Jama'at made it obligatory for its members to boycott nearly every key institution of the secular state: the legislative assembly, the judiciary assembly, the army, the banking industry, and so on. To participate in the affairs of such a state was forbidden (harām), because its foundation was human rather than divine sovereignty. Mawdudi also urged his party members to sever social ties with "transgressors" (*fāsiq*īn), including those associated with Muslim institutions such as the Aligarh Muslim University. Yet the Jama'at sometimes invited non-Muslims to its open sessions. The Hindu Indian leader Mohandas Gandhi, for instance, is known to have participated in its regional meeting in Patna, the capital of the state of Bihar, in April 1947.

Mawdudi and the Jama'at were ambivalent about the formation of an independent Muslim state, making it their goal to establish Islam in a united India after the departure of the British. After the partition of India and the formation of Pakistan in 1947, however, Mawdudi shifted his headquarters to Pakistan and embarked on a program to shape the newly founded state into an Islamic state. The branches of the Jama'at in India and later in Bangladesh have developed independently of each other over the years.

According to Mawdudi, it was not simply its goal that set the Jama'at apart from other Muslim parties. He claimed that its structure and workings were "exactly like those of the party Muhammad had established in the beginning." He described processions, flags, sloganeering, uniforms, resolutions, addresses, emotional writings, and so on—mobilizing tools central to most parties—as poison. Notwithstanding his self-image and claims, however, his party was modeled on a Leninist approach, with the Jama'at conceived as a vanguard of pious Muslims leading to the inauguration of an Islamic revolution. Mawdudi was perhaps the first thinker in South Asia to open the membership of his party to women on the basis of the Qur'an and hadith. The Jama'at's constitution even urged women to "disobey the commands of their husbands and guardians if such commands were sins against Allah." But granting membership to women did not mean that women enjoyed the same rights as men. He held that it would be catastrophic if a woman became a ruler; initially, he did not allow women to vote in the elections.

The Jama'at eventually revised many of its positions. Mawdudi even came to support the candidacy of a woman, Fatimah Jinnah, in the Pakistani presidential elections in the mid-1960s. In Pakistan, Jama'at women now not only vote but also occasionally contest elections. In India, the Jama'at's consultative assembly, the shūrā, discussed in 1999 the problem of the absence of women in Jama'at leadership (in 2000, out of 4,776 members, only 303 were women). It proposed that the Jama'at president be empowered to nominate women to assume key roles. As of 2011, there still was no woman in the shūrā, but the proposal itself was significant. Similarly, the Jama'at has considerably toned down its general criteria for membership. Even so, the number of core members (arkān) in the Jama'at has not reached six digits in Bangladesh, India, or Pakistan, nor has the party won elections that would enable it to form its own government. In Bangladesh and Pakistan, the Jama'at has contested elections but is still far from a mainstream political force. In Bangladesh's parliamentary elections of 1991, 1996, and 2001, the Jama'at won 18, 3, and 17 seats, respectively. In Pakistan's national elections of 1988, 1990, 1993, the Jama'at won 7, 8, and 3 seats, respectively (it boycotted the elections of 1997 and 2008). Electorally, student wings of the Jama'at on college campuses have performed better than the parent party. In Pakistan and Bangladesh, the Jama'at's student wings exercise considerable influence and are known to have resorted to force and violence to meet their objectives. In contrast, the Jama'at enjoys a rather less tarnished image. Compared to mainstream parties, the Jama'at members and leaders are often seen, even by their opponents, as less corrupt and more dedicated to their cause.

The 1990 national elections in Pakistan were remarkable in many ways. Seeking to transform itself into a popular party, the Jama'at-i Islami under the leadership of Qazi Hussain Ahmad tried for the first time to use the repertoire of mass mobilization: posters, billboards, sloganeering, mass rallies, processions, music videos, and in some accounts, even dances to the tunes of popular numbers. It also floated a sister organization, Pasban (protector), the membership of which was open to a broad range of Muslims, including those who did not strictly adhere to the provisions of the shari'a. Yet as in the past, the Jama'at won only a few seats. The 1990 elections demonstrated nonetheless that the Jama'at was no longer exclusively the party of the pious Muslims or averse to using the modern repertoire of politics—things it had previously condemned as pagan ignorance (jāhiliyya).

See also fundamentalism; India; Mawdudi, Abul al-A'la (1903–79); Pakistan

Further Reading

Irfan Ahmad, "Cracks in the 'Mightiest Fortress': Jamaat-e-Islami's Changing Discourse on Women," Modern Asian Studies 42, nos. 2 and 3 (2008): 549–75; Idem, Islamism and Democracy in India: The Transformation of the Jamaat-e-Islami in India, 2009; Syed Vali Reza Nasr, The Vanguard of Islamic Revolution: The Jamaat-e-Islami of Pakistan, 1994; Elora Shehabuddin, "Jamaat-i-Islami in Bangladesh: Women, Democracy and the Transformation of Islamist Politics," Modern Asian Studies 42, nos. 2 and 3 (2008): 577–603.

IRFAN AHMAD

Jerusalem

The city of Jerusalem (in Arabic al-Quds, or "the Holy") is often ranked third, after Mecca and Medina, among the holiest sites in Islam. Early Islamic sources call Jerusalem the "navel of the Earth" (surrat al-ard), a reference to its cosmological centrality, and the final "place of congregation and resurrection" (ard al-mahshar wal-manshar) on Judgment Day. The Rock of Jerusalem at the summit of Mount Moriah is portrayed as a portal to paradise. One of the earliest Arabic names for Jerusalem, Bayt al-Maqdis, or "House of Holiness," is often interpreted as a reference to the temple built by Solomon at the site of the Rock of Jerusalem, associating Muslim reverence for Jerusalem with that of Jews and Christians. Jerusalem is known to Muslims as the first of the two qiblas, or prayer directions, referring to the tradition that Muhammad directed his followers in Medina to pray toward Jerusalem before changing the qibla to Mecca. It is also celebrated as the destination of the Prophet's "night journey," referring to the tradition that God transported Muhammad in his sleep from Mecca to Jerusalem and then to heaven to meet with earlier prophets, including Abraham, Moses, and Jesus.

Jerusalem was brought under Muslim control ca. 638. The Umayyad caliphs developed Jerusalem as a center of Muslim worship, most notably with the construction of the Dome of the Rock in 691 during the reign of 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwan. The reasons for the erection of this unprecedented example of Islamic monumental architecture have been debated extensively. A minority has argued that it was a bid to shift the pilgrimage (hajj) from Mecca to Jerusalem in response to 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr's Hijaz-based rebellion against Umayyad rule. While Umayyad architectural patronage in Jerusalem may have had political motivations, it seems unlikely that Jerusalem was ever intended to supersede Mecca as a destination for pilgrimage. Others have seen the Dome of the Rock as a symbolic assertion of the righteousness of Islam in a city still dominated by Christian places of worship. Still others have interpreted 'Abd al-Malik's construction project as a pious attempt to restore a house of worship to the site of Solomon's temple.

Even though Jerusalem never acted as a seat of government under Muslim rule, the maintenance of its religious sites by political leaders was generally expected. Islamic sources from the 11th century through the Ottoman period include "pilgrimage guides" to the city and suggest that the practice of combining a visit to Jerusalem with the hajj to Mecca was widespread. When Jerusalem was lost to the Crusaders in 1099, demands for the restoration of Muslim rule in the city and the access to holy places it ensured were directed to the Abbasid caliph in Baghdad. The prestige gained by Muslim military commander Salah al-Din (Saladin) after his reconquest of Jerusalem in 1187 is reflected in the reams of panegyric composed in his honor and the legitimacy conferred upon the Ayyubid dynasty he founded in Egypt and Syria. The Mamluk and later Ottoman rulers of Jerusalem continued the practice of investing in the city's infrastructure and patronizing its religious architecture.

Jerusalem remained under Ottoman rule until the end of World War I, when it was made the capital of the British Mandate for Palestine. In the aftermath of the 1948 Arab-Israeli War, Jerusalem was divided in half; West Jerusalem was claimed as the capital of the new state of Israel, and East Jerusalem, along with the rest of the West Bank, was controlled by the Jordanian monarch. With its military occupation of the West Bank in the Six Day War of 1967, Israel annexed East Jerusalem. Since then, the question of control over and access to the area known to Muslims as "the Noble Sanctuary" (al-haram al-sharif)—which contains the Dome of the Rock, the Aqsa Mosque, and a number of other Islamic holy sites but is also revered by Jews as the site of Solomon's temple—has been highly charged. Although Palestinians seek to make East Jerusalem the capital of an independent Palestinian state, it remains under Israeli sovereignty.

See also Crusades; Muhammad (570–632); pilgrimage; Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Kamil J. Asali, ed., Jerusalem in History, 1989; Sylvia Auld and Robert Hillenbrand, eds., Ottoman Jerusalem: The Living City, 1517–1917, 2000; Michael Burgoyne and D. S. Richards, Mamluk Jerusalem, 1987; Amikam Elad, Medieval Jerusalem and Islamic Worship, 1995; Oleg Grabar, The Dome of the Rock, 2006; F. E. Peters, Jerusalem, 1985.

ZAYDE ANTRIM

jihad

Literally meaning "struggle," jihad may be associated with almost any activity by which Muslims attempt to bring personal and social life into a pattern of conformity with the guidance of God. Nevertheless, early in the development of Islam, jihad came to be associated particularly with fighting or making war "in the path of God." In thinking about jihad, then, we may learn a great deal through a focus on war.

Muslims have written about war in a variety of genres. A.K.S. Lambton once remarked that philosophical treatises, the Mirrors for Princes compiled by court officials such as Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092) who were interested in communicating the lessons of statecraft, and the compendia of juridical opinions collected in the schools devoted to shari'a reasoning constitute three distinctive and important styles of Muslim political writing. One could speak similarly about war. For political thought, legitimation is the great issue: what form of order best coheres with the good, with practical wisdom, or with the guidance of God? And because experience indicates that establishing and maintaining political order often involves the use of military force, discussions of war ordinarily follow. A comparison of world civilizations shows that questions like "When is war justified?" "Who decides?" and "How is war to be conducted?" are typically tied to notions about the purpose of politics and the distribution of power: both are related to ideas about the nature and destiny of human beings, so religion comes into the mix as well.

In tying religion, politics, and war together, Muslims are hardly unique. They continue to speak and write in the distinctive ways previously mentioned. Indeed, Lambton's list of three types of writing is probably too short. For the fullest possible exposition of Muslim thought about war, one would need to consult the treatises (adab) of men of letters like Jahiz (d. 868 or 869) or the histories compiled by Tabari (d. 923) and others. Works of fiction would have their place in such a survey, as would poetic texts.

Nevertheless, one can speak of the relative importance of certain forms. The compendia of opinions or responses to questions by experts in the practice of shari'a reasoning constitute a source of inestimable importance for understanding the Islamic experience of war. This is true because the shari'a (i.e., the "path" or way of living most conducive to human happiness in this world and the next) suggests a focus on the questions of when, who, and how outlined earlier. In addition, the practice of shari'a reasoning, in the sense of a transgenerational argument about the guidance of God, goes to the heart of what it means to submit or to bring oneself and one's world into a pattern of behavior consistent with the purposes of the Creator. The attempt to relate the "sources of comprehension" (i.e., the Qur'an, the sunna of the Prophet, and the consensual precedents set by recognized experts) to contemporary situations (by means of reasoning, especially analogy) is perhaps the most characteristic attempt to think about war in an Islamic "voice." As such, changes in ahkām al-jihād (the judgments pertaining to armed struggle) across the generations reflect the changing fortunes and political conditions of Muslims, thus opening the door to wider areas of Muslim experience.

Foundational Motifs

In speaking about shari'a discourse about war, it is useful to be aware of the following issues: (1) the story of Muhammad and his Companions, (2) theological ideas, and (3) accounts of the development of Islam across the centuries.

The Story of Muhammad

While the historical accuracy of traditional biographies of Muhammad may be in question, the outline of the story Muslims tell about the struggles of the Prophet and his Companions are not. Once the Prophet began his public ministry, the primary response in Mecca was resistance. The small community that gathered around Muhammad experienced discrimination and persecution. When this rose to the level of physical abuse, some of the Prophet's Companions urged retaliation. According to the story told by Muslims through the centuries, Muhammad refused, saying that he had been given an order only to preach.

This was not the final word, of course. Sometime during the negotiations by which Muhammad and his community moved to Medina, God sent the verses recorded in Qur'an 22:39–40: "Those who have been attacked are permitted to take up arms because they have been wronged. God has the power to help them; those who have been driven unjustly from their homes only for saying 'Our Lord is God.' If God did not repel some people by means of others, many monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, where God's name is much invoked, would have been destroyed." The clear import of this text is that the Muslims now had different orders. In Medina, Muhammad added the roles of military commander and statesman to his preaching in the effort to achieve security for the believers.

the Jama'at won 18, 3, and 17 seats, respectively. In Pakistan's national elections of 1988, 1990, 1993, the Jama'at won 7, 8, and 3 seats, respectively (it boycotted the elections of 1997 and 2008). Electorally, student wings of the Jama'at on college campuses have performed better than the parent party. In Pakistan and Bangladesh, the Jama'at's student wings exercise considerable influence and are known to have resorted to force and violence to meet their objectives. In contrast, the Jama'at enjoys a rather less tarnished image. Compared to mainstream parties, the Jama'at members and leaders are often seen, even by their opponents, as less corrupt and more dedicated to their cause.

The 1990 national elections in Pakistan were remarkable in many ways. Seeking to transform itself into a popular party, the Jama'at-i Islami under the leadership of Qazi Hussain Ahmad tried for the first time to use the repertoire of mass mobilization: posters, billboards, sloganeering, mass rallies, processions, music videos, and in some accounts, even dances to the tunes of popular numbers. It also floated a sister organization, Pasban (protector), the membership of which was open to a broad range of Muslims, including those who did not strictly adhere to the provisions of the shari'a. Yet as in the past, the Jama'at won only a few seats. The 1990 elections demonstrated nonetheless that the Jama'at was no longer exclusively the party of the pious Muslims or averse to using the modern repertoire of politics—things it had previously condemned as pagan ignorance (jāhiliyya).

See also fundamentalism; India; Mawdudi, Abul al-A'la (1903–79); Pakistan

Further Reading

Irfan Ahmad, "Cracks in the 'Mightiest Fortress': Jamaat-e-Islami's Changing Discourse on Women," Modern Asian Studies 42, nos. 2 and 3 (2008): 549–75; Idem, Islamism and Democracy in India: The Transformation of the Jamaat-e-Islami in India, 2009; Syed Vali Reza Nasr, The Vanguard of Islamic Revolution: The Jamaat-e-Islami of Pakistan, 1994; Elora Shehabuddin, "Jamaat-i-Islami in Bangladesh: Women, Democracy and the Transformation of Islamist Politics," Modern Asian Studies 42, nos. 2 and 3 (2008): 577–603.

IRFAN AHMAD

Jerusalem

The city of Jerusalem (in Arabic al-Quds, or "the Holy") is often ranked third, after Mecca and Medina, among the holiest sites in Islam. Early Islamic sources call Jerusalem the "navel of the Earth" (surrat al-ard), a reference to its cosmological centrality, and the final "place of congregation and resurrection" (ard al-mahshar wal-manshar) on Judgment Day. The Rock of Jerusalem at the summit of Mount Moriah is portrayed as a portal to paradise. One of the earliest Arabic names for Jerusalem, Bayt al-Maqdis, or "House of Holiness," is often interpreted as a reference to the temple built by Solomon at the site of the Rock of Jerusalem, associating Muslim reverence for Jerusalem with that of Jews and Christians. Jerusalem is known to Muslims as the first of the two qiblas, or prayer directions, referring to the tradition that Muhammad directed his followers in Medina to pray toward Jerusalem before changing the qibla to Mecca. It is also celebrated as the destination of the Prophet's "night journey," referring to the tradition that God transported Muhammad in his sleep from Mecca to Jerusalem and then to heaven to meet with earlier prophets, including Abraham, Moses, and Jesus.

Jerusalem was brought under Muslim control ca. 638. The Umayyad caliphs developed Jerusalem as a center of Muslim worship, most notably with the construction of the Dome of the Rock in 691 during the reign of 'Abd al-Malik b. Marwan. The reasons for the erection of this unprecedented example of Islamic monumental architecture have been debated extensively. A minority has argued that it was a bid to shift the pilgrimage (hajj) from Mecca to Jerusalem in response to 'Abdallah b. al-Zubayr's Hijaz-based rebellion against Umayyad rule. While Umayyad architectural patronage in Jerusalem may have had political motivations, it seems unlikely that Jerusalem was ever intended to supersede Mecca as a destination for pilgrimage. Others have seen the Dome of the Rock as a symbolic assertion of the righteousness of Islam in a city still dominated by Christian places of worship. Still others have interpreted 'Abd al-Malik's construction project as a pious attempt to restore a house of worship to the site of Solomon's temple.

Even though Jerusalem never acted as a seat of government under Muslim rule, the maintenance of its religious sites by political leaders was generally expected. Islamic sources from the 11th century through the Ottoman period include "pilgrimage guides" to the city and suggest that the practice of combining a visit to Jerusalem with the hajj to Mecca was widespread. When Jerusalem was lost to the Crusaders in 1099, demands for the restoration of Muslim rule in the city and the access to holy places it ensured were directed to the Abbasid caliph in Baghdad. The prestige gained by Muslim military commander Salah al-Din (Saladin) after his reconquest of Jerusalem in 1187 is reflected in the reams of panegyric composed in his honor and the legitimacy conferred upon the Ayyubid dynasty he founded in Egypt and Syria. The Mamluk and later Ottoman rulers of Jerusalem continued the practice of investing in the city's infrastructure and patronizing its religious architecture.

Jerusalem remained under Ottoman rule until the end of World War I, when it was made the capital of the British Mandate for Palestine. In the aftermath of the 1948 Arab-Israeli War, Jerusalem was divided in half; West Jerusalem was claimed as the capital of the new state of Israel, and East Jerusalem, along with the rest of the West Bank, was controlled by the Jordanian monarch. With its military occupation of the West Bank in the Six Day War of 1967, Israel annexed East Jerusalem. Since then, the question of control over and access to the area known to Muslims as "the Noble Sanctuary" (al-haram al-sharif)—which contains the Dome of the Rock, the Aqsa Mosque, and a number of other Islamic holy sites but is also revered by Jews as the site of Solomon's temple—has been highly charged. Although Palestinians seek to make East Jerusalem the capital of an independent Palestinian state, it remains under Israeli sovereignty.

See also Crusades; Muhammad (570–632); pilgrimage; Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Kamil J. Asali, ed., Jerusalem in History, 1989; Sylvia Auld and Robert Hillenbrand, eds., Ottoman Jerusalem: The Living City, 1517–1917, 2000; Michael Burgoyne and D. S. Richards, Mamluk Jerusalem, 1987; Amikam Elad, Medieval Jerusalem and Islamic Worship, 1995; Oleg Grabar, The Dome of the Rock, 2006; F. E. Peters, Jerusalem, 1985.

ZAYDE ANTRIM

jihad

Literally meaning "struggle," jihad may be associated with almost any activity by which Muslims attempt to bring personal and social life into a pattern of conformity with the guidance of God. Nevertheless, early in the development of Islam, jihad came to be associated particularly with fighting or making war "in the path of God." In thinking about jihad, then, we may learn a great deal through a focus on war.

Muslims have written about war in a variety of genres. A.K.S. Lambton once remarked that philosophical treatises, the Mirrors for Princes compiled by court officials such as Nizam al-Mulk (d. 1092) who were interested in communicating the lessons of statecraft, and the compendia of juridical opinions collected in the schools devoted to shari'a reasoning constitute three distinctive and important styles of Muslim political writing. One could speak similarly about war. For political thought, legitimation is the great issue: what form of order best coheres with the good, with practical wisdom, or with the guidance of God? And because experience indicates that establishing and maintaining political order often involves the use of military force, discussions of war ordinarily follow. A comparison of world civilizations shows that questions like "When is war justified?" "Who decides?" and "How is war to be conducted?" are typically tied to notions about the purpose of politics and the distribution of power: both are related to ideas about the nature and destiny of human beings, so religion comes into the mix as well.

In tying religion, politics, and war together, Muslims are hardly unique. They continue to speak and write in the distinctive ways previously mentioned. Indeed, Lambton's list of three types of writing is probably too short. For the fullest possible exposition of Muslim thought about war, one would need to consult the treatises (adab) of men of letters like Jahiz (d. 868 or 869) or the histories compiled by Tabari (d. 923) and others. Works of fiction would have their place in such a survey, as would poetic texts.

Nevertheless, one can speak of the relative importance of certain forms. The compendia of opinions or responses to questions by experts in the practice of shari'a reasoning constitute a source of inestimable importance for understanding the Islamic experience of war. This is true because the shari'a (i.e., the "path" or way of living most conducive to human happiness in this world and the next) suggests a focus on the questions of when, who, and how outlined earlier. In addition, the practice of shari'a reasoning, in the sense of a transgenerational argument about the guidance of God, goes to the heart of what it means to submit or to bring oneself and one's world into a pattern of behavior consistent with the purposes of the Creator. The attempt to relate the "sources of comprehension" (i.e., the Qur'an, the sunna of the Prophet, and the consensual precedents set by recognized experts) to contemporary situations (by means of reasoning, especially analogy) is perhaps the most characteristic attempt to think about war in an Islamic "voice." As such, changes in ahkām al-jihād (the judgments pertaining to armed struggle) across the generations reflect the changing fortunes and political conditions of Muslims, thus opening the door to wider areas of Muslim experience.

Foundational Motifs

In speaking about shari'a discourse about war, it is useful to be aware of the following issues: (1) the story of Muhammad and his Companions, (2) theological ideas, and (3) accounts of the development of Islam across the centuries.

The Story of Muhammad

While the historical accuracy of traditional biographies of Muhammad may be in question, the outline of the story Muslims tell about the struggles of the Prophet and his Companions are not. Once the Prophet began his public ministry, the primary response in Mecca was resistance. The small community that gathered around Muhammad experienced discrimination and persecution. When this rose to the level of physical abuse, some of the Prophet's Companions urged retaliation. According to the story told by Muslims through the centuries, Muhammad refused, saying that he had been given an order only to preach.

This was not the final word, of course. Sometime during the negotiations by which Muhammad and his community moved to Medina, God sent the verses recorded in Qur'an 22:39–40: "Those who have been attacked are permitted to take up arms because they have been wronged. God has the power to help them; those who have been driven unjustly from their homes only for saying 'Our Lord is God.' If God did not repel some people by means of others, many monasteries, churches, synagogues, and mosques, where God's name is much invoked, would have been destroyed." The clear import of this text is that the Muslims now had different orders. In Medina, Muhammad added the roles of military commander and statesman to his preaching in the effort to achieve security for the believers.

As the story continues, we understand that the "permission" of Qur'an 22:39–40 evolves into the "destined" or "ordained" of Qur'an 2:216 ("Warfare is a thing written for you, though you do not like it") and the direct command of Qur'an 2:190–94 ("Fight those who are fighting you, but do not become aggressors"). In Qur'an 4:75, God challenges the believing community: "And why should you not fight in God's cause and for those oppressed . . . ?" In Qur'an 8:39, the order is to fight until God's cause succeeds, and in chapter 9, fighting against those who violate treaties or otherwise prove dishonorable is authorized "wherever you find them." The order of the verses is given in the story so that the intensity and expansiveness of the order to fight mirrors developments in the military and political struggle with unbelievers. When in the end the Muslims prevail, Muhammad proclaims that "Arabia is solidly for Islam." The narrative of struggle thus ends on a note of hope.

It also ends by reinforcing the message that runs throughout: from the Muslim point of view, the question is not whether the Muslims should go to war or not. Rather, the issue from beginning to end is obedience. When the Companions in Mecca urge retaliation as a means of justice against mistreatment, the response is negative, not because of any direct rebuttal or refutation of their appeal, but because of God's order. Similarly, when fighting is justified in connection with the migration to Medina, the decisive factor is the command of God. The emphasis on obedience suggests the ongoing importance of ascertaining God's directives. The development of the shari'a discourse on judgments pertaining to armed struggle provide a noteworthy attempt to address this issue.

The Natural Religion

This emphasis on obedience has its corollary in the notion that Muhammad's entire career constitutes a divine summons—a "calling" of humanity to the condition signified by islam, or "submission" to God. Whether by the "beautiful words" of preaching or the strong persuasion of military force, the point is to bring human behavior, both personal and social, into a pattern consistent with the guidance of God.

In this, the story of Muhammad and his Companions suggests a certain view of the nature and destiny of human beings. Qur'an 7:172–73 describes the primordial encounter between God and humanity: "When your Lord took out the offspring from the loins of the Children of Adam and made them bear witness about themselves, He said: 'Am I not your Lord?' And they replied, 'Yes, we bear witness.'" The text goes on to say that the establishment of this covenant means that, on the Day of the Resurrection, no human being will have an excuse. All are bound by the fact that human beings are creatures of God whose very purpose is to serve the divine will. In accepting this—that is, in submitting themselves to their Maker—human beings find happiness, purpose, and dignity. Those who reject the divine calling do harm to themselves. Their fights with one another mirror conflicts within themselves. They suffer in this life, and if they do not make things right, they will also suffer eternal punishment in the next.

The point here is that nothing in Muhammad's approach to unbelievers is an imposition on or violation of their rights. He is God's messenger, calling human beings to act in accordance with their true nature and thus their best interests. Like other messengers before him (most importantly, Moses and Jesus), Muhammad summons people to submit to, or obey, God. Even the strong persuasion of war should be seen in this light, with one important proviso. War may create a sphere of security for the practice of true religion. It may be used to enhance such security by bringing non-Muslims under the protection (dhimma) or "superintendence" of Muslims. But it should not be used to bring about faith in the sense of heartfelt acceptance of God's service. It should not because it cannot—in Islam, as in other faith traditions, unwilling faith is a contradiction in terms. The Prophet and his Companions are a blessing to humanity because they call everyone to live as God intended, according to the "natural" religion. And they give particular groups, with their individual members, as much of the blessing as possible. For those who believe, full participation in the community of Muslims leads to rewards in this world and the next. For those who cannot believe but are willing to accept Muslim governance, the protection of Muslims keeps them secure from the disobedience of others and limits their own errors.

Historical Development

The Prophet died in 632. According to tradition, he sent letters to the Byzantine, Sasanid, and Abyssinian rulers prior to his death and invited them to accept Islam. In this account, acceptance could mean profession of faith or the payment of tribute indicative of the kind of protection or superintendence already mentioned. Failing this, the Prophet's letter promised to put these rulers and their armies to the test of war.

Muslim accounts take this report to indicate Muhammad's plan to enlarge his ministry beyond the confines of the Arabian Peninsula. Whether or not such letters were sent, in the generations following the Prophet's death, Muslim armies conducted campaigns to establish Islam in most of the Middle East and North Africa. Eventually, Islam became the driving force behind a world civilization, with adherents in every part of the globe and with special influence in North Africa, Asia, and central and southern Europe.

Muslim tradition attributes many of that civilization's most characteristic patterns of political and military organization to the earliest period (632–61) and especially to the leadership of 'Umar b. al-Khattab (r. 634–44). Again, it matters little whether tradition matches historical fact on this point. Later generations would cite early practice as precedent for a form of governance dedicated to the notion that human beings should administer their affairs according to the guidance of God. In order to fulfill this ideal, Islam should be established as the religion of state. The ruler should be a Muslim and should consult with recognized specialists in the Qur'an and other approved sources in the formation of policy. There should be a clear distinction between those who profess Islam as a faith and those non-Muslims living under the protection of Islam. While both should enjoy basic rights, the former should be viewed as citizens of the first rank, and the latter should pay additional taxes, observe limits on the public expression of religion, and in general behave or be regulated in ways suggestive of the priority of Islam.

We have already noted the theological motifs suggestive of the view that the imposition of such patterns of governance ought to be considered a blessing. Limits on Jewish or Christian religious expression, for example, were construed as a way of "reminding" or "recalling" members of these communities to the true or natural religion. According to this line of thinking, Moses had not founded a religion called "Judaism" any more than Jesus founded "Christianity." Both had proclaimed Islam. Where contradictions between the practice of Jews or Christians and that of Muslims became manifest, the judgment of Muslim tradition would be that the former had corrupted the preaching of the prophets. Muslim protection thus provided a kind of oversight or superintendence by which corruption could be contained.

It is in connection with these theological views that we may understand the insistence of Muslim tradition that the expansion brought about by Muslim armies was not precisely a matter of "conquest." Muslim thinking about war proceeded on the assumption that this expansion was a matter of "opening" or "liberating" territory in order to create opportunities for human beings to hear the call to practice Islam. A state led by a Jewish or Christian (or some other non-Muslim) establishment could be viewed as tyrannical by definition or, at the very least, not the best for human welfare. Given this assumption, experts in shari'a reasoning would develop their teaching on war in connection with a concern for the relations between the "territory of war" and the "territory of Islam."

Expansion of Islamic governance and of the Islamic profession of faith were not the same thing, although the establishment of a Muslim state did create incentives for conversion. Expansion into more established centers of trade and culture led to disputes and redistributions of power. Thus it was not long before Muslims located in Egypt complained of unjust treatment to the caliph 'Uthman b. 'Affan, who had succeeded 'Umar. 'Uthman's assassination in 656 led to the great intra-Muslim conflict known as the first fitna, or "test" of the community. When 'Ali b. Abi Talib, son-in-law of Muhammad and one of the earliest to profess Islam, pursued reconciliation with those accused of conspiracy against 'Uthman, the latter's relative Mu'awiya used his position as governor of Syria to mount a challenge to 'Ali's leadership. The resulting impasse led to further divisions—accounts speak not only of the partisans of 'Ali and Mu'awiya but also of a third party, the Kharijis, whose name indicates that they seceded or separated themselves from either side. 'Ali's death in 661 at the hands of members of this latter group did not resolve the issues of leadership. The dominance of Mu'awiya and his family—and thus the hegemony of Damascus in the territories now under Muslim rule—would not be set until the partisans of 'Ali, now under the leadership of his son Husayn, were defeated at Karbala in Iraq in 680 and opposition in the holy cities of Mecca and Medina quelled by forces under the command of 'Abd al-Malik in 692.

But matters did not remain settled for long. By the 740s, a disparate yet growing opposition to the Umayyads united under the banner of the Abbasids, whose victory moved the imperial capital once again, this time to Baghdad. The extent of religious difference in Islam can be shown by any number of developments in the period of Abbasid rule, but none made a greater impact on Muslim memory than the mihna, or the test of scholars with respect to the nature of the Qur'an. Ma'mun (r. 813–33) and his successor determined that all recognized experts in religious matters should publicly adhere to the judgment that the Qur'an is God's "created" speech. The political import of the test was considerable. Resistance to Abbasid authority on this matter, and the subsequent change of policy so that the contrary view became the official norm, exemplifies the intense competition between adherents of distinctive notions of Muslim practice. Abbasid authorities coveted the legitimacy associated with Islam. But this would be a long time coming; the Abbasids never really obtained control over significant sectors of the population, particularly portions of Egypt and Syro-Palestine. The resulting divisions, in which a consensus associated with "the people of the sunna and of the community" held sway in the Abbasid regions, while Shi'ism, particularly in its Fatimid/Isma'ili forms did so elsewhere, would be reflected in Muslim accounts of the progress of the faith for centuries to come.

Thus one might speak of a Sunni version of the expansion of Islam in which the story recounted thus far constitutes the gradual progress of a community elected by God to bring the world into a condition of submission to God's will. The fitna involving Mu'awiya and 'Ali, the Abbasid revolt, the mihna, and other instances of conflict constitute a series of tests by which God refined the community. The story of Islamic expansion is a story of God's providential care, in which the believers may for a time become unsettled, but the saying of the Prophet eventually proves true: "My community shall never agree on an error."

By contrast, one may speak of a minority point of view in which claims of progress are offset by Muslim disobedience. Mu'awiya's challenge to 'Ali was wrong, and the subsequent defeat of Husayn at Karbala was an act of betrayal. In the generations following, Abbasid authorities ignored the claims of those designated by 'Ali's successors to lead the community of Muslims. In doing so, they preferred might to right, and their marginalizing or even conspiratorial policies constituted a kind of theft by which the Muslim community was deprived of the wisdom of persons possessing extraordinary piety and knowledge of the esoteric, as well as the exoteric, dimensions of religious practice. While the expansion of Islam throughout the world indicates that God has not rejected the believers, they will not enjoy the success for which they are destined until the family of 'Ali takes its rightful place at the head of the umma.

The Sunni-Shi'i divide has had enormous implications for the practice of Islam, not least in connection with the conduct of war. These distinctive modes of Muslim practice achieved political instantiation during the middle periods of Islamic development. The Ottoman and, in a somewhat different way, the Mughal empires reflected the Sunni consensus, while the Safavids constituted a Shi'i state. The latter in particular allowed for a considerable elaboration of the Twelver or Imami form of Shi'ism, with its distinctive eschatological emphasis. According to the doctrine of this school, the 12th in the series of imams or designated successors to the Prophet went into hiding in 874. He did so by the will of God and in response to the disobedience of the majority of the Muslims; this served to protect the imam from the fate of his predecessors, almost all of whom became victims at the hands of hypocrites. Imam Mahdi (i.e., the rightly guided leader) remains somewhere "in the Earth" and will do so until God decides that the time is right for his appearance. In his absence, a number of appointed "deputies" serve as guardians of the Shi'is. By the time of the Safavids (1501–1722), this role largely belonged to the experts in shari'a reasoning, whose view of the state was similar to that of their Sunni counterparts: an Islamic establishment in the service of adherence to the shari'a, a Muslim ruler with settled modes for consultation with the religious class, and distinctions between Muslim and non-Muslim citizens reflective of the primacy of Islam. The authority of the Hidden Imam served to relativize the authority of the ruler, however, with important consequences for the justification and conduct of war.

In the modern period (beginning ca. 1750), the decline and ultimate demise of the great empires altered the political standing of Islam. That these changes occurred largely as a result of the advance of European powers, followed in the second half of the 20th century by the United States, only served to reinforce the judgment: the political and military precedents associated with the early expansion of Islam no longer held. Muslim thinking about war reflected the changed situation. Some authors wrote as apologists, arguing that Muslim approaches to war were consistent with the norms of civilization, as defined by the norms of Europe and the United States. Others wrote polemical tracts arguing that Muslim approaches constituted the measure of truly civilized warfare and that Europe and the United States should learn from Islam and thus add a spiritual and moral dimension to their obvious prowess in science and technology. Other interpreters of Islam used their position as diplomats to bring precedents from the history of Islam to bear on international law. In particular, the protocols added to the Geneva Conventions in the 1970s showed the influence of Muslim interlocutors, especially the provisions respecting the status of resistance movements. In this, the diplomatic contributions of Muslims mirrored the strongest trend in 20th-century Muslim thinking about war. Proponents of armed resistance attempted to stretch premodern precedents to fit circumstances in which believers found it possible to ask whether any established state actually constituted a Muslim, and therefore legitimate, form of political order.

Warfare and the Norms of Islam

The earliest compendia of scholarly opinions related to the rules of war seem to be those associated with the Iraqi jurists who styled themselves as working in the tradition of Abu Hanifa (d. 767). A collection of opinions related to jihad and jizya (i.e., to questions about military affairs and taxation in the regions that came under Muslim rule during the postprophetic expansion) is associated with the work of Abu Yusuf (d. 798). Even more significant is the collection associated with Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Shaybani (d. 804), which later generations knew by the title Kitab al-Siyar, or the "book of movements." As the contents indicate, the movements in question are those between the territory in which Islam is established (dar al-islam) and the territory where it is not (dar al-harb). As the Arabic suggests, the latter is, under certain conditions, the object of war intended to expand the dominion of Islam.

Given this interest, the text is preoccupied with the rules of engagement for Muslim forces: how they should approach the foe, what targets and tactics are appropriate, what is to be done with enemy persons, and how war prizes are to be distributed or managed. The opinions collected in the text are presented as responses to particular questions: Must the Muslim forces issue an invitation to the opposition so that its people have an opportunity to submit voluntarily and thus avoid war? What if the Muslim forces find themselves in a situation in which they must employ tactics that will result in the death of children? Are enemy captives to be killed, or must they be transported to the territory of Islam? May the Muslim fighters keep prizes (horses, money, etc.) they capture, or must they place these at the disposal of their commander?

In these and other cases, the text reports the opinions of Abu Hanifa, Abu Yusuf, or Shaybani—and sometimes of all three. Answers are crafted in consultation with verses of the Qur'an, reports of Muhammad's words and deeds, and the practice of the early Muslims, but these scholars also appeal to the notion of "that which is salutary," meaning (at least in part) "that which works, in order for the Muslim community to carry out its mission." Here, their interest is in the ability of the Muslim forces to attain victory. Thus, when faced with questions regarding tactics that will result in the death of children, the responses grant considerable latitude in the interests of the Muslims' ability to carry out their mission. Looking at the text as a whole, we may reconstruct the argument as follows:

1. The Prophet forbade the killing of children (along with a number of other categories of persons whose noninvolvement in fighting classifies them as noncombatants).
2. There are cases in which Muslim armies must employ tactics that would result in the death of children or else stop fighting. These include siege warfare, in which the use of hurling machines does not allow for precise targeting, and cases in which an enemy tries to deter the Muslims by tying children to the city walls, so that archers firing into the city are likely to hit at least some of the children.
3. In cases like those previously mentioned, the Muslim armies should do their best to avoid harming children and other noncombatants. But they cannot be prohibited from doing what is necessary to win. As Shaybani puts it, "If the Muslims stopped attacking the inhabitants of the territory of war > for any of the reasons that you have stated, they would be unable to go to war at all, for there is no city in the territory of war in which there is no one at all of these you have mentioned."

The overriding imperative is the expansion of the dominion of Islam. To drive the point home, the text mentions questions that focus on the possibility that the residents of a besieged city or the children tied to the city walls may be Muslims and then asks whether Muslim fighters deploying tactics that may lead to the death of these innocents should be required to pay blood money or to otherwise make up for the damage. The answer is an unequivocal no.

If such answers suggest the importance of the Muslim mission, others point to a concern that armies conduct themselves in an orderly fashion. Thus the responses make clear that war is authorized by a public authority and follows on an invitation to voluntarily submit. Enemy captives who might pose a threat to Islam—for example, adult males whose physical capacity suggests their ability to fight—should be killed, unless their capture occurs in territory that is already under Muslim control. Women, children, the old, the lame, and other noncombatants must be transported to the territory of Islam, even if this is expensive or dangerous for the Muslim forces. Part of the rationale for this restriction is the concern that fighters abstain from taking "private" booty. All prizes, including potential wives and slaves, must be placed under the administration of the authorities, who will (upon return to Muslim territory) distribute them according to rules governing the shares of various fighters.

Such concerns for regulation suggest the placement of the text in the early Abbasid drive to develop a standing professional fighting force. Tabari's history relates stories indicative of the way Abu Yusuf, Shaybani, and others crafted some of their opinions in response to questions from the caliph, and biographies compiled by later generations of Hanafi scholars report that these early scholars served in official capacities. Coupled with the fact that Shaybani's text appends a number of judgments related to the conduct of fighting within Muslim territory (e.g., against rebels or against ahl al-dhimma, "the people of protection," meaning Jews, Christians, and others living under Muslim rule, when these communities violate their agreement with the Muslims), the evidence suggests a set of opinions that draw on and reflect the condition of an imperial state. The rules of engagement bear comparison with those of Imperial Rome and other states governing an extended territory. The caliph's authorization makes war a public act, and the rules of engagement crafted by the scholarly community serve as norms for commanders in the field.

The condition of the empire changed, however, and the formulation of norms for the conduct of war shows similar alterations. Mawardi (d. 1058) is famous for his discussion of the ways the caliph can designate "lesser" rulers as his deputies. The powers assumed by those deputized include the authority to initiate war. In this respect, as in the more general question of public authority, Mawardi's opinion is crafted to serve the cause of continuity, even as it responds to a situation in which the notion of power centralized in Baghdad is at best a useful fiction. Particularly with respect to norms governing war, the idea that the caliph designates a deputy to serve as sultan preserves the idea that war is a public act fought in accord with standing notions of the mission of the Muslim community and for the benefit of humanity.

Mawardi's contributions do not end with his judgment about authority, however. In response to questions familiar from Shaybani's Kitab al-Siyar, Mawardi provides judgments that are quite distinct. For example, regarding the questions dealing with tactics that may bring about the death of children and others, Mawardi argues that if the Muslim forces cannot attain victory without killing large numbers of innocents, then they should cease fighting and offer the enemy a chance to surrender. If this does not work, then the Muslim forces should withdraw and wait for a more favorable opportunity. There is no appeal to the overriding importance of victory here. Mawardi maintains the authority of those reports in which the Prophet condemns the killing of noncombatants and thus the notion that Muslim forces should occupy the moral high ground. Given that Mawardi is usually presented as a follower of Shafi'i (d. 820) rather than of Abu Hanifa, one might suppose this is a difference between schools. However, Shafi'i is usually more aggressive than Shaybani on questions related to the issuing of an invitation to voluntarily submit and avoid war. For example, Shafi'i holds that the knowledge of Islam is universal and thus that the Muslim forces need not repeat the summons issued by the Prophet. On questions about the disposition of prisoners taken in the territory of war, Shafi'i says that all may be killed at the discretion of the commander. Mawardi's distinctive opinion may thus simply reflect a sensibility that the means employed by fighters must allow Muslim fighters to maintain the moral superiority of the Muslim community.

In any case, it is clear that judgments pertaining to military force are subject to interpretation. In this, the development of norms related to war is consistent with other areas in which scholars issued opinions developed in conjunction with shari'a reasoning. Finding a "fit" between textual precedents and the particular conditions of one's age is more an art than a science. Muslim reasoning about war, while indicating the outlines of a set of criteria or touchstones for believers in different times and places, nevertheless provides evidence of various opinions.

A move forward to the time of Ibn Taymiyya (1263–1328) points to serious debate on a number of questions addressed by Shaybani and Mawardi. Ibn Taymiyya stands at the end of the period in which the imperial model represented by the Abbasids was fading. Not only did the notion of central authority suffer from the rising power of lesser (Muslim) rulers, as suggested by Mawardi's development of the notion of "designated" authority, but by the 14th century the Crusades and the Mongol invasions posed new military and political challenges. With respect to the Crusades, the Book of Jihad, attributed to Sulami of Damascus (d. 1106), adapted the device of fighting as an "individual duty" to encourage Muslim rulers outside the province of Syro-Palestine to aid those bearing the brunt of the Christian advance. The leadership provided by the Kurdish military leader Saladin (d. 1193) seems in some ways to be a response to this, while in other ways he fits the model outlined by Mawardi. While Sulami's appeal to individual duty does not seem to be entirely original, it does mark a development by which later figures would discuss the norms of war in relation to conditions of emergency: if the opinions outlined by Shaybani and Mawardi related to conditions in which Muslims held power, what is their purchase in times when Muslim power is threatened or even overcome by foreign invaders?

Ibn Taymiyya issued his opinions in response to questions raised by the Mongol sacking of Baghdad (1258) and subsequent incursions into Syro-Palestine. Working primarily from Damascus, Ibn Taymiyya discussed issues posed when non-Muslim invaders came to dominate the territory of Islam but then converted. He argued that the Mongols continued to rule by a "mixed regime" of Muslim and Mongol law and should thus be regarded as illegitimate. In such a case, the notion of fighting as an individual duty authorized any Muslim authority able to mount resistance to do so. Ibn Taymiyya's primary appeal was to the Mamluk sultan in Cairo, although his own troubles with that ruler (Ibn Taymiyya served time in a Cairo prison at the order of the sultan) suggest that relationship was not entirely satisfactory. In any case, the collections of Ibn Taymiyya's opinions show a serious engagement with the set of precedents provided by the Qur'an, the sunna of the Prophet, and the rulings of outstanding scholars like Shaybani and Mawardi. Styling himself as a follower of Ahmad b. Hanbal (780–855), Ibn Taymiyya clearly does not feel bound to simply imitate earlier scholars. He does relate his opinions to theirs, however, and thus discusses a number of standard cases. Who may authorize fighting? Who should serve in the Muslim army? What targets are legitimate? What tactics may the Muslim armies employ? In these and other cases, Ibn Taymiyya's judgments reflect the quest for a fit between precedent and present circumstance characteristic of the practice of shari'a reasoning. Thus authority for war rests with an established leader so that fighting is a public act. However, the emergency presented by the advance of the Mongols means that "establishment" may not follow the most obvious lines. The Mamluk sultan's historic interest in Syro-Palestine suggests he should organize the resistance, but if he fails to do so, nothing in Ibn Taymiyya's texts suggests that another, more distant leader should not rise to the occasion. As to who should serve in the Muslim army, Ibn Taymiyya cites the standard norms about believers who are physically able and can provide their own weapons, horses, and other equipment. He notes that in ordinary circumstances, those who do not wish to fight may fulfill their duty by providing money or equipment for those who do. But the emergency condition is different. In this case, everyone able should fight—and this could include women and children, at the leader's discretion. Necessity makes the forbidden things permitted in the sense that every believer can and should support the leader's efforts at resisting invasion.

Necessity does not affect the question of means, however. Ibn Taymiyya follows established precedents regarding the restrictions on targets, with one exception: he says that women who support the enemy by means of propaganda may be viewed as combatants. That is, they need not actually take up arms, although the opinion does not specify the nature of "propaganda." Overall, however, Ibn Taymiyya suggests that the standard rules of engagement apply even in an emergency.

New Conditions and Alternative Views

Ibn Taymiyya's rulings draw on and point to striking changes in the political structure of the areas dominated by Islam. In the centuries that followed, these would include, first, the growth and expansion of the three great dynasties of the middle period of Muslim history and, second, the modern expansion of European power, with its legacy of colonialism.

With respect to the first, the Ottoman and Mughal empires represent the continuation of the standard majoritarian or Sunni discussions of the norms of war. Scholarly discourse sought to build on the opinions formulated by Shaybani, Mawardi, Ibn Taymiyya, and others like them.

The Safavid dynasty and its successor (the Qajar dynasty) represent something a bit different, however. As noted earlier, the Safavids ruled in conjunction with an establishment of Twelver Shi'ism. They sponsored a discussion of judgments pertaining to war that bears the imprint of the sect's characteristic doctrines. Particularly with respect to the authorization of war, the Shi'i view that God appoints one ruler for every generation, coupled with the Twelver notion that all of those so appointed were, from the death of the Prophet forward, prohibited from carrying out his mandate by the unbelief of the Muslim majority, meant that authority for jihad belonged only with the Imam of the Age. According to the compendium associated with Muhaqqiq al-Hilli (d. 1277), for example, mature men who are physically able and are not slaves are obligated to fight in the cause of expanding the hegemony of Islam. This obligation only holds, however, when the imam or his deputy is present. Since God responded to the unbelief of the majority by taking the Twelfth Imam into hiding, the conditions for jihad seem not to hold. Assuming that the reference to the imam's "deputy" indicates one of those who, according to Twelver tradition, served as intermediaries during the period of "lesser" occultation (roughly from 874–914), even this authorization may be in question.

The fighting authorized in the absence of the imam or his deputy is defensive in nature. That is, if an enemy attacks, the ruler is authorized to organize a resistance; indeed, in certain cases, any individual may defend himself or herself or even other victims from aggression. In the ordinary case, though, Hilli's text indicates that the ruler organizes forces in order to deter or preemptively attack a potential enemy.

With respect to other matters, Hilli follows standard precedents in that the Muslim fighters are required to avoid direct attacks on noncombatants. In the case of siege warfare or an enemy's use of children as shields, his opinion is closer to that of Mawardi than that of Shaybani. In a judgment that runs contrary to one of Ibn Taymiyya's views, Hilli says that even women or children who provide support to the enemy should be regarded as noncombatants, except in cases of emergency.

The consensus represented by Hilli becomes important in considering the effects of European expansion on Muslim judgments about war. In the early 19th century, Russia's advance to great power included increasing influence in the affairs of Iran. Shi'i scholars issued opinions advising the Qajar ruler of his authority as defender of the Shi'i faith and distinguished between an imposed war (al-difā', a war of defense) and the jihad for which authority belongs only to the imam or his deputy. The distinction would appear again following the Iranian Revolution and the establishment of the Islamic Republic of Iran. The argument of Ayatollah Khomeini (1902–89) that the Shi'i scholars as a whole, or one of them having the requisite learning and piety, fill the office of deputy is enshrined in the Iranian Constitution. The notion that the scholar or scholars filling this role may authorize active resistance to an established ruler provides important background to the 1979 revolution. With respect to war, Khomeini called on the notion of defense, as well as of resistance to rebels, when he spoke about the war with Iraq (1981–88). Ongoing debates in Iran regarding the state's role in world affairs, its sponsorship of groups like Hizbullah and Hamas, and its nuclear program all show the import of traditional judgments like those collected in Hilli's compendium.

On the Sunni side, the erosion of Ottoman and Mughal power set off debates that similarly reflect the attempt to articulate a fit between historic precedents and changing circumstances. When a well-known Sunni scholar ('Abd al-'Aziz, grandson of the famous Shah Waliullah of Delhi) declared that the advance of British power rendered India a part of the territory of war rather than of Islam, he may or may not have meant to authorize popular resistance. Some groups in India thought it so, however, and organized the series of uprisings that led to the Sepoy Mutiny in 1857. Britain's brutal suppression of this rebellion suggested to many Muslims that a different strategy would be necessary, and Sayyid Ahmad Khan (d. 1897) advanced his well-known argument that jihad (at least in the sense of armed struggle) is obligatory when the Muslims are strong and not when they are weak. Post-Sepoy India would yield some of the most interesting examples of apologetic and polemical writing regarding jihad, with Syed Ameer Ali's (d. 1928) best-selling Spirit of Islam presenting the military campaigns of Muhammad as consistent with the highest standard of "humanity," while Mawdudi's (1903–79) treatise on jihad argued that fighting to establish a political order in which Islam is established is a duty for Muslims and a boon to an otherwise disorganized and heedless world community. For Mawdudi, the jihad is not only a necessary aspect of Muslim practice; it is also a feature of justice, because polities that are not organized around the norms of Islam tend to fight wars as they conduct domestic affairs—that is, by way of oppression, indiscriminate killing, and genocide.

Analogues to the apologetics of Ameer Ali and the polemics of Mawdudi appeared in other regions of the historic territory of Islam. In Egypt, for example, Mahmud Shaltut's (d. 1963) treatise on the "fighting verses" of the Qur'an combined a novel reading of the text with an account of the early Muslim expansion that rendered it a campaign of humanitarian intervention. For Shaltut, the account of the "occasions" connected with the revelation of the verses on fighting outlined in traditional biographies of Muhammad does not provide an adequate guide. Instead of reading the verses in relation to an escalating set of tensions between Muslims and their Qurashi rivals, one should read the text as a whole and thereby understand that the Qur'an meant only to authorize wars of defense. Similarly, Shaltut's understanding of the facts of the early expansion, by which for example the Christians living in Palestine petitioned 'Umar b. al-Khattab to defend them against their Jewish neighbors, presents a paradigm of one nation coming to the aid of another. In a modern context, Shaltut's point was that Muslim norms are fully consistent with those of the emergent tradition of international law.

More akin to Mawdudi is the essay on jihad by Hasan al-Banna (1906–49), the founder of the Muslim Brotherhood movement. Here, jihad is a duty laid upon Muslims for the benefit of humankind: the goal of jihad is the establishment of a state governed by Islamic values. As such values are consistent with the true nature of humanity, the jihad is a beneficent act. Left to their own devices, human beings will prove tyrannical and foolish, as the Qur'an indicates. Governed by Islam, human beings can live with dignity in the context of a political order that makes peace and justice possible.

Apologetic and polemical writing on jihad continued to develop throughout the 20th century and into the 21st. In the work of Sayyid Qutb (1906–66), this type of writing took a new turn, as the Egyptian writer and activist fused the style and arguments of the authors mentioned with arguments pertaining to resistance. In Milestones, Social Justice in Islam, and especially in his commentary on the Qur'an, Qutb argued that Muslims criticized global trends associated with the dominance of Europe and the United States and asserted that Islam alone provides a way of ordering life that accords with true human nature. In this sense, Muslims are always in a condition of resistance, because the way of submission is always opposed to jāhiliyya, that "heedlessness" to which, the Qur'an teaches, humanity is prone.

For Qutb, the notion of resistance becomes a characteristic trait of the Muslim life. Jihad, in the broad sense of struggle to bring oneself and the world into conformity with the path of God, is the principal theme of Muslim ethics. According to Qutb this struggle should focus on building communities of character, small groups of Muslims whose association would encourage personal discipline. These would be the seed from which a Muslim social movement might grow, with the aim of transforming the world. The use of military force would likely be a part of this aim, just as it was in the time of Muhammad. For the most part, however, Qutb focused on the need for these communities of character; as he put it in several places, if tyranny is overthrown and there is no group ready to assume leadership so that a truly Islamic social order might be put in place, the result will only be a new form of tyranny. Muslim devotees must thus undergo a time of purification and preparation, not unlike the Prophet and his Companions during the Meccan period.

Qutb is thus an important transitional figure for modern discussions of war, and many surveys point to his work as a foundation for later discussions of resistance, from the apologia of the assassins of Anwar Sadat (The Neglected Duty, 1981) to the Hamas Charter of Hamas (1988) and the World Islamic Front's Declaration Concerning Armed Struggle against Jews and Crusaders (1998). Such documents contain echoes of Qutb's ideas, but their authors also typically cite earlier precedents such as the Qur'an, the sunna of the Prophet, Islamic history, and standard contributors to the discussion of the judgments pertaining to jihad. In the end, texts like those mentioned attempt to develop a rationale for a certain kind of fighting, in conjunction with the establishment of political goals. As such, they make a series of claims and are the subject of much debate among Muslims engaged in shari'a reasoning.

Thus The Neglected Duty speaks of the duty to struggle for the purpose of establishing an Islamic state, meaning one in which public law is derived according to the sources and procedures characteristic of shari'a reasoning. Such "government by divine law" is distinguished from other forms, in which "human law" is the measure of political and personal behavior. In the current circumstance, the author writes, such a government does not exist in Egypt. He believes this judgment holds elsewhere in the territory of Islam, but his particular concern is with Egypt. In such a circumstance, Muslims are called to exert themselves to bring about change, and their efforts can include armed force. This is especially so if the ruler fails to heed numerous calls for change. Appealing to the time and judgments of Ibn Taymiyya, the idea is that Egypt, like the territory governed by the Mongols, is governed by a "mixed" legal regime. A truly devoted leader would institute a program of reform and move the state toward fidelity to Islam. But, according to the author, the Egyptian leader has not; he is thus an apostate and deserves punishment by death.

Herein lies the problem of resistance, and the author understands it clearly: who can carry out the punishment when the criminals are in power? Ultimately, says the text, the authority to punish belongs to God, who gives it to the Muslim community as a whole. The recognition of a ruler is a kind of "vesting" of this communal duty and right in a particular person or group. If these become corrupt, however, responsibility devolves to the community as a whole, or to those who understand the situation. Jihad thus becomes an "individual duty" incumbent on every Muslim able to fulfill it. As the author writes, in this case, jihad is like prayer and fasting: everyone must perform as he or she is able or else be complicit in injustice.

In this way, the text calls on Ibn Taymiyya and other historic figures. As described earlier, however, Ibn Taymiyya's appeal to individual duty was actually aimed at neighboring Muslim rulers. The author of The Neglected Duty thinks more of a mass appeal and of a kind of popular uprising. Not surprisingly, his argument has been controversial, so authorities like Shaykh al-Azhar suggest that the theory of resistance developed in the text is an invitation to anarchic violence. This fear stems not only from the possibility that the argument of The Neglected Duty comes close to suggesting that every Muslim serves as his or her own commander. It is also fostered by the author's claim that any Muslim who fails to support the uprising is prima facie complicit in injustice and may be killed with impunity. The text does admit that some supporters of a corrupt government may be innocent, or at least affected by factors that mitigate guilt (e.g., coercion or ignorance). In the event some of these supporters die in a military action, however, the author suggests that the "sorting" between innocent and guilty will be done by God. The calling of the faithful is to struggle for justice, and the killing of Sadat, in particular, is understood as an execution or an administering of just punishment.

The Charter of Hamas makes a similar appeal to emergency and argues that in a circumstance where an enemy has occupied territory belonging to the Muslims, jihad becomes an individual duty, akin to prayer and fasting. The focus in this case is Palestine, and the text asserts that Muslim claims to the land are not simply a matter of history or of property wrongly taken from individuals. Rather, it argues that Palestine (and with it, Jerusalem) was given to the Muslims as a trust. Defending this territory, or struggling to restore it to the territory of Islam, is thus a religious duty. Similarly, the enemy is defined in religious rather than ethnic or national terms: "the Jews" are an individual and collective target of resistance, and the struggle is part of a long-term, even eschatological, contest between faith and disobedience.

The Charter does not discuss the details of fighting, so one does not find arguments about combatants and noncombatants or about various tactics or weapons. Hamas has of course used techniques that suggest a lack of concern with traditional shari'a judgments regarding the distinction between combatants and noncombatants (e.g., the firing of rockets into Israeli villages), and "martyrdom operations" (also known as "suicide bombings") raise many questions for Muslims. Shaykh al-Azhar, for example, allows that martyrdom operations may be an appropriate tactic, but only if the direct target is military. By contrast, the popular scholar Yusuf al-Qaradawi seems to suggest that there are no civilians in Israel, since all men and women between the ages of 18 and 60 are at least eligible for military service.

The clearest example of a Muslim argument that justifies resistance and also connects it with something close to a strategy of total (i.e., indiscriminate) fighting is the World Islamic Front's Declaration. Published in a London-based Arabic language newspaper in February 1998, the Declaration quickly attracted attention as an attempt by the leaders of a number of resistance movements to advance an argument in the form of traditional shari'a reasoning. After the September 11, 2001, attacks on New York and Washington, D.C., the text became known as "Bin Laden's fatwa or normative opinion." Muslim critics of the document complained that neither Osama bin Laden nor any of the other signatories actually had standing to issue legal opinions. Bin Laden's subsequent replies make clear that he believed such criticism reinforced one of the basic claims of the Declaration, which is that the contemporary Muslim community, while numerous, is dominated by leaders whose faith is superficial. As with The Neglected Duty and the Charter of Hamas, the Declaration interprets current circumstances in the language of emergency. By way of analogy, rulings offered by historic scholars indicate that such circumstances render fighting a duty incumbent upon "any Muslim able . . . in any country where it is possible." In this interpretation, one need not wait for authorization from an established ruler; the corruption and/or impotence of those holding power in the territory of Islam renders this point moot.

The Declaration also declares total war on a specified enemy. Fighting as an individual duty targets Americans and their allies, civilians and soldiers alike. This point has proven highly controversial among Muslims, and Bin Laden and other resistance leaders have attempted to respond. The duty to avoid direct harm to noncombatants is a well-established precedent, according to Bin Laden, but it is not absolute. To indicate the possibility of exceptions, he cited rulings that allow the Muslim forces to continue fighting an enemy that hangs children on the walls of a besieged city. The fighters know their tactics are likely to kill at least some of the children, but the children's blood is on the enemy's hands. Then, too, Bin Laden and others insisted that killing American and allied civilians is reciprocal justice or repayment in kind for the death of Muslim innocents. Finally, in a document published in November 2002, Bin Laden advanced the claim that the citizens of democratic states cannot claim innocence, since they have the ability to change governments and thus to alter objectionable policies. When Bin Laden released a video aimed at the American people just before the November 2004 presidential election, he reiterated this point, indicating that peace was at hand if the U.S. electorate would just choose the right candidate.

The issue of distinguishing civilian and military targets continues to trouble Muslims, however. Since 2005, this question has divided advocates of resistance: the indiscriminate killing of Muslim civilians by fighters associated with the late Abu Mus'ab al-Zarqawi, commander of al-Qaeda in Iraq, brought warnings from several advocates of resistance, including Bin Laden's associate Ayman al-Zawahiri. In 2009, Mulla 'Umar, leader of the most important Taliban group involved in fighting in Afghanistan, issued orders that fighters associated with him should avoid the direct killing of noncombatants. It seems that the weight of precedent and the weight of Muslim public opinion complement one another in this matter; at least with respect to fighting in areas inhabited by a majority Muslim population, one might expect fighters to alter the strategy articulated in the Declaration.

The debate over resistance is perhaps the strongest trend in contemporary Muslim argument about the rules of war. Resistance is also the topic of what is generally considered the most significant contribution of diplomats representing Muslim states in international forums.

The record of those agreements constituting the modern law of war shows that Muslim states, and particularly representatives of the Ottoman court, took part as early as the 1856 Paris Declaration Respecting Maritime Law. The various Hague Conventions also indicate Muslim participation, as does the Geneva Accord. More recently, Muslim diplomats played a part in the development of the 1993 Chemical Weapons Convention.

With respect to resistance, the most important contribution of Muslim states may be seen in the 1977 Geneva Protocol I. Together with a second protocol, this agreement responds to changes in the character of armed conflict since World War II. In particular, Geneva Protocol I expands the application of the law of war so that it includes conflicts in which "peoples are fighting against colonial domination and alien occupation and against racist regimes in the exercise of their right of self-determination." The text also eases the requirement imposed by earlier agreements that combatants "distinguish themselves from the civilian population." For example, the fourth Hague Convention specified that combatants should fulfill this requirement by wearing a "fixed distinctive emblem recognizable at a distance"; the Geneva Accord reiterates this directive. Geneva Protocol I recognizes that there are times when a combatant cannot do this, "owing to the nature of the hostilities." Combatants are still required to carry their arms openly. The relaxation of the requirement of emblems, together with the expansion of the scope of application of the laws of war, seems clearly designed to take account of the activities of guerrillas and other irregular or nonstate forces. From the perspective of Muslim states, support for these changes correlates with sympathy for Palestinian resistance to Israel. Such sympathy does not transfer to other conflicts involving Muslim resistance groups, however. Diplomats representing historically Muslim states during a term on the United Nations Security Council have consistently supported the sanctions and other counterterrorism measures adopted since 1999 by the council in its effort to deal with al-Qaeda and the Taliban.

Conclusion

The centrality of resistance in contemporary Muslim argument about war reflects the larger debate about political authority in which Muslims have engaged since the passing of the imperial states of the middle period (from ca. 1258 until the modern era). In particular, the abolition of the Ottoman caliphate or sultanate set off a great debate over the proper form of government in an Islamic state.

This lack of consensus certainly has an impact on the attempt to regulate war. Historically, Muslims in positions of leadership appealed to shari'a norms in order to harness war to appropriate ends and to ensure that the harms associated with war (death, destruction of property, etc.) might be proportionate to the goods at which it aimed. Without an agreement over the location of authority, regulation of ends and means alike comes into question. "Who decides?" is always a relevant question, not least with respect to war.

At the same time, one must note the persistence of a number of historic features of Muslim thought about war. Even in a situation characterized by disagreement, some of it deadly, respect for precedent seems very strong. When resistance groups are criticized for violations—for example, in controversies over martyrdom operations and al-Qaeda's doctrine of total war—the responses point to the enduring appeal of the notions enshrined in tradition: that the means of war should be proportionate to its ends and that fighters claiming to engage in a just war should not themselves engage in injustice.

In all this, Muslim thinking about war bears a strong resemblance to that developed by Christians, Jews, and other groups. This does not minimize the objectionable nature of certain judgments, such as al-Qaeda's doctrine of total war. But the question of war is present for every historic and contemporary group, and the attempt to regulate it, to see war as a tool that is sometimes appropriate for attaining or defending justice, is difficult. In the end, the question of war for Muslims is this: in what ways, or under what conditions, is war an appropriate means of jihad, in that it is consistent with the guidance of God? And a second question quickly follows: how do human beings comprehend this guidance?

See also dissent, opposition, resistance; fundamentalism; military; nonviolence; rebellion; violence

Further Reading

Khaled Abou El Fadl, Rebellion and Violence in Islamic Law, 2001; James Turner Johnson and John Kelsay, eds., Cross, Crescent, and Sword, 1990; John Kelsay, Arguing the Just War in Islam, 2007; John Kelsay and James Turner Johnson, eds., Just War and Jihad, 1991; Rudolph Peters, Jihad in Classical and Modern Islam, 1996.

JOHN KELSAY

Jinnah, Mohammad 'Ali (1876–1948)

Mohammad 'Ali Jinnah was the leader of the All-India Muslim League, which successfully demanded the creation of Pakistan following India's independence from British rule. After Pakistan gained its independence from India, he was the country's first governor-general until his death on September 11, 1948.

Jinnah was born in Karachi on December 25, 1876. His father was a wealthy Isma'ili merchant. He was sent to London in 1892 to work with Graham's Shipping and Trading Company, which had extensive dealings with his father's firm. He abandoned this career for the legal profession and successfully qualified as a barrister at Lincoln's Inn, the oldest of the four Inns of Court in London where lawyers are called to the bar. Upon his return to Bombay, Jinnah quickly established himself as the leading Muslim advocate in the high court. He moved in elite Indian circles, and in 1896 he joined the Indian National Congress, becoming a prominent figure in its so-called moderate wing. The Muslim League was founded in 1906 at the annual session of the All-India Muhammadan Educational Conference, but it was not until 1913 that Jinnah joined the organization while maintaining his congress membership. His burgeoning wealth as a result of careful investment of his earnings was further augmented by his marriage to Rattanbai Petit, the daughter of the wealthy Parsi magnate Sir Dinshaw Petit. Jinnah was considered a future leader of the congress and was instrumental in bringing about the 1916 Lucknow Pact between congress and the Muslim League. This agreement marked the high watermark of cooperation between the two parties.

Four years later, Jinnah resigned from the congress because of his disillusionment with the violence and communal passions that followed Mohandas Gandhi's (1869–1948) introduction of religion into politics. It was only in 1928, however, that the division further widened between him and the congress when the Nehru Report, the first nationalist draft of a constitution for an independent India, rejected his famous "Fourteen Points" constitutional proposals. These had been drawn up to protect the interests of the Muslim minority community. At their heart lay devolution of power to the provinces and separate electorates. For Jinnah, it was essential to maintain the latter as a safeguard for Muslim interests.

Shortly after parting ways with the congress in 1928, Jinnah abandoned Indian politics. He had become estranged from his young wife. His personal unhappiness increased as a result of her illness and later death in 1929. He thereafter increasingly turned to his sister Fatima both as a confidant and to help bring up his daughter, Dina. Between 1930 and 1935, Jinnah forged a lucrative legal career in London. The new political situation following the 1935 Government of India Act encouraged him to return to the fray. The All-India Muslim League fared poorly, however, in the 1937 elections in the provinces where Muslims were in the majority. The league was rescued from oblivion both by Jinnah's attempts to reorganize it and by the way in which the seven congress provincial governments insensitively handled Muslim interests. Following this episode, the Muslim League publicly committed itself in 1940 to the demand for a Muslim homeland.

Jinnah's espousal of the two-nation theory as the basis for Pakistan effectively provided a rallying cry for the Indian Muslim community, which previously had been divided by the conflicting political interests and demands of politicians from the Muslim majority and minority provinces. The disadvantage of the elevation of a minority rights discourse into demands for political sovereignty was the deterioration of community relations in the future "Pakistan" areas. This formed the backdrop to the constitutional negotiations at the end of the raj.

Jinnah's political skills as a negotiator were crucial to his success. He was also able to bring unity and discipline to the fractious Muslim League movement, in part through his strong personality. He could also stand aloof, because of his personal wealth, from the landed magnates who formed a key element in the party.

World War II also assisted Jinnah's rise to prominence. The British saw the Muslim League as a useful counterbalance to the noncooperating congress, and Jinnah was elevated to a position of equality with Jawaharlal Nehru (1889–1964) and Gandhi. The key turning point was the July 1945 Simla Conference, which was designed to establish an expanded Viceroy's Council in which only the viceroy and the commander-in-chief would be British. The creation of a politically representative executive council was seen as a major step toward eventual independence. Jinnah blocked its formation by successfully demanding that all Muslim representatives be members of the Muslim League. He maintained that the proposals were a stopgap and could in no way affect the Muslim League's demand for Pakistan.

Pakistan did not, however, become an inevitability until after the collapse of the Cabinet Mission proposal and the first major outbreak of communal violence on August 16–18, 1946, known as the Great Calcutta Killing. This followed Jinnah's call for direct action in response to the British formation of an interim government without the league. While Indian unity was impossible thereafter, the circumstances were created in which the Muslim majority provinces of Punjab and Bengal were divided. Mass migrations and massacres accompanied the Punjab's partition. This meant that Pakistan faced an unprecedented refugee crisis at birth.

Jinnah held the two offices of Pakistan governor-general and president of the Constituent Assembly. On August 11, the eve of independence, in a famous speech to the Constituent Assembly, he laid the basis for a liberal and tolerant conception of Pakistan. By then, however, he had become increasingly ill with tuberculosis. The burden of state construction became an impossible task, and in the final months of his life, he spent much time at his official retreat in Ziarat.

See also India; Muslim League; Pakistan

Further Reading

Akbar S. Ahmed, Jinnah, Pakistan and Islamic Identity: The Search for Saladin, 1997; Hector Bolitho, Jinnah: Creator of Pakistan, new ed., 2006; S. M. Burke and Salim Al-Din Quraishi, Quaid-i-Azam Mohammad Ali Jinnah: His Personalities and Politics, 2004; Sikander Hayat, The Charismatic Leader: Quaid-i-Azam M. A. Jinnah and the Creation of Pakistan, 2008; Ayesha Jalal, The Sole Spokesman: Jinnah, the Muslim League and the Demand for Pakistan, 1985; M. R. Kazimi, ed., M. A. Jinnah: Views and Reviews, 2006; Stanley Wolpert, Jinnah of Pakistan, 1998.

IAN TALBOT

jizya

The jizya was a poll tax that all non-Muslim, adult males living in territories controlled by Islamic governments were required to pay. It was the substantive proof of a people's or region's subjugation to Islamic rule. The term appears once in the Qur'an (9:29), meaning tax or tribute, and refers to the tribute owed by "the People of the Book" (ahl al-kitāb), specifically Jews and Christians. The jizya became one of the most public stipulations of a pact between the People of the Book and the Muslim ruler, under which they were accorded the protection of the state and the freedom to practice their religion in return for abiding by public Islamic law and adhering to a number of restrictions regulating their behavior. In recognition of their protection under this pact, they became termed *dhimmī*s. Followers of other religions, such as Zoroastrians and Hindus, were later incorporated into the category of *dhimmī*s and were required to pay the jizya.

The Persian and Byzantine empires and pre-Islamic Arab tribes had already established systems of taxation and tribute. As Islam spread, previous structures of taxation were replaced by the Islamic system, but Muslim leaders often adopted practices of the previous regimes in the application and collection of taxes. Examples of the application of the jizya are found in a number of the hadith.

Prior to the Abbasid epoch, the jizya was not strictly defined or applied, which frustrated the efforts of later scholars attempting to understand the early Islamic tax system. The jizya during the early centuries of Islam was used interchangeably with another term for tax, kharāj. Lack of clarity regarding the categories of people to which jizya was applied further convoluted matters. In some instances jizya was applied to individuals; in other cases jizya was applied to entire communities or provinces. Sometimes the jizya meant a land tax. Under the Abbasids, the jizya was delineated as a poll tax all *dhimmī*s were required to pay. Rules for the application of the jizya were devised. Free, adult males who were not afflicted by any physical or mental illness were required to pay the jizya. Women, children, handicapped, the mentally ill, the elderly, and slaves were exempt, as were all travelers and foreigners who did not settle in Muslim lands. In exchange for paying the jizya, *dhimmī*s were permitted to practice their religion, were not obligated to serve in the military, and were offered protection by Muslim rulers. Collected yearly, the jizya was used to pay salaries, pensions, and charities.

The jizya remained in place for centuries and was applied by various Muslim regimes. The Ottoman Empire applied the jizya to its Jewish and Christian subjects for centuries. While adhering to traditional parameters of the jizya, the Ottomans allowed religious clerics and people of certain provinces, such as Serbia and Bosnia, exemption from or lower rates of taxation. A form of jizya was instituted in India near the 14th century, but the practice was eradicated by the early 18th century. Following the Mongol invasion, many regions of the Middle East saw the disappearance of the jizya. However, the jizya continued into the 19th century in many North African countries and Persia. With the disappearance of Islamic states and the spread of religious tolerance, the jizya nearly vanished in the 20th century. Reports of religious minorities being forced to pay jizya have occasionally surfaced in countries plagued by war and political instability, such as Pakistan, Afghanistan, and Iraq during the early 21st century. The imposition is seen to be at odds with modern secular conceptions of citizenship in the nation-state, which entail the equality of citizens who adhere to different religions.

See also jurisprudence; minorities; taxation

Further Reading

Satish Chandra, "Jizyah and the State in India during the 17th Century," Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 12, no. 3 (1969); Daniel C. Dennett Jr., Conversion and the Poll Tax in Early Islam, 1950; S. D. Goitein, "Evidence on the Muslim Poll Tax from Non-Muslim Sources," Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 6 (1963); Norman Stillman, The Jews of Arab Lands: A History and Source Book, 1979.

MATTHEW LONG

Jordan

The present-day Kingdom of Jordan began as the Emirate of Transjordan when Winston Churchill, then Britain's colonial secretary, announced at the Cairo Conference of 1921 that the area east of the Jordan River (76 percent of the total) would be exempt from Jewish immigration and would be governed by Emir 'Abdallah, son of Sharif Husayn of Mecca. In 1946, the British granted independence to the Emirate of Transjordan, and, following the creation of Israel in 1948, 'Abdallah renamed his territory the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan.

In the war that followed the proclamation of the state of Israel, which Israel's Arab neighbors did not recognize, Jordan gained East Jerusalem and parts of the West Bank, along with 700,000 Palestinians who fled from Israel. Fearing that Abdallah would compromise with Israel in order to claim a part of Palestine for himself, Palestinian militants assassinated him in 1951. He was succeeded by his grandson Husayn in 1952 after the abdication of Husayn's father, Talal. King Husayn ruled until his death in 1999, during which period he signed a peace treaty with Israel in 1994.

Amman, the capital of Jordan, was a small Circassian settlement until it became a stop on the Hijaz railroad in the early 1900s. It developed into the political and cultural center of Jordan, a metropolis of two million people.

Jordan's natural resources are limited to phosphates and uranium. Projected plans to rely solely on nuclear energy have been thwarted because of Israeli pressure in the name of security. Although the country remains heavily dependent on remittances from workers in the Gulf and foreign subsidies, recently construction has been flourishing, and the ongoing conflict in Iraq under the umbrella of the "war on terror" has transformed Amman into the gateway to Iraq and the Palestinian territories. A well-educated, technologically literate workforce makes Amman a rival of Beirut as the business center for the Levant.

Jordan is a constitutional monarchy with a bicameral national assembly. The legal system combines Islamic law and French codes. Tribal law was outlawed in 1976, but an editorial in the Jordan Times in October 2010 complained that it was still in practice. The present electoral law—"one person, one vote"—favors constituencies that support the regime. Politically, Jordan has had to maneuver astutely through the narrows of Arab politics. In order to fend off lingering colonial influence, actual or perceived, King Husayn was forced by Arab nationalist pressure to dismiss Glubb Pasha (1897–1986), a British officer who was head of the Arab Legion, in 1956. Two years later, the Arab Federation of Jordan and Iraq, formed as a shield against the ambitions of Egypt's Nasser, was cut short by the Iraqi revolution in July of the same year. In May 1967 Jordan entered into a military alliance with Egypt, which drew it into the war of June 1967 against Israel, resulting in the occupation of the West Bank and East Jerusalem by Israel. In the wake of this defeat, the Palestinian militants (fedāyeen or fidā'iyyūn, "those who sacrifice") arose and slowly formed a "government within the government" in Jordan. In September 1970, these militants landed three hijacked planes in Jordan and, after releasing the passengers, attempted to take control of the country. The showdown with the Jordanian army, known as Black September, led to the expulsion of the fedāyeen to Lebanon and Syria. Following the Arab–Israeli war of 1973, the Arab Summit at Rabat named the Palestine Liberation Organization as the sole representative of the Palestinian people. In 1988, Husayn would finally renounce all claims to the West Bank.

He supported Iraq in its war with Iran (1980–88), opening the port of Aqaba to supplies for Iraq. This led to the formation of the Arab Cooperation Council of 1989, embracing Jordan, Iraq, Yemen, and Egypt. When Iraq attacked Kuwait in the following year, Jordan was accordingly excluded, along with Yemen and Egypt, from the American coalition that liberated Kuwait. Nonetheless, Jordan was allowed to participate in the Madrid Conference (hosted by Spain and cosponsored by the United States and the Soviet Union to initiate peace talks between the Israelis and the Palestinians), which followed, and in October 1994 signed a peace treaty with Israel. King Husayn died in February 1999, ending a reign of 46 years. His crown passed to his son, 'Abdallah II, who has continued on the trajectory set by his father by maintaining peace with Israel. Educated in England and the United States, 'Abdallah II has made successful initiatives to liberalize the economy, but movement toward an open, free, and fair democracy has been slow. At present, the recent waves of protests in the Middle East seem to have arrived at the doorstep of Jordan. The path into the future is difficult to determine, but it is clear that Jordan, along with the rest of the Arab world, stands at the threshold of a new era at the dawn of 2012.

See also Beirut; Palestine; Syria

Further Reading

Beverly Milton-Edwards and Peter Hinchcliffe, Jordan: A Hashemite Legacy, 2009; Philip Robbins, A History of Jordan, 2004; Avi

Shlaim, Collusion across the Jordan: King Abdallah, the Zionist Movement and the Partition of Palestine, 1988; Idem, Lion of Jordan: The Life of King Hussein in War and Peace, 2008.

JOHN DONOHUE

judge

A judge is an appointed official (qadi) who presides over Islamic judicial courts. A judge is responsible for determining the application of Islamic law in individual cases brought to the courts of Islamic law.

The office of the qadi was first institutionalized during the Umayyad dynasty. An Arab-Islamic precursor to this office, however, can be found in the role of arbitrator (hakam). In pre-Islamic Arabian society, disputes between two parties were often settled by a mutually appointed hakam—a role the Prophet Muhammad filled during his time in Medina. Muhammad and his immediate successors in the early and mid-seventh century seem to have appointed hakams to arbitrate on the leader's behalf. By the late seventh century, the Islamic Empire had expanded considerably, and Umayyad rulers introduced an array of bureaucratic innovations designed to facilitate the administration of justice. Among them was the systematic appointment of judges (though the precise dates of the first appointments are difficult to determine). Umayyad caliphs directly appointed a judge to each province to adjudicate court cases in that area. The judge was a delegate of the state and subject to removal at any time. Islamic jurisprudence was still in its infancy, and judges of that period ruled at their discretion, though informed by Qur'anic injunctions and Arab and local customs. As legal scholarship flourished and became more methodologically systematized in the eighth and ninth centuries, ruling authorities regularly began to appoint judges who were trained in jurisprudence.

Abbasid caliphs regularly chose judges from among an emerging class of jurists or legal specialists (fuqahā'). Such scholars often hesitated or even refused to accept such an appointment, as many jurists were uncomfortable with executing judgment on an individual—a role said to belong to God—and particularly with doing so as an instrument of the state, not to mention the moral dangers involved in the temptation to take bribes or to make decisions in favor of the caliph or other powerful and influential members of the government or society. The position of judge was often understood to be a corrupting influence for both political and economic motives. During the Abbasid era, a formal theoretical framework for legal decisions began to take shape, but the judge remained answerable to the political authority and ran the risk of losing his position if he made decisions counter to the ruler's political program. Although theoretically in an independent position as representative of the law, in practice the judge was appointed and could be dismissed by the caliph or sultan and so was beholden directly to the ruler and indirectly to other influential members of the government. This tension between holding a state-appointed office and following the guidelines of an independent scholarly discipline continued into the modern era. Accusations of injustice leveled against judges are not uncommon in the historical record, but occasionally judges skillfully managed the complexities of the office. The sources refer to a good judge as maḥmūd al-sīrah, or "of praiseworthy behavior," and some of the most esteemed scholars of Islamic history also served as judges of the state, such as Ibn Rushd, known in the West as Averroes (d. 1198), and al-Asqalani (d. 1449).

In most premodern contexts, the authority of the judge was solely vested in his personage, and judges heard cases in diverse places, including marketplaces and private homes, rather than in a building reserved for the purposes of adjudication. The judge's authority was not only reserved to the jurisdiction to which he was appointed but also limited with regard to types of cases. A judge had no power to initiate an investigation or to bring an individual to trial, unlike the police (shurṭa), who had their own courts. Instead, the judge arbitrated cases brought before him by two or more willing parties seeking resolution of a question or dispute. Such cases were almost entirely related to civil and religious law. Criminal law cases typically fell to the police or, when deemed a more serious threat to public order, the caliph's court.

In the Umayyad and Abbasid eras, a judge often held other positions simultaneously, such as that of a professor of law, treasurer, tax official, or even chief of police (ṣāḥib al-shurṭa). As government officials, judges typically worked in tandem with other public offices to preserve public order. Various assistants facilitated the judge's work, particularly a notary-witness (shāhid 'adl), who was responsible for legally verifying admitted testimonies or documents, and a scribe (kātib), who kept official court records. Occasionally, a judge would enlist the assistance of other specialists to give their legal opinions (fatwas) on a given matter. Such fatwas, however, were neither decisive nor binding from a legal standpoint since the judge retained full authority to issue the final verdict (hukm). In addition to adjudication, the judge oversaw pious endowments and the inheritance of estates and saw to the well-being of orphans and other disadvantaged persons in his jurisdiction.

Legal scholars of the early and classical period debated what qualifications a judge should have and urged caliphs to make appointments based on certain criteria. It was almost universally agreed that a judge should be a free, male Muslim known to be just, intelligent, and knowledgeable of the law. Notably, some Hanafi legal scholars believed women were eligible to serve as judges in some types of cases. Other qualifications occasionally mentioned include being wise, modest, and free of certain physical disabilities that might impede performance, such as deafness or blindness.

In theory, the classical Islamic judiciary contained neither a judicial hierarchy nor appellate courts, though the Abbasid caliph Harun al-Rashid (r. 786–809) established an enduring custom of appointing a chief judge (qāḍī al-quḍāt or, as it came to be known in Muslim Spain and North Africa, qāḍī al-jamā'a) for the capital city. The chief judge functioned on the level of a vizier and was responsible for appointing judges to the provinces, yet he did not represent a higher court to which appeals could be made. The decision of any judge was final. In practice, however, several avenues existed for rulings to be overturned; the most obvious among them was the maẓālim (injustices) court. Established in the Abbasid era, the maẓālim court was a venue in which complaints of injustice or corruption (be it against a vizier, judge, or otherwise) were presented directly to the caliph. Islamic law was not necessarily authoritative in a maẓālim court—though the latter's existence was often justified in terms of the shari'a. In the court's early days, the caliph himself judged cases in which the interests of the state were paramount. In later centuries, caliphs often appointed a vizier or judge to act as judge of the maẓālim court. David Powers, in his article "On Judicial Review in Islamic Law," has shown that other means also existed by which rulings could be overturned. In addition to the right of a judge to overturn his own rulings, a process of "successor review" existed among the judges. Upon taking office, a newly appointed judge would review the court records of the previous incumbent. Any prior rulings on record could be overturned by the incoming judge.

See also arbitration; endowment; ijtihād and taqlīd; judicial courts; jurisprudence; justice; police

Further Reading

Irit Bligh-Abramski, "The Judiciary (Qāḍīs) as a Governmental-Administrative Tool in Early Islam," Journal of the Economic and Social History of the Orient 35, no. 1 (1992); Muhammad Khalid Masud, Rudolph Peters, and David S. Powers, eds., Dispensing Justice in Islam: Qadis and Their Judgments, 2006; Al-Mawardi, The Ordinances of Government, al-Aḥkām al-Sulṭāniyya wa'l-Wilāyāt al-Dīniyya, translated by Wafaa H. Wahba, 1996; David S. Powers, "On Judicial Review in Islamic Law," Law and Society Review 26, no. 2 (1992); Émile Tyan, "Judicial Organization," in Law in the Middle East: Volume I, Origin and Development of Islamic Law, edited by Majid Khadduri and Herbert J. Liebesny, 1955.

MATTHEW PIERCE

judicial courts

Medieval Sunni Islamic law recognized numerous judicial or quasi-judicial institutions that had the power to resolve disputes and whose decisions were subject to enforcement by the state. The most basic institution was that of the qadi (also called ḥākim). Both terms (or derivatives of each) are found in the Qur'an and the hadith to indicate some dispute-resolution mechanism, although in those instances, given the historical context, they may refer to mechanisms that were more arbitral in nature rather than courts of law established by a state. Upon the Abbasid institutionalization of the Islamic state, other judicial institutions were established alongside that of the qadi, such as the nāẓir al-maẓālim, the wālī al-jarā'im, and the muḥtasib. The nāẓir al-maẓālim was primarily a forum for the vindication of claims against government officials as well as disputes within the government bureaucracy, the wālī al-jarā'im was responsible for the punishment of criminals, and the muḥtasib was largely responsible for maintaining the good order of public spaces (in particular, the market). Ordinary civil disputes, however, were almost entirely the province of the qadi, and for that reason, the qadi has been traditionally viewed as the exemplar of the Muslim judge.

The Ideals of Judging: From Taboo to Learning and Impartiality

For Sunni writers on judging, the position of judge posed a dilemma. On the one hand, it was an office of immense political significance in the practical life of the Muslim community. In addition, giving judgment in accordance with Islamic law was also a collective obligation of the community, and therefore it could not be ignored. On the other hand, judging was a morally risky activity. A judge might be unjust as a result of either ignorance or venality. Even a just judge faced the constant temptation to abuse his position to enrich either himself or his friends. This ambivalence toward judges and judging is reflected in numerous cautionary tales regarding early scholars who, out of piety, not only refused the post but also were willing to endure the ruler's punishment for their refusal. It is also reflected in hadiths such as the one attributed to the Prophet Muhammad in which he is reported to have said, "Two judges in Hell, one judge in Paradise." Nevertheless, it would be a mistake to assume such stories represent a universal attitude among religious scholars, even in the early community. After all, Abu Yusuf Ya'qub b. Ibrahim and Muhammad b. al-Hasan al-Shaybani, Abu Hanifa's two most prominent disciples, and even Shafi'i were all reported to have served as judges at some point in their lives. Instead, Muslim scholars developed an ethic for judges based on two principal ideals: learning and impartiality. A judge who lacked legal knowledge was by definition unjust, unless he took advice from the learned and applied their counsel in resolving disputes. More important (at least in the sense that scholars spent more time thinking about it) was the requirement of impartiality. This placed all sorts of limitations on the judge and how the court should be organized. Scholars debated whether the impartiality ideal meant that only strangers should be appointed judges; it certainly meant that a judge could not engage in private business ventures with persons in his jurisdiction. It also meant that a judge could not hear cases in which his impartiality could be doubted, such as a case involving his friends, enemies, or close family members. By the 11th century, the extreme fear of judging that appears in narratives in the early centuries of Islam seems to have disappeared, replaced by the ethic of learning and impartiality. As a consequence, leading jurists by this time were able to accept the position of judge without fear of censure.

The Court's Jurisdiction

A qadi, in addition to being individually qualified by way of specialized learning in Islamic law ('ilm) and his exemplary ethical character ('adāla), must be appointed to his office by the ruler (caliph) or his representative (nā'ib). The scope of a judge's jurisdiction, whether in terms of the cases he is allowed to hear or the persons who can be brought before him, is determined exclusively by the terms of his appointment. If a judge exceeds the jurisdictional limits included in the terms of his appointment, whether by ruling on a matter for which he lacks jurisdictional competence or by ruling against a person not falling within the geographical limitations of his jurisdiction, his judgment is void.

The power to determine the judge's jurisdiction became a very important tool in legal reform, not only during the 19th century period of reforms known as the Tanzimat, but also in prior periods of Ottoman history. Pre-19th-century jurists, for example, stated that where a judge, pursuant to the jurisdictional terms of his appointment, is required to render judgment according to specified legal doctrines, he lacks power to rule according to other legal doctrines—despite their Islamic validity—and if he does, his judgment is void. This doctrine was reaffirmed in the Majalla and was also used by modernizing states such as Egypt in connection with family law reforms—for example, by prohibiting courts from hearing claims arising out of contested marriages that had not been registered with the civil authorities.

A judge obtained his office only through a valid appointment from the ruler and could be dismissed at the ruler's will. (Muslims living outside the jurisdiction of an Islamic state, however, could appoint, and indeed were required to appoint, a judge for themselves.) Even so, Muslim jurists understood the judge to be a representative of the community generally rather than of the ruler who appointed him. For this reason, a qadi's jurisdiction did not lapse with the death or dismissal of the official who appointed him, unlike, for example, the ruler's minister (vizier), who was understood to be the ruler's personal lieutenant.

The Judge's Relationship to Islamic Law

Until the 12th century, Muslim judges in theory were mujtahids, meaning that they were required to render judgment directly from revelation in light of the Islamic foundational texts (the Qur'an and the reported teachings of the Prophet) or to use some valid method of interpretation to arrive at the applicable rule of law. In this period of Islamic legal history, attempts by the appointing authority to restrict a judge's right to independent legal interpretation were resisted by Muslim jurists, some holding that any stipulation in the appointment of a judge that purported to restrict the judge's right to engage in ijtihād—the independent search by a competent expert for God's rule as derived from revelation using the accepted interpretive methods set forth in works of theoretical jurisprudence (uṣūl al-fiqh)—was void; others went so far as to hold that inclusion of such a provision rendered the appointment invalid in its entirety. It should be noted, however, that the famous ninth-century Maliki jurist and judge of Ifriqiya, Sahnun, was reported to have required all judges in his jurisdiction to rule exclusively according to the doctrine of Malik b. Anas (d. 795), even if they were followers of Abu Hanifa.

Regardless of jurists' insistence on the right of judges to engage in ijtihād, the desire to ensure some predictability in legal outcomes, which was famously manifested as early as the eighth century in Ibn al-Muqaffa''s Risala fi al-Sahaba (Epistle on the caliph's entourage), as well as the increasing availability of a relatively stable and sophisticated body of jurisprudence, meant that by the end of the 11th century, resistance to the idea that a judge could be a muqallid (a legal official who defers to the legal opinion of a mujtahid) had substantially declined. Accordingly, Muslim jurists began to organize the doctrines of the various schools into a form (mukhtaṣar) that would be easier for judges to use based on a theory that an authoritative rule—described as the mashhūr in the Maliki school and the ẓāhir al-riwāya in the Hanafi school—exists within each legal school and that judges, insofar as they were muqallids, were obliged to judge on the basis of that rule. These two developments—the convention that all judges were muqallids and the convention that the muqallid judge was obliged to rule in accordance with the authoritative doctrine of his school—provided a doctrinal justification for a system of judicial review to ensure that judges complied with the rules of their particular school.

By the Ottoman period, qadis no longer applied Islamic law exclusively—at least if that term is understood to apply to the rules of fiqh alone. The rules of fiqh were those rules that could be traced to the interpretive activity of Muslim legal scholars as distinguished from the rule-making activity of the state and its agents. The Ottomans, for example, had issued numerous positive laws, known as kanun, that found their way into an ordinary judge's court. For example, the Ottomans placed a ceiling on the amount of interest that could be charged in connection with a popular ḥīla (legal fiction) used to circumvent the prohibition against interest-bearing loans, and Ottoman-era jurists applied that rule in disputes arising out of such transactions. In addition, Ottoman-era qadis increasingly took over responsibilities for administration of the criminal law, which in substance usually derived at least in part from kanuns.

The Religious Dimension of a Judge's Decision

Just as the corruption or ignorance of an individual judge could subvert the ends of the legal system, so too could the corruption of the litigants. Both the Qur'an and the hadith warn individuals against the temptation of manipulating the judicial system in order to deprive others of their rights. In addition to the risk that parties might manipulate the system for their own ends, there was also the question of a judicial ruling based on a controversial rule of law: did the judge's ruling in such a case effectively resolve the moral controversy for the purposes of the next life before God, or were its effects limited to the secular world?

As a general matter, Muslim jurists distinguished between the purely legal consequences of a judicial ruling in this life, which they referred to as ẓāhir, and its religious consequences, which they referred to as bāṭin. If the prevailing party intentionally corrupted the court's decision by, for example, conspiring with the witnesses to submit a false claim (with certain exceptions to this rule among the Hanafi jurists in the area of family law), then, as a general rule, the judge's decision lacked any moral weight. If a judge were to learn subsequently that the initial judgment had been obtained fraudulently, it could be reversed. Where the prevailing party did not win as the result of intentionally false evidence but did prevail based on a controversial rule of law (e.g., a judge ruling that an adult woman did not need her father's consent to marry), jurists disagreed over whether the judge's ruling in fact changed the moral rule governing the conduct at issue. It appears that during the first centuries of Islamic history, jurists believed that the judge's decision in controversial areas of law did not resolve the underlying moral controversy. In later centuries, particularly after the 13th-century Maliki jurist Shihab al-din al-Qarafi strongly supported the view that a valid judicial decision based on a controversial legal rule conclusively resolved the moral as well as legal controversy involved in the dispute, Muslim jurists generally accepted the proposition that a judge's decision, untainted by fraud, resolved the moral as well as the legal controversy, but on the condition that the prevailing plaintiff did not assert a claim based on a controversial rule that he or she subjectively rejected. An example of such a case would be a Maliki who obtained a right of first refusal from a Hanafi judge based solely on his status as a neighbor of the seller, even though as a Maliki he rejected the validity of that rule.

Courts in the Post-Ottoman Era

As part of the legal reforms initiated by the Ottoman Empire in the 19th and 20th centuries, state-promulgated civil codes gradually began to displace the role of uncodified fiqh in the Ottoman legal system and in the legal systems of the successor states to the Ottoman Empire. The main impetus for replacing uncodified Islamic law with civil law codes modeled on European codes was a desire not so much to abandon Islamic law as such but rather to recast it in a manner that would make it more amenable to the needs of a centralizing and modernizing state. Whereas premodern Islamic jurists attempted to minimize the state's control over substantive law, post-Ottoman states, largely with the support of the modern legal class, asserted their control over courts (usually through the state's control of a court's jurisdiction) to further modernization projects. In this context, the Egyptian model of a civil code, derived at least in part from substantive Islamic law but applied by a secularly trained class of judges, has proven to be particularly influential throughout the Arab world.

See also ijtihād and taqlīd; jurisprudence

Further Reading

Nathan J. Brown, The Rule of Law in the Arab World, 1997; Mohammad Fadel, "The Social Logic of Taqlīd and the Rise of the Mukhtasar," Islamic Law and Society 3, no. 2 (1996); Sherman Jackson, Islamic Law and the State: The Constitutional Jurisprudence of Shihāb al-Dīn al-Qarāfī, 1996; Baber Johansen, "Truth and Validity of the Qadi's Judgment: A Legal Debate Among Muslim Sunnite Jurists from the Ninth to the Thirteenth Centuries," Recht van de Islam 14 (1997).

MOHAMMAD FADEL

jurisprudence

Jurisprudence in an Islamic context refers on the one hand to the corpus of laws or legal rulings and knowledge of the law, both termed fiqh. A jurist is therefore termed a faqīh, one endowed with knowledge of the law. On the other hand, jurisprudence also refers to the principles on which individual laws are based, or the hermeneutical system by which legal rulings on particular cases are derived, in which case it corresponds to the term uṣūl al-fiqh, literally "the roots of the law" but technically the science of legal hermeneutics. Already by the second Islamic century, fiqh had become a technical term signifying the academic discussion of Islamic law (shari'a). The term fiqh designates human activity and the specific legal rulings jurists reach; it cannot be ascribed to God or to the Prophet Muhammad. The shari'a, imposed on humankind by God's revelation and embodied in the foundational texts of the Qur'an and hadith, is explained and elaborated by the interpretive activity of jurists. Since this is the only access to the law in practice, shari'a and fiqh often overlap in usage, though the former retains the connotation of the divine (the law as God wills it) and the latter retains the connotation of the human (the law as an approximation of God's will as determined by jurists).

In its widest sense, fiqh covers many aspects of religious, political, and civil life, including both practical and theoretical regulation and justification. The two most important genres of juristic literature are furūʿ al-fiqh (the branches of the law) and uṣūl al-fiqh (the roots of the law). Furūʿ al-fiqh works are compendia that set out the rulings on specific areas of the law in chapters that follow a recognized order, in greater or lesser detail and with varying amounts of justificatory argument. Uṣūl al-fiqh works identify and classify the sources of law and the methods adopted to derive legal rules and assessments from the evidence of revelation. These works also present a structure of authority that distinguishes the qualified jurist (mufti, mujtahid) from the layman (muqallid), excluding the caliphs and scholars who are not trained specifically as jurists, such as theologians and hadith experts, in the interpretation and elaboration of the law. Ideally, uṣūl al-fiqh may be seen as a pure science in comparison with the applied science of furūʿ al-fiqh.

Most major works of furūʿ al-fiqh discuss the points of law under three main divisions: 'ibādāt (acts of worship), muʿāmalāt (civil transactions), and qaḍāyā (court cases) or ḥudūd (prescribed criminal punishments). The 'ibādāt section focuses on acts of religious devotion that are one's individual obligation toward God and comprises rulings on ritual purity, prayer, alms, fasting, pilgrimage, and sometimes jihad, in that order, ostensibly corresponding to the frequency with which performance of the act of devotion in question is required. Mu'āmalāt, for the most part treating private law or obligations between people, is more loosely ordered and includes family law; mercantile law; and laws relating to agency, land ownership, compensation for injury, murder, and so on. The third section includes the set penalties (ḥudūd) for seven specific crimes: theft or robbery, highway banditry, apostasy, rebellion, adultery or fornication, false accusation of adultery, and drinking wine. It also includes judicial procedure. Islamic jurisprudence thus leaves relatively undefined two areas of the law that are of tremendous importance for politics: criminal law for infractions other than the ones set by the ḥudūd and public law addressing the relationship of subjects to the government, including such topics as the payment of taxes. Historically, a compromise of sorts developed between the jurists and the rulers whereby the jurists recognized the legitimacy of the ruler and relinquished the right to control a great deal of public law in return for the monarch's public commitment to the shari'a, recognition of the jurists' authority, and recognition of the jurists' control over private law—the law between individuals. These gaps opened up the possibility for the prosecution of many crimes not treated in the foundational texts and the application of various punishments to those convicted of committing them—termed ta'zīr in the legal tradition. It also opened up space for the relatively free elaboration of public law. The best-known and most developed of these systems is the kanun of the Ottoman Empire, which governed large areas of public law and procedure in government institutions.

Books on the points of law display literary formalism and casuistry but also attention to practical concerns and hardheaded realism. The four major Sunni schools of law or traditions of legal study—the Hanafi, Maliki, Shafi'i, and Hanbali madhhabs—as well as the Shi'i tradition show a broadly similar approach to the genre in this sense. There is a dual hermeneutical aspect to works in this genre: an interpretive relationship to the school tradition and a further interpretive relationship to the Qur'an and sunna. As loyal members of a legal school, jurists are committed to a discursive engagement with their past, the creative dimension of which is termed ijtihād, and the duty of submission, taqlīd. These legal schools functioned as authorizing institutions whose interrelations were governed by normative pluralism.

The standard content of a work of Sunni uṣūl al-fiqh may be exemplified by the al-Mustasfa min 'Ilm al-Usul (Methods of jurisprudence) of Ghazali (d. 1111), which represents a high point in the development of the genre. The position of uṣūl al-fiqh in relation to the other Islamic sciences is explained therein; the uṣūlī, or legal theorist, accepts the results of theology and hadith criticism and then explicates the way in which Islam's foundational texts indicate juristic norms, whether by explicit or implied meaning or through deduction and logical derivation. There are four broad areas of discussion: categories of the legal assessment of acts (mandatory, preferred, permitted, disliked, and forbidden); sources of the law (Qur'an, hadith, consensus, and analogy or independent reasoning); hermeneutical rules that permit extrapolation of norms from sources (analogical reasoning, a fortiori argument, reductio ad absurdum, etc.); and elaboration of the theory of ijtihād or independent reasoning.

The origins of Islamic jurisprudence are contested. Modern scholarship has rejected the traditional view that Islamic law began as a more or less mature system during or immediately after the lifetime of the Prophet. According to conventional understanding, fiqh came into being toward the end of the eighth century, created by jurists endorsing, modifying, or rejecting the popular and administrative practice of the Umayyad period. Revisionist scholarship has instead emphasized the emergence of fiqh from ancient Near Eastern legal cultures, Arabian customary law, or independent development. The Risala (Treatise) of Shafi'i (d. 820) was previously considered to be the first treatise in uṣūl al-fiqh, the work that established the genre, but it has been judged by contemporary scholars to be either a late work or a work the implications of which it took time to discover.

Since their emergence in classical Islamic history, the genres of furū' and uṣūl al-fiqh have been produced continually until the present day, finding their most important social realization in the Islamic legal educational system. With the emergence of the madrasa, or college of Islamic law, in the 11th century, fiqh was recognized as the main purpose of education and retained this position until the decline of the traditional system in the 19th and 20th centuries. In modern times, three major factors have radically affected fiqh, mostly as a result of Western influence: the gradual emergence of secular educational systems; the appearance of independent nation-states and their associated legal forms, including law codes, constitutions, and statute law; and the ideological dissociation of political opposition from the tradition of fiqh.

Scholarly debate on Islamic jurisprudence has been cast in relation to modern legal reforms, especially concerning the possibility of change in the law and the challenge to a number of standard rules of interpretation. The "closure of the gate of ijtihād" was previously understood to have contributed to the rigidity of Islamic law and the decline of Muslim societies. Recent scholarship has challenged this theory and presented Islamic legal hermeneutics as a method for the discovery and development of legal rules, implying a capacity for change and evolution. Some maintain that Islamic legal theory is not developmental but rather concerned with the discovery of the law as an eternal and enduring truth, while others claim that Islamic theory is either largely divorced from the practical content of the law or used arbitrarily to justify legal assessments predetermined by tradition or various biases. The interplay of legal theory and practice has thus become an important object of scholarly study and debate. Beginning in the 19th century, Muslim reformers, including Muhammad 'Abduh (d. 1905) and Rashid Rida (d. 1935), decried the rigid boundaries that had formed between the various madhhab traditions of Islamic law. They argued not only for modern jurists' freedom to choose from all the legal positions found in the sources (takhayyur) and to borrow from other Islamic legal traditions—termed talfīq (piecing together)—but also for recognition that laws can and should change according to historical circumstances. A new field came into being, that of fiqh muqāran (comparative law), which involved studying similar issues across the madhhabs. One famous example of talfīq put into practice was the reform in the Anglo-Muhammadan legal system of the Hanafi law of divorce in order to facilitate the wife's access to divorce by using a principle borrowed from Maliki law. Other modernists, such as 'Alī 'Abd al-Raziq (d. 1966), argued for the rejection or limitation of consensus, the unanimous agreement of the jurists that acts as a sanctifying authority and makes a particular legal position historically unassailable, according to classical legal theory. Many thinkers have sought to limit the application of consensus, analogy, and other principles, emphasizing instead public interest (maṣlaha) or textually unregulated benefits (al-maṣālih al-mursala) as a guiding principle in the reform and elaboration of the law. Still others have argued for the rejection of the hadith as a foundational source of law, restricting that role to the Qur'an, or even to the portion of the Qur'an that was revealed at Mecca. These radical efforts at reform have met with very limited success and in many cases have been vehemently rejected. Fundamentalists and others have argued for the development of an Islamic law that is not limited by or restricted to one madhhab; in practice, however, because the vast majority of the medieval texts they consult were written within the epistemological system of the madhhabs, they have tended to fall back on positions that resemble those of one or another madhhab.

Since the late 20th century, in reaction to the encroachment in Muslim nations of secular law, which often entirely replaced Islamic law except in matters of marriage, divorce, and inheritance, many religiopolitical movements have clamored for application of the shari'a. In many cases, a vague concept of shari'a is promoted with a utopian understanding of Islamic law's ability to bring order and social justice to the nations involved by curbing corruption, fending off Western influence, and promoting public morality. Such optimism is neatly captured in the slogan popularized by the Muslim Brotherhood in Egypt and others: al-Islām huwa al-hall ("Islam is the solution"). In Saudi Arabia, Iran under the Islamic Republic, Afghanistan under the Taliban, and the Sudan, various forms of Islamic law have been instituted. Hamas in Palestine, the Front Islamique du Salut in Algeria, and many other political parties and movements in the Islamic world have made vocal calls for doing the same in their nations.

See also minorities, jurisprudence of; shari'a; 'ulama'

Further Reading

Norman Calder, Studies in Early Muslim Jurisprudence, 1993; Wael B. Hallaq, A History of Islamic Legal Theories: An Introduction to Sunnī Uṣūl al-Fiqh, 1997; Idem, The Origins and Evolution of Islamic Law, 2005; Baber Johansen, "Legal Literature and the Problem of Change: The Case of the Land Rent," in Islam and Public Law, edited by Chibli Mallat, 1993; Joseph Schacht, The Origins of Muhammadan Jurisprudence, 1959; Bernard Weiss, The Spirit of Islamic Law, 1998.

GREGORY MACK

justice

The most common terms for justice in the Qur'an are 'adl and qist; its opposite, oppression, is zulm. The foundational text of Islam exhorts believers to be just, standing with the marginalized—the orphans, the needy, and the destitute (2:177; 90:8–18)—and speaking out against oppression, even if it entails going against one's own family (4:135). The Qur'an describes a deity who is thoroughly committed to justice. Indeed, as the famous Qur'anic metaphor testifies, God will not commit any amount of injustice, even if it be the weight of a mote or speck (4:40; 99:6–8). Moreover, because God is just, righteousness according to the Qur'an is ascertained not by tribal lineage or gender affiliation—a radical departure from pre-Islamic Arabian society—but solely on the basis of taqwā, one's level of piety (49:13). Whereas God does not wrong anyone (4:40; 45:22), human beings are fully capable of either upholding justice or committing oppression.

The obligation to promote justice and curb oppression was viewed as a central function of the ruler in premodern Islamic political theory and a major feature of the social contract between the ruler and the ruled. According to the medieval scholar Mawardi (d. 1058), the subjects of the ruler owe him obedience and support and, in return, he has ten public duties: (1) guarding the faith against heresy; (2) maintaining the rule of law; (3) ensuring public safety; (4) punishing criminals; (5) defending the Muslim territory; (6) supporting the expansion of Islam and recognition of its superiority; (7) collecting taxes; (8) making payments from the treasury; (9) appointing responsible and effective officials; (10) watching over the realm personally, without delegating or shirking responsibility. Justice is stressed particularly with regard to maintaining the rule of law—the point of this is regularly described as preventing the oppression of the weak by the strong. The ruler is therefore viewed as the champion of the oppressed, even when the oppressors are government officials. For this reason, Islamic regimes instituted special courts for the redressing of injustices, termed mazālim. Instructional manuals on political leadership and court chronicles stress the ruler's obligation to facilitate the settlement of disputes and claims and to allow unrestricted access to the ruler, such as the ability of a commoner to submit a petition directly to him or to attend an audience before him. Justice is also stressed with regard to the imposition of taxes: they should be limited to legal taxes and should not be extremely burdensome or oppressive. Injustice, however, was viewed by most Sunni theorists as insufficient cause for rebellion or removing a ruler from office. While the legality of rebellion against an unjust ruler was disputed, the majority opinion was that rebellion should be discouraged and rebels subdued through negotiation if possible and by force if not.

Justice is a key theme in modern political Islamic thought. The Egyptian writer Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966) called for the creation of an Islamic state with justice as its core principle. Imprisoned and eventually executed by a regime that was clamping down on Islamic activists, Qutb wrote in a context of oppression. In Social Justice in Islam (1949) and later Milestones (1964), Qutb argued that only a government based on the sovereignty of God (ḥākimiyyat Allāh)—in other words, a distinctly "Islamic" system—could ensure both socioeconomic justice and religious harmony. During the popular upheavals against the shah of Iran in 1978–79, Ayatollah Khomeini (d. 1989) condemned the regime as an oppressive monarchy that had sold Iran to American interests. That Khomeini's alternative, fleshed out in The Guardianship of the Jurist (1971), was a state supervised by religious jurists underscores a core, and often unquestioned, assumption of political Islamic thinking: that only an "Islamic" government will translate into a truly just Muslim order.

Some of the most profound articulations of justice in Islamic religious terms have taken place outside the historic heartlands of Islam. The African American activist Malcolm X (d. 1965) saw in Islam a radical message of liberation from white supremacy. He converted to Islam while in prison and, upon his release, became the most influential minister in the Nation of Islam, transforming the then fledgling black Muslim group into a powerful voice of racial equality. African American Muslims have also played a leading role in the struggle for gender justice, most notably the feminist scholar Amina Wadud (b. 1952). By undertaking a gendered reading of the Qur'an, she has challenged the historical monopoly that men have exercised over exegesis. Using the concept of tawḥīd (the central Islamic tenet of the absolute unity of God), Wadud has argued that equality constitutes a fundamental component of gender justice in Islam. Any practice that undermines the sacrosanct equality of women and men therefore violates the very unity of God. Questions of religious pluralism have also taken center stage in the Islamic quest for justice. During the collective struggle against Apartheid, the South African Islamic scholar Farid Esack (b. 1956) articulated a Qur'anic theology of liberation committed to socioeconomic, racial, and gender justice through a framework of religious pluralism. This understanding of Islam relinquished any claim of Muslim exclusivism—that adherence to Islam constituted the only possible path toward the transcendent—in favor of interreligious solidarity against oppression.

See also equality; ethics; human rights; pluralism and tolerance; rebellion; revolutions; solidarity; tyranny

Further Reading

Nimat H. Barazangi, M. Raquibuz Zaman, and Omar Afzal, eds., Islamic Identity and the Struggle for Justice, 1996; Hamid Dabashi, Theology of Discontent: The Ideological Foundation of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, 2006; Farid Esack, Qur'an, Liberation and Pluralism: An Islamic Perspective of Interreligious Solidarity against Oppression, 1997; Toshihiko Izutsu, Ethico-Religious Concepts in the Qur'an, 2002; William E. Shepard, Sayyid Qutb and Islamic Activism: A Translation and Critical Analysis of Social Justice in Islam, 1996; Amina Wadud, Qur'an and Woman: Rereading the Sacred Text from a Woman's Perspective, 1999.

SHADAAB RAHEMTULLA

K

Kadızadeli

"Kadızadeli" is a Turkish term that literally means "a supporter of Kadızade" and refers to a 17th-century revivalist movement, arguably rooted in the socioeconomic change in the Ottoman Empire. The movement was named after Kadızade Mehmed (d. 1635), a popular preacher in Istanbul. The history of the movement is usually divided into three periods, each of which revolves around a charismatic preacher.

Kadızade's intellectual inspiration was Birgili Mehmed (1523–73), a scholar of ethics and law who was originally from Balıkesir (in northwestern Anatolia) and eventually settled in Birgi (in western Anatolia). Birgili is known for his legal challenge against the practice of cash waqf (religious endowments) sanctioned by the Ottoman grand mufti Abu al-Su'ud (d. 1574). Birgili's al-Tariqa al-Muhammadiyya (The Muhammadan Path, 1572) became one of the most popular manuals of practical ethics in the 17th and 18th centuries. In this work, Birgili placed special emphasis on "commanding right and forbidding wrong," a principle that Kadızadelis took to heart.

Kadızade Mehmed was born in Balıkesir and studied with some of the former students of Birgili before he moved to Istanbul, where he eventually became a preacher, quickly moving up in the hierarchy of mosques and reaching the peak of this career preaching at Ayasofya (Hagia Sophia). The Kadızadeli movement emerged within the context of the disagreements he had with another famous preacher at the time, Shaykh Abdülmecid Sivasi (d. 1639).

Sivasi had followed his father and uncle in the Halveti Sufi order and came to lead it in Sivas in eastern Anatolia. His fame reached the ears of Sultan Mehmed III (r. 1595–1603), who invited him to Istanbul. In Istanbul, Sivasi became the shaykh of a Halveti convent and a well-known preacher, eventually becoming the Friday preacher at the Mosque of Sultan Ahmed.

While Kadızade and Sivasi were preaching in two almost adjacent mosques in the 1630s, they came to disagree on several issues, ranging from the permissibility of coffee and tobacco to Sufi practices, including music and whirling, which is a Sufi ritual meditational dance, and the teachings of Ibn al-'Arabi (d. 1240). Their disagreements did not remain confined to the intellectual realm, as the Kadızadelis, who included both preachers and laymen, embraced his strong emphasis on the principle of "commanding right and forbidding wrong" and eventually took some of the issues to the streets. At times, their agenda converged with that of the sultan, as in the case of the closure of coffee houses by Sultan Murad IV (r. 1623–40).

After the death of Kadızade in 1635, the Kadızadelis returned to the Ottoman public space, led by Muhammad al-Ustuwani (d. 1661), who was originally from Damascus. In Istanbul he first held study circles at Ayasofya and soon received preaching appointments; he was even invited to preach in the palace. After a confrontation between the Kadızadelis and Sufis at the Fatih Mosque in 1656, Ustuwani was exiled to Cyprus. Köprülü Mehmed Pasha (d. 1661), a grand vizier with extraordinary powers, had no tolerance for public disturbances.

It was Köprülü's son, Fazıl Ahmed, who brought the next leader of the Kadızadelis, Vani Mehmed (d. 1685), to the capital after having been impressed by him in a meeting in Erzurum, and Vani arrived in Istanbul when Fazıl Ahmed had already become the grand vizier. His sermons brought him many admirers, including Sultan Mehmed IV (r. 1648–87), who chose Vani as his sons' tutor and his own mentor. In this capacity, he persuaded the sultan to prohibit certain Sufi practices, such as whirling, in the late 1660s—a decision that was reversed after the gradual disappearance of the Kadızadeli movement.

Studies focused on the Kadızadeli movement have pointed out several factors, such as the tension between the privileged members of the Ottoman 'ulama', who were at times targeted by the Kadızadelis, and the Ottoman preachers, as well as the tension between preachers who belonged to Sufi orders and those who did not. The common provincial origins of all Kadızadeli leaders and the lack of knowledge about their family backgrounds suggest that they were all of modest means in comparison with the higher-ranking members of the Ottoman 'ulama' and Sufi shaykhs who mostly belonged to well-established families.

There are also some indications that the Kadızadelis might well have been targeting certain privileged socioeconomic groups, such as the Janissaries, many of whom in that period were merchants. A better understanding of this group also requires comparative studies that would take into account the impact of the thought of Ahmad Sirhindi (1564–1624) in the Ottoman Empire.

See also Ottomans (1299–1924)

Further Reading

Marc David Baer, Honored by the Glory of Islam: Conversion and Conquest in Ottoman Europe, 2008; Necati Öztürk, Islamic Orthodoxy among the Ottomans in the Seventeenth Century with Special Reference to the Qadi-Zade Movement (PhD diss., University of Edinburgh, 1981); Derin Terzioğlu, Sufi and Dissident in the Ottoman Empire: Niyazi-i Misri (1618–1694) (PhD diss., Harvard University, 1999); Madeline Zilfi, The Politics of Piety: The Ottoman Ulema in the Postclassical Age (1600–1800), 1988.

BAKI TEZCAN

Karbala

Karbala is a town in Iraq, approximately 80 kilometers southwest of Baghdad. It is one of the most important shrine-cities ('atabāt) of Shi'i Islam. After the death of the caliph Mu'awiya b. Abi Sufyan (d. 680), Husayn b. 'Ali, the Prophet's grandson and third Shi'i imam, had agreed to lead the revolt of the "party of 'Ali" (Shi'at 'Ali), which considered the succession of Yazid I, designated by his father, to be unlawful. On October 10, 680, Husayn was killed in Karbala in a battle against Umayyad forces, allegedly together with 72 companions. Husayn's tragic end made 'Ashura', as the day is commonly called, the central reference point of Imami Shi'i cultural memory.

Imamis viewed Husayn's martyrdom in cosmic dimensions as predestined: God had revealed it to Adam, all pre-Islamic prophets, and Muhammad. Husayn was believed to have been aware of his destiny and to have consented to it, as it would achieve ultimate victory for his followers on the Day of Judgment, an idea that makes Husayn a Christlike figure undergoing what seems to be redemptive suffering. In other forms of Shi'ism, this idea is less prominent or wholly absent, and it is also wholly unknown in Sunni Islam. To the Imamis, however, Husayn was the Prince of the Martyrs (sayyid al-shuhadā'), and visiting his grave was sometimes considered more meritorious than making the pilgrimage to Mecca.

The only way for the Imamis to partake in this promised salvation was by engaging in constant remembrance of the tragedy of Karbala. From early on, therefore, a number of rituals evolved that emphasized mourning and weeping over the fate of Husayn. The earliest reports stem from the tenth century, when the Buyids (a Persian dynasty that controlled the Abbasid caliphate between 945 and 1055) allowed public memorial services in Baghdad, but the tradition as such is clearly older and seems to have started shortly after the events. Processions incorporating breast beating and other expressions of grief were part of these gatherings and from the beginning had the potential to spark sectarian clashes. Gradually, a literary genre commemorating Karbala developed; its most prominent work was Rawdat al-Shuhada' (The garden of the martyrs) by the Persian preacher Husayn al-Wa'iz al-Kashifi (d. 1504–5). During the Safavid (1501–1722) and especially Qajar (1794–1925) periods, these works evolved into stage presentations (ta'ziya), which took on the form of a Persian national theater over time. Eventually, self-flagellation rituals were introduced (originating probably in the Caucasus and Azerbaijan regions and possibly under Christian influence), which comprised the use of chains and swords.

The mourning rituals always aimed at linking Husayn's fate to that of the believer in his lifetime, but until the 20th century, the interpretation focused on salvation in the hereafter. In the 20th century, it was transformed into a revolutionary ideology that placed active resistance against any oppressor in this world at the center. The Iranian writer 'Ali Shari'ati (1933–77) had the most lasting influence in this regard. He blended 'Ashura' with a Marxist view of history, and his sentence "Every day is 'Ashura', every place is Karbala" became a central slogan in the Iranian Revolution in 1979, when the shah was equated with the caliph Yazid. Since then, the politicization of Karbala has been used in other contexts in Iran (e.g., during the war against Iraq in the 1980s) and also in India and Lebanon (where the label "Yazid" was attached to the Israeli occupying forces in the 1990s). In Iraq, the significance of Karbala itself dramatically increased since the shrine became accessible again for pilgrims after the fall of Saddam Hussein (d. 2006) in 2003.

The rituals of self-flagellation have been rejected by many Shi'i scholars (mainly on the grounds that they were unlawful innovations and harmed the image of Shi'ism worldwide) and even formally forbidden by Ayatollah Khamene'i in 1994. Nevertheless, they remain an integral part of the Muharram rites outside Iran as well as a major issue in anti-Shi'i polemical literature.

See also India; Iran; Lebanon; Shi'ism; Umayyads (661–750)

Further Reading

Kamran Scot Aghaie, The Martyrs of Karbala: Shi'i Symbols and Rituals in Modern Iran, 2004; Mahmoud Ayoub, Redemptive Suffering in Islām: A Study of the Devotional Aspects of 'Āshūrā' in Twelver Shī'ism, 1978; Werner Ende, "The Flagellations of Muharram and the Shi'ite 'Ulama'", Der Islam 55, no. 1 (1978); Jan Hjärpe, "The Ta'ziya Ecstacy as Political Expression," in Religious Ecstasy, edited by N. G. Holm, 1982; Wayne R. Husted, "Karbalā' Made Immediate: The Martyr as Model in Imāmī Shī'ism," The Muslim World 83, nos. 3–4 (1993); Yitzhak Nakash, "An Attempt to Trace the Origin of the Rituals of 'Āshūrā'," Die Welt des Islams 33 (1993).

RAINER BRUNNER

Karramis

The Karramis (Karrāmiyya) were a theological group that flourished in the Iranian province of Khurasan between the 9th and 12th centuries. Their founder, Abu 'Abdallah Muhammad b. Karram (d. 869), achieved fame as an ascetic and fiery preacher. He began preaching his doctrines in his home province of Sistan but was expelled by the local authorities on charges of heresy. Ibn Karram was eventually accepted in the city of Nishapur, where he gained many converts, most of whom were from the lower classes. Eventually, the school was adopted and patronized by the Ghaznavid dynasty, which built a few madrasas and Sufi lodges (khānaqāhs) for the Karramis.

Theologically, the school was very close to the traditionalist Hanbali school (Ibn Karram had been a pupil of Ahmad b. Hanbal [d. 855]). Ibn Karram's teachings have been described by opponent groups as "anthropomorphic," and the group achieved notoriety for their harsh polemics and tactics against more rationalist trends in Islam. They reached the pinnacle of their power in Nishapur in the tenth century but were eventually expelled to the neighboring province of Ghur, where it appears they dwindled into nonexistence.

The Karramis, due to their attitudes toward other groups and their anthropomorphic tendencies, were anathematized by all later authors who mentioned them. It was the Karramis who, during one of their power surges, accused the famous Ash'ari Ibn Furak (d. 1015) of heresy, and it is alleged that they eventually poisoned him. They were also at the forefront of instigating the notorious expulsion of the Ash'aris from Nishapur in 1053. Perhaps the most famous opponent of the Karramis was the Ash'ari theologian Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1210), who engaged in many public debates with the group and wrote extensively against them.

The Karramis adopted many elements of Hanafi jurisprudence, although it appears they had some unique legal opinions of their own. They stressed a simple lifestyle, shunned excessive worldly pleasures, and prohibited certain forms of economic gain. Despite their prominence, they were unable to leave a lasting intellectual legacy, and only a handful of their works exist in manuscript form in contemporary times.

See also heresiography

Further Reading

Edmund Bosworth, "The Rise of the Karāmiyyah in Khurasan," The Muslim World 50, no. 1 (1960); Wilferd Madelung, Religious Trends in Early Islamic Iran, 1988; Margaret Malamud, "The Politics of Heresy in Medieval Khurasan: The Karramiyya in Nishapur," Iranian Studies 27, nos. 1–4 (1994); Aron Zysow, "Two Unrecognized Karrāmī Texts," Journal of the American Oriental Society 108, no. 4 (1988).

YASIR QADHI

Kharijis

The origins of this dissident sect of the Umayyad and early Abbasid periods are generally traced to the First Islamic Civil War (656–61) and in particular to the divisions within 'Ali b. Abi Talib's camp following his acceptance of the Syrian call for arbitration at the Battle of Siffin (657). The name of the sect (those who go out) is frequently associated with the secession of pious elements at Kufa opposed to 'Ali's decision; nevertheless, precisely what was at issue between those first "Kharijis" and 'Ali is hard to pinpoint, and their famous slogan "Judgment belongs only to God" (the so-called taḥkīm, from which is derived another name for the sect) may have been born out of wider concerns than merely the arbitration episode. Recent scholarship has understood the name "Khariji" not as deriving from a particular foundational-event during 'Ali's caliphate but as a self-designation, possibly drawn from Qur'an 4:100, intended to underscore the link between emigration and militant activism. During the decades that followed the First Civil War, the Khariji movement established itself as one of the principal streams of opposition to Umayyad authority in Iraq, Iran, Jazira, parts of the Arabian Peninsula, and the Maghrib.

Khariji resistance can be found as early as the 660s and 670s among small groups of militants around Kufa and Basra who shared a similar rejectionist stance toward the political establishment in Iraq. Many of these men had a reputation for ascetic piety (excessive prayer, fasting, and night vigils), as well as a particular attachment to scripture. The most fundamental Khariji political ideas were first incubated in this milieu of small, face-to-face groups sharply dissociating from their enemies while convinced of their own exclusive status as the true "People of Paradise." By the 680s, the center of Khariji activity had shifted to Basra, and under the pressure of the Second Civil War, their doctrines were debated and systematized as the movement itself broke into competing subsects.

Two key doctrines distinguished the Kharijis from other Muslims of the time. First, they saw the imamate as an office held on the basis of merit (variously understood as piety, knowledge, or militancy) rather than descent; should an imam lose his superior merit, he must also lose his office. The membership in the tribe of Quraysh shared by the first caliphs of Medina as well as the Umayyads was held to be irrelevant: Abu Bakr and 'Umar b. al-Khattab were both seen as legitimate on the basis of merit; 'Uthman b. 'Affan and 'Ali were both seen to have gone wrong and thus were lawfully removed from office (i.e., assassinated). The Umayyads were seen as illegitimate "imams of error" from the start, and it was up to the believers to take action in order to replace them with more suitable leadership. They held that the community retained the ultimate right to remove its imam. Accordingly, while the Kharijis ascribed both religious and political authority to their imams, they nevertheless granted them unquestioned obedience only insofar as they retained their superior merit. This does something to explain the fissiparous nature of the Khariji movement, which generated numerous subsects. Merit also superseded Arab ethnicity: the imam could be (and in practice sometimes was) a non-Arab, an expression of the ethnic egalitarianism that attracted non-Arabs to the movement from a relatively early period.

Second, all Kharijis judged ordinary Muslims to be infidels, a doctrinal stance known as takfīr. Believers were to join up with the true community by leaving the company of infidels in the garrison towns (i.e., performing hijra, or emigration) and actively establishing their own imamates. When engaging ordinary Muslims in battle, they were to treat them in every respect as the infidels they were: such people could be despoiled of their property, enslaved, and killed indiscriminately (isti'rād).

It was the second of these two key doctrines, takfīr, that generated differences of opinion and doctrinal systematization among the Kharijis of Basra during the 680s and afterward. Extremists such as the Azariqa and Najadat, active in western Iran and Arabia, maintained the original Khariji insistence on total separation from infidels. They tolerated no intermarriage or inheritance between themselves and ordinary Muslims and insisted on emigration and holy war. (Armchair Kharijis who did not actively seek to establish an imamate were to be considered unbelievers, while those who made hijra would retain their status as "People of Paradise," even if they sinned on occasion.) Others took a more moderate path. Without denying the infidel status of ordinary Muslims, they considered them infidels of a different sort. "Hypocrites" (munāfiqūn) was the usual term, or alternatively (and much later) "those who are ungrateful for God's blessings" (kuffār ni'ma). Either way, a complete severance of relations was no longer obligatory in all circumstances. The point was to justify coexistence until a resumption of political and military activity was practical. This moderate tendency came to be embodied in the Ibadi sect, the only surviving Khariji group. The more extreme wings of the Khariji movement met with suppression and flared out or, in one notable case, survived for a time by denying the very obligation to have an imam (and hence the need for emigration and holy war by which an imamate could be established). Extremist Kharijism can be found in contemporary times only in the political discourse surrounding certain radical Islamist groups, such as the one called Takfir and Hijra by the Egyptian authorities in the 1970s.

See also 'Ali b. Abi Talib (ca. 599–661); civil war; heresiography; Ibadis; theology

Further Reading

Patricia Crone, God's Rule: Government and Islam, 2004; Jeffrey Kenney, Muslim Rebels: Kharijites and the Politics of Extremism in Egypt, 2006; Keith Lewinstein, "The Azāriqa in Islamic Heresiography," Bulletin of the School of Oriental and African Studies no. 54 (1991); Wilferd Madelung, Religious Trends in Early Islamic Iran, 1988; Chase Robinson, Empire and Elites after the Muslim Conquest, 2000.

KEITH LEWINSTEIN

Khilafat movement (1919–24)

The short-lived Khilafat movement (from the term khilāfat—caliphate) was an agitation by Indian Muslims, allied with the Indian nationalist movement, during the years following World War I. Its purpose was to pressure the British government to preserve the authority of the Ottoman sultan as caliph of Islam. Integral to this was the Muslims' desire to influence the treaty-making process following the war in such a way as to restore the 1914 boundaries of the Ottoman Empire. The British government treated the Indian Khilafat delegation of 1920 as quixotic Pan-Islamists and did not change its policy toward Turkey. The Indian Muslims' attempt to influence the treaty provisions failed, and the European powers went ahead with territorial adjustments, including the institution of mandates over formerly Ottoman Arab territories.

The significance of the Khilafat movement, however, lies less in its supposed Pan-Islamism than in its impact on the Indian nationalist movement. The leaders of the Khilafat movement forged the first political alliance among Western-educated Indian Muslims and 'ulama' (Muslim clerics) over the religious symbol of the caliphate. This leadership included the 'Ali brothers, Muhammad 'Ali (1878–1931) and Shaukat 'Ali (1872–1936), two newspaper editors from Delhi; their spiritual guide Mawlana 'Abd al-Bari (1878–1926) of Firangi Mahal, Lucknow; the Calcutta journalist and Islamic scholar Abu al-Kalam Azad (1888–1958); and Mawlana Mahmud Hasan (1851–1920), head of the madrasa at Deoband, in northern India. These publicist-politicians and 'ulama' viewed European attacks on the authority of the caliph as an attack on Islam and thus as a threat to the religious freedom of Muslims under British rule.

The Khilafat movement crystallized anti-British sentiments among Indian Muslims that had been increasing since the British declaration of war against the Ottomans in 1914. The Khilafat leaders, most of whom had been imprisoned during the war, were already active in the nationalist movement. Upon the release of these leaders in 1919, the Khilafat issue provided a means to achieve pan-Indian Muslim political solidarity in the anti-British cause. The Khilafat movement also benefited from Hindu-Muslim cooperation in the nationalist cause that had grown during the war, beginning with the Lucknow Pact of 1916 between the Indian National Congress and the Muslim League and culminating in the protest against the Rowlatt antisedition bills in 1919. The congress, then led by Mohandas Gandhi (1869–1948), called for nonviolent noncooperation against the British. Gandhi espoused the Khilafat cause, as he saw in it the opportunity to rally Muslim support for the congress. The 'Ali brothers and their allies, in turn, provided the noncooperation movement with some of its most enthusiastic followers. For a time, these Khilafatists supplanted the politics of the Muslim League and its leader, Muhammad 'Ali Jinnah (1876–1948), who opposed the movement.

The combined Khilafat–Noncooperation movement was the first all-India agitation against British rule. It saw an unprecedented degree of Hindu-Muslim cooperation, and it established Gandhi and his technique of nonviolent protest (satyagraha) at the center of the Indian nationalist movement. Mass mobilization using religious symbols was remarkably successful, and the British Indian government was shaken. In late 1921, the government moved to suppress the movement and arrested, tried, and imprisoned its leaders.

Gandhi suspended the Noncooperation movement in early 1922. The Turks dealt the final blow to the movement by abolishing the Ottoman sultanate in 1922 and the caliphate in 1924.

See also caliph, caliphate; India; Ottomans (1299–1924); Pan-Islamism

Further Reading

P. C. Bamford, Histories of the Non-Cooperation and Khilafat Movements, 1974; Mushirul Hasan, Nationalism and Communal Politics in India, 1991; Gail Minault, The Khilafat Movement: Religious Symbolism and Political Mobilization in India, 1982; M. Naeem Qureshi, Pan-Islam in British Indian Politics: A Study of the Khilafat Movement, 1999.

GAIL MINAULT

Khomeini, Ayatollah (1902–89)

Ruhallah (Ruhollah) Musavi Khumayni (1902–89), usually referred to as Ayatollah or Imam Khomeini, was the leader of the Iranian Revolution of 1979 and an influential theoretician of the Islamic shari'a. He was born to a clerical family in Khumayn, in central Iran. Khomeini's great-grandfather lived in Kashmir, but his family was from Nishapur, in the northeastern province of Khurasan. When Khomeini's father was killed in 1903 in a dispute about irrigation rights with two provincial notables, members of his family, led by his widowed mother and paternal aunt, traveled to Tehran, and after a lengthy and relentless pursuit of the case, the influential culprit was brought to justice in 1905. Resilience and determination in the face of adversity and injustice appeared ingrained in the family.

Khomeini studied jurisprudence in Qum with the leading religious authority of the time, Shaykh 'Abd al-Karim al-Ha'iri (d. 1937), and 'irfān (Islamic philosophy and mysticism) with Mirza Muhammad 'Ali Shahabadi (d. 1950), a staunch opponent of the Pahlavi dynasty (1925–79). The celebrated encyclopedist and historian Sayyid Muhsin al-Amin (d. 1952) was also one of his teachers.

Unrelenting opposition to the widespread American presence in Iran and the secularizing and state-building efforts of Muhammad Reza Shah Pahlavi (r. 1941–79) led to Khomeini's arrest in 1963. He was sent into exile in 1964, first to Turkey, soon thereafter to Iraq, and finally, in the last months of the Pahlavi dynasty, to France. He returned to Iran on February 12, 1979, having mobilized vast political demonstrations, masterminded the first religious revolution in modern times, and challenged the hegemony of the United States and the Soviet Union and their respective ideologies in the Muslim world and beyond.

With the possible exception of the first ruler of the Safavid dynasty (1501–1722), Isma'il I (r. 1501–24), Khomeini's tenure as leader of the Iranian Revolution marked the single most significant instance of the fusion of political with religious leadership in the country's history. Khomeini's contributions to Islamic political thought as a scholar and politician are conventionally considered in the context of his performance as rahbar (leader of the Iranian Revolution) and as the walī al-faqīh (guardian-jurist), which tends to subjugate his achievements in political thought to excesses committed by the Iranian government during his tenure in office. Most of his writings, and especially those written after 1979, are prescriptions for problems that he associated with Iran's immediate political malaise. He applied Islamic political precepts to radically modern situations and minimized opposition to his many innovations by adopting a clear-cut populist language and by appearing as an exemplar of austere, unflappable determination, whether in exile or at the helm of power. By resorting to Islamic precepts rooted in the Qur'an itself, in contradistinction to the abject and morally corrupt mayhem that he saw in the country's recent past, he succeeded in establishing his own novel and effective political vocabulary, with which many Iranians found themselves in some sympathy despite their avowed secularism.

Although opposed to the separation of religion from politics, which in his view was a colonialist import and not the sole gateway to good governance, he explicitly exploited the malleability of religious law when politically expedient and proved capable of adopting radical interpretations that went against the grain of centuries of jurisprudential received opinion, thereby substantially broadening the scope of interpretation to exigencies of time and place. In subordinating religious law to national priorities by resorting to the traditional concept of maṣlaḥa (in this context loosely defined as national interest), Khomeini transformed modern political discourse in Iran.

The Islamization of public life was an important concern of his after 1979, expressed and enforced through the pivotal concept of wilāyat al-faqīh (the guardianship of the jurist), first articulated by him in the 1950s. On the one hand, the principle reaffirms the clergy's claim to the authority of popular sentiment, and on the other hand, it makes Islamic rule and social order impossible outside the tutelage of the clerical profession. According to one of his students, 'Abbas Zaryab Khuyi (1919–95), it was the philosopher-king of Plato's Republic that inspired Khomeini's formulation of the walī al-faqīh. As legatees of the Prophet through his heir, the Twelfth Imam, in his role as the Mahdi (messiah), the clergy in Khomeini's view represented popular will and exercised just rule in the Imam's absence. Although many Iranians within the country and abroad regard the separation of religion from politics as essential to the welfare of the state and denounce the very concept of wilāyat al-faqīh as a self-serving ploy by the clerical establishment, the concept has gained further credence in the early years of the 21st century, as some of its erstwhile detractors now admit to a grudging acceptance of its utility as a necessary bulwark against an increasingly feasible emergence of a military dictatorship. Robust clerical presence in the public sphere, Khomeini warned, was alone capable of curbing Islamic radicalism, terrorism, and the militarization of civilian life. In his testament, Khomeini wrote, "My emphatic counsel to the armed forces is to observe and abide by the military rule of non-involvement in politics. Stay away from politics and you'll be able to preserve and maintain your military prowess and be immune to internal division and dispute."

Cognizant of the perils of lay Islamism, as exemplified in the teachings of 'Ali Shari'ati (d. 1977), the Egyptian Sayyid Qutb (d. 1966), or more recently Osama bin Laden, Khomeini relied on wilāyat al-faqīh to curb the influence of scientistic religiosity and the possibilities it afforded to nonclerics to interpret the shari'a. Presciently, as early as the 1960s, he warned his Sunni counterparts to occupy a more central role in Islamist politics in the Arab world. This plea for greater involvement was accompanied by his insistence on Muslim solidarity and the need to maintain unity in confronting the non-Muslim world, a view reflected in his fatwa (religious opinion) in 1979, which declared Friday prayers a religiopolitical obligation and, on that line of reasoning, permitted Shi'is to participate in Friday congregational prayers alongside Sunni Muslims. This was a precursor to the 2008 fatwa by Ayatollah 'Ali Sistani, Iraq's highest-ranking jurist, allowing Shi'is to participate in all congregational prayers led by Sunni imams and an example of the many ways in which, two decades after his death, Khomeini still retains a towering presence in contemporary religious and political debates.

In line with the plurality of authority that defines the nonhierarchical essence of Islamic religious infrastructure, and in a similar manner to constitutions of the United States and many European nations, Khomeini established a political system based on power sharing and exchange between the exigencies of governance and ideology. The supreme leader is selected by the 86 elected members of the Assembly of Experts, who serve for eight-year terms and have the authority to remove him from power. The Council of Guardians, whose six clerical members and six lay jurists are appointed by the supreme leader and parliament (majlis), respectively, has the authority to veto any legislation deemed contrary to Iran's constitution and the dictates of Islam and to screen all candidates for the Assembly of Experts, presidency, and parliament. Resolving the disputes between Iran's parliament and the Council of Guardians is left to the Expediency Council, the main venue for the resolution of potential conflicts between religious and secular legislation. The Expediency Council is also the institutional articulation of Iran's national priorities that will trump both the precepts of religious law and the partisanship along party lines that has defined the country's elected legislature.

A degree of pragmatism can be detected in Khomeini's views on the participation of women in public life, at least in the postrevolutionary period. While women were forced to conform to Islamic norms by covering their hair and donning manteaux (long coats), their rights to vote, run for parliament, and serve as cabinet ministers and lawyers were not taken away from them. In time, they were also allowed to serve as "advisors" to judges, circumventing the shari'a's ban on women judges. By the first decade of the 21st century, women students outnumbered men in Iran's institutions of higher education.

See also ayatollah; guardianship of the jurist; Iran; revolutions

Further Reading

Hamid Algar, Roots of the Islamic Revolution in Iran, 2001; Ruhollah Khomeini, Clarification of Questions: An Unabridged Translation of "Resaleh Towzih al-Masael," translated by J. Borujerdi, 1984; Idem, Islam and Revolution, Vol. I, Writings and Declarations of Imam Khomeini, 1941–1980, translated and annotated by Hamid Algar, 1981; 'Abbas Zaryab Khuyi, Maqalat-i Zaryab: 32 Justar dar Mawdu'at-i Gunagun bi-Damima-yi Zindiginama-yi Khudnivisht, 2010; Parvin Paidar, Women and the Political Process in Twentieth-Century Iran, 1997; Larry Ray, "'Fundamentalism,' Modernity and the New Jacobins," Economy and Society 28, no. 2 (1999); Asghar Schirazi, Constitution of Iran: Politics and the State in the Islamic Republic, 1997; Richard Tapper, ed., Ayatollah Khomeini and the Modernization of Islamic Political Thought, 2000.

NEGUIN YAVARI

Khunji, Fazl Allah b. Ruzbihan (1455–1521)

Commonly called Khwaja Mawlana Isfahani and a member of the famous Ruzbihan family, Khunji was a prominent hadith authority, Shafi'i jurist, litterateur, and historian at the Aq Quyunlu and Uzbek courts; he is also the author of works on theology and Sufism, as well as the Suluk al-Muluk (The conduct of kings), an important work on political theory. He is primarily known as an ardent and outspoken Sunni; the defining event of his life was the usurpation of Iran by Shah Isma'il I (r. 1501–24) and its transformation into a Shi'i state. Khunji fled to Transoxiana and spent the remainder of his career urging his Uzbek and Ottoman patrons to purge his homeland of Isma'il, whom he viewed as a heretic, and Isma'il's extremist Turkmen horde, called the Qizilbash, or Redheads, because of their distinctive red headgear.

Apart from an invariably polemical posture in his writings, Khunji is responsible for the well-known refutation of the Nahj al-Haqq wa-Kashf al-Sidq (The path of truth and the exposition of righteousness) of 'Allama Hilli (d. 1325), the preeminent Shi'i theologian of the Ilkhanid period, titled Ihtal Nahj al-Batil wa-Ihmal Kashf al-'Atil (Refutation of the path of falsehood and deflection of the exposition of the specious). His central argument here and elsewhere is that the impeccable members of the House of the Prophet (ahl al-bayt) cannot be truly revered when one is consumed with hatred of the Companions of the Prophet, and he includes verses in praise of the imams to demonstrate his own veneration for them. His Refutation was refuted in turn a century later by Qadi Nur Allah Shushtari (d. 1610), judge of Lahore under Emperor Akbar, as well as, more recently, by Imam al-Hasan al-Muzaffar (d. 1955) in his work Dala'il al-Sidq li-Nahj al-Haqq (Proof of the correctness of the path of truth). Khunji's strident anti-Shi'i views became somewhat tempered toward the end of his life, when it was evident that the Safavid state (1501–1722) would be no transitory phenomenon.

Khunji's status as one of the most important voices in Sunni-Shi'i polemics has tended to obscure the general erudition and breadth of his scholarship, including his political thought as formulated in the Suluk al-Muluk. Written in Persian in 1514 at the request of 'Ubaydallah Khan (r. 1535–39), his Uzbek patron after the death of Muhammad Shaybani Khan (r. 1500–10), the Suluk is a practical manual of government synthesizing two genres, that of jurisprudential (fiqh) works focused on the shari'a-state relationship and the hortative and sapiential style of Mirrors for Princes. It addresses the standard legal concerns from both Shafi'i and Hanafi perspectives and draws extensively on Mawardi (d. 1058), chief judge of Baghdad, and Ghazali (d. 1111), author of the seminal Ihya' 'Ulum al-Din (The revival of the religious sciences); it also shows the influence of the rational political philosophy of Jalal al-Din Dawani (d. 1502), author of the Akhlaq-i Jalali (The Jalalian ethics), with whom Khunji studied in his native Shiraz.

The Suluk al-Muluk reflects the author's central concern to protect the shari'a and restore orthodoxy, and it is clearly conceived as an updated and impassioned Sunni response to the fledgling Safavid Imami system of government. It contests the Shi'i position that religiolegal authority derives solely from the spiritual stature and lineage of the ruler by reasserting the standard Sunni position (held by, for example, Badr al-Din Muhammad b. Jama'a [d. 1333], the chief judge of Egypt under the Mamluks) that military force alone qualifies one to act as ruler, termed here as imam and sultan-caliph. Indeed, even a tyrannical usurper enjoys legitimate authority if he is able to consolidate his power through violent means. In the postcaliphal period inaugurated by the Mongol sack of Baghdad in 1258, Khunji, following Dawani and Fakhr al-Din al-Razi (d. 1209), considered any ruler of a Sunni polity to be caliph, or deputy of the Prophet. To achieve righteous government, Khunji held that the ruler should ideally be an administrator (mudabbir) whose main function is to apply the shari'a, while his authority should derive solely from his ability to enforce obedience; all members of government are considered his deputies.

As a prominent reformulation of Sunni political thought, Khunji's manual of government represents a sophisticated attempt to harmonize the norms of the shari'a with the prevailing non-Islamic realities of Turco-Mongol nomadic tribal confederations. His specific contributions to the development of Sunni political theory include his strong reassertion that all political power is centered in the sultan-caliph, regardless of personal character and lineage, and his recognition of the legality of taxes not provided for by the shari'a (such as the Mongol jamghā or customs impost), since they are necessary to ensure the functioning of the state—a stance that counters the common pietistic position that condemned latter-day rulers to permanent illegality. Khunji's works were widely studied in Central Asia and perhaps in Mughal India, but due to the increasing isolation of Transoxiana it appears they had little influence in the central Sunni lands.

See also caliph, caliphate; Dawani, Jalal al-Din (1427–1502); Ghazali (ca. 1058–1111); imamate; Isma'il I (1487–1524); Mawardi (974–1058); Mirrors for Princes; al-Razi, Fakhr al-Din (1149–1209); Safavids (1501–1722); shari'a; Shi'ism; sultan; Sunnism

Further Reading

Muhammad Aslam, trans., Muslim Conduct of State: Based upon the Sulūk-ul-Mulūk of Fadl-ullah bin Rūzbihān Isfahāni, 1974; Anthony Black, "The Decline of Classical Islamic Political Thought," in The History of Islamic Political Thought, 2001; Ulrich Haarmann, "Yeomanly Arrogance and Righteous Rule: Fazl Allāh ibn Rūzbihān Khunjī and the Mamluks of Egypt," in Iran and Iranian Studies: Essays in Honor of Iraj Afshar, edited by Kambiz Eslami, 1998; Ann K. S. Lambton, "The Imām/Sultan: Fadl Allāh b. Rūzbihān Khunjī," in State and Government in Medieval Islam: An Introduction to the Study of Islamic Political Theory: The Jurists, 1981.

MATTHEW MELVIN-KOUSHKI

kinship

It is impossible to overestimate the importance of kinship and ancestry to the history and culture of the Middle East. The traditional social order throughout the region was based directly on kinship, which remains the predominant mode for understanding and ordering the world. Only some of the implications of kinship for the evolution and organization of political life can be covered here.

With one exception (the matrilineal Tuareg people, who trace their descent through female ancestors), lineage in the Middle East is strictly patrilineal: individuals trace their genealogies solely through the male line. Patrilineages vary in size and in the degree of commitment they demand from their members, but in general they are collectives that retain and protect group rights to farmland, grazing land, or other entitlements. Even private property can be restricted by family ties; for instance, a man may be obliged to give his close relatives first bid if he wishes to sell his land. In cities, too, guilds, street gangs, and Sufis use the idiom of kinship (both real and fictive) to bind themselves together in self-contained and almost self-governing groups of putative "brothers."

Patrilineality in the Middle East is expressed in kinship terms that systematically differentiate between paternal and maternal lines. A mother's brothers are distinguished from the father's brothers, as are cousins on the father's side and the mother's side. There is also a strong tendency toward patrilocality: men are expected to remain in the village, quarter, camp, or house of their patrilineage; wives move to be with their husbands and not the other way around. Brides are kept near home by the common preference for men to marry the daughters of their father's brothers. This is referred to as marriage "close to the bone." Another typical feature of most of the kinship systems of the Middle East is the absence of any terminological recognition of ranking of siblings, so that there is no linguistic differentiation of elder and younger. This coincides with an egalitarian system of inheritance and the absence of primogeniture, where the first-born son holds the place of privilege. As a result, when a ruler dies, he usually is succeeded by one of his brothers, not by his eldest son.

Traditionally, tribal political rivalries and alliances were based on a flexible pattern of complementary opposition among patrilateral kin, varying according to genealogical distance. Men were expected to side with their closer blood relatives against those more distant and to share the responsibilities and obligations of blood revenge according to the degree of "closeness." Thus, in the oft-quoted axiom "I against my brothers; my brothers and I against our cousins; my brothers, my cousins, and I against the world," the cousins in question were patrilateral. This neat picture of lineage-based segmentation was complicated by strategic alliances based on the ancient principle that "the enemy of my enemy is my friend," which led to a dual system of opportunistic factional blocs, such as the liff of the Berbers, that cut across lineage units. However, these blocs, while politically important in ordinary life, did not supersede blood ties or obligations.

The first theorist to analyze the pervasive political significance of kinship in the Middle East was the 14th-century North African scribe, judge, and scholar Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406), who argued that Bedouin tribesmen were characterized by their strong ties of 'aṣabiyya, or "group feeling," a result of their common patrilineal descent. According to Ibn Khaldun, tribal leaders were "first among equals," chosen by consultation among their peers. United by their group feeling, the Bedouin could conquer centralized regimes, but inevitably the new ruler would then be tempted to marginalize and subdue his previously equal lineage mates, replacing them with compliant slaves and clients. Over four generations, this policy, while increasing the authority of the center, undermined tribal 'aṣabiyya, leaving the state susceptible to conquest by a new wave of warriors bound together by their empowering ideology of shared blood.

The relationships and attitudes promoted by the kin-based ideology of 'aṣabiyya thus coincided with a moral environment where authority was achieved by competition among coequal kinsmen, not ascribed to supposedly innate superiors, and where rulers were treated with no great awe or obeisance. Such a debunking ethic delegitimated relations of hierarchy and command and coincided with the relatively rapid rise and fall of dynasties in the Middle East, where no lineage had any intrinsic right to authority. To overcome factionalism, religious leaders often sought to supersede lineage allegiances under the flag of the faith. In this, they were inspired by the example of Muhammad, who proclaimed that piety, not blood, would determine authority in the encompassing womb of Islam. However, this ideal was not realized even in Muhammad's own time, when some of the elite members of Muhammad's own lineage (the Quraysh) jealously opposed diminution of their prestige.

The typical Arabic patterns of inheritance and terminology contrast with the Central Asian and Turkic kinship systems in which seniority among siblings is always terminologically marked so that lineages descended from the eldest son are ranked above those descended from younger sons in a ramifying hierarchical array. This system was imported into the Middle East by the Seljuqs, the Qajars, and, most importantly, the Ottomans, whose long-lived regime repudiates Ibn Khaldun's portrait of rapidly eroding imperiums. There are many reasons for Ottoman longevity, but one is the legitimation of authority implicit within its ranked kinship structure. As a result, the right of the Osmanli line (the lineage of the sultans) to rule was rarely challenged by lesser lineages. Rather, the sons of the sultan contested violently for the throne among themselves, with the victor putting his brothers to death or blinding them. But despite internal struggles over succession, it was nonetheless taken for granted that sovereignty was the natural prerogative of the Osmanli lineage. This assumption was at odds with the prevalent pattern in the Arabic world, where rivals unwilling to ascribe innate superiority to any sultan contested secular authority. Unstinting submission, in this system, could only be granted to those whose loyalty was solely to God. The family system of Arabia, it seems, favored the rise of prophets, while that of Central Asia favored the coronation of kings.

See also genealogy; honor; Ibn Khaldun (1332–1406); solidarity; tribalism

Further Reading

Jean Cuisenier, Economie et Parente: Leurs affinites de structure dans le domaine turc et dans le domaine arabe, 1975; Ibn Khaldun, The Muqaddimah, translated by F. Rosenthal, 1967; Charles Lindholm, "Kinship Structure and Political Authority: The Middle East and Central Asia," Comparative Studies in Society and History 28, no. 3 (1986).

CHARLES LINDHOLM

knowledge

Knowledge is information about the nature of existence, and such information, when true, provides guidance for human decision making in both private and public matters. Decision making, in principle, is led by true knowledge, and in Islam this means religious knowledge as derived from divine guidance, communicated in God's speech (the Qur'an) and embodied in the precedent (sunna) of the Prophet Muhammad. In addition, since these sources do not speak to every aspect of life, Muslim scholars have devised other means by which to issue rulings for emergent situations. These include communal consensus on an issue, possible comparison of a new situation to a past ruling, local custom if deemed good, and a host of principles that scholars have culled from the religious heritage over the centuries. The recognition of multiple sources of knowledge has given Islam a healthy degree of flexibility by which to adapt to changing patterns of history.

The worth of religious knowledge to the well-being of human society, however, has always been contested in some form. Its truth depends in part on its relevance alongside other kinds of knowledge, including not only secular knowledge obtained by human efforts, such as philosophical and scientific claims, but also "spiritual knowledge" that saintly figures claim to receive from the other world via special inspiration. Such alternatives often work in tandem with religious knowledge but can also challenge it. Central to the politics of religious knowledge is the effort to defend its value as divine guidance for the world. This can happen by a willingness to die in defense of it, skill in persuading others of it by reasoned argument, the use of force to enthrone it as emblem of national sovereignty, or the personal struggle to display a noble character as evidence of its impact on one's soul.

A number of studies call attention to the role of religious knowledge as an organizing agent of Muslim society, the corresponding social prestige of those who possess it, and the loss of this prestige when secular knowledge overtakes religious knowledge as the predominant agent of decision making. Knowledge is vital to public order, and the acquisition of culturally valued knowledge can bring status, but for knowledge to be acted upon, it must hold true. The impact of religious knowledge on public life is therefore a question not only of its prestige and power but also of its credibility as source of moral guidance for society. Is it demonstrably true?

Traditionally, for example, a statement of the Prophet is considered true if it can be reliably traced back via a sound chain of transmitters to its prophetic origin. In contrast, the truth of other kinds of knowledge, such as knowledge of geometry or politics, does not depend on a chain of transmission; its truth does not depend on a prophetic origin but on its rationality. Thus the force of religious knowledge for Muslim society is not simply a function of the prestige of those who have mastered it but because it is understood to be demonstrably true by examination of its transmission from the Messenger of God. The prophetic origins of knowledge verify its status as divine truth, making it a worthy guide. It is therefore essential to transmit religious knowledge from one generation to the next to ensure that society is in proper relation with God's will. Within this traditional conceptualization of religious knowledge, those who memorize and reproduce it are notable in society as guarantors of a life in conformity to truth as communicated by God.

This role, however, is considerably diminished when the truth claims of religious knowledge lose credibility in the face of other forms of knowledge that do not require a prophetic origin for their credibility. Religious knowledge in Islam has always had its competitors, but the advent of European rule in Muslim lands brought a profound and pervasive challenge to the truths of Islam. Not only did the ascendancy of European forms of knowledge marginalize the prestige of religious learning, but it also introduced critical analysis—apart from sound transmission—as the ultimate arbiter of truth claims, including those of religion. To be credible, religious knowledge had to hold up to human methods of verification. Thus the increasing irrelevancy of religious knowledge in its traditional form is a question not primarily of the loss of power and prestige on the part of religious authorities but rather of the acceptance of new standards for determining true and useful knoweldge.

